The Peking National Government may be divided into three factions: There is first the President, the Cabinet and the little group of officials who are, for the most part, earnest and well meaning. They are trying to carry on the affairs of the government with a treasury depleted and almost bankrupt, credit exhausted and resources undeveloped because almost no one can be trusted in the present system of graft. Eleven of the provinces are already independent of Peking. The officials refuse to pay the local revenues into the Central Government, whose power now extends, in some respects, scarcely beyond the gates of Peking. The officials of the National Government together with the soldiers, professors, teachers and police have back pay owing them for many months. The government is struggling on one day at a time trying to weather the present crisis without bankruptcy.

The second point of the triangle of forces behind the National Government is Tsao Kun, the military governor of Paotingfu, who holds the military command over the three provinces about Peking. He is a man of little or no education, but shrewd and cunning. He is able to play the old game of diplomacy and seems now to be the chief factor in dictating the policy of the National Government in Peking. The important actions of the Cabinet must receive his confirmation, and it is the opinion of those in touch with the situation that he is seeking to get the presidency for himself, or failing that to get the vice-presidency.

The third point of the triangle is Wu Pei Fu, the able general under Tsao Kun, in command of his army at Loyang, the strategic point midway between Peking and Central China. With the aid of his Christian General Feng and a better trained army, he defeated the Governor of Manchuria, Chang Tso Lin, and seemed for the moment to be the hope of China. He failed to enter Peking, however, to redress crying wrongs, to reform the government or to accomplish anything worth while after his fruitless victory. It is such useless military expeditions and aimless preparation and fighting that are draining China's strength. Thus the Central Government is divided into at least three factions which must each be satisfied before any move or compromise is agreed upon. Eleven provinces are already independent of Peking. China seems to be breaking up again in sectional military feudalism.

In the north is the famous Governor, Chang Tso Lin, who rules the three Manchurian provinces. He long dictated the policies of the Central Government and overshadowed it by his army which was defeated in the recent battle, when his forces advanced to capture the city and take over the government. He is a shrewd diplomat who has risen by sheer force and native ability. He had come to a working agreement first with the Japanese militarists in his province and later with the Bolsheviks and through them has been getting ammunition and supplies for his army. Like a number of the other military governors he has failed to put down the growing number of bandits in his district, or to develop adequate trade and the vast mineral resources of his province. He is ever training new men for his army. It is the common expectation that he will begin another attack upon Peking about next April.

Each of these three generals has seized one of the three principal railways and commandeers its revenue in order to pay his army. Tsao Kun commands the Puko-Tientsin railway, Wu Pei Fu the lucrative Peking-Hankow line, and Chang Tso Lin holds the railway running south from Mukden for revenue and military purposes. Thus the National Government is robbed of its income from the three principal railways. In 1919 the National Government spent some three million dollars for education and over one hundred million for the army and military purposes, in addition to all provincial armies. Bribery and "squeeze" have reduced the income on practically all the other railways in China and the officials have stolen or squandered the capital raised to build new lines. Almost the only road that is paying adequate dividends to-day is the one under the control of the British between Shanghai and Nanking.

In the South Sun Yat Sen, a born revolutionist, idealist and impractical visionary, claims to be China's only hope. All the while he conducts negotiations with the Bolsheviks, the ex-bandit Chang Tso Lin, the Japanese militarists or anyone who can promise him hope of success. He commands but a small following among practical men, but holds the confidence of a number of young inexperienced students and scattered idealists throughout the country. General Chen has evicted Sun Yat Sen and seized the government at Canton. With some other governors he stands for the doctrine of state rights for the provinces, local autonomy and complete independence of Peking. The province of Fukien in the South is held by "Little Hsiu," a military leader who has left a bad record behind him as an agent of the grafting Japanese party in the North. Other provinces are similarly in open defiance or are semi-independent of Peking. The North and South are still at enmity after several years of fighting, retreating and looting.

There are a few good men in sight, but they are not now in places of political power. David Yui, the National Secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association, enjoys the widest confidence of everyone in China. He was sent as the people's representative to the Washington Conference, and on his return was welcomed by the President and the leading officials; he was received with devotion by a hundred thousand people in Tientsin, and by great crowds in other cities. He is now attempting to raise part of the thirty million dollars needed to redeem the Shantung railway from Japan in fulfilment of the agreement of the Washington Conference. General Feng, the Chinese Gordon or Stonewall Jackson of China, is a man far stronger than President Li. He has already won nine thousand of his officers and men to the Christian life, and is now in command of what is probably the nearest approach to a "Christian army" of any body of men since Cromwell's Ironsides. The professional armies of America, Britain and Europe seem immoral, godless and pagan compared to Feng's army, with whom I have been. Almost the entire body of his officers and the majority of his soldiers are equally efficient in Bible study and in honest discipline, in prayer or in fearlessly fighting for the defense of their country.

After being the Christian Governor of two provinces, General Feng has now been ordered to Peking to take command there. Jealous factions may be counted upon to do all they can to undermine his influence or starve out his soldiers, whose pay is already many months in arrears. But he may yet prove to be the man to save the situation in China. He may yet become China's first Christian president. In the voting on the "twelve greatest living Chinese," conducted by a journal in China, he stands fifth. Three of the first five and seven of the entire twelve are Christian men, although the Christians number only one in eight hundred of the population. The present Premier is a Christian and Mr. W. W. Yen, a former and probable coming Premier, is also one, but no other Christian has to-day the same qualifications or possibilities for the presidency as General Feng.

Twenty-two years ago his heart was touched when my classmate, Horace Pitkin, Miss Morrill and others were martyred at Paotingfu. Ten years ago he decided to become a Christian in a meeting conducted by John R. Mott in Peking. To-day he leads the most Christian army in the world. His twenty thousand men will neither drink, smoke, gamble nor loot. These Christian men are the hope of China.

The "New Thought Movement" of China is an intellectual renaissance of young Chinese students and intellectuals. It marks the transition from the medieval to the modern world. The movement was born in the spring of 1919 and marks a new day for China as did the transition during the middle ages in Europe. These students and intellectuals are the vanguard of China's oncoming democracy.

The movement is characterized in the first place by a merciless criticism of all the evils of the past. In place of the old autocracy, they lead the way to a new democracy; instead of the antiquated corrupt officials they demand efficient leaders for the new government. They likewise call for the reform of the autocratic, paternal family system, the adoption of the popular vernacular in place of the ancient classical language and literature, the reform of society and the reorganization of industry to eliminate the exploitation of the sweated labor of the poor by profiteering, selfish capitalists. They call for a reform of religion which will free it of all superstition.

The first cause of the new movement may be traced to the breaking down of China's social system with its present "squeeze," corruption, militarism, lawlessness and economic privation, followed by the assault upon China's sovereignty by the twenty-one demands of the Japanese militarists. The second cause is found in the rise of the new democratic movement throughout the world, the effect of the World War, the downfall of Prussian militarism and the influence of the Russian revolution. The third cause is seen in the widespread influence of Christianity and its institutions, and finally in the awakening of the new intellectual leaders of China who are guiding the movement.

The principal foreign sources of the movement may be traced to the pragmatism of Dewey and James, the realism of Bertrand Russell, the philosophy of Bergson and Eucken, the socialism of Marx, the communism of Lenin and Trotsky, the writings of Tolstoi, Wells, Shaw and other modern writers.

The political effect of the movement was observable in the uprising on May 4, 1919, when five thousand students roused popular national sentiment over the loss of Shantung through the military policies of Japan. Their influence led to a strike of the merchants, the boycott of Japanese goods, and to the expulsion of the members of the Chinese Cabinet who were selling out the interests of China to Japan. The students may now lead the way in the development of a democratic public sentiment if they stand together on moral issues. The student strikes in many colleges show the new democratic uprising against an autocratic and often inefficient educational system. But their complication with politics sometimes makes them the cats-paws of scheming politicians. The chief danger of the New Thought Movement is its lack of moral and spiritual dynamic and the present anti-religious attitude of many of its leaders. Two of the leaders that I interviewed were frank atheists and stated that the majority of students in the National University were agnostics. Seventy-nine leaders of the anti-religious movement came out on March 21, 1922, with a declaration against Christianity on the occasion of the World's Student Christian Federation Conference held in Peking. Their attack upon Christianity was based upon its alleged alliance with capitalism, militarism and war, and the selfishness of its unjust social order. While the New Thought Movement is one of great intellectual promise, there is danger that it will destroy much that is good in its desire to eliminate the evils of the past.

We were requested to come to China to conduct meetings for these students and leaders. The first night in Peking the Chenkwang Theater was crowded and several hundred were standing. We spoke on "The Present World Chaos and Proposed Roads to Freedom." On the following three nights the largest church available was filled with some eleven hundred non-Christian students. On the second night we spoke on "Christianity, a Progressive Religion," showing that civilization involves the harmonious development of the material, intellectual, social, aesthetic, moral and spiritual life, and that to omit any one of these elements cripples the individual and the nation. We then sought evidence as to whether the influence of pure Christianity in each of these six spheres had made for progress.

On the next night we were assigned the subject of "Jesus' Ideal of a New Social Order." After discussing the causes of the worldwide social and industrial unrest, we took up the various proposed solutions, such as, state socialism, anarchism, syndicalism, guild socialism, communism and Bolshevism. We then discussed the principles of Jesus and their application to a new social order involving the moral organization of mankind in a Kingdom of God or a Commonwealth of Humanity. On the closing night we were assigned the subject, "Jesus' Philosophy of Life." In this service some four hundred students signed cards as inquirers and were enrolled in Christian Bible classes desiring to make a scientific study of Jesus' way of life. This student audience in Peking is now one of the most critical and intelligent in the world. After each address the meeting was thrown open for questions. The fine spirit shown in these questions revealed an openness of mind, a real spiritual hunger and an absence of carping criticism that gave evidence that the heart of China's students is as sound as ever.

In Tientsin over two thousand young men attended the lectures each day. There were over four hundred inquirers desiring to enter Bible classes and two hundred prepared men expressed the desire to enter the Christian life. In Chefoo nine hundred and forty-seven non-Christians registered as inquirers to enter classes for the purpose of studying the Bible and there were over two hundred decisions for the Christian life.

In the midst of the corruption of China's officials, the growth of banditry, lawlessness and disorder, we see signs of hope in a real intellectual renaissance among China's students and intellectuals. The basic moral depth of the students and common people is the hope of the future of China's democracy that is yet to be. With all the corruption of her official class, I do not for a moment waver in my faith in her great future. This people that has stood for four thousand years through twenty-four long dynasties and a decade of the new republic will weather the present storms. For China goes on forever. The government may falter, but the people are stolid and stable. There is promise of a religious reformation which, coupled with the growth of her renaissance movement, may lead China from the medieval into the modern world.

The Dualism of Our Christianity

THE following is a very partial report of a speech by Bishop Paul Jones at the meeting of the New York section of the Fellowship for a Christian Social Order:

What we mean by a Christian social order is certainly not a social order that will simply allow a person with a Christian conscience to "get by" without getting his conscience hurt taking part in it. It is a social order which in itself is an embodiment of the whole Christian idea.

How are we going to get it? There have been those at times who have suggested that here we have the Church, the Christian organizations, here we have the social order—like having a can of paint and a barn, you want to paint the barn. It is simply a matter of applying the paint to the barn. Of course, we cannot apply Christianity to a social order like that, nor is it just a matter of Christians drawing up specifications of what this social order must be and taking steps to put these into effect.

Christianity is not a type of legislation. It is a life. And so far as our social order becomes Christian, it becomes a full expression of the Christian life. As to the way in which we are going to get out of the provincialism which sees our lives in terms of our own interests, that question brings us back to a consideration of what we have in the nature of the Christian life at the present time.

A moral dualism is a general characteristic of us and the Church, the holding of ideals and of standards, of real value and worth while our practise is upon quite a different level. Practically every characteristic doctrine or teaching of Christianity is almost directly negated when we come to apply it to the life we are living. We have standards, ideals, principles which are very high and very noble, and we have that other thing which directly cuts across them all the time.

For example, we talk about forgiveness as being characteristic of a Christian person. We mean forgiveness, not simply as a response when someone comes to you and begs your pardon, but that attitude which leads a person to go out and bring a sinner back, like a mother making her prodigal son repent. That is what we mean by God's forgiveness. Where do we find forgiveness like that among Christian people? Occasionally we find it among individuals, but in general, in our churches, we are perfectly satisfied that for those who break our laws, for those who need our forgiveness most we should have no place for forgiveness in our system. We have them arrested, tried, sentenced. So much punishment for so much crime. Some are stupid enough to believe that these practises will work a transformation in the individual. But we do not find any way of bringing forgiveness into our relationships.

Far be it from me to undervalue all the changes needed in the structure of our social order, in legislative motives, in forms of organizations internally and internationally. Of course we need these things, because as strictly as anyone I believe in the action of the conditions in which we live upon the human spirit. But far deeper than that is the fact that we make out of the spirit which we have the machinery to do these things. "Where there's a will, there's a way." Our lack is that we have not sufficient will to get together with the peoples of other races, not sufficient will to find ways of living with Turks and Germans and whatever group you will. We are thinking of our rights. What has that got to do with the Christian life?

CHAPTER I—THE COLONEL RETURNS.

IT was early in the summer that a tall, lean, bronzed looking man found his way up the gangway from Boulogne pier to the cross-channel steamer. Even had he been in civilian attire he would not have been taken for anything but a soldier—a soldier of the best order. There was something in the way he walked, something, too, in the light of his thoughtful gray eyes which suggested not only order and precision, but association with danger.

Presently his lips quivered and his eyes became slightly dimmed.

"Nearly six years," he murmured. "Even Alice will be changed, while the children will have grown almost beyond recognition."

If ever a man looked eagerly forward to his return home it was Lester Trelawney. He had been away from home for six years. Even before the outbreak of the war, his regiment having been sent to Egypt, he had to bid good-bye to his wife and children almost without warning or time for preparation. Later he was ordered to India.

At the end of his work in Egypt and India he was sent to Mesopotamia, where, after a good deal of strenuous work, he had been taken prisoner. Here, in a foul smelling den, he had been taken ill and practically gave up all hope of ever seeing his home again. A sound constitution and a dogged determination not to be beaten, however, carried him through. Not only did he get well, but he managed to escape from his jailers.

"Trelawney, is that you?"

He turned and saw a man who had just emerged from a cabin.

"Why—yes, it's Wykham. I am glad to see you."

"Not more glad than I am to see you. Heaven only knows how much good honest sorrow I've wasted over you. You've been given up for dead twice. Let's see, you've not been home since '14, have you?"

"No."

"Beastly shame, I call it. But you are all sorts of a big gun now, I can tell you."

"Hardly. Only a colonel."

"But you'll be more than that—a brigadier for certain."

"I'm not troubling about that sort of thing," he replied; "my one thought is to see my wife and children."

"Of course, of course. By Jove, you'll be a bit excited, although you look as cool as a cucumber. Why, it's nearly six years since you left."

"Yes, six years," and there was a far-away look in his eyes.

"I saw your wife a few weeks ago."

"Did you?" Trelawney looked questioningly at the other.

"Yes. She looked scarcely a day older. The change will not be in her. It will be in the children. How many have you?"

"Four. Two boys and two girls. The youngest, Peggy, was barely eleven when I left. The eldest, Trevor, was just over seventeen when the war broke out."

"And now he's twenty-three. By Jove, you will find a change. We'll go up to London together, eh?"

"I can't promise," replied Trelawney. "My wife may be here to meet me."

"Oh, yes, of course. Well, the best of luck! I expect I shall be seeing you often now you are back again."

"There she is!"

Lester Trelawney was utterly unconscious of the crowd of onlookers as he passed along the gangway. He had seen a face which made him forget, not only the past years of peril and excitement, but all his surroundings.

"Alice, my darling, it is good of you to come," he murmured as he held a little woman in his arms, and kissed her many times. "There, don't cry, little wife. I'm back safe and sound."

"I can't help it," she sobbed. "I'm so—so—oh, thank God you've come—"

She was a small-featured but pretty woman, in spite of the fact that she was past forty. There was scarcely a line on her face and not a single gray hair among her golden locks.

"Oh, Lester, I'm so proud, so thankful, so happy! You are sure you are all right?"

"Sure, Alice," he laughed. "There, I'll try and find an empty carriage."

"I bribed the conductor to reserve one for us," and a blush surmounted her cheek as she spoke. "I thought—I thought—"

"Yes, I know what you thought," interrupted Trelawney joyfully. "Alice, this hour almost repays one for all the years we've been separated. There are thousands of questions I want to ask you, and heaps of things you'll have to tell me. The children are all right, I hope?"

"Yes, they are all right. Of course, Trevor isn't at home, but the girls are both all right. You'll hardly know them."

"Fancy my little Peg with her hair up!" Trelawney sighed as he spoke. "Then she'll be quite grown up."

"Yes, quite; she's a lot older than her age. Oh, I am glad you are home again. I don't think I could have gone on much longer without you."

"Nothing wrong, I hope?"

"Oh, no, nothing at all. But—oh, I have wanted you!"

They were alone in the compartment at length, and again Coloney Trelawney took his wife in his arms and held her close to him. Evidently the years had not cooled his ardor, nor had his affection for his wife lessened. Nevertheless there was a tone in her voice that made him anxious, especially when he asked her about the children.

"Ah, well, I hope I am home for good now," he replied gently. "Oh, my little wife, you have not wanted me half as badly as I have wanted you."

She nestled up closely to him like a tired child nestles to its mother, and sighed contentedly.

"I never wanted you so much as during the last two years," she said. "You see the children seemed to grow up suddenly."

"And everything has become so dear," went on Mrs. Trelawney. "Prices are simply awful, and although school bills have stopped, the girls have had to have more expensive dresses, while, as I told you, Trevor has had to be helped. Of course Eleanor and John earned a good deal."

"Eleanor" cried the Colonel in a tone of questioning surprise.

"Yes, she got a post under government. Everybody did it during the war, you know; but that's over now. Still it has given the girls all sorts of notions."

Trelawney was silent. He was an understanding man, and although he spoke no word, it was easy to see that he read more in his wife's words than she had voiced.

"Poor little girl," he said at length. "I'm afraid you've had a difficult time, and I have been so wrapped up in my own affairs that I have not realized how you've been placed. But never mind. I'm home now, and together we'll soon have everything straight."

"I'm sure I've tried very hard to do what I thought you would like," said Mrs. Trelawney. "But I never realized how helpless I was until I was left alone. You see, no matter what difficulty arose I always had you. But everything has become so changed, and—and the girls are very high-spirited and headstrong. People say that the spirit of the age is different, and that the old happy days will never come back again."

"Ah, but they will," laughed Trelawney. "I can see your position exactly. I had scarcely realized that our kiddies have grown up, and although I have been trying to remember that Trev is twenty-three and Eleanor twenty-one, I always find myself thinking of them as kiddies just as I left them. Why, as you know, I often put them to bed and heard them say their prayers. Ah, well, I shall have to adapt myself to the new conditions. But that will be all right. They always did love their old dad, and they always will. By Jove, Alice, but we are going to have a great time," and again he kissed his wife tenderly.

Again the tears brimmed into her eyes, but it was easy to see that they were tears of happiness.

"I feel as though a great burden had been rolled from me," she said. "I've got my old husband again. Oh, Lester, a woman is a poor thing without a man. But I feel as though I'm afraid of nothing now. Oh, my husband, you will believe that I've done my best, won't you?"

"Of course I shall—and do," replied the Colonel. "But is there anything you haven't told me, Alice? There's nothing on your mind that troubles you, is there?"

"No-o; only things have been so different from what I expected. I used to think—but, there, it's all right. You are home, and I'm so happy that I almost ache with it. There, kiss me again, and tell me I'm silly for bothering."

"Of course you are silly," laughed the Colonel. "Your nerves are a bit overwrought by the excitement of my coming. Just fancy, it's nearly six years since I've been home. More than once I thought I should never see you again. But by the mercy of God I am here, well and strong."

The train swept up through Kent and, just as the evening shadows were falling, neared London.

"The very sight of the old city gives one a new lease of life," he cried. "And no wonder. I've been so much away from civilization for years that to feel the throb of London life again is like food to a starving man. In another few minutes we'll be at Victoria. I am excited, Alice! Fancy, in less than an hour I shall see our kiddies."

"Yes, and they'll be excited, too. They are all the time wondering what you'll be like."

An hour later a taxicab bearing the Colonel and his wife made its way to the door of the Trelawney house on Hempstead Heath.

Town and Country Work of the Home Missions Council

SOME account of the annual meeting of the Home Missions Council has appeared in another issue of THE CHRISTIAN WORK. In the field of rural work an unusually interesting report was presented by the chairman of the Town and Country Committee, Dr. Paul L. Vogt. He drew attention to the fact that six denominations had one or more full-time executives in the rural field; that four others had part time executives in this field; and that two are considering carefully the employment of a rural secretary. He reported as a gain to the knowledge of rural life, and particularly the rural church, the publication of the regional surveys of the Committee on Social and Religious Surveys. Their significance, he feels, lies chiefly in six things:

1. These surveys are the first made since the war.
2. They are the first made since the great denominational "drives."
3. They include the first surveys ever made of the Range Country and the South.
4. They are the first surveys to cover rural America systematically by regions.
5. They are based upon far wider information than was ever before assembled.
6. They are at once scientific in content and popular in presentation.

Last year eighteen hundred country pastors attended summer schools. In the Northern Methodist Church alone nearly four thousand pastors have had such training since 1917. With the increasing enrolment it has become easy for a large number of these summer schools to be conducted on a denominational basis, but the likelihood is that in a number of State institutions post-graduate schools for rural ministers will be developed. The Town and Country Committee has worked out a four-year course which will enable a student to cover pretty thoroughly in four successive summers the field of town and country work.

In the field of mountain work the Committee recommended the calling of a conference on the Ozark region and correlation of work in the better known Appalachian section. The majority of the denominations report two-thirds of their membership in rural areas; only two have as few as fifty per cent there. The average size of congregations of the various denominations is between seventy and eighty. The Southern Methodists with 103 and the Moravians with 115 per church lead. In the South there are nearly three country churches per minister. The Baptists and Methodists of the North have two for each minister; the Presbyterians a little less than one and one-half and the Moravians one and one-quarter. Probably one reason why the Moravian average is so good lies in the fact that their congregations are larger, and that, therefore, the payment of an adequate wage is not so much of a burden on individual members and also because practically all of their country churches are supplied with parsonages.

The most recent denomination to assign rural work to a full paid executive is the United Brethren. Miss Lydia B. Wiggim is giving much of her time to this phase of the work.

Foreign Correspondence

Christianity in Japan

JAPAN was opened in 1854. The first missionaries from this country were landed in 1859. Now there are over eight hundred Protestant missionaries working there. These missionaries were sent out by over twenty missionary societies in Europe and America, and there are about two hundred thousand Christians scattered all over the country. Two hundred thousand Christians out of sixty millions of people are but one in three hundred. One Christian to every three hundred unbelievers is a small proportion. Japan is not yet a Christian country. The citadel of her heathenism is not broken down. Ignorance and superstition still hold their sway over the masses of the people. Buddhists and Shintoism are doing all they can to oppose Christianity. Moreover, rationalism, skepticism and materialism from Germany, England and America have found their way to Japan, and they are just as eager to make new converts in the fresh soil of Japan as they are in their home lands. Still, Japan is more Christian in her spirit than she herself knows. Doors have been opened everywhere for Christian work. The Christians are growing more and more influential. Perhaps Japan herself does not know how much and to what extent the Christian elements are working in her bosom. But the time is coming, and it is not far distant, when she will understand that the leaven of the Gospel which is working in her midst so steadily is an important element of the mighty movement of her social life.

Now, what are some of the special phases of Christianity in Japan? In other words, how is the Christian religion progressing; how is Christian thought developing in the land of the Far East? I want to tell you of two facts in regard to this, and as briefly as I can.

I want to mention, in the first place, the union of the different churches and the non-sectarian character of the Japanese Christians. In Japan almost all the different churches of Europe and America, from the English High Church down to the Salvation Army, are represented by their denominations, but the denominational distinction in Japan is a small thing. The Japanese do not care for the sectarian spirit; they do not want to import or repeat the denominational strifes and ecclesiastical quarrels of other lands. What they want is to get the marrow of Christianity, the outward forms of religion are almost nothing to them. Consequently, the more missionaries are catholic and non-sectarian in their spirit, the more successful they are in their work. In Japan the several denominations stand in such a relation that the organic union of these churches in some way or other, some day, may not be impossible. I often hear people say that we ought to be loyal to the denomination to which we belong. But our loyalty to the Church we belong to does not hinder our Christian fellowship with those who belong to sister churches. Yes, that is true, but if Christians belonging to the different denominations can come together, forgetting their own isms, to unite under the same banner of the Cross to work for their common Master, if such a thing be possible, I think nothing is more desirable.

Now, in Japan we are trying just that sort of thing. Already the American Presbyterians, North and South, the Dutch Reformed, the German Reformed, the Cumberland Presbyterians, and the Scotch Presbyterians are united under the name of the Church of Christ in Japan. The Methodist Episcopal, the Methodist South, the Methodist Protestant and the Canadian Methodist have made their organic union under the name of the Japanese Methodist Church. The English and American Episcopal churches have joined their hands under the name of the Holy Catholic Church of Japan to carry on their common work. Several years ago there was a proposal to bring the Congregationalists and Presbyterians together. Unfortunately, we have failed in that proposal, but, in my opinion, their union in some way may not be impossible.

Now I come to the second point, What is the Japanese Christian's attitude toward theology? Some people, especially friends of the Christian work in Japan in this country, seem to be anxious about the Japanese Christians as to their orthodoxy. I do not discuss here whether they are orthodox or heterodox. Nor do I wish to defend them, but I do tell you that the Japanese Christians are just as loyal and faithful to their Divine Master as any Christians are. They stick to the fundamental truths of Christianity which were proved and tested through the Christian centuries. Their belief in Christ as the Son of God, the Redeemer of mankind, comes not so much from their intellectual curiosity as from their profound spiritual experience. They have something sacred in their innermost hearts which neither science nor criticism can touch. God's truths are dearer to them than their own lives. However, they are not afraid to read, to think and ponder, and to discuss. They keep their minds alert and wide awake. They try not to get behind the times. They are ready to receive wisdom from all quarters of Heaven. More earnest and zealous seekers of truth you can hardly find. They know something of what essential elements are, as distinguished from the non-essentials. They know that Christian theology is more than philosophy. They know that Christianity is more than the Creed or the Church. They know that Christianity is Christ, and that Christ is Christianity, and, therefore, their creed is just as simple as and creed can be. They try to get deep down into the heart of Christ, that is all. This is the reason why Dean Stanley, Frederick Robinson, Henry Ward Beecher, Phillips Brooks, George A. Gordon and Charles Jefferson are most influential among the Japanese Christians, as Spurgeon, Moody and Chapman are the most popular. You should not be anxious about the Japanese Christians. They are growing in grace as well as in knowledge. They are your friends, your co-laborers in the vineyard of the Lord.

The Walk to Emmaus

"After that he appeared in another form unto two of them, as they walked and went into the country."—MARK 16:12.

ONE cannot read the stories of the appearance of our Lord after his resurrection without being struck by two facts. First, that some great and subtle change had taken place in the medium of his manifestation from that by which his disciples were wont to recognize him throughout his earthly life. He appears always, as it were, in disguise. About the how and manner of these transformations, it is useless to speculate. But it may not be altogether idle to remark that we have some difficulty in recognizing the same physical life in the multitude of forms in which it has appeared in the course of its evolution: and perhaps the baffling difficulties in the way of tracing its transformations may suggest, here, belief in the fact of spiritual transformations, of which the manner is, and perhaps, in this region, may ever remain, beyond our ken.

But it is equally clear that, despite all changes, the identity of the risen Christ with the Jesus of the earthly life was always maintained. The disciples recognize him, not by the seeing of the outward eye, but by the recognition of the spiritual self; Mary, by the accent of the voice; the seven, by the marvelous effect of the command from the shore, "Cast the net on the right side of the boat," that brings back to them that first great hour when they became fishers of men; these two, at least, by the prayer of blessing and in the breaking of the bread.

The account of the walk to Emmaus suggests to us first, the fact that Christ appears to us in different forms to-day as he did in the first great moments of the Eastertide. To one he is supremely Jesus, the historic person, whose whole significance is in the great unfolding of what a human life can be. To another he is our Lord, and the words we use reflect the transcendent awe we feel in his presence, as of One by nature or achievement other than ourselves. To still another he is the Master and Teacher, unfolding, in lesson after lesson, the secrets of the nature of God, and human life. And to others he is Christ, life's living, present, intimate companion, the Fellow of Jehovah, the Fellow of Humanity, a mystic presence nearer to us than breathing, closer than heart's faith by expounding to them the Scriptures. But all these forces may be united in one experience. Every hymn-book is a school for such an enlargement of experience. German reformer, Roman Catholic priests, Episcopalian bishops, Methodist evangelists, present Christ to us in different forms. "As we sing these hymns we step into a shining fellowship, from which no power can excommunicate us but our own little-mindedness and sin."

Second, the ministry of the risen Jesus to the hearts of men is here depicted in moving form. The death of Jesus on the cross had destroyed the hopes of these two, the mighty hopes that he would redeem Israel. They had lost their gladness, the gladness, the radiance that the living Christ had imparted to their lives, with his glowing vision of God, his tremendous faith in man.

Third, He restored their faith by showing them the reason of his sufferings and death. He cleared the way for the hearts faith by expounding to them the Scriptures. He interprets the entire history of Israel, the meaning of prophecy, the necessity of his own sufferings, how he, being what he was, and having such a purpose as he had, coming into conflict with a blind world, too narrow in its faith to accept at once the universal faith he was ushering in, had to die at the hands of such a world.

The church is on the road to Emmaus when, in its Bible it is trying to discover the great and essential truths, whether in the book of Genesis, the Gospels or the book of Revelation, that are true for all time. The Church is on the road to Emmaus when it allows the Spirit of Christ to be the life and the censor of all that it believes. The Church is on the road to Emmaus when it is inculcating "that intellectual honesty which dreads what Plato calls the lie in the soul, even more than the lie on the lips."

Fourth. Finally, the climax of this experience with the risen Christ was knowledge. "Their eyes were opened, and they knew him." Religious feeling, if it is genuine, is never blind. Its destiny is knowledge. The word emotion, itself, means moving away from, "a flight from what is, to something beyond." This is true of genuine patriotism. Love sees the mighty heart, and will, and mind that is the soul of our people, as nothing else can. It is true of friendship. Our feeling of friendship becomes translated into understanding. It is true of Christian faith.

One day a pastor went to a wealthy lady in his congregation to urge her to furnish $125 for some object in which he was interested. This lady was, truth to tell, not as much noted for her generosity as for her wealth, and she demurred seriously in his request. Finally the pastor said: "Well, my good lady, you pray over the matter this week, and if on Sabbath you still feel that you should not give the money, just tell me so, and I will not say any more to you about it." The minister relates that on the next Sabbath he opened his eyes after the benediction to see his parishioner rushing frantically toward the pulpit, with a roll of bills in her hand. "Here," she cried, as she thrust the money into his grasp; "take your money. I haven't been able to enjoy my prayers all the week."—The Presbyterian.

ONE BOOK A WEEK

Under this caption, each week, we shall direct attention to some striking book, such as no Minister or those interested in religious thought and action can afford to remain unacquainted with

The Steel Strike Report Again*

THIS imposing looking volume of over five hundred pages by Marshall Olds, published by G. P. Putnam's Sons and distributed widely throughout the country with the compliments of Elbert H. Gary, is apparently the formal answer of the United States Steel Corporation to the report made by an independent investigating committee for the Interchurch World Movement and adopted unanimously by the Executive Committee of that organization June 28, 1920. The book is divided into two parts, with a foreword by Jeremiah W. Jenks, who in effect says that when such a question is at issue both sides should be heard. The Steel Company was not officially represented in the report made by the church organization. Now that we have the Steel Company's case presented it should be read and considered. He claims for Mr. Olds an impartial attitude, but nowhere does he endorse the author's opinions, nor vouch for either his statistics or his statements. Indeed, he says that the charges made by the author demand the consideration of church people and all fair-minded persons, because they are so serious that they cannot be passed by without study. Now this may mean either one of two things—that Dr. Jenks doubts the value of the Interchurch report or questions the validity of Mr. Olds' criticisms. He does not tell us what he believes. His position is that of the interested bystander who calls attention to the fact that two disputants have called each other liars, but does not care to take sides in the quarrel by indicating which one he thinks is the liar. This he leaves to the public. The remainder of the introductory part of the book is taken up with quotations from those who were interested in the report. A statement by a certified accountant attesting the accuracy of Mr. Olds' figures and quotations from editorials and other matter of a similar kind are brought together apparently to show at the outset that the Interchurch report cannot be considered as expressing the unanimous opinion of all the men and groups who were vitally interested in the study. In fact, this assumption runs all the way through the volume. To put it into the form of a thesis, it would be something as follows: A report purporting to be made by a representative Christian organization for the purpose of getting at the real facts in a long disastrous strike is really the work of a group of men more or less tinged with socialism and some of them real Bolsheviks.

In Part I the author gives the facts which he deems an answer to the Interchurch report, and in Part II he tells his versions of how the investigation was made, then the report written and acted upon by the Executive Committee. When you come to the real facts Mr. Olds presents it seems to me that he strengthens rather than disproves the fundamental contentions of the Interchurch report. For instance, on such questions as those of the twelve-hour day wages, profits and relations between employers and employees he merely denies one set of figures and sets up a new table of statistics of his own. Granted that conditions were not as bad as the Interchurch report said they were, Mr. Olds' figures do not give a clean bill of health to either employer or employee in the steel industry. His arguments reminded me of a story of a row in an Irish neighborhood. "Mike O'Flynn is dead; John Murphy killed him with a brick on the head," said one neighbor to another. "Nothing of the sort," replied a third bystander; "it was only half a brick he threw at him; I was there and saw it all." "What, only half a brick," said the first retailer of the information; "for shame, no Irishman should have such a thin skull." And there you have it. While Mr. Olds piles up his statistics in an attempt to lighten the black in the picture drawn by the Interchurch committee and calls names, the church people of our nation are not going to be seriously impressed with the charge that Bishop McConnell, George Coleman, Fred Smith and the others in that group are dangerous citizens, or that the members of the Executive Committee, that unanimously passed the report after it was recommended by Hubert C. Herring, Bishop Cannon and Warren Stone, which committee, by the way, had in its membership Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., Robert E. Speer, and other men of such well known and sound opinions, are Bolsheviks and gave their assent to a document simply because they saw in it an instrument to help overthrow the present order of society. What the man on the street will want to know is whether or not the Steel Company does enforce the eight-hour day, pay starvation wages, coerce public opinion and employ a private army to hold its workers in subjection. Calling names does not answer serious charges. To a Bolshevik or a capitalist two times two makes four, and never five or eight. Facts are facts, and these alone count.

This new document should be read. At the same time the Interchurch report should be reprinted, so that the questions involved may have a wider hearing and a larger public may be given a chance of knowing just what are the facts.

Personally, I see nothing but good in the controversy. Among the hundreds of criticisms and charges against the Church is that it is a capitalistic organization. It is a good thing, and I think a hopeful sign, for the Church and for its future work to be charged once in a while with being on the other side. It proves that it is the partisan of neither one group nor the other, but occupies a place of leadership between the two, for here is where lies the truth and where the Church exerts its strongest and ablest leadership.

*Analysis of the Interchurch Movement Report on the Steel Strike. By Marshall Olds. G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. $2.50.

Mr. Berry's article on "The Gap in the Wall" "strikes twelve" in voicing the silent anguish of many ministerial hearts. One of my neighbors has been on his field fifteen years. He should have left five years ago. His church knows it and he knows it. He is a noble fellow and largely successful. He has arrived at the age when he is qualified for his ripest and best work—somewhere in the fifties. Yet this very fact is a handicap in seeking a change. What is he to do? I have been in my charge ten happy years. So far as I know, my church is perfectly satisfied. But I am not; and not only for the reason that I conscientiously believe that a man of a different type now could do them a greater service, while my particular gifts should have a chance to work in some other field that may need them. But how shall I proceed? More than once in approaching a brother minister with the request for a recommendation I have been met as if my desire required explanation and apology. But where there is no system, how else can a man honorably seek a change? So many of us are not at all skilled in the variety of ecclesiastical politics that brings results. We don't know how—and we don't want to know. Moreover, it is disturbing to a pastor and interferes with his work to start out on an active campaign to change fields. It requires much time and thought.

I am convinced that little improvement is possible until the placing of pastors is made someone's business—his only business, for which he is fitted and paid a good salary. He might have oversight of one

give to the Sunday-school teacher inspiring and practical insight into the essential spiritual messages of the International Uniform Lessons. The book consists of a series of short expository sermons on the lessons by such leading American preachers as Francis E. Clark, W. E. Barton, Charles Reynolds Brown, William Elliot Griffis, Cornelius H. Patton, John E. Tuttle, and others.

Dr. Frederick Lynch, editor of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, says in a recent letter:

"The other day The Monday Club Sermons for 1923 happened to come to my hand, and I was very much impressed both by the list of contributors, and by the unusually fine standard of the execution."

Dr. Lynch has arranged with us to run The Monday Club Sermons serially in THE CHRISTIAN WORK, beginning with the January 27th issue. But many Sunday-school teachers, pastors and superintendents will wish to own the whole series, so as to have it at all times conveniently at hand. or more presbyteries, and perhaps subject to a similar official at the head of the synod. There should further be a flexible time limit—say of five years—for a pastorate, at the expiration of which term it should be easily possible for any pastor to make a change if mutually desirable. Such a time limit would reflect itself upon the churches who are squeamish about settling upon a man, largely because of the permanence of the relation as it now obtains. And every pastor should be expected to look for promotion—according to his desert. This might not imply a larger church or an increased salary, but rather a work in line with his own peculiar growth. If he has developed intellectually he should have a chance at a more educated church. If his growth has been along executive lines, then he should be placed where this qualification would find larger scope. I know a pastor—a man who was formerly a sheet-metal worker—well educated, who became pastor of a church of farmers. He failed. Then he went to another similar field at a larger salary and a better chance in every way. But he is not happy. It was no real promotion for him. In an industrial community with a workingman's church I believe he would make good.

I had not intended to suggest a remedy. Only to thank Mr. Berry for talking out in meeting. Most of us speak with self-convincing eloquence of the parity of the ministry, while secretly (thinking of your theme) we admire and covet the episcopacy.

PRODIGAL DAUGHTERS

By Joseph Hocking

Starts Soon as THE CHRISTIAN WORK'S New Serial

Within the next few months "Prodigal Daughters" can be seen on the screen throughout the country. Famous Players chose it as one of a small number of novels from which great films could be produced. The selection of this story emphasizes anew the great appeal of Hocking's novel.

"Prodigal Daughters" is a tale of the flapper, with a swift plot, stirring incidents and an interesting and remarkable solution.

"Prodigal Daughters" has been the theme of many sermons and of endless discussion. Its appeal lies not only in the dramatic presentation of the author but its timely message to modern America and England. Three million copies of Hocking's novels have been sold.

"INVESTING IN CHILDHOOD"

"Investing in Childhood," a lecture on the Near East illustrated by sixty lantern slides, is available free to pastors and Sunday school superintendents.

All the pictures are recent. There are views of the Smyrna disaster, of the trek of five thousand orphans on their way from the interior of Turkey to places of safety in Syria and Palestine, and there are abundant illustrations of the fine constructive work the Near East Relief is doing in protecting and training 115,000 children now under its care.

Twenty-five of the set of sixty slides are very finely colored, twenty-five are in sepia tone, and ten in black and white. There is also a set of twenty selected especially for Sunday schools. Sets may be secured from the various State offices of the Near East Relief.

DEVOTION TO A SCHOOL

Blair Academy, the well-known boys' preparatory school, situated in the very heart of the beautiful mountain district of the Delaware Water Gap, sustained a great loss by fire December 8. At that time Clinton Hall, the administration building, was completely destroyed by fire. Monday morning, February 26, at the chapel service, the faculty and students, to the great surprise of everybody, gave $50,000 towards the $1,200,000 Alumni Rebuilding, Enlargement and Endowment Fund of the school. One master gave an insurance policy of $10,000. Dr. Sharpe, headmaster, and Mrs. Sharpe gave $2,500, and eight of the students and faculty gave one thousand dollars each.

AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY

Its work is interdenominational evangelical and international in scope and is commended by all the churches. It has published the Gospel message in 178 languages dialects and characters. Its colporters meet the immigrants with Christian literature in many languages, and also visit the spiritually destitute. In the Spanish and Portuguese languages, chiefly for Latin America, there have been issued 16,012,088 copies of volumes, tracts and periodicals. Its literature in the native dialects has been the strong right arm of foreign missions. Its benevolent work is dependent upon donations and legacies.

REV. EDWIN NOAH HARDY, Ph.D., Gen. Sec.
WILLIAM PHILLIPS HALL, President.

Donations may be sent direct to American Tract Society, 101 Park Avenue, New York, N.Y.

Many others made gifts from $500 down. The total gift of $50,000 was far beyond what the most sanguine expected.

Rev. Frank N. Riale, D.D., the field representative of the Presbyterian General Board of Education, is to have the general management of the campaign. Dr. Riale's most unusual success in securing large gifts for various colleges ought to mean great success for Blair.

The World of To-day

A FACTORY TURNED OVER TO THE WORKERS

For twenty-six years Henry A. Dix, of New York City, developed and carried on successfully the manufacture of dresses and nurses' uniforms. The business now has a turnover of $1,000,000 per year. Recently he and his son withdrew from the business and transferred it to the workers. This transaction was called a sale of the business to the employees. However, by the unique terms of the sale the business will in reality purchase itself out of the net earnings, and even during the time of this purchase part of these profits will go to the employees. These are the terms of the transfer: Six men who have been long in the service of the company were designated by Mr. Dix to form the board of directors of a new company incorporated as the Henry A. Dix and Sons Corporation. On nomination by these six directors a seventh is to be appointed. These men as the board of directors have taken over the $300,000 in material assets and $250,000 in cash for working capital. No collateral was required; they have given only their notes. They own all of the voting stock. From the net earnings of the business twenty per cent. is to go into surplus and eighty per cent. into paying for the stock until it is all paid up. The members of the board of directors have full responsibility for the management of the business and they retain their present salaried positions. Mr. Dix has accepted an honorary advisory relationship, so that the new owners may have the advantage of his long experience in the business. This gives him no hold upon the conduct of the business nor the disposal of the earnings, and for his services he is to be paid fifty cents a year. This unusual plan is only the culmination of a series of unprecedented industrial experiments put into effect by Mr. Dix. About three years ago he put his four plants, three in New Jersey and one in New York, on a five-day weekly schedule, leaving the daily hours unchanged—eight hours in New York and nine hours in New Jersey—and found that the workers were in better condition and that production increased on this schedule. No change was made in the wages of week workers and neither was the piece rate reduced, so that the wages of the piece workers either remained the same or were increased with the increase of production. The factories are closed down for two weeks each summer, employees receive vacation with pay and the plants are renovated, painted and put in perfect order. No overtime is ever worked, orders are refused if they cannot be filled during the regular working hours. There is no unemployment. Even during the depression after the Armistice the Dix plants were kept running. When the transfer was announced Mr. Dix's son, M. H. Dix, stated his father's attitude as follows: "When my father began business twenty-seven years ago he said that workers generally got nothing except their wages for their services, and he felt that such a system was wrong. He felt that those who give their lives to building up a business for another man should have some share beyond that of mere wages in the concern which they helped to create. From time to time he has tried to make changes which would recognize the human element in the success of a business concern. He shortened the working days and ran the place on a five-day week. He inaugurated a system of dividend profits so that the employees would share in the profits. Even so our personal profits continued to grow, and my father decided that instead of accumulating more, which we do not need, we should turn the whole thing over to those who have contributed to our success. He has now done that, instead of selling the business, as he had three times planned."

REGARDING PRODIGAL DAUGHTERS

We have begun publication of Joseph Hocking's greatly discussed novel which has raised the question as to whether the parents or the children themselves are responsible for the present conditions in modern home life. Ellis Parker Butler, the popular writer, claims that the fault is with the parents alone and not with any spirit of the times. Harold Bell Wright writes: "I agree with Butler that the peril of the daughters is due largely to the mothers, . . . but may it not be that the mothers themselves are products of that same 'spirit of the times.' 'Prodigal Daughters' presents the parents' side in a convincing way, and to my mind is of vital importance to-day." The Rev. Robert Gordon, of the First Baptist Church of Fon Du Lac, Wisconsin, who recently preached a sermon from this story, writes: "'Prodigal Daughters' is called a novel, but it is not fiction. It is a transcript of real life. Cut it anywhere and it will bleed." President Tivnan, of Fordham University, also lays some of the blame to the parents. He says: "Without question some of the responsibility must be laid at the door of the parents. It is small wonder that the ideas emphasized by Hocking have taken possession of our youth." Katherine Bement Davis, of the Bureau of Social Hygiene, who has been in touch with thousands of young women in connection with her work, says, on the contrary: "I cannot agree with Ellis Parker Butler. We have to remember that the spirit of the times—whatever that may be—affects mothers as well as daughters." Mary Gardner, preceptress of Ripon College, writes: "From some twenty years' intimate observation I am of Mr. Butler's opinion. I have looked at the question from various angles, as I have two children of my own as well as numerous other children who have come to me." This opinion, divergent as it is, has to do with causes. But none can deny the facts that whatever may have been the forces which have been at work in the world to bring it about, yet there is no gainsaying the fact that mothers, fathers, ministers and educators can afford no longer to ignore the conditions this startling story brings out very clearly.

THE ANDERSON IMBROGLIO

When William H. Anderson, the fighting Anti-Saloon League superintendent, came to New York some ten years ago the League in that State was scarcely heard of in the public prints. He made an agreement with the New York League directors to secure publicity at his own expense, for which he should be reimbursed if the increase of the League's receipts warranted it. Mr. Anderson soon put the League on the front page of the papers of the State. In 1918, four years after Mr. Anderson came to New York, Dr. David James Burrell, the president of the New York Anti-Saloon League and the very eminent minister of the Marble Collegiate Church, recalled to the board Mr. Anderson's expenditures for publicity. Mr. Anderson reported that altogether he had used $24,700 for that purpose from his own resources. The directors voted to repay him as they could. In 1920 and 1921 a certain O. Bertsall Phillips worked as a solicitor of funds for the League. He was to receive $5,000 salary with ten per cent. of all that he raised for the League above $25,000. Mr. Phillips and Mr. Anderson made an agreement that after Mr. Phillips' receipts from the League came to $10,000 they would split his further commissions between them. This was in consideration of the fact that Mr. Anderson's work helped Phillips. Mr. Anderson credited his half of these commissions to his bill against the League. When Phillips was dismissed from the League he tried to recover from Mr. Anderson the portions of the commissions which he had turned over to him. Phillips appealed to the New York District Attorney's office. The District Attorney's office let the charges slumber for months, when a new factor entered the case. Some time before this Mr. Anderson had given to Mr. Raymond Fosdick, who is in charge of part of John D. Rockefeller's benevolences, a copy of the confidential report which he had made to his directors touching the publicity fund. Mr. Fosdick does not altogether believe in the present policy of prohibition enforcement, and has clashed with Mr. Anderson on the topic. In some way the "Evening Mail" of New York received the information in this confidential report. Mr. Anderson does not see how it could have come from anyone but Mr. Fosdick. When "The Mail" published the "scoop" the District Attorney's office straightway took up the Phillips charges. When Assistant District Attorney Pecora examined Mr. Anderson, the latter refused to tell exactly by what transactions or from whom he secured the $24,700 which he reported he had used for publicity. Now Mr. Pecora is laying the matter before the Grand Jury, although the League directors have issued a strong statement of their complete confidence in the superintendent and accept full responsibility to their constituency for the payment of the $24,700 charged by Mr. Anderson. When the news came out that the Anti-Saloon League had given commissions on gifts rumor had it that Mr. Rockefeller would not support the League further. It is generally understood that he is opposed to giving under such circumstances. Due apparently to Mr. Fosdick's influence, Mr. Rockefeller had already decreased his subscription from $75,000 to $25,000.

ANTI-SALOON LEAGUE METHODS

It is easy to pick flaws with anything. It is not quite pleasant to learn that any man in a welfare or benevolent organization receives a commission on the gifts which he secures. Nor does one always agree with all the reasoning of the Superintendent of the New York Anti-Saloon League. It is difficult for most of us to regard attempts to weaken the Volstead Law as treasonable. We certainly do not want it weakened, but it would be possible to conform to the

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

Eighteenth Amendment under another law. There is nothing in that amendment which makes the Volstead Law any more sacrosanct than is any other law which carries out a constitutional provision. The New York State Court has just determined that the Anti-Saloon League in that State is a political committee within the meaning of the law, and must consequently file its expenditures and receipts for campaign purposes. If that decision is sustained, it should apply to any organization which favors or opposes a candidate at an election. It might apply to child labor organizations, prison reform associations, amnesty committees, women's rights' societies, to any body of people acting together and at a particular time favoring or opposing a given candidate. But if the decision is sustained there ought to be nothing awkward for the Anti-Saloon League in making known the list of its contributors. Indeed, such publicity might be helpful. It would witness to the very wide support which the Anti-Saloon League commands. The disadvantage is that in some circumstances the wets might boycott a merchant subscribing to the Anti-Saloon League, and in some homes it might not conduce to family peace.

"JUSTICE" BY SENTIMENT

The failure of the Illinois jury to convict the men so far tried for the horrible Herrin murders may have been justified by the evidence. We do not know. But certainly those who are guilty at Herrin should be punished. One gets the feeling that local union sentiment is standing in the way of an impartial trial. The same interference of local sentiment is even more apparent in Louisiana, where the Grand Jury has failed to indict any one for the dreadful Mer Rouge murders. It is difficult to avoid feeling that America's "civilization" is of a pretty low order. One cannot imagine any nation in Europe East of Russia or North of Turkey allowing masked men to administer "the law." And we do not recall Herrin's horrors in that region. In large parts of our country we have not attained—or we have lost—the idea of cool, even-handed justice meted out without regards to personal acquaintance, or feeling. We are as a people given to sentiment and violence, we allow ourselves to go "emotionally insane." In the very communities that are guilty the Church must raise its voice most clearly to summon the community to do the right thing. Preachers must be willing to preach in such a way that some of the community, at least, would like to run them out of town.

THE MICHIGAN COMMUNIST TRIALS

It is extremely difficult to gather the real truth concerning the convention of the Communist Party, near St. Joseph, Michigan, last August. The State has charged sixty-eight men and women with breaking its anti-syndicalist law in taking part in the convention, and has begun by trying William Z. Foster. While the meeting was in progress last August Federal agents raided its meeting place in the open air and later, according to their statement, dug up barrels of papers and records. At least one Federal agent attended the convention. A resolution for the party to amend its procedure so as to come within the law was lost by only one vote, so that it can be plausibly argued that the Government itself through its agent is responsible for the party's refusal to conform to the statute at that time. Since then it has done so. The whole affair has at least one moral—the mistake of a policy of repression. In Great Britain a Communist, Kirkwood, sits in Parliament. Men of like mind with him hold similar places on the Continent. Probably more of us believe that men should be allowed to advocate violence and murder so long as their rights are amply protected under the law and they are given a free opportunity for lawful discussion. But we should be more eager to punish the advocacy of violence and murder when it comes from employers and Chambers of Commerce and sheriffs than when it comes from people who have been hounded about the world because their opinions on economics or government are different from those of the majority. Does not Jesus' teaching of forgiveness have some bearing on the way we, as a government, deal with the men and women on trial in Michigan?

THE METHODISTS' CITIES COUNCIL

Once a year the Methodists gather together some of the pastors of their city churches to talk about their peculiar problems. Nothing has stood out more distinctly at these meetings than the growth in the sense that Christianity is concerned not only with individuals, but with the whole organization of society. The Methodist Church owes an immense debt to Harry Ward and his Federation for Social Service. Their influence is rapidly permeating the whole communion. So socially minded was the general attitude at the meeting of the Cities Council in Cleveland last month that a Czechoslovak visitor, who had been in this country only two or three months, speaking to a group conference on the third day of the meeting began with the regular form of address at a Socialist gathering. "Comrades," he said, "I came here expecting to feel strange. But during these three days it has been hard for me not to think that I have been at a Socialist meeting." The spirit of sympathy with labor came to its climax in the session addressed by Rev. Edmund B. Chaffee, director of the Labor Temple of New York. When he referred in passing to the Interchurch Steel Report a veritable demonstration took place in honor of Mishop McConnell, who was presiding. Men shouted, "What's the matter with Bishop McConnell?" The answer came quick and strong, "He's all right." Most of the city pastors assembled had a keen sympathy with the labor unions, however much they might deplore union blindness and violence. We expect to publish Mr. Chaffee's address shortly. Of course, the conference did not limit itself to the question of labor. It was broader than that. As Dr. Sockman, of the Madison Avenue Methodist Church, New York, said, "The Church must be a drill ground for democracy." The conference recognized, too, the need for thinking in the pulpit calculated to inspire the intellectual respect of the best educated man in the pew. As Dr. Sockman put it, "In my opinion, the most outstanding single need of the Methodist Episcopal Church to-day is for constructive theological preaching which can interpret to people their flitting half-thought-out ideas. The best urban mind must find a guide in the pulpit. And that guide must be sound enough intellectually to command the respect of guides in other realms of thought." The only pity is that other communions cannot share these meetings with the Methodists.

THE FEDERAL COUNCIL, "AL" SMITH AND PROHIBITION

While we are on the topic of prohibition it is worth while to notice the resolution passed by the New York Legislature asking Congress to weaken the Volstead Law. The resolution was passed at Governor Smith's request. It is of national interest because there is considerable talk of the Democrats attempting to nominate Governor Smith for President next year. Governor Smith has been a consistent foe of prohibition. Only this month, in spearing of the effort of a New Jersey Senator to promote three per cent. beer, Governor Smith, said, according to the "New York Times": "I will be glad to go down and help him put over his bill, if that will get us somewhere where we can put a foot on the rail again and blow off the froth." On the other side, the recent conference of temperance and welfare organizations, held in Washington under the auspices of the Temperance Commission of the Federal Council of Churches, has come out with an appeal worthy of attention. It runs in part as follows:

We call upon the Christian citizens of the nation to sustain the expressed purpose of the Federal Government to enforce the law; to report violations of it to the proper officials, as is their duty, so declared by the United States Supreme Court, and to support all local, state and federal officers who obey and effectively enforce this law in accordance with their oath of office.

By every moral standard, the buyer of illicit liquor is as guilty as the seller and becomes legally guilty as soon as he possesses it. We call upon law-abiding citizens to discourage such traffic.

The enforcement of constitutional prohibition requires an effective enforcement act. Any weakening of the law by permitting the sale of light wine and beer would be practical nullification.

The churches of America were largely responsible for the creation of the public sentiment which resulted in the adoption of this amendment. The Church has a continuing responsibility to create and maintain the necessary public sentiment to enforce the prohibition law.

The Church has the same obligation to finish this task that it had to initiate it.

the American Mission Boards last year were asking for 1,833 new missionaries for the foreign field. While the majority of the calls are still for ordained men and for women to do evangelistic work, every one knows that the missions are using wider and wider variety of training. Boards have recently asked for a teacher in a school of journalism, an instructor in a school for the deaf, a physiologist, an X-ray specialist, an editor, a farm manager and a survey specialist. The missionary's task is often a most enjoyable one. He is a far more important person in the foreign field than he probably would be at home. By the force of circumstances, leadership is thrown upon him. He can help to shape the Church and the social order of the future to an extent that not one in a thousand could expect to at home. One young woman writes of her experience in starting her missionary work as a kindergarten teacher to the missionaries' children: "I had no idea that it was so delightful. It have the best and most intelligent children you could find in any place. Some of the staff here would feel a little happier if they did have a few hardships, because they came over thinking that they were giving up a great deal and find that they are not giving up anything." He who goes out as a missionary is in many ways a fortunate man. But he still may have to endure loneliness and sickness, climate that wears out his body and his nerves, and in parts of the world he may still run the risk of martyrdom.

IMPORTANCE OF THE AMNESTY QUESTION

A well-known professor in an eastern theological seminary, who is at present in England, has written to President Harding in the interest of political prisoners. Because of its timeliness and the new light that it throws on the matter the following is quoted from the letter, although there has been no opportunity to obtain permission to use the writer's name: "I have tried to express to you the strong conviction which I find entertained on this subject by sober-minded men who support your administration and are conservative in their views on social matters. . . . I may say that during some months' stay in Europe I find that our attitude on this matter is doing much to discredit us among right-thinking and sober-minded men in other countries who are otherwise our friends. I sincerely trust that you will see your way to take prompt and effective action in this matter."

THE SUPPLY OF MISSIONARIES

"Since the war the great supply storehouse for foreign missionaries lies in America," remarked an Englishman quoted by Robert P. Wilder, General Secretary of the Student Volunteer Movement. From 1912 to 1914 over one hundred new volunteers went out from Great Britain annually. The war cut down the figure until in 1918 it fell to six. Since the Armistice the number has mounted again to ninety-nine. It should soon reach the pre-war figures. From 1910 to 1920 the number of new volunteers going out from the United States averaged 440. Some influence, very possibly the immense advertising of missions that came with the Interchurch World Movement and the increase of missionary funds accompanying it, raised the number of volunteers to 595 in 1920, and to 637 in 1921. The figures for 1922 are not yet completed, but what has been gathered indicates a considerable falling off from the figures of 1921. Over against this

"Our World," New York, for February, devoted largely to political articles on Italy, contains an article by Allan Westcott of the U.S. Naval Academy on "The Struggle for the Mediterranean" which is very illuminating as showing the relation between military establishments and national commercial advancement. The increase in American exports to Turkey $3,300,000 in 1913 to $42,200,000 in 1920) "was brought about in large measure through skilful co-operation with business interests on the part of the American High Commissioner in Turkey, Rear Admiral Bristol." "A short time ago there was much opposition to a bill in Congress to put commercial agents on men-of-war. Now destroyers are entering Turkish ports with 'drummers' as regular passengers and their fantails piled with American samples. An American destroyer has made a special trip at thirty knots to get American oil prospectors into a newly opened field."

Opposition to the World Court

IT is almost impossible to conceive of anyone opposing President Harding's move to make the United States one of the signatory powers to the World Court which has been set up by the League of Nations. While it is a great thing merely to have the Court in existence, so that the nations having a quarrel may take it there if they choose to do so and public opinion will probably be strongly behind such a course, yet it is not obligatory to take the case there. In spite of the fact, though, that membership in the Court does not bind the nations to use it, strong opposition to the United States having anything to do with it is developing, and it behooves every Christian man and woman to get back of the President in his high endeavor.

The opposition is coming from three sources:

1. Those who believe it is a step into the League of Nations, and practically means participation in it. There is no doubt that several of the Republican Senators oppose it on this ground.

2. Those who do not want the United States to have anything to do with the other nations of the world. This group is led by Senator Hiram Johnson. He has already begun a violent campaign against the President and evidently intends to fight our entrance with all his powers. In a speech of two hours' length at the Hotel Astor, New York, on March 8th, he warned America not to have anything to do with the Court and "against taking this great nation of yours and putting that nation at the mercy of any one of any number of European nations in any organization of any kind whatever." Senator Johnson also put himself among the first group of objectors, those who believe entrance means relations with the League of Nations. "The Court," he says, "is a part of the League of Nations, and they say then that we are no part of the League of Nations at all. We are going to be a part of the League of Nations, but no part of the League of Nations at all. This is what is asked of us, and then the same snares are used. At this writing Senator Johnson is the only Senator or prominent man who has directly opposed the President, but it is to be remembered that practically all the Republican Senators refused to vote for Senator King's motion approving the general idea.

3. The third group opposing our entrance into the Court do not oppose our participation in a World Court, but are not enthusiastic about the existing one. They want a real Court, one where it will be obligatory for all nations signatory to it to take all their quarrels, one where one nation can hale any other nation before it if it thinks it has been wronged. Senator Borah heads this group. At a dinner of the Jersey City Chamber of Commerce on the evening of March 8th he put himself on record as demanding a World Court with the United States a part of it, but he wanted it to be a real court with obligatory powers. We have great sympathy with Senator Borah on this point. We wish, as we believe millions of people wish, that such a World Court might be set up. But that is not the question at this moment. A Court has been set up. It is not what we wanted, but it is there and all the other nations are in it. Another cannot be set up at this time, and the only question now before us is, Shall we join? We do wish, however, that President Harding in asking us to join had intimated that the United States would have liked to have seen it a real Court before which each signatory nation would have to take all of its problems.

Thus the opposition is going to come from three groups—those who fear it means recognition of the League of Nations; those who do not want the United States to have anything to do with the rest of the world; and those who feel it is not a real Court. President Harding recognizes this opposition. We do not think he ever dreamed it would be so great, especially from the leaders of his own party. It is the loveliest bit of irony history has afforded for some time, that when it came up in the Senate practically all the Democratic Senators voted for it and practically all the Republican Senators voted against it. He has decided to go before the people. He has begun his campaign with a letter to Governor Bloom of Ohio, in answer to a resolution of the General Assembly of Ohio, sustaining his action. The letter, after expressing deep gratitude for this instance of popular support, by which he was greatly encouraged, throws the responsibility on the people. "I may say frankly," he says, "that it is inconceivable to me that the American people, who have so long been devoted to this ideal, should refuse their adherence now to such a program as is represented by this tribunal." Then comes about the best thing the President has yet said on the matter of international relations:

"I look upon the establishment of the Court of International Justice, with the jurisdiction that has been given to it, as one of the greatest advances which world society has made toward conditions in which, at last, the rule of law may be substituted for the rule of force. It looks to the settlement of issues before they become dangerously acute; it contemplates the elimination of the causes of conflict and war. Feeling thus, I cannot but believe that our own country should be among the most devoted adherents of such a program."

Again let us say, every Christian ought to rush to the President to support him, for this is a Christian act. It is the attempt to apply Christian principles to international affairs, to substitute law for war. Do not wait. Write at once to your Senators insisting that they sustain the President. If you are a minister, preach on it and get your congregation to send a resolution to your Senators. If you are a layman, ask your minister to preach on it, and get your Chamber of Commerce or your club to pass a resolution. The enemies are already at work. With the three groups mentioned above are the militarists, those who have no trust in any power but force. Get your letters and resolutions to your Senators before they get theirs to them. F. L.

Night and Morning on the Soul

IT is night on the soul wherever there is an unconcern about the deeper things of life, whenever there is contentment with mere happy material conditions, and a feeling that superficial pleasures are enough; it is night on the soul when the belief in the possibility of still bettering the world has been lost, or has never arisen, when sorrow occupies the chief place, when fear of any kind prevents the expansion of wing and proscribes any venture of faith. Night sometimes comes on the soul through a shattering of faith, or through despair of the higher good. I am inclined to think just now that the two most powerful causes that operate to bring night on the soul are the despair which comes from seeing the power of evil to check good and often apparently to drive it back, and the effect of the ambition for gain, whether of place, power, or wealth, in destroying spiritual vision, in preventing men from seeing the truth about life or themselves or God.

When the morning of God breaks upon that night, and the sleeper awakes, the world is full of holy wonder. Man becomes aware of himself, and of the hidden powers of his life, knows himself beset behind and before, and laid hold on by a greater than he, knows that his life is embedded in a wider and deeper life, that he and God are one in some mysterious way, and yet that he is he, and God is God—he is one with God when he awakes. In this morning phantoms of the dark vanish, the outward changes places with the inward in importance, things of time stand in the light of eternity, worldly ambitions are weighed and found wanting in the scale of soul-values, loneliness gives way to a sense of the Invisible Companion, the waters of faith come to fill up the old channel occupied by despair, fear is lost in love and faith, and trust shoots down the future blazing a trail for earnest effort. Experience has brought the certainty of God.

Nor can this be reasoned away. A recent writer on "Rationalism and the Idea of God" says: "It will be one of the great constructive tasks of psychology to ascertain how such a conception (the conception that God is personal) is organized, and how it operates to produce the experiences, often of overpowering intensity and lasting value, which as a matter of record it often does." All the same, to him the personal God does not exist, and it will be the task of psychology to explain how the thing is done, i.e., how man comes to play so valuable a trick upon himself. The writer thinks that psychology is coming to the aid of natural science to make the belief in God impossible. One might remind him that there was a time when it was thought natural science could do that by itself. It was confidently proclaimed to have been done, science had substituted law for God. Matter and force were a quite sufficient account of everything. There was no longer any function for religion. But religion survived the attack, and God is still believed in and experienced. We need have no fear that psychology will deal any death-blow to vital religion. Just as science has altered a great many of our thoughts, there is no doubt that psychology will bring us new light, and we shall interpret differently many of our experiences. But that we shall be left merely with a God of our own making, or our race's making, there is no fear. The theory here is that God did not make us, but that we made God. Personality of God is only an idea in the mind of man, a projection of his own personality. Psychology will show us, it is thought, that a good deal of what we interpret now in the terms of theology will become intelligible as a product of the natural working of the human mind. "God, as personal, is being slowly driven out of the universe, but returning as this organized directive idea of which we have spoken," says the writer. The human mind organizes a directive idea, and this takes the place of God. We have made him, are going on making him, and he will change as we change. This is not a conclusion proper to psychology at all. The fact is that psychology can make no pronouncement on the ultimate source of religious experience. It has a perfect right to ransack the contents of the human mind, to sift, classify, and explain the relations to one another of all the phenomena of the religious life, but all this leaves the question of the origin of religious experience unsettled. The worst any psychologist could say on the religious claim is: "Not proven." No man who has a vital religious experience would ask to have it proven by any psychologist. He knows no proof can be reached by that method.

It is quite true that we must make no claim for the adequacy, much less for the finality, of any theology. We do make our theology in our own image. What else could we do? We could not go outside of ourselves to think of God. We may be stating less than the truth when we attribute personality to God. What we claim is not the adequacy of our theology, but the fact that the attempt we make to think of God at all is owing to the impact of God upon our own souls. We do make theology, but we do not make God, just as men made astrology, but did not make the stars. And there would have been no false theology if there had not been a true God any more than a false astrology if there had been no stars. It would seem to us just as reasonable to deny the reality of the external world, and say that it is all the creation of our own senses, as to deny the reality of the Great Spirit, and say that He is merely the projection of our own spirits.

Some would have us believe now that what men have taken to be their awareness of God is only their awareness of their own subconscious life, and what they have taken to be the voice of God is simply the rising of something which had lain buried in that sub-conscious life. All religious experience is nothing more than the irruption on to the conscious plane of that which usually lies beneath the threshold of consciousness. We believe that when a man becomes aware of his deeper life, and of the full import of his own personality, he will find God. But this is a very different thing from saying that his deeper life or his personality is God. When a man comes to the full consciousness of his own personality we do not believe that he will find it explained by his individual experience, nor by the experience of the race to which he belongs; he will be inexplicable still until it is recognized that he is in relation to a great Spirit who is not himself, and not the creation of humanity at all. The awaking of the soul brings genuine religious discovery. The body awake is aware of the world of sound and color, the world that can be touched and weighed and measured; the mind awake finds that the world is thinkable, knows something external to it which can be internalized by thought; the soul awake finds the reality of God. There would be no life for the body without a physical environment, no life for the mind without a mental environment; nor is there any life for the soul without a spiritual environment, and that spiritual environment is God. The eye rejoices in the light, but the light first made the eye. The soul rejoices in God; it was God who first made the soul. Our life and our home are in Him. We may have keen physical senses, we may have an alert and well-informed mental life, and yet our souls may not be awake. There may be intellectual light and spiritual darkness. When the soul awakes, there is no doubt about the reality of God, about the value of spiritual things, no doubt about the possibility of new experience richer than before.

However much we may explain of our present life by digging into our past history, the man whose soul is awake in the morning of God knows that he has entered upon a life into which new things come, streams of wealth from above, not merely uprushing from below. He is under no delusion as to their source, they come from the God who has prepared for them that love Him things that eye hath not seen nor ear heard nor the heart of man conceived. And the awakened soul will be more interested in this future than in the past, more interested in the super-conscious which is yet to be reached than in the subconscious which is being dug up. His life will be one of anticipation of the greater and grander things that are yet to be. He will explore something more precious than his own subconscious life; he will know that there is laid up for him an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled and that fadeth not away. Religion will put such vital creative power in him, and make him feel that he is a fellow worker with God, so that he will regard as a certainty an ever-growing future of new births and new wonders. He knows, he feels, he praises, he serves the living God, who can do for him "exceeding abundantly above all he can ask or think."

Dr. Mott's Tour of Visitation

[EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE]

A CONTINENT-WIDE tour of visitations, with purpose to quicken and strengthen the religious life and work of the Young Men's Christian Associations of the United States and Canada—that is the significant movement now in progress in this country. The first visitation was in Montreal, November 28-29, and the itinerary as planned includes forty-five meetings in thirty-five States, reaching to Vancouver on the Pacific Coast, and winding up in St. Louis, April 5. New England was covered before the holidays; New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, South Carolina and Florida in January, and the February tour reached from Georgia to Indiana, Michigan and Ohio. There are no waste days in the entire period. The churches have a distinct interest in the outcome, as one of the objects is to effect closer co-operation between them and the Association in mutual service to the community.

This movement had its organized beginning at the Lakehurst Conference a year ago, when the special commission which had been studying the religious work of the Associations and the religious status of the members made a report which frankly admitted the necessity of re-establishing and re-emphasizing the religious work as the primary objective. When Dr. Mott was approached with the request that he devote himself to this movement as its leader for four months of intensive work it was found that he had long felt the supreme importance of just such a movement, and was ready to give himself to the task of furthering a constructive religious work program and do all in his power to promote the spiritual vitality of the Associations. In company with a representative of the General Secretaries' Commission on Religious Work and a staff member of the Religious Work Department of the International Committee, Dr. Mott is now touring the country.

The program includes three features. First, a series of State-wide or Interstate "retreats." These are confined to the leaders, both lay and secretarial, of all the Associations in the areas concerned—city, county, railroad, industrial, student, army and navy, and colored Associations. The aim is to influence and move the springs of the leadership of the whole brotherhood. In these meetings the leader will give intimate addresses with reference to the spiritual life of the workers and the pronouncedly Christian and evangelistic aspects of the work of the Association; and there will be periods of self-examination, meditation, dedication and united intercession, and a special period given to the building of a minimum religious work program which should be in operation in every Association. The spiritual influence of such "retreats" is inestimable, as those who have attended them know.

Second, a series of religious work institutes in typical communities across the continent. These continue for two days, and each visit includes a meeting with the entire employed staff of the Association with reference to quickening their sense of responsibility for this most vital part of the work, and also to stimulate their own spiritual life; a luncheon meeting of the most influential laymen of all Protestant denominations—the men who, because of their position, character and influence can do most to commend the religion and work of Christ to young men and boys; a meeting with the Protestant clergymen on the most helpful relations which should exist between the Association and the churches; and a three-hour meeting of all the Christian working forces on behalf of young men and boys in the community, whether these forces are in connection with the Association or not; also, whenever the time permits, a meeting with immediate evangelistic purpose confined largely to young men and boys from eighteen to twenty-five years of age. In connection with these meetings the intent is to work out a new and enlarged religious work program for the Association in each community and to augment the religious forces. These are typical visits, designed to set an example to other communities.

Third, the organizing in each State of deputations of laymen and secretaries who will carry the message and the plans out to hundreds of communities which it will be impossible for the touring party to visit. In connection with each State-wide "retreat" special time will be given to preparing these deputations for their vitally important work, through which it is aimed to reach the last local Association with a quickening message and impulse.

This is one of the most important evangelistic and revival movements of the day, working in a special field which has a prepared constituency and a wide outreach. It carries out the spirit of the International Convention at Atlantic City, which reaffirmed so strongly the supremacy of Christ and the primacy of the Church, and declared its absolute loyalty to the original objective, winning young men and boys to Christ. It makes the word "Christian" in the name of the Association the supreme word which it was intended to be, and should mark a new era in the spiritual life of the great organization whose historic policy is to promote the growth of the Christian Church.

A Significant Anniversary

THE twenty-fifth anniversary of Dr. Charles E. Jefferson's pastorate of the Broadway Tabernacle Church, New York, was a significant event, not only because it marked a remarkably successful pastorate in one church for a quarter of a century, but also because it revealed how great an influence one man can exert, not only upon his own people, but upon the world at large when he has both prophetic vision and untiring energy. The various functions held during the week's celebrations re-emphasized this point. My own thought, again and again, was: how much one devoted man with an enthusiasm for righteousness and also for humanity can do!

Dr. Jefferson is first of all a preacher. He came to New York twenty-five years ago into a situation that would have frightened almost any other man—a church in the midst of a section of the city practically deserted by families and into a city out of which many of the younger families were moving into the suburbs. Even in its new and magnificent home at Broadway and Fifty-sixth Street it is in no sense a parish church. Its worshipers come from all parts of the great city. But he came with the resolve to devote himself entirely to his own church for the first few years and see if a great Congregational cathedral or center could not be built up in New York. Always a good executive, a real administrator and successful organizer, he put his first and greatest emphasis on preaching. He insisted when he came on having uninterrupted mornings for study and preparation of his sermons. If people were to come long distances to hear a preacher and be held to the church, it could only be done by great preaching, by sermons that would repay them for the coming. Dr. Jefferson adhered to this rule with Spartan severity. He allowed nothing to break in upon his hours. He felt he owed this to his people. He practically concealed himself mornings and lived with great books, great thoughts, and wrote great sermons.

The people of New York soon discovered that here was a real preacher come to town and they began to come to the Tabernacle. And not only the people came, but the best people, people to whom it was a joy to preach. For they soon discovered that here was no preacher of sermonettes, no panderer to the curious, no diluter of the big things of the faith for the feeble-minded, and no preacher interested in the sensational topics that adorn the church advertisement pages of the Saturday papers. Here was a man dealing with the biggest things of the faith. Every sermon was upon the eternal verities. Like Dale of Birmingham, Horton of London, and George A. Gordon of Boston, he held preaching to be the instruction of the people in the deepest and biggest problems that engage the human soul and that face humanity in its complex relations. And he has not worried about time. If it took fifty minutes to discuss a great theme properly, he took it. (I have a recollection—I may be mistaken—that he told the congregation when they called him that he was going to do this.) It was a great success. One of the most successful series of sermons he ever preached, a series that packed the great church every Sunday, was the series afterwards published, on the Foundations of the Faith. In this series he discussed the great doctrines of the Church in masterly form, and the crowds hung upon his words. It is all very interesting and I am saying these things hoping that my younger friends in the ministry may think it all over carefully. Dr. Jefferson's great success has been largely due to these two things; first, that he has put four or five days of each week into uninterrupted reading, study and most careful sermon preparation, and secondly, he has kept to the big, eternal, lofty things of the faith in his preaching.

The fact that he preached sermons dealing with the eternal phases of the faith made it possible for him soon to reach a wider audience, for these sermons were great enough to put into books. Most of Dr. Jefferson's many books, those dealing with the Foundations, with the Building of the Church of Christ through the ages, those dealing with the thought of Christians to-day being builders of the Church and Kingdom, those great series of lectures delivered on various foundations in the universities on international problems, immortality and other great themes, were originally preached to the congregation of the Broadway Tabernacle. Thus his sermons have found a national congregation. They have also helped to sustain the local congregation, for people reading them in New England, the West, the South, everywhere, when they came to New York sought out this preacher.

After Dr. Jefferson had well established himself by following this course of application to the task in hand he began to touch the great world movements. He came back from a trip to Europe a deadly foe to militarism. I once heard him tell how the sight of militarism in Europe moved him to the very depths of his being and he vowed that he would smite it with all his power. And he did. Ever since that day he has been a passionate prophet of good-will among the nations of the reign of law supplanting the reign of force. Some of the most scathing words against war and the preparation for war I have ever heard uttered I have heard from his lips. He was one of the founders of the New York Peace Society; he is chairman of the Executive Committee of one of the Carnegie Endowments, the Church Peace Union; he has written two or three of the best books on the general subject of war and peace; he preached the sermon at the last meeting of the World Alliance for International Good-will through the Churches at its meeting in Copenhagen; he was exchange preacher in Great Britain all last spring, an ambassador of good-will, and is just publishing a book on Great Britain and America.

During the years of his pastorate Dr. Jefferson has found time to serve his denomination in many offices, and he is called upon to address its meetings on all great occasions. He is also one of the most popular preachers in our universities and is a member of the Corporation of Yale University. He is the helper of the younger men in the ministry, and they are continually turning to him for counsel; but it is as a great and fearless prophet of the faith, preacher of the eternal word that I think of him on this twenty-fifth anniversary. His heart must have been glad when, at a luncheon where the ministers of New York of all denominations were present, one after another bore witness to his faithfulness as an ambassador of God.

THE WEEKLY SERMON

"There Stood by the Cross of Jesus His Mother"

By Rev. John Kelman, D.D.

Pastor Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York

"There stood by the cross of Jesus His mother."—John 19:25.

THE cross was the most horrible mystery that ever darkened the face of the sun upon the earth; the blackest tragedy, human or divine, that ever tortured man's wildest imagination. It leads us clean out beyond the range of all that a man may think or say, beyond his imagination and beyond his tears; into a world in which no one can possibly be at home. The homeless dreariness of the outer dark, the final desolation of the spirit, is upon Christ and all who stand beside Him there; and right into the midst of it there comes this human touch which forever relieves it all.

When Jesus was a little boy He used to climb the hill at the back of Nazareth, far up among the mountains of Galilee. and from that slight eminence, looking north in the clear morning or evening light, He saw the far-flung white line of the great road that ran from Ptolemais (Acre) on the Mediterranean to the furthest east. He saw long strings of camels swinging along, with their burdens of spices and rich cloths of silk and gold, from the east to the western markets, passing other trains of camels equally long which bore from the Phœnician seaports of Tyre and Sidon the whole merchandise of the Mediterranean to the distant eastern bazaars. On a frosty morning He might hear, down to the south of Him, the clank of iron upon stone. when the Roman garrison changed guard, or when a centurion marched his company along the Roman paved road that connected Capernaum with the sea. That was far below Him on the level plain of Esdraelon, a plain whose very color suggested blood, and which even in His day was the most famous battleground in all the world. In this way we see how, even at Nazareth from His earliest childhood, He was hemmed in, as it were, by the ideals of the world's merchandise and the world's militarism—by commerce and by war.

Now, while He was dying (if indeed the site of Calvary be that to which popular imagination has turned of late) there were on either side of the little hill two great roads leading northward out of Jerusalem. On the northern side of the hill they joined and became one, but Calvary separated their branches. Again, one was the road of commerce, while the other was reserved for the march of soldiers. It was as if those great jaws of commerce and of war, between which Nazareth lay in His childhood, had closed in upon Him now in His latest hour like some mighty vice. The things that had troubled His childhood and perplexed it were now crucifying Him. The commerce and the warfare of the world, its financial and its military glories, were murdering Him whom in His childhood they had astonished. Thus the thoughts of Nazareth linked themselves on with the facts of Calvary, and He understood the weird development of His life in terms of these two roads.

But when Mary came and stood before that low cross of His she brought to His dying heart another set of memories from Nazareth. There, when He was a very little boy, before even the two roads had got upon His imagination, He had gone daily to the village well, hand in hand with her. Now that she came back to Him in His last hour the tenderness of the old familiarity returned to temper the agony of His crucifixion, and to give to Him in His loneliness a gentle companion. She, too, was there, caught like Himself between the great jaws of military and commercial cruelty, whose vice-like grasp was slaying Him. She was there. And as His dying eyes closed in weariness He could feel again the touch of her hand in His, and tread again the little pathway to the village well.

All this throws a light of its own upon the meaning of this awful yet familiar scene. Mary is not merely the one woman who was so dear to His childhood in the northern village. She stands for human life and all its common love and sorrow. Our question, on this day which men celebrate as Good Friday in every land, is how to relate that common life with Calvary, how to understand the relation of the dying Christ to our human experience. Let us express this in two aspects:

1. What Jesus did for Mary.

2. What Mary did for Jesus.

1. What Jesus did for Mary. In thinking of this we must remember that it was not Mary alone who stood there. (1) All womanhood stood beneath the cross of Jesus and found itself that day. All its mystery and reticence, its shy unexamined and unconfessed instincts, were revealed to its own heart in the light of His dying love. All poorer and cheaper elements dropped away from it, all the littleness of envy and jealousy and gossip and self-importance and interference, such as had been sometimes associated with other incidents in her life, these dropped away. Only love was left, the deepest thing and the most precious in all the world, love of a woman's heart. Looking back from whatever future day upon that scene, she saw her true self there without any of life's alloy upon it, in a constant vision that nothing in all the remaining years could ever change. She saw herself as she stood at His cross. She, Mary of Nazareth, literally found herself that day. Henceforth the only thing that was worth striving for was that which she had discovered in herself then. As she stood then, so must she try to be to the end of her earthly life, a spirit named and known only by its loyalty and its love, a woman's heart set in the holy place where all meaner things had fallen away from it. This she must ever strive to be.

(2) All bereavement stood there and found itself. For bereavement also has its meaner side. We all know how sore a trial it puts upon character. There is the sudden, disintegrating shock; the desperate, vain rebellion; the slowly growing persuasion that life is over and done with now; the sense of one's heart withering into deadness; the tasteless duties that weary the spirit without interesting or exciting it. Occasional longings of the stricken heart break into feverish and intermittent passion, and are succeeded by a recoil that sends us back into a mood in which nothing seems to be worth while.

All this Mary brought to Jesus as He hung there upon His cross, and His love for her shows most tender and pathetic in the simplicity of His consideration, and the fulness of His understanding of these commonplace elements in sorrow. His love restored for her the balance of things and of their values. The thought of that most desperate hour henceforth and forever would have His love—His simple, understanding love—as part of its meaning. So the savorless life regained its interest and its poignancy, not in itself, but for His sake who had met her there. The eyes of Jesus will haunt the loneliness of this woman's life, and her sorrow will be taken up with her love of Him, into the divine and eternal life in which she also shall have part.

2. What Mary did for Jesus. On the cross He believed in spite of all the enemies of faith. He loved in spite of hatred, and forgave the world with his dying breath. Surely we cannot but believe that Mary's presence there helped Him in that victory. The hands that had caressed Him long ago were now clasped in agony at His feet. He felt again the touch of her fingers upon His matted hair. The old loyalties and the simple childish things came back across the years to comfort Him, and a touch of home came to visit Him on the homeless cross. Yes, the world held this also—the mad, raging, wicked world. All that Nazareth had ever been to Him was still part of the truth of things. The mother's presence helped Him, in that last deadly struggle, to keep hold upon His faith in life. It is indeed a wicked world, yet there is love in it, and no pure human heart has ever loved in vain.

Ah, yes, that simple human tenderness did much for Calvary. But not only did it bring comfort to Jesus in His hour of agony: it brings light to us all in our interpretation of the deed that was done there. In our handling of the doctrine of the atonement nothing is easier than to let it become a mere hard intellectual proposition, a thing of official relations and deeds. So it becomes ghastly and repels men who try to believe it. It drives into an unsympathetic and arid theological controversy those whose breaking hearts would fain flee to a crucified friend. Here is a touch which shows us the atonement in the light of mother-love, a thing we can all understand quite well. He, hanging there, is still touched with the feeling of all that makes up life's affections. All that we can find in His heart is simply love, and the love that existed between Him and His mother stands as a natural type of all His love. Herein is love indeed, and when we see it reflected in her eyes we know it well.

Oh, brothers and sisters, consider this new meaning in the cross. The highest mysteries of our faith are very simple things which little children and all the hearts that love can understand, for in our degree we know it by experience. Have we not all been tortured? Is there not a cross set up for every one of us? In all our lives there is sin, and the shame and remorse of sin to torment us. In all our love there is pain lurking somewhere. And here, in the simplicity of this stupendous event, mother and Son look simply into one another's eyes, and as you see them, behold, the sin of the world is forgiven and cast behind His back. You see before your eyes the spectacle of love that has swallowed up the pain of life, and made pain the minister of grace, to enthrone love upon the earth. So she helps us to make the cross an intelligible thing by making the love of Jesus simpler. In a new certainty we know Christ crucified. When we go down from this tremendous spectacle we shall be able to take up our own cross, and in our own lives to die daily and be crucified with Christ. We shall learn from it that the highest secret and the deepest depth of life's possible experience is just love; and that the loving soul may go through a thousand deaths and triumph over them all, and change their pain to peace and holiness and everlasting life.

Demand that the Government Use Your Money to Find a Substitute for War

Senator Borah, in a speech before the Senate on December 18, said:

"We shall expend this year, Mr. President, for war purposes $2,650,000,000; for agriculture, $24,876,000; for the public health, $15,877,000; for promotion of education, $10,151,000; for labor interests, $4,718,000; to study the causes of and the remedy for war, not one cent."

California and the Japanese Problem

By Dr. David Starr Jordan

Ex-President of Stanford University

DURING my visit to Japan in October and November several matters of historic or world interest took place.

Conspicuous among these was the withdrawal of Japanese troops from Siberia, the feeding by the Japanese at Gensan, in Korea, of a host of "white Russian" refugees from Vladivostok, the abandonment of Tsing-tao and the rest of Shantung, the withdrawal of Japanese troops from Hankow and elsewhere in China, the scrapping of ships with the release of some thirty thousand men from the navy. Finally, on the initiative of the Women's Peace Society of Japan, all reference to military glory was eliminated from the histories and readers used in the lower schools.

The general motives for these acts are found in the popular recognition of the cost, certainty of failure, and danger involved in militarism and imperial ambitions.

Some sixty years ago Japan suddenly emerged from the feudal system, under which the real governor of the nation was the Shogun or head of the army. By way of compromise, the constitution then adopted provided that each Cabinet should contain a general and an admiral, and military action was distinctly outside the control of civil authority. It was the military group which overrode civil rule in Korea, inciting a bitter and futile revolt. It was the military members in Count Okuma's ministry who "put over" the "twenty-one demands" on China, some of these demands freely denounced in Japan as "infamous," but which apparently the Prime Minister was too proud to disown, though contrary to his own avowed and actual policy. It was the military element in 1914 who tried to force Japan into siding with Germany, a purpose thwarted by the resolute firmness of Count Okuma, who would not consider for a moment breaking the treaty with Great Britain, and for which act of obstinacy Okuma and Japan were loudly damned by the German Ambassador.

The essential reasons for withdrawal of troops from Siberia and China are found in the following:

1. The enormous expense involved in imperialistic ventures. The land is poor and overtaxed, and the cost of living is three or four times what it used to be. The money wasted at Vladivostok and Tsing-tao is badly needed for internal improvements, especially the desire to give Tokyo and Osaka what those huge cities have never had—sewers, paved streets, subways, sidewalks and adequate markets. The mayor of Tokyo, Baron Goto, said while I was in that city that his efforts to modernize Tokyo, for which he has brought Prof. Charles A. Beard, of New York, as city planner, would be successful if he had the three hundred million dollars wasted at Vladivostok.

2. The capitalists in general are in favor of retrenchment. Imperialism and war mean waste of property, and bankers do not favor waste.

3. The intellectuals, for the most part, are and have been consistently opposed to these ventures. These men, educated in the admirable Japanese imperial universities, or else in America or England, have the ideas current in the world of science. One of the strongest influences for conciliation and peace is found in the Japanese men and women, some two thousand in number, trained in universities of America and Britain. In Tokyo alone are sixty graduates of Stanford—professors, engineers and business men—equally loyal to their nation and their alma mater.

4. Public opinion of England and America (but of no other countries) has great weight in Japan, insofar as it is understood and discriminated from yellow journalism and the ranting of "professional roughnecks." The Japanese have come to believe that their sober friends in foreign countries regret these adventures, into both of which they were led at the request of their allies. They were asked to replace the Germans in China and to safeguard the Czechoslovaks retreating through Siberia. But they held on too long after the fall of the curtain.

5. The military men themselves are now coming to believe that they "backed the wrong horse," and that Germany, after all, was not the model of a successful nation. Most of these men are sincere patriots, seeking only the welfare of Japan as they understood it. But the people no longer trust their judgment. The changed condition has been frankly met by the present Prime Minister, Admiral Kato, the head of the navy, who sees that as "a great naval power" Japan was putting a heavy mortgage on its future. A few army men bluster and still hold out for "perfect defense," as in all other countries which have been militarized, but they get little encouragement from the intelligent public.

6. The Japanese scholars and ethical teachers believe with Lincoln, that "no people is good enough to rule another by force."

7. The Japanese government has given its pledge to withdraw, and though administrations change, pledges are not broken. I do not remember a case in which a government in Japan has not kept its word. I have never heard of a single case of violation of the Root-Takahira convention, named by Will Irwin "The Gentlemen's Agreement."

To Japan the Washington Conference, whether ratified in Europe or not, came like a welcome shower to a desert land. It pricked the rising bubble of suspicion, fear and hate, bringing about confidence in the good-will of America and opening the way to the reduction of waste and the abatement of taxation.

The backbone of Japanese militarism lay in fear of the American navy, just as our own "Japanese menace" exists primarily to carry elections and to bring our navy to California.

The California Alien Land Acts have gravely hurt the feelings of a proud, sensitive and warm-hearted people, not so much through their intention and purpose as through the raw and inconsiderate method involving, as Roosevelt once insisted, "the maximum of irritation with the minimum of efficiency."

The Japanese authorities do not want, and never have wanted, their laborers to go to America or anywhere else where they are not welcomed. They have granted no passports to any since 1908, except picture brides (as granted in the "Gentlemen's Agreement"). They have granted none to go to Mexico since about 1910, when Count Hayashi adopted that policy, unasked, in order to allay criticism. On the annexation of Hawaii many thousands of Japanese came over, but the Foreign Office has no control over these or any others outside their own country. Some come in still in irregular fashion, but the Japanese government will do anything it can to prevent this, and the number cannot be great.

The rights of their nationals as members of "a most favored nation" were limited through the operation of a statute passed fifty years ago by compromise between the friends of the Negro and the enemies of the Chinese.

Japan among Asiatic nations stands in a class by herself as the only one possessing an actual constitutional government, and with a coherent scheme of compulsory education, ending in six great state universities with about twenty thousand students, ranking with the best in Europe. They are prepared to grant by treaty any reasonable request of the United States, but they have a moral (and I trust legal) right to be consulted when the interests of their own people are concerned.

When the proper occasion arises, and our minds and hands in America are not occupied with the wreck of the continent of Europe, the Japanese government will ask for certain things.

1. A Joint High Commission, which shall make all relevant facts accurately and authoritatively known to the people at large in both nations.

2. A treaty of similar content to replace the Root-Takahira Convention, which, having no legal value, is subject to attack and misrepresentation.

3. They will liberalize their expatriation laws, which are now much the same as those of the continent of Europe, which hold on to expatriates in the interest of conscription. They are not much interested in questions of foreign citizenship, but with political troubles of their own, each administration hopes to avoid foreign complications.

The question of the constitutionality of one or both Land Acts should be settled.

Has a State the right to interfere with the nation's international relations?

Has a State the right to divide aliens "of the most favored nation" into two classes on any pretext whatever?

Has a State "through initiative and referendum," largely a haphazard form of legislation, a right to throw international responsibilities on the Federal Government?

If these questions are answered affirmatively, two duties are plain—the abolition or limitation of the "referendum" and the repeal or amendment of Citizenship Act, grossly misused by the statutes of California. We are far too lax in our naturalization of foreigners, but it is a central principle of America that "men are men," and all persons legally here as actual and permanent residents should have it within their power to become citizens. This is for our protection as well as theirs; else an "imperium in imperio" is likely to grow up—communities under control of some foreign consul. It was to prevent this that children of all races born in this country are allowed citizenship. The referendum method of dealing with foreign nations is plainly suicidal. It ought to be unconstitutional to allow international interests to be dealt with in slap-dash fashion, leaving the Federal Government to defend, explain or apologize.

Japan is to be our next neighbor on this coast for a thousand years. Her people are eager and active, and it is vastly to our interest, moral and commercial alike, that she should be consulted courteously when any matter concerning her affairs, large or small, is at stake. In general, her government will agree to anything we may reasonably ask, but such matters should not come as a surprise.

The question of racial equality has been made a demand of Japan. I believe that it will not be repeated. To invite Japan to international conferences is all the "equality" either President or Congress can grant. Each citizen has the right to think of foreign peoples as his education or his ignorance permits. Furthermore, the very demand presupposes previous inequality or inferiority. No one, friend or enemy, regards the Japanese as an inferior race—only different—and among educated people on both sides this difference seems very small—politically and socially negligible.

Our Naval Mission to Brazil

A few weeks ago our press remarked casually that the United States had sent a naval mission to Brazil. A little later we were told, in the same casual manner, that Argentina does not like it. The French have a military mission in Brazil; we believe also in Peru. The Germans had one before the war in Chile. What does it all mean?

It is a part of the tussle of nations for prestige and markets. With regard to our own naval mission in Brazil, the simple fact is that the British had one there and we have succeeded in replacing it with one of our own. Now Brazil will be guided, it is hoped, in foreign policy by American naval advisors rather than by British naval advisors and will give her naval contracts for the replacement of "junk" with "a real navy" to American shipbuilders.

It is the old game and a bad one. The American republics discussed their military and naval expenditures when they were at Santiago in March. Why don't they agree with one another that their national dignity and patriotism require that they rely in future on their own departments of defense without the disturbing presence of military advisors from anywhere?

Ministerial Turn-Over

A recent bulletin of the Rochester Federation of Churches points out a remarkable record in the turn-over of pastorates in that city since September 1, 1919, which has been as follows: Ten out of fourteen Baptist churches have lost pastors; two out of four Congregational; all of the three Evangelical Association churches; one out of fourteen Lutheran churches; thirteen out of fourteen Methodist churches; ten out of twenty-one Presbyterian churches; six out of thirteen Episcopal churches; one out of five Reformed churches; one of the two Disciples; the United Presbyterian; the Free Methodist; the Swedish Emanuel; the Unitarian and the Seventh Day Adventist churches; making a total of fifty-two churches that have had a change of pastorate and forty-nine that have not.

SYNOPSIS:

Colonel Lester Trelawney has been away for over six years, in military service in India and Mesopotamia. As the story opens, he is on his way home, across the English Channel. He is met at the landing by his wife and during the railway journey to London she seemed anxious to unburden her mind regarding something. The most that she can tell him, however, is that "things have become so different since he went away." They finally arrive at their home.

CHAPTER II—"THE OLD ORDER CHANGETH."

"IT'S just beautiful," Colonel Trelawney sighed contentedly, "just as I have thought of it during six lonely years."

But all thoughts of house and garden passed from him in a moment, for he heard the sound of voices, and the scamper of feet. A second later the door was opened, and he was met by two girls who rushed towards him.

"Why, Eleanor," he cried, as he kissed the older and taller of the two, "I shouldn't have known you. And, by Jove, you are a pretty girl, too. As for little Peg; why, you young puss, what have you done with yourself?"

"Like Topsy, 'I'se growed,'" replied the girl.

"You have 'growed.' You make me feel an old man. You were a rackety, untidy kid when I left and now you are far taller than your mother. Still you are dad's baby, aren't you?"

"Not much of a baby about me," retorted the girl saucily.

They were both good-looking girls. Eleanor, the older and taller of the two, had almost classical features, and a striking appearance generally. Peggy, the younger, although not yet eighteen years old, had a fine well-developed figure. Both were attired in the latest fashion; each of their dresses was cut very low at the neck, while their skirts were very short.

Colonel Trelawney's quick, observant eye took all this in at a glance, but he made no remark. Indeed, he was so happily excited that details of dress counted for little.

"But where's John?" he asked.

"Here, father," said a youth, coming forward. "I only wanted to give the girls the first chance."

Colonel Trelawney hesitated a moment, and then he put his arm around his shoulder and kissed him.

"God bless you, my boy," he said fervently.

John blushed a fiery red, while Peggy giggled. He was a sensitive fellow, and like other boys of his age, was not given to open manifestation of his feelings.

"Your mother has told me about you," went on the Colonel. "Of course, I'm immensely pleased that you've been wanting to help your mother. All the same, I'm sorry you didn't go on to the 'Varsity."

John shuffled awkwardly and was silent. He had been steadily watching his father ever since he had entered the house, as if trying to make up his mind about him.

"But he's been such a comfort to me," interposed the mother. "I don't know what I should have done without him."

John looked more uncomfortable than ever, while Peggy laughed aloud, and then burst out singing.

"Our John's a pattern boy, a pattern boy, a pattern boy. Our John's a pattern boy—yes, a pa-a-tern boy!"

"Do be quiet, Peg," he exclaimed.

"But you are," laughed the girl, "and it's only right father should know it."

"Ah, well," broke in the Colonel, "it's good to see you all, even though I can't realize even yet that you are no longer children. But I must get used to that. In the meanwhile we will have a great time together. After I've settled up a few things I'm going to have a complete holiday. Come, you girls, kiss your old dad again, and then we'll have dinner. Mother told me she'd arranged to put it off till I came home, so you'll be hungry."

"We are," assented Peggy.

"Dinner will be ready in five minutes," Mrs. Trelawney informed them.

"Then I'll have a wash in the meantime," said the Colonel. "Oh, my little kiddies, God only knows how I've longed for this hour."

During dinner the gathering was somewhat subdued. Possibly the fact that the head of the house sat at the table had a restraining influence. After all, they were children when he went away, and for six years his controlling hand had been taken away from them.

More than once Colonel Trelawney looked searchingly from one face to another. He felt almost like a stranger in his own house. His wife only had remained the same. The years of absence had scarcely changed her at all. She was the same loving unselfish creature he had always known; her to be; but the children puzzled him.

As for John, the Colonel's heart warmed as he looked at him.

"I shall be able to make a pal of him," he thought. "He's a fine lad."

"If only Trev were here we should all be home together," he said aloud presently. "I know it can't be helped, but I would have given a good deal to have him with us."

"Oh, Trev's all right," laughed Peggy. "He's no end of a swell. I don't know how many hearts he's broken already."

The Colonel made no reply. He did not seem quite sure of his ground, and his eyes were passing quickly from face to face as if endeavoring to form judgment.

"If he can't get leave I shall go to see him at the first opportunity," was all he said, before going on to relate some

World Court League

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES has asked that the United States join the World Court set up by the League of Nations.

The recommendation is going to be bitterly opposed by three groups of people:

(1) Those Senators and others who do not want the United States to have any participation in world affairs.

(2) Those who think it is a first step toward recognizing a community or league of nations.

(3) Those militarists who have no trust in any method for peace except armaments and war.

The opposition of certain Senators is going to be very strong as was evidenced by the reception of President Harding's first message to the Senate.

On the other hand, the President is determined to put the United States in to the World Court and has announced his determination to go to the people.

He will need the help of every lover of good-will and of everyone who believes that the time has come to substitute judicial methods for war in the settlement of international disputes.

Everyone who believes that the Christian principles can be applied to international affairs should immediately address himself to helping the President achieve this high purpose.

Every American should rally to the President because the Court is largely an American idea, and every great American statesman has advocated it.

The President's call to America to sustain him, voiced in the letter to Governor Bloom of Ohio, should express the sentiment of everyone who wants to see America taking her full share in world problems: "I look upon the establishment of the Court of International Justice, with the jurisdiction that has been given to it, as one of the greatest advances which world society has made toward conditions in which, at last, the rule of law may be substituted for the rule of force. It looks to the settlement of issues before they become dangerously acute; it contemplates the elimination of the causes of conflict and war. Feeling thus, I cannot but believe that our own country should be among the most devoted adherents of such a program."

Let us all devote ourselves to sustaining the President in this high endeavor.

We can do much personally.

(1) We can write a letter to the President congratulating him and offering him our support.

(2) We can write our Senator at Washington urging him to support the President.

(3) We can preach, talk, and write about it unceasingly.

BUT WE CAN DO MUCH MORE IF WE WILL BAND OURSELVES TOGETHER FOR A YEAR TO PUT OUR UNITED FORCE BEHIND THE PRESIDENT.

With this thought in mind the editors of The Christian Work, a magazine which has led in the movement for America's participation in world affairs, have undertaken to unite the Christian pastors and laymen of the nation in a

WORLD COURT LEAGUE

Will you not join us and thus have part in achieving one of the greatest steps ever taken in Christian history?

You will triple your influence in this way and together we can bring such pressure upon the United States Senate that it will not dare to resist the will of the President and the people.

of his experience during the years he had been away.

The evening passed quickly away. The Colonel was blissfully happy at being at home again, while years had seemed to have rolled from his wife at the thought of having him by her side.

"Well, what do you think of them?" she asked, when at length they had retired to their room.

"John's splendid," he replied heartily, "just splendid."

"He is, isn't he? Of course, the girls laugh at him, but there isn't a nicer boy living."

"Why should the girls laugh at him?"

"Oh, they say he's such a sobersides—and—and—what do you think of the girls?"

"Eleanor seems very clever, but a bit reserved. I can't quite make her out yet."

"No, she isn't easy to understand. Of course, she's very handsome, and very high spirited, and—has all sorts of ideas. She's got beyond me. In fact, they both have."

"In what way? Tell me."

Mrs. Trelawney hesitated a moment, and seemed on the point of answering him, but decided to be silent.

Meanwhile the two girls found their way upstairs, while John went into the room which in past years had been called the "treadmill." It was the room which, when they had a governess, had been used as a schoolroom.

"Well?" queried Peggy when they were alone.

"I see trouble," replied Eleanor.

"Well, trouble or no trouble, I'm dying for a cig. It's the first evening I've spent without smoking for ages. Give me one."

"Haven't got any here. I left them down in the 'treadmill'."

"Then let's go down and get them. I can't sleep without a smoke."

"We'll have to be careful. As you can easily see, he's of the old-fashioned order, and may be shocked."

"Well, he must be shocked, that's all. I'm not one to hide my light under a bushel. Besides, everybody smokes now. I scarcely know a girl who doesn't have her packet of cigarettes a day. Still, as you say, we'll have to be careful. He'll not be played with. Like you, I see trouble. But let's go down to the 'treadmill' and smoke there."

The girls went quietly down-stairs and found their way into their old schoolroom.

"Hello, Johnny darling," exclaimed Peggy. "What are you doing here? It's time for children like you to be in bed."

"What are you doing here then?" retorted John.

"We've come for a smoke," replied Peggy. "We hadn't any baccy up-stairs, so we came here."

John looked at them steadily for a few seconds. "You are afraid of him then," he replied.

"Afraid! Not a bit. What is there to be afraid of?"

"Nothing if you play the game," was the boy's reply.

"Don't be silly," cried Peggy, lighting a cigarette and throwing herself in an armchair.

There was a silence for a few seconds, then Eleanor broke out: "Well, mother's darling, what do you think of him?"

"He's splendid," replied the boy. "He's just great. All the same, we are in for a new dispensation. A good thing, too," he added, after a few seconds' silence.

"Bosh!" replied Peggy.

"It's not bosh," retorted John. "If father had been home these last two years things would have been different, and you know it."

"Bosh!" repeated Peggy. "I'm just going on in the same way."

"No, you are not. As a proof of it, why didn't you smoke when he was with us?"

"Why, my dear boy, there's nothing in smoke."

"I don't say there is; but why didn't you?"

"Oh, well, we naturally wanted to see which way the wind blew. You see, he's at a dangerous age," she giggled, "and of course Eleanor and I wanted to sum him up first."

"And what do you think of him?"

"Oh, I suppose he's all right; but if he thinks he is going to find us a pair of 'antiques,' he'll pretty soon find out his mistake. He'll have to come to our ways."

"More likely to be the other way. I hope so, anyhow."

"Look here, pattern boy, are you going to play the game?" asked Eleanor.

"I've nothing to do with it," replied John. "But I'm glad that dad's come home. It's time he did come, too. You've been just doing what you liked with mother, and it's done you no good. As for dad, he's just great, I tell you. He's the most splendid man I ever saw. He may be old-fashioned, but he's a gentleman through and through, and you'll find that he'll be obeyed."

"I'll admit there's a look in his quiet gray eyes which is a bit discomfiting." Eleanor spoke as though she were thinking deeply.

"Oh, I'm prepared for a — of a row," rejoined Peggy flippantly, as she crossed her legs and puffed at her cigarette.

"You wouldn't say that in dad's presence," John said quietly.

"Why, what's the harm in it? Every girl swears now."

"Not nice girls," retorted the boy.

"Thank you," and Peggy's eyes blazed. "Then we are not nice girls?"

"What's the use of getting into a passion?" was John's reply. "You know as well as I do that you've picked up with a fast set. As a consequence, real nice girls are dropping you. There's the Newshams, for example, they—"

"Who cares for the Newshams? As everybody knows, they are just a narrow-minded, church-going lot who are tied to their mammy's apron strings. What's the use of living if you can't enjoy yourself?"

"I believe dad will want us to enjoy ourselves," replied John, "but anyone can see with half an eye that he's as keen as a razor, and that he won't have you going to such dances as you have gone to; neither will he have such bounders as that fellow Barnes coming to the house."

"Look here, Johnny, if you tell dad anything about Jim I'll—I'll never speak to you again."

"There'll be no need for me to tell him," replied the boy. "If Barnes comes here he'll see for himself. But I tell you he'll show him the door in double quick time."

"If Jim isn't allowed to come here, I shall go to him, that's all," answered Peggy quickly. "Besides, why shouldn't he come here? I'm going to choose my own friends, and if dad thinks he's going to dictate to me he'll find out his mistake."

"I expect the mater has told our long lost father all about him by this time," rejoined Eleanor.

"No she hasn't," laughed the younger girl. "I put the fear of God into her last night. I told her that if she tried to prejudice him against Jim, or said anything about him, I'd run away with him."

"But you don't care anything about him."

"That's all you know. Anyhow, he's good fun, and he's one of the best dancers in London. In any case, if our long lost father thinks we are going to be like nuns shut up in a nunnery the sooner he knows the truth the better."

"Personally, I can't imagine what you see in him," said Eleanor. "For that matter, I can't understand girls who are forever ogling men. Of course, they are all right in their way. They take one to the theater, or to supper, but as for the love business and marrying, it's just sickening. I think any girl is a fool who get's married."

"Oh, you're cold-blooded."

"I try to be sensible, anyhow. Life isn't a very long business, and the idea of getting married and having babies, and that sort of thing, is simply nauseous."

"I s'pose that's why you turn the cold shoulder to Rod Ravenscroft?"

"Rod Ravenscroft is all right as a friend, and if I wanted to marry I'd as soon have him as anybody. But as I've just said, love and marriage make no appeal to me. Still I don't want to judge anyone else. We must all live our own lives."

"That's what I mean to do," cried Peggy. "And that's why I don't mean to let anyone interfere between me and Jim."

"You'll find that dad will interfere," interposed John.

"Then he'll be told to mind his own business, that's all."

"It is his business."

"How is it his business? If I am fond of Jim, it's my own affair."

"But the fellow is such a bounder."

"Bounder yourself," retorted Peggy, with flashing eyes, "and a goody-goody bounder at that. Of course, he's fond of life, but so am I, and I'm not going to stand any interference either from you or anyone else. I told mother so last night."

John shrugged his shoulders. "Time'll tell," he remarked quietly.

"I suppose that means that you'll tell," retorted Peggy. "Well, tell, I don't care."

"Hark! What's that?" cried Eleanor.

At that moment there was the sound of footsteps on the gravel outside, and a low tapping at the window pane.

Peggy's face flushed crimson. "That'll be Jim," she whispered. "I told him not to come to-night, but—but—"

"But surely you are not going out to him?" said John, as he saw his sister preparing to leave the room.

"Of course I am," was the girl's reply. "I'll be back in ten minutes."

Liberty in Logan County

By Henry S. Huntington

PART II.

LAST fall a Salvation Army man came to Logan and preached on the street. No one objected. But in his fourth sermon the preacher touched on labor. Don Chafin immediately notified him that he must not do that. But the Salvation Army man was a Christian. The next time he preached he began again to talk about the hiring being oppressed, or something to that effect. Don took him by the collar, "There's a train goes in fifteen minutes, and that's your limit to get out of here." The Salvation Army man did not see that he had any choice. He went.

So thoroughly has this policy of suppression become the atmosphere of Logan County that one of the country ministers telling this story really bragged about "the way Don keeps things cleaned up here." He went on: "Now, if that preacher hadn't got to talking about labor Don would have let him preach." In other words, there is not even liberty of the pulpit in Logan County, and a large proportion of the preachers are so much in sympathy with the system that they do not even know that their liberty is curtailed. When the mine war came two years ago one young Logan preacher took a gun and went up on Blair Mountain himself.

The coal operators of Logan instruct their foremen to ask applicants for work two questions: Where do you come from? and, Do you sympathize with labor unions? The foreman may not engage any man who answers yes to the second question. Some of the Logan coal operators, I understand, have introduced the so-called "yellow dog" contracts, by which the companies bind themselves not to employ any members of the United Mine Workers or of the International Workers of the World, and the employees bind themselves not to join or encourage any such union or organization. In these contracts the employee also is compelled to promise that after he has ceased to work for the employing corporation he will not "annoy or interfere with the business, customers or employees of the employer, and will not aid or encourage anyone else in so doing."

The operators recently secured an injunction from the local court addressed specifically to the officials of the United Mine Workers and to a number of individuals, but generally applicable, forbidding them to interfere with the mine workers contrary to the law. The injunction, like most labor injunctions, only forbade what was illegal anyway. The trouble with such injunctions is that the legal verbiage makes them misunderstood by the people to whom they are addressed and by the police. Backed with such an injunction police are likely to think that they can arrest men who are doing perfectly legal acts.

So notorious did the suppression of free speech in Logan become that the Civil Liberties Union of New York arranged a meeting there to be held on the court house steps after church Sunday evening, March 4. The Civil Liberties Union wanted to make it clear that the meeting was solely for the assertion of the right of free speech in Logan County. It also wanted to make the people of Logan realize that conditions in the county were disapproved by conservative people in the United States. Accordingly, two scheduled speakers were clergymen—Father Ryan, head of the National Catholic Welfare Council, and the writer. Arthur Garfield Hays, an able New York lawyer, who has had a good deal of experience in such cases, was to be the third speaker.

The powers that be in Logan were up in arms at the announcement of the meeting. "The Logan Democrat" of March 1st came out with a heading stretching across the whole front page, "Political and Traitorous Parasites Would Stir Malicious Propaganda Against Logan." One sentence in the article under the heading began, "Who invited these fellows, so-called clergymen—" (!)

A sample statement in the article ran, "A false and inflaming report of a situation that the self-invited orators know nothing of—and which, perhaps, is better so, as they might want to settle here themselves if they did know it—will appear in the lick-spittle press and be bandied about by peanut politicians." The next day the other Logan paper, "The Logan Banner," remarked in a front page article, "Yes, it would be interesting to hear them [the speakers announced for the meeting] if we were not aware that the speakers billed to appear here were known radicals and men who have been in prison for violating the laws time and again." (!)

Don Chafin himself owns the "Democrat," I am told, and he owns the building in which the "Banner" is printed. The newspaper articles were, no doubt, a pretty fair reflection of Chafin's own feelings.

When the night of the meeting came the court house steps, the open ground in front of it, and the street were jammed with men and an occasional woman. People hung out of the windows of the neighboring buildings in order to hear. It was the biggest meeting that Logan had ever seen. Don Chafin and his deputies stood in the balcony over the speakers in order that nothing might be lost.

A courageous railroad man, a member of the local Shopcrafts Federation, presided. Heber Blankenhorn, the man who put together the Interchurch report on the steel strike, began the speaking with a brief statement of the purpose of the meeting. Unfortunately Father Ryan was prevented from coming by a threatened attack of grip. But the other clerical member of the delegation gave what was virtually a fifteen-minute sermon on free speech—a sermon to show how Jesus was hated by the conservative pillars of the established order of His time because He spoke the truth. Then Arthur Garfield Hays gave the great speech of the evening. He told in half-humorous fashion his experience in Pennsylvania, where he was arrested when he went into Vinton-dale, a non-union coal town. When he started up the steps of the mine company's office to see the judge, who was holding a hearing there, he was seized and thrown into jail without any warrant. After a while the jailer came down with a warrant, but Hays would not receive it then. In due time the judge appeared.

"I want to get through with this case quickly," said his honor.

"All right," said Mr. Hays, "I'm ready."

"I find you guilty and fine you $5."

"I refuse to pay the fine."

"All right, then, the fine is remitted. You're guilty. Get out."

"I refuse to let the verdict of guilty stand against me."

"All right, then you're not guilty."

Mr. Hays got into his car and drove on to the next town, where the local justice was delighted to issue warrants for the mine company's guards. So the guards were served that very afternoon, and last December a local jury, with two operators on it, found them guilty.

There was some cheering and some jeering during Mr. Hays' speech. One of the deputy sheriffs shouted out that he was a liar when he told the people that the name of Logan was a scandal in the United States. Another deputy urged the drivers of the automobiles parked in front of the court house to honk their horns to drown out the speakers. But the people of Logan, in general, were far too courteous to take the deputy sheriff's suggestion. At the end of the speech the secretary, or former secretary, of the Mine Owners' Association yelled out, "Raspberry," from behind us. But seventy-five per cent., yes, I suppose, ninety-five per cent. of the people were delighted. It was like a new birth of freedom to them that men should stand up in the center of the town and talk as Americans, and even go so far as to read the first amendment of the Federal Constitution! One man remarked afterwards, "There are more happy people in Logan than in fifteen years. I told my wife I'd rather the thing had happened the way it did Sunday night than to have picked up a million dollars. The only thing that made me feel bad was that people had to come clear from New York to tell me I had the right to talk, and I tell you for the people here it was breaking the news to 'em."

The mine operators, to be sure, were none too well pleased. One of them remarked to a caller the next day, "Do you know there'd have been hell if that thing had lasted a little longer? Every mine superintendent in the field was there and was watching." Certainly, some of the good clergymen of Logan felt that the thing had been done in a mistaken way. They believe that there is plenty of wrong in New York, and that there was no need of people going from there to tell them about the mistakes of Logan. The American Legion rushed in and passed a long resolution denouncing the "attack on the county."

But as I talked with the men who had suffered in days gone by, as I went about and got some impression of the fear that had reigned and still reigns in Logan I was glad that there had been some assertion there of the American rights that had been infringed. Logan needs a series of such meetings in order that free speech and freedom of residence and the constitutional rights of unions, as well as of mine corporations or churches, may be clearly understood and sacredly guarded. I have never been a union man. I recognize that unions have done many evil and vexatious things, as well as good and helpful ones. But if we are to have American liberty under the Stars and Stripes, let us have it everywhere that they float, and let us have it for every person and institution under the law.

Essay Contest

The American School Citizenship League has announced the subjects for its annual world essay contest which will close June 1. For students in normal schools and teachers' colleges the subject is, "A World Educational Association to Promote International Good-will." For seniors in secondary schools, "The Achievements of Civilization and How to Organize Them for World Comity." The prizes are $75, $50 and $25 for the three best essays in each set. Full particulars can be obtained from the secretary, Mrs. Fannie— Fern Andrews, 405 Marlborough Street, Boston, Mass.

Where the Races of Men Pass By

By Rev. Harry B. Fisher

Pastor of the Union Church, Cristobal, Canal Zone

IT has been well said that nothing unites a people like fighting a common enemy or doing a common task. Certainly this has been true of that splendid group of red-blooded Americans who pooled their lives and made possible the Panama Canal. Fighting death from a thousand foes, yet through it all bent on doing one thing as one man, these men, victorious in their effort, were in very truth "knit together as one man."

When the Canal was well under way Uncle Sam sent down to the Zone a number of chaplains who served the men in their religious needs. But as the task of building the Canal drew near the point of completion the men began to see that with the opening of the Canal and the abolishment of the old commission these chaplains would be withdrawn. One by one, the several denominational agencies began to apply for building locations along the Zone. But, the men said to each other, "In the days of our labor here we were neither Baptists, Methodists, Presbyterians nor Congregationalists—but we were one family, united in worship as well as in labor. Why should we now be separated and have half a dozen or more small denominational churches? Why should we not have one strong Evangelical Society?"

So it was that in 1909 at Cristobal, the Atlantic Terminal, the first Union Evangelical Church was organized on the Canal Zone. From this church laymen went to other construction towns and there organized outposts of the Union Church of Cristobal. By 1913 the Canal Zone had taken on its permanent character, so far as the location of residential districts. These communities were established as follows: The Commercial Center at Cristobal, Atlantic Terminal, the first Lock City at Gatun, where the larger locks are located, the second Lock City at Pedro Miguel, and the Administration Center and Pacific Terminal at Balboa.

By 1914 congregations were well established at each of these four cities, and in that year the Union Church of the Canal Zone was formally organized under a special grant from the Canal Commission. These four congregations have gradually grown until, it can be said with truth, they serve in a remarkable manner the spiritual needs of that splendid group of Christians found there on the Zone.

But, all is not as flowery as it would seem. You must remember that these people live and labor under tropic skies. You must remember, too, that the Canal Zone is but a narrow strip of land, ten miles in width, highly Americanized, flanked on either side, and at the two terminals by a civilization vastly different and alluringly strange, a civilization of mixed Spanish, Indian, Oriental, West Indian and the lowest of all Europeans.

You must remember, also, that all that divides the two civilizations is an imaginary line drawn down the middle of the street. On one side is the U. S. A., while just across the street are seen the dives and brothels of the other republic. The most abominable "district" to be found anywhere in the two Americas is but one short block from our own Stars and Stripes. I would not dare tell in these columns the things my own eyes have seen and my own ears have heard. I would not be permitted to give here scenes multiplied a hundred times where our splendid American youths have been the open prey to demons of the lowest order. But, I know that many of these boys, and many of these girls, have come from some of our own church homes, for I have been by their side in the hospitals; I have sat with them at the bar of justice; I have talked with them between the prison bars and I have read the letter from mother, father, sweetheart, sister or brother. Just now while I am writing these lines the combined Atlantic and Pacific Fleets of the U. S. A. are playing war yonder in the waters off Panama. More than thirty-five thousand American youths are at this moment exposed to the burning fires of the brothel, the saloon, the gambling den and the dope ring.

Yet American Protestantism, while established with four splendid congregations, finds itself without adequate equipment to meet the problems flung at its door. The crying need of the Union Church on the Canal Zone is for adequate church buildings. At Cristobal a beautiful building has been erected, but $10,000 is needed to furnish and finish it. At Gatun, the larger Lock City, the church meets on the ground floor of the Government Lodge Hall; at Pedro Miguel an old building has been made over to meet the needs for the present. But at Balboa, the largest center on the Zone, where are located all the administration interests of the Canal, the Union Church has but the basement floor with a tin roof in which to attempt to meet the conditions and problems of both civilian and service men.

The Union Church needs at least one hundred thousand dollars with which to finish the church at Cristobal, to meet the needs at Gatun, and to build a much needed church building at Balboa. As pastor of the Cristobal Church I am in the States to raise this needed one hundred thousand dollars. I am here at the expense of my local congregation, and I cannot go back until this amount is assured us for United Protestantism's task at the cross-roads of the world.

The Union Church is sponsored by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America and by the several denominational bodies affiliated with the Federal Council. A special Committee on Religious Work on the Canal Zone has been appointed by these denominations to serve in an advisory relation with the Executive Council of the Union Church on the Canal Zone. A trust agreement has been drawn by these denominations whereby the Federal Council holds the property guaranteeing the investment as an Evangelical Agency.

The Union Church is self-supporting. Its annual budget is over $14,000. Besides paying all of its own pastoral and current expenses it supports a missionary to the Panamanians at David, Panama. It is not a missionary church, but a church with a missionary spirit. The Cristobal Branch also supports special work among the Chinese in its local parish in Colon. In the membership of the Union Church eighteen denominations are represented. Last year tourists from twenty-one countries and forty-five of the States of the Union crossed the thresholds of this church. The ships of the whole world pass and repass its doors continually. If ever there was a church by the side of the road where the races of men pass by, the Union Church of the Canal Zone is that Church.

We need the help of every American of the Protestant faith. We need your prayers, we need your sympathy, and, too, we need just now your most generous financial aid. It is our plan to make these church buildings a memorial to the strong band of civilians who made possible the eighth wonder of the world and who gave the same to the country we love so dearly. What will be your aid?

Is There Hope in the Factory?

By Professor H. A. Overstreet

ARTICLE III.

ON the average, I seemed to find, management has come to realize three pretty crucial things: First, you cannot get good work out of an overdriven operative; second, workmen tend to gravitate from the poor factories to those that are more wisely humane; third, there is a noticeable high cost of low wages.

The last is a remarkable and significant advance. It was in pretty full swing just before the depression. Since then, of course, there has been in some quarters (but by no means in all) a kind of panic-stricken reversion to older standards. Whether the reversion is but temporary remains to be seen. Mr. John Calder, Industrial Relations Manager of Swift and Company, summed up a few years ago what, at that time was coming to be the insight of more progressive management in the phrase: "Cheaper goods and dearer men." And his voice, I found, was not that of one crying in the wilderness. The voice of the old-type traditional management apparently had been a tendency to solve its cost problems in too obvious a way. Whenever it was a question of lowering costs and increasing profits, the first head to hit was the workman's. Reduce wages! Or, if this was too crudely obvious, make some trifling modification in the machine process, take a new time-study, and then explain to the workman, in all innocence, that changed conditions require a lowered price rate. Every little trick, I found, was resorted to to steal a little here and a little there from the wage fund. The worker, of course, was not blind to what was happening; and he matched the subtle filching of his masters with an equally subtle sabotage of his own. It was a merry game of tickle-me-I-tickle-you.

With it there went a certain pessimism as to the human nature of the workingman. The psychologists endow man with an equipment of elemental instincts—sex, hunger, gregariousness, etc. The average foreman, trained in the practical psychology of the shop, added one instinct which the innocent psychologists omitted—incurable laziness. "Work?" I heard one foreman say this in effect. "They hate it. Pride in their work? Nothing doing. What they want is a million dollars and a fat job at doing nothing." Hence the task of management was to keep a sharp eye on the inevitable shirker and give grudgingly only what it was forced to give.

In this respect, I found that a very noticeable change had already taken place in a number of quarters. In the first place, I found that management had become, or was becoming, intelligent about human nature. Operatives were not regarded as intrinsically lazy and good-for-nothing, but as actually possessed of a desire for good workmanship. Where such management detected shirking or lack-lustre interest, it did not vent its spleen on the slacker; rather, it seriously tried to discover what it was that was balking the slacker's workmanship instinct. The better types of management, I found, were all for awakening the operative's interest in his work, first by properly placing him; second, by giving him the kind of instruction that would make him master of his job; third, by supplying incentives.

I remember one striking instance of how fundamental the instinct of workmanship is in human beings. The case in point concerned a number of college men who were working in the factory for the summer. A group of them, for instructional purposes, were assigned to the mill, where there was a foreman who apparently did not wish to be bothered with them. So instead of detailing them to specific tasks, he waved his hand impatiently and told them to get what they could out of watching the men. That seemed a pretty soft snap. Regular pay and nothing to do! The workman's paradise! At the end of the third or fourth day those young men were the most miserable lot I have ever seen. They took every conceivable opportunity to get at the machines; and one day I actually found them matching coins to take turns at a steady job at the calenders that one of them had been fortunate to secure.

Of course it will be said this was exceptional. These young men had not been compelled to work day in and day out. If once they had got their fill of factory drudgery they would not have been as eager to yield up their golden opportunity of pay-without-work. And of course that is true if they had once got their fill. Your workman who damns work and shirks it, is, I take it, the workman who has been given more than he can hold. This does not mean, however, that with work proportioned to his strength and eliciting his interest, he would not be as eager as were those college men to put in his hard licks throughout his eight-hour day. Provided, too, he were sure that the work would hold out!

As a matter of fact, in departments where management was wise, I found men not only happy in the running of their machines, but taking pride in the little tricks that marked them as superior operatives. I have found this even in relatively unskilled jobs. I remember one grizzled Italian, who had been in the same department for over twenty years, doing a job at which any fairly intelligent person could earn a cum laudé in a week. He was proud in his little domain. If he was not there, things went wrong. He had the same attitude that a conscientious scientist has toward his laboratory experiments. No, I am convinced that workmen are not happy doing nothing. They are happiest when they are doing that which they can do well and for which there is adequate recognition.

All this means, of course, that human nature is, at bottom, industrially sound. Slacking is a disease due most often to conditions beyond the worker's control. It is being increasingly realized that the task of good management is to cure the disease by getting at its causes, not by damning the worker and feeling thereby the thrill of superior virtue.

Progressive management is therefore not so keen as is generally supposed to find in lowered wages the open sesame to increased profits. Wages are being lowered, unfortunately; but in many cases with reluctance and sorrow. The new slogan is: "Better men and better organization." The wiser types of management realize that the lowering of wages is a direct invitation to inefficiency. In one large factory I know personally of months of serious effort to weed out inefficiency of personnel and process in the hope of avoiding what seemed to be an inevitable cut in wages. When the cut was finally made (prices had gone down so rapidly that one could scarcely see the trail of them), it was explained to the workers in mass meeting by the general manager that the step had been taken only as a last resort. When I joined that factory several months before I had heard only one expression: "This factory is 'white.'" When the cut was made that feeling was still dominant.

In significant contrast was the action of another factory not far distant. Although, during the years of the war, it had trebled and almost quadrupled its original investment, when the very first signs of depression came and orders were being canceled, the management promptly cut wages twenty per cent. Factories, in short, differ as individuals differ—in their fundamental sense of fair play.

A New York friend of mine returned from his golfing the other day. "Have a good game?" he was asked. "Rot-ten!" he replied. "What was the trouble?" "Oh, it was all my caddy's fault. He had the hiccups. Every time he hiccupped, I'd miss my stroke; and every time he didn't hiccup, I'd miss it just because I was waiting for the hiccup to come!"

Waiting for the hiccup to come has apparently, for a long time, been the absorbing indoor sport in factory management. Seebohm Rountree, on the other hand, the British employer, recently told of a way in which he had managed for many years to beat the hiccup to it. He said that he and other British employers had adopted by agreement with the workers a scheme by which all controversies were referred to a board equally representative of the employers and the workers, with an impartial chairman. As a consequence, in an industry employing seven thousand workers and dealing with nineteen unions, there had not been a strike since 1837. He counselled the policy of looking far enough ahead and of conferring, in a spirit of generous give and take, with the workers.

Mr. Rountree's address followed a speech by the president of one of our large employers' associations in which Unionism was denounced as the foster father of inefficiency and industrial terrorism. This speech was loudly applauded by the hearers; but when Mr. Rountree had concluded his strikingly divergent address, the enthusiasm was so great that the hearers arose in a body and cheered.

The incident is significant not so much for what the British speaker said as for the response of his American audience. I think it typifies a rapidly growing sentiment among the more thoughtful type of American employers and managers. I found, in a more or less intimate contact with a score and more of factories from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast, a growing conviction that the day of closed compartments—owners and managers in one compartment, workers in the other—is over. The arrangement simply will not work. To my surprise, I found managers coming to this conviction, not sulkily, as if a fatal concession had been wrung out of them, but with enthusiasm, as if they had made some epochal discovery. I remember the manager and vice-president of a stove factory telling me the story of the formation of his factory council:

"We were sick of the old way—ashamed of it. It had all the evils of autocracy with none of its advantages. It made management into a slave drivers' job. Now we are happy. Our workers are happy. We are a family. We talk things over. And the surprising thing is that the men are fair. Last year we actually put the drawing up of the wage scale into their hands. Do you know what they did? Went at it more systematically than we'd ever done. They sent out a committee to examine the wage scales in the entire industry. Then they went over the whole situation and made a report. We adopted that report without a single modification. And this year we are doing it again. Give up the factory council? Not on your life. It's given us the first breath of generous fellow feeling we've had for a generation!"

We all remember Charles Lamb's reply to the question whether he had ever met a certain person whom he disliked, to the effect that he didn't want to meet him, for if he met him he might like him. I think that sums up the factory situation. Factory managers with whom I have talked have invariably stressed the point that meeting with their men was a real, to many a quite unexpected pleasure. Why, workers, given a little authority, weren't at all the unreasonable and belligerent creatures they had been made out to be! They actually showed good judgment. More than that, they were helpful. And I have heard these executives deplore the wasted years in which management and men were kept sedulously apart as if contact were a kind of contagion.

Among the workers I found varying attitudes toward the factory council movement. It must be remembered that the worker has had a pretty stiff and impressive course in inhumane treatment; and he is not likely to throw up his hat very wildly when his superiors hand him out something that they assure him is good. He is very apt to pick suspiciously at the sugar coating.

My grizzled Italian shrugged his shoulders when I asked him what he thought of the factory council. "Maybe good. Maybe bad. I do-a my work!" In another factory, the workers were so little impressed with the council idea that, for a joke, they elected to the chairmanship of the educational committee, a woman who could neither read nor write. And the union men, of course, have no use for it at all. "Just an easy way to knife the unions, and keep the workers under their thumb!" I think that this attitude was not altogether without justification. I had visited one large and very elegant factory in an eastern city where, by one of the vice-presidents, I had been given in glowing detail the account of the democratic operation of their factory council. It looked wonderfully good to me. The next day I talked with an Industrial Relations manager, in another (not a rival) factory; and I spilled over a little of my enthusiasm. He smiled sardonically. "Yes, that's what everybody says about them who doesn't really know. As a matter of fact, there's no more democracy there than there was in the good old days of the Reichstag. Whenever the management wants to put something over, it calls in a few of the leaders—one by one, mind you—and with a certain persuasiveness lays the matter before them. I've been there, so I know. Then a meeting of the council is called. Oh, yes, it's all very nice and democratic; but somehow—well—I hate to spoil your illusions!"

In one large motor truck concern in the Middle West, where the management was about as enlightened and-ready-to-be-further-enlightened as any I found, and where the reputation of the firm among the workers was high, the cure for industrial ills was sought not in full joint management, but rather in publicity. "Cards on the table" was the slogan there. By a series of charts and periodic conferences the workers were kept accurately informed of the state of the business. They knew what proportion of the gross receipts went to them as workers, and over what costs the remaining costs were distributed. Nor was this apparently just a matter of publishing a lot of mystifying figures, for an educational department (whose head was a Socialist!) was actively functioning to make the figures mean something. One might say that here was the preliminary to all sharing of management—the intelligent sharing of industrial and financial knowledge. One is led to suspect that much of the so-called sharing of management falls far short of this preliminary, and having no basis in intelligent understanding, is little more than a kind of brave show.

Nevertheless, the times are propitious. No one expects the leaven in the lump to swell suddenly into mighty proportions. It would be rather terrifying for the lump. The important question is whether the leaven is there.

Futile and misconceived as much joint management is, it seems to me that the leaven is there. However slight the beginnings, the movement means a new alignment within the factory. Trade unionists may deplore the dulling of their fighting edge, but the wise unionist knows that the exclusive trade union alignment can never be final. Necessary it may have been, and effective for the time being; but no decently successful organization in industry can be achieved save on the alignment of the entire working force as one. The trade union movement makes a division between two bodies of workers—the so-called "workers" on the one hand and the management on the other. That division confuses the real issue—which does not at all lie as between managers and workers (for managers are workers); but as between workers and non-workers. As far as I have been able to see—and I began to feel this intensely as the months progressed—the really vital problem of industry arises out of the control of industry by the investing non-workers. Anything which tends, therefore, to close the gap between management and men hastens the day when intelligent consideration can be given to this strikingly anomalous situation of a control of industry by those whose interest is primarily financial and not industrial.

Before that day comes, however, much water will have run down hill and much will have changed in the mind of the worker and the mind of management. The story is told of a Scotch professor of theology whose custom it was to give the identical examination questions year after year. At last, the matter having grown to somewhat scandalous proportions, he was gently reproved by his colleagues. With reluctance, yet with Christian resignation, he thereupon changed one of his questions. Where formerly he had asked: "Who were the kings of Judah and Israel?" he now asked: "Who were the major and the minor prophets?" As may be imagined, the result was disastrous—to all except one student. This student gallantly rose to the situation. "Far be it from me," he wrote, "to recount the names of such well-known persons as the major and minor prophets; but as for the kings of Judah and Israel, they were"—

The militant worker to-day is in much the same state of mind. He has met the same old issues in the same old way for so many years that when a new angle of the situation is presented to him, far be it from him to question such a worthy angle; but as for him—

In management, the crucial test comes when it is a question of scrapping old methods for new. Herein, I believe, lies the epoch-making value of the work of the Amalgamated Garment Workers' Union. This union has recognized that the day of jealous apartness is at an end, and in its device of impartial chairmanships and of the daily meeting of representatives of the employers and the union to settle disputes as they arise, it has set the pace for a type of industrial co-operation between capital and labor that is of very great moment for the future.

It looks very much as if a new industrial day were dawning in which new attitudes and new methods will be applied. The sign in the heavens is the fact that the old type of slave-driving manager is rapidly disappearing. A new type of manager has appeared, who takes the same kind of pride in management that the old line craftsman took in his workmanship. The new type of manager is ashamed of friction, bitterness, dissatisfaction in his factory. He takes it to be a reflection upon himself. As he makes his difficult way through trial and error, to a more satisfying relationship in the factory, he is beginning to hit upon a very old device which seems too long to have been forgotten: "Where two or three are gathered together." Sometimes when he finds it, it comes upon him like a religious conversion. I know of no more disaster-breeding attitude than the prevailing thought among a certain type of radicals that managers are all miserable sinners and that there is no health in them. The great hope of the future, I believe, lies in the fact that managers are at last seeing their managerial jobs in relation to their fellows of the ranks. In the voluntarily achieved union of management and men, I take it, lies the strength that will eventually sunder whatever bonds of thralldom there are in industry. The labor leaders and the executives who see this are, I think, the children of wisdom. The others would seem to be blind leaders of the blind.

The United Lutheran Church

The United Lutheran Church in America, which was formed in 1918 through the merger of the General Council, the General Synod and the United Synod of the South, has a membership of 1,400,000 and is the largest Lutheran body, including in its membership more than one-third of all the Lutherans in the United States. In 1919, when the Home Missions Council conducted an Every Community Service Endeavor Campaign in Montana, eleven different branches of Lutherans were found in that State, some differing in the language used and others in the relationships sustained with bodies in other States, all having, however, practically the same body of doctrines.

The Daily Vacation Bible School is being recognized more and more as an efficient instrument of making the truths of the Christian religion known to children, of giving them pleasurable occupation when school is closed and of promoting acquaintances among foreign groups of children and their assimilation into the ways of American life. The International Association of Daily Vacation Bible Schools reports the holding of 2,500 such schools during the summer season of 1922 and stresses the cosmopolitan character of these schools and the great benefits given to foreign-born children.

COUNTRY CHURCH DEPARTMENT

Much in Little*

By Elizabeth Wootten

of the Committee on Social and Religious Survey

THE little hamlet of Canoga, in Seneca County, New York, is picturesquely situated on the northwestern point of Cayuga Lake. It is a small agricultural community of about four hundred souls, with twenty-five families living in as many homes built about its only street. Its public buildings comprise the Presbyterian church, the Town Hall, the District School and the Community House. Many Indian memories cluster around the neighborhood, but since the late fifties the white men were in exclusive possession.

That, in brief, is the whole story of Canoga, and in the past sixty or seventy years there has been little to add to it. The industrial development, through railroads and a canal, of Seneca Falls, seven miles away, effectually arrested its further growth. Canoga remains to-day what it has always been—a little hamlet entirely engrossed in agriculture. The march of progress seems to have passed it by; its farmers go to Seneca Falls to do their trading; its population has declined and is likely to grow smaller rather than larger; the best it can hope for is a continuation of its present modest competence as a farming community.

There was a time, before the industrial evolution, which exalted Seneca Falls and depressed Canoga, when the little hamlet supported two churches, a Methodist and a Presbyterian; but by 1919 all that was left of the former were some ruins blackened by fire, while the latter stood bleak, unpainted and almost forgotten by its congregation. Canoga, in fact, presents in rather an acute form a religious problem that is a commonplace of rural America. Here was a little place, apparently too small to support a church with a full-time minister, and with no hope of increased population. What could it do about its spiritual life? There are two obvious answers to that constantly recurring question. One is a circuit or a student ministry, perhaps assisted by a minimum amount of aid from the Home Mission Board; the other is home mission aid sufficient to make possible a full-time minister. Canoga, for some years, had chosen rather half-heartedly the former answer. Since 1825 thirty-one preachers had served the Presbyterian church, and only five of them had been installed or ordained. Of late years students from Auburn Seminary had conducted services at irregular intervals, this spasmodic ministry being partially supported by an annual grant of $100 from the Home Mission Board. Beyond the privileges of irregular Sunday worship the church had no organization, nor had it any regular budget for maintenance. For the year 1917-18 the total contributions for benevolences amounted to $16, while $200 was raised by the church membership to pay for the irregular services of its student-pastors.

It was a discouraging situation, and it was hardly surprising that the two dozen members listlessly regarded a full-time ministry for their church as a possibility too remote to be worthy of serious consideration. They may have hoped one day to be able to supply their church not only with the coat of paint it so sorely needed, but also with a cellar and a furnace, which would have added considerably to the attractions of the occasional winter services; but for a resident, full-time minister it is safe to say they had never even dared to hope. The privilege of instilling this hope into the hearts of the people of Canoga was reserved for the last of the long line of student-pastors.

During the summer that he served as the incumbent of Canoga church young Howard Mickelsen, a student of Auburn Seminary, became interested in the place and the people. A farmer's son himself, he loved the land and knew the way to the hearts of an agricultural community. To his enthusiasm there seemed nothing strange or impossible in the idea of this picturesque little hamlet, with its four hundred souls and its historic past, being ministered to by a permanent, resident pastor. Accordingly, in the spring of 1919, Mr. Mickelsen, having graduated and married, and backed by a grant from the Home Mission Board of the Presbyterian Church, took up the work that he had chosen.

In the first year of Mr. Mickelsen's full-time pastorate the thirty-six members of the church raised $600, or $16.66 per capita. During 1920-21 the membership increased to forty-three and the budget to $800, or $18.3 per capita. During 1921-22 the membership climbed to seventy-five and the budget to $1,365, or $18.20 per capita. Canoga doubled its contribution by doubling its membership.

When the pastor first laid the budget of $600 before the church in 1919 his tiny congregation said: "It can't be done." With preliminary training in the duties of stewardship, however, the congregation was prepared for the every-member canvass, and before the day of the canvass one-fourth of the church membership had signed stewardship cards. Then, one Sunday morning, Canoga was surprised to find that it had raised more than its quota for the church, as well as special funds for the Red Cross, the China Famine Fund and local relief.

FROM STRENGTH TO STRENGTH.

Going from one phase of organization to another, the Canoga congregation next considered a Ladies' Aid Society. But Canoga had no vestige of activity that could be so utilized. Invitations were accordingly sent asking all the women in the community to meet at the parsonage. Twenty responded, and were duly organized under an efficient president. The Ladies' Aid Society had enough to occupy it after the long period of neglect the church had known. This organization provided Canoga church with an individual communion set, new hymnals and a furnace. The church was painted for the first time in many years. The Ladies' Aid also encouraged community interest in dramatics, and plays were staged, not only in Canoga, but in three neighboring towns, and return engagements were booked. This society also conducted a church bazaar that netted $225. During the summer the beautiful Lake Cayuga at their doors provided an ideal playground for the church members, and shore suppers and picnics as a corporate religious body became a regular part of community life.

MEN AND WOMEN'S ORGANIZATIONS.

If Canoga's size is predetermined by outside economic influences, there are no limits to the activities of its church members under the broad, constructive policy of its newest pastor. The physical content of the one-room church building was the first index to the increased activities of its members. It suddenly became too small for the various meetings, and while there are no available funds for the ambitious project, yet the congregation began to think of a community house. A sad reminder of Canoga's arrested growth was an empty, well-built brick two-story building, formerly a store, which lent itself ideally to the purpose. While the Geneva Presbytery was being entertained in Canoga the visitors heard of the desire of their hosts and presented them with $700. The first floor of the building was divided into a kitchen and a larger room with a movable platform and chairs. The upper story, with a thirteen-foot ceiling, was reserved for basketball.

The men of Canoga parish were not to be surpassed by the women. Besides supporting the new program, they organized themselves into a Bible class with a membership of fourteen, after they felt they had outgrown a large mixed class. It is to the men's Sunday-school class that the church owes its basement with a cement floor, as well as the cement walk outside the building. This class has successfully linked the life of the community to the church by arranging meetings in the Community House to popularize the work of the Farm Bureau.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S SHARE.

In these various economic and social ways leaders have emerged in the little community to link its secular life with that of its church. But having enlisted the support and loyalty of the elders in the hamlet, the pastor turned his attention to that important nucleus, the younger generation. For the first time Canoga found its church offering a continuous, well-organized Sunday-school, with age and sex groups that would ensure a supply of leaders. The Sunday-school to-day has four organized departments with graded lessons, a three-year training course for teachers, and a Home Department for invalids and those unable to attend. The Sunday-school has an enrollment of eighty-four of all ages against the adult membership of the church, which amounts to seventy-five.

The pastor has also utilized his religious organization for social and recreational purposes. Nothing was easier than to enroll the boys' Sunday-school class into a Scout Troop, or for the pastors wife to organize the girls class into the Bluebird Club. The Boy Scout Troop of fourteen members and the Bluebirds with nineteen constitute the nucleus of all the social activities of the young folks. In the Christian Endeavor Society a membership of forty brings these two clubs into contact with the rest of the junior church members, and as a body they arrange suppers, special picnics, athletic events and financial campaigns as their share of the church program. The funds derived from one of the banquets has enabled them to send delegates to a Young People's Conference.

With the church as a touchstone for the life of Canoga, it is natural to find the community availing itself of the church's powers of organization. The community now takes part in socials, lakeside picnics, dramatics, athletics, and in economic conferences that concern the very needs of the sole industry of Canoga. A notable social event was the Fourth of July celebrations, when a parade of floats decorated by the church and community represents the manifold activities of all ages and groups in Canoga. The first motion picture exhibit in Canoga was shown on a screen stretched along the wall of the church Community House, and proved an attraction for people living in all the neighboring villages. The experiment has worked. Neither the people nor the Home Mission Board would go back to the old plan of hit or miss preaching. It is worth while for the people, the minister and the board to co-operate in making the church central as it now is in Canoga's life.

This inspiring story of service to its community by a church which had become a symbol in the past life of its congregation is one of humble and small beginnings. Canoga had reached a stage when it was content to hold itself together in an economic way, with no future of any sort, with an uninspiring present. But the sudden revival of its church has put a new spirit into the community. Even its agricultural assets may look to increase in value with the adoption of scientific farming methods. What the church has done for Canoga the community may now learn to do for itself. If Canoga once felt hampered and depressed by larger and more successful, flourishing neighbors, her church has now taught her to use that rich and large service which brings perfect freedom.

America's Model Gas Factory

"In a recent issue of the American Gas Record particulars were given of the American Government's activity in the preparation of chemical processes of warfare. At the large factory at Edgewood, Maryland, the staff consisted of two hundred expert chemists, seven hundred assistants attached to the Army Chemical Department, and 1,770 additional employees. There were 297 permanent buildings and many temporary buildings; and twenty-one miles of railroad. The factory could manufacture 66,000 gas bombs and gas shells a day. A gas had been manufactured against which no mask yet invented could prevail. Of this gas 1,400 tons had been stored."—From No More War.

General Pershing prohibited the further manufacture of poison gas some months ago. Experimentation has not stopped. The appropriation recommended by the House committee for 1924 is $650,000.

Out of the 344 resident students at Wilson College, Chambersburg, Pennsylvania, only eleven are not members of any church. We wonder if that can be duplicated anywhere in this country. Wilson boasts that next to Vassar it is the oldest women's college in the United States.

Abraham, the Hero of Faith

GEN. 12:1-5; HEB. 11:8-10, 17-19

"He believed in Jehovah; and he reckoned it to him for righteousness."—GEN. 15:6.

RIGHTEOUSNESS is the sublime national ideal of the ancient Hebrew race. A very commonplace thing to say, but everlastingly true. This racial ideal of righteousness has been their great contribution to humanity. Many people think that the especial contribution of the Hebrews to humanity is financial genius. They have indeed a positive genius for finance, to their great credit, if sometimes to their confusion. But it is strangely true that the Americans understand the Hebrews better than any other race have understood them. And the reason is that the Yankees are nearest like them in this very capacity. Our own "Brother Jonathan," as you know, was a consummate tradesman; and he was brother in spirit of some of the old Hebrews.

Now, if the Hebrews have this genius for righteousness and this genius for finance, is it strange if they talk of righteousness in terms of finance? It is the double genius, the one playing on the other. They talk about reckoning belief for righteousness. What other ancient nations ever reckoned anything for righteousness? And if you follow the Scripture through, you will find that they are constant in thus "reckoning." The Master was a Hebrew, and he gave little stories in which people's lives were compared to banking, to money-making, to the having of so much money or talents in your charge. And you were accountable for the way you spent that money, or the way you "spent" that life.

Admitting that righteousness itself can be reckoned, how can belief in God be reckoned for righteousness? That is not righteousness; that is faith. Abraham was a hero of faith, not of conscience, do you say? But belief in God, that is intense enough to drive the life like a dynamo, belief in God independent enough to throw off all things that interfere, belief that outlasts every opposition, belief that makes one everlastingly enduring—that is a belief pretty near to righteousness. It has heart in it, and will in it, as well as reason or insight. Faith flames into action; the total self is on fire for God. The heroes of faith, Abraham, Amos, Jesus, become torches of the Eternal Conscience, to light and lead the world.

Are there any other beliefs that can be reckoned for righteousness? I wish to group two or three in the compact space of a sermon, tying them together like fasces in one bundle, for unbreakable strength. Here is this old belief in immortality. How ancient it is? How far back it goes there into those marvelous, forgotten books between the Testaments! How native and instinctive it is to Jesus! "If it were not so, I would have told you. In my Father's house are many mansions." How this faith transforms and irradiates the living of those disciples! How it sings through the catacombs, as those little groups of Christians meet beside their dead! Can this faith be reckoned for righteousness?

You remember in the Nineteenth Psalm how the psalmist has been telling of the transiency of life, how everything passes away like the grass of the field. He has been telling about the swift passage of our years; and at last he cries in a climax of prayer, "Establish thou the work of our hands upon us; yea, the work of our hands establish thou it." And then, over in the fifteenth chapter of First Corinthians, you remember how the apostle Paul, after taking a flight among the stars, telling of the victory that comes through faith in Jesus, end his paean on immortality with these words, "Wherefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord."

Edward Everett Hale told us it was more important to live as an immortal now than to believe in immortality hereafter. But he knew, as you know, that one is less likely to live as an immortal now unless he believes in the undying continuance of a worth-while, righteous life. And this brings us to the third great faith that may be reckoned for righteousness. I cannot introduce it better than by a very famous poem. Do you know "Abou Ben Adhem"? Any one over thirty knows it. Those persons whom young people think old used to love it, and to hear it recited in school. Let us read it again.

"Abou Ben Adhem (may his tribe increase!)
Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace;
And saw, within the moonlight in his room,
Making it rich, and like a lily in bloom,
An angel, writing in a book of gold:—
Exceeding peace had made Ben Adhem bold,
And to the presence in the room he said,
'What writest thou?'—The vision raised its head,
And, with a look made of all sweet accord,
Answered, 'The names of those who love the Lord!'
'And is mine one?' said Abou. 'Nay, not so,'
Replied the angel. Abou spoke more low,
But cheerily still; and said, 'I pray thee, then,
Write me as one that loves his fellow men.'

The angel wrote, and vanished. The next night
It came again with a great awakening light,
And showed the names whom love of God had blessed.
And lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest."

Why? Because Ben Adhem loved folks, and God loves folks. Because he cared for people, and God cares for people. Because he ministered to humanity and it is written, "He that would be great among you, let him be your min-

ONE BOOK A WEEK

Under this caption, each week, we shall direct attention to some striking book, such as no Minister or those interested in religious thought and action can afford to remain unacquainted with

Three Recent Novels of Religion

ONE is continually hearing about the passing interest in religion, religious things, and especially the Church, and yet every one of the popular novelists turns to the subject as soon as his reputation is made, and everybody reads their books. Indeed, the novelists seem to enjoy writing about the Church above all other things, and the novels dealing with the Church, from "Robert Elsmere" to "The Cathedral," are among the best sellers. It was interesting to read in one of the well-known weeklies last week, as I did, that the interest in the Church was all gone, that it was a defunct institution kept alive by inflation, and then to see three novels dealing with the Church from three of our well-known and popular novelists appearing almost simultaneously and being widely read.

"The Church on the Avenue" (Dodd, Mead and Company, $2.00) is by Helen R. Martin, who achieved well-deserved fame by her beautiful story of "Tilly, the Mennonite Maiden," which was a story of the rebellion of a young woman who had been privileged a glimpse of the world beyond the Pennsylvania valley in which she had been reared against the limitations of her sect. It was dramatized and was very popular with Patricia Collins as Tilly. In this new novel Miss Martin has turned to a Pennsylvania iron city. Not only the foundries, but the whole town—schools, libraries, churches, newspapers, politics, everything—is owned and run by a narrow-minded and reactionary man, Jacob Leibert. To the Presbyterian church in this city comes Rev. Robert Watts. Robert has no trouble getting along with things as they are. He does not think the Church has any concern with industrial and social questions. Its concern is with personal religion only. His wife, however, and a classmate of hers in Wellesley College, who comes to the town as librarian, are very modern and very radical. They think the chief concern of the Church is with the application of Christianity to social and economic evils. The one minister in the city who agrees with them is the Rev. Mr. Callo-way of the Episcopal church. The author is largely concerned with the story of the conflict in the Presbyterian manse as Robert's and his wife's minds begin to clash against each other, in the exciting disturbances that begin to appear in the city in connection with the introduction of radical ideals in the town, and in the joining of a union by the school teachers, but the main part of the story is devoted to the raging of the conflict in the town and the attitude of the churches and their leaders. Needless to say, the story has one aim, namely, to show the failure of the churches to furnish any real help in the solving of the problems facing the nation, and to show how they are either purposely or helplessly allied with capital. It also shows the failure of the clergy, making them to be subservient hirelings of the rich, uttering platitudes, believing in compromise and lacking both in insight and courage. Even in the love affairs of the characters, the prevailing conflict makes itself felt. One cannot help admiring Miss Martin's passion for economic justice and her championship of the oppressed. The book is, of course, written for propaganda, and this naturally detracts from its artistic and dramatic power. One has the feeling on every page that only one side of the case is stated with either effect or fervor, and, above all, the sense of exaggeration is over everything. Perhaps this is necessary to produce a desired effect, but it can become too obvious. A case in hand is the call of Rev. Robert Watts to a big Presbyterian church on Fifth Avenue, New York. There is not a church on the Avenue that would look at such a man. The four Presbyterian churches on the Avenue at just this moment have as pastors four men suspected of heresy in theology by many and of radicalism by some on the questions Miss Martin is discussing, (namely, Doctors Fosdick, Merrill, Kelman, and Henry Sloane Coffin.

"Peradventure: Or the Silence of God," by Robert Keable (G. P. Putnam's Sons), is a study in religious biography. One cannot say in religious development, because it is hard to see any development in the young man. The story begins with the life of Paul, son of an Anglican rector of the most evangelistic type, in some corner of London. Paul is of the most earnest Christian Endeavor type. He spends his nights holding meetings in wretched spots in London and saving souls. He is a fervid preacher and is destined for the ministry. He goes up to Cambridge University. Here he comes under a new influence. The beautiful old college chapels, the stately services, the new type of thought, the different attitude toward religion from any he has known gradually change him. He tastes High Church Anglicism, and being of poetic soul, responds. A visit to Keswick is described in the book. Then Paul comes under the spell of Roman Catholicism and even spends a season with a remarkable priest. He almost enters the Roman Church, but at the last moment hesitates and is lost. He leaves Cambridge and goes into the country for a year with some Cambridge men to write—he has already published one volume of verse—and to think things through. Under the influence of his friend and of a girl he comes to know—Ursula, a painter—he abandons all signs of the old faith and chooses a new religion, "the acceptance of the beauty of the world and no questions asked." The story is interesting, but not subtle. There are natures which are so easily changed, but they are not typical. The last change is accomplished too easily. He gives up so much with so little argument for it. The remarks of his friends could have been so easily answered. There is a girl all through the book and another enters at the end. Considerable of the first half of Paul's develop-

"THE GAP IN THE WALL"

Rev. J. C. Berry's article on "The Gap in the Wall," printed in our issue of November 11, has excited much discussion. As things are at present in the Presbyterian, Congregational, Baptist and other similar churches, the difficulty encountered by ministers in finding new churches when they want to go to new fields, and the difficulty encountered by churches in getting rid of pastors who do not meet the situation, are very real and very serious. Happily, the discussion started by Mr. Berry promises to lead to some definite action, at least among the Presbyterians. The following letters speak for themselves.—EDITORS.

I think I know some little of the feelings of the men in the Presbyterian ministry in regard to the tenure of their office. I had one bitter experience that taught me a lesson that will last as long as life. One man in the church made it impossible for me to stay there to carry on a work that was going along excellently. For the good of the church I resigned—and I had the time of my life to get back into a desirable church again—for an "out" man in our church is a "down" man, whatever he may be in the Salvation Army. At that time I promised myself that if ever the time came that I was in a position to clear my system on the matter that clearance would certainly come.

One does not like to say that there are men in the ministry who are evidently unfitted for such a calling and who consequently are restless and dissatisfied because it is almost impossible to locate them. But with the open back door through which presbyteries admit all sorts of men to our ministry it could not be otherwise.

In the second place, there are a large number of average men who have naturally high ambition and who desire a better field of labor than they are really entitled to or can fill. These men too are restless and constitute a rather difficult problem. When you eliminate these two classes the problem simmers down to this: How are good and worthy men to be located in useful fields of service? To solve this problem two things are necessary, it seems to me. First, a proper supervision and guidance of churches. Presbyterial oversight breaks here. It should mean episcopal authority and the right to instruct and effectively guide churches which are seeking a pastor. Then there should be a better oversight of ministers so that none who are worthy shall ever be placed in the embarrassment of seeking a field of labor.

It may be that at some time such an agency (as the Committee on Vacancy and Supply) will prove effective, although I do not at present think it possible any more than I think it possible for a matrimonial bureau to satisfy the requirements of true homes. Card catalogs can never contain the real value of men. They may be helpful in recording the history, but they can never present the real personality. . . .

I think almost any of the illustrations which Mr. Berry uses to clarify and enforce his points could be duplicated from my own experience with those that would neutralize them. The vast majority of Presbyterian ministers are so well satisfied with the present plan, in spite of all its difficulties—and they are many and serious—that they are unwilling to enter another arrangement which will put a premium on machinery rather than the workings of the spirit and expose them to dangers which have been repeatedly illustrated in other methods. I believe what Mr. Berry says represents only a small fraction of the satisfactory experiences of the Presbyterian ministry.

Second, the longer I live and the more experience I have with churches and ministers the more firmly convinced I am of the need of the sacrificial spirit on the part of both church and ministry in order that the most lasting work may be done and in the best way. I am sure that the very position which the ministry holds in the minds of men leads to the temptation to think of itself more highly than it ought to think. Many a man imagines himself capable of occupying a more prominent pulpit than he has been permitted to hold, when in very truth there are peculiarities in his make-up which prevent the reaching of his own estimate. If a minister will be willing to take the place that is offered him in the providence of God and to put his whole soul into that work without planning to go as soon as possible to another church, or even looking for one until in some unmistakable way God shall indicate that he should do so, I am sure that many of the difficulties which now arise over the finding of suitable locations will be done away with.

Or to put it in another way, if only the ministry will take to heart the spirit of Him who on the occasion of a discussion as to the comparative abilities and worth among the disciples took a towel and girded himself and performed the service of the lowliest of slaves, I feel sure the need of another organization for the performance of this delicate task will be greatly diminished. There is plenty of work in numberless fields for the man who is willing to work. If there is any doubt as to this statement an application to the Board of Home Missions for the hardest field in the church will be quickly dispelled.

I realize these are the convictions of only one minister and may not be shared by any other. They are given only that they may help bring about the solution of the problem even though the help be very little.

ALFRED ROY EHMAN,

Associate Secretary of the New Era Movement.

From my observation of the ministry and close association with so many of them I am satisfied that very many of our ministers are in happy relationship with their churches, and while they are open to larger fields, they have contentment, satisfaction and joy in their work; and while there are always some hard things to bear and some thorns in the flesh in almost every parish, the ministry on the whole must think rather of the multitude of people who are more friendly and kindly to them than their merits deserve. . . .

My conferences with Methodist ministers do not lead me to suppose that they have reached any ideal system. Between the evils of the Presbyterian system and those of the Methodist system there is not much to choose. Wire pulling for place, politics and commercial estimate of parishes seem to be an almost universal characteristic or an almost necessary outcome of the Methodist system of appointments by a presiding elder and bishop. Probably the solution cannot be a matter of machinery but of education of the church, of a quickening of the sense of spiritual values and a heightening of the estimate of the value of responsibility and team work in the local and general organization of the church.

WORSHIP AND SERMON

EDITOR CHRISTIAN WORK:

Your article on "If Not the Sermon, What?" published in THE CHRISTIAN WORK, March 3, 1923, rightly calls our attention to the fact that we Protestants need to cultivate the practice of worship in our services more than we seem to be doing.

The Protestant minister in his pulpit is both priest and prophet. As priest he leads the people in worship; as prophet he speaks to the people for God. It is by no means an easy position; for he has to look two ways at once, to earth and to heaven, to people and to God: Shall he be more concerned about leading the people Godward by the various means of worship than about obeying God's commands to deliver a revealed message to truth-hungering souls; or shall he be more concerned about preaching his message from God than about leading the people to God? Is his task one of leading the people to God or of bringing God to the people?

When we thus attempt to compare and weigh values, is it not clear that the problem is not one of worship or sermon, but of worship and sermon? And herein lies the difficulty. The tendency is to stress one more than the other. But this should not be. Let half of the service be a time of outpouring of the souls of the people to God in acts of worship. Let half of the service be a time of outpouring of the soul of God through His preacher to the people. Then will worship and sermon be properly related to each other in the church service.

Yours sincerely,

W. B. MASKIELL.

tween the old and the new, and more intimately it is the story of the breaking of a proud soul partly by the victory of the new, partly by a series of blows from those in its own household. The archdeacon is a proud, masterful and conservative man. So far he had had pretty much his own imperious way in everything. He really loved the great Cathedral and thought everything he was doing was for its best. A new canon comes into residence. He is a determined man, also, and starts out to supplant the archdeacon. The Cathedral is not pleasant reading. It is full of petty intrigue, and the punishment of the haughty archdeacon seems more than he deserved. There are few lovely characters in it, that of the big, young, rather awkward Lord who falls in love with the subdued archdeacon's daughter being the finest and truest character in the book. The book is, of course, powerfully written. It is full of mysticism—everything being not only dominated but almost determined by the great Cathedral which overhangs the city. The Cathedral is not only tremendous, over-powering in men's lives, but is sinister, cold and cruel. It stands eternally while the generations come and go. Men built it, but it is bigger than men. The Cathedral the author has in mind in this book might be Durham, as it is a cathedral which stands high up looking over the city—dominating the whole landscape.

As Reinstated At Last IN THE CHURCHES!

When the moment arrives that eminent divines in the Church like Dr. Jowett, Parkes Cadman, etc., say this ministry should be taken up—it must give us pause! Heretofore healing has been done, in most part—on the outside. But now the clergy of the world are aroused to the urgent necessity of a renewal of vital Christianity within His own blessed organization. Moreover many are successfully practising it already, —which bodes well for distressed humanity, which is stretching out longing arms to the Church for more abundant Christ-life, greater spiritual and mental peace, more assured outer success, and for actual healing of the body, also. It is but the continued ministry of Christ and the Disciples. If Christ's gospel is in reality what it theoretically claims to be, then it is not the One Panacea for every exigency of life. His gospel OFFERS definite, full complete redemption.

Now are these but empty phrases for the EARS, or can it really make good on them in the LIFE? "Modern men demand a show-down of religion. But it made good once—it can do so now! Jesus Christ still maketh thee WHOLE. Whole in spirit, whole in mind—and whole in body. We must re-employ it." This was the thrilling manifesto flung out by the young crusader

DR. SAMUEL C. BENSON

To The Clergy of England and America

as he launched the modern Bible Healing Movement in the City Temple, London, and in the Broadway Tabernacle, New York.

This youthful enthusiast had such a gripping vision, such a vision of a revitalized and SERVING Church, that a few months ago he literally left all, giving up his fine position, that of Secretary of the Eastern Department of the American Bible Society, and selling his very home, to throw himself and his all unreservedly into starting what Dr. Jowett foresees as "The renaissance of religion."

But GREAT is his reward! Today, practically every main religious body is represented in sponsoring the movement—Church of England, Salvation Army, Church Army, Y. M. C. A., Presbyterian, Episcopal, Methodist, Congregational, Baptist, Dutch Reformed, Lutheran, and many others. The Press has cited and has verified many specific cases of marvelous cures through Bible Healing.

Dr. Benson has been called the American Couc—SPIRITUALIZED. He focuses the mind on the Bible's healing gospel.

The movement is spreading rapidly—and sanely towards its natural goal which, according to Jowett, is "a healing clinic in EVERY Church, thus completing the full circle of the redemptive work appointed her by her Lord." Isn't it thrilling! No wonder that zeal and devotion, heroism, fire and energetic enthusiasm were generated by the early followers. But it is coming back—as the ministry of Healing is once again freely offered the sick—without money and without price. It is launched, in the spirit of the Crusade—the sweeping religious flame of the Twentieth Century, when so many deadening, and well-nigh fatal influences have crept in. Its high slogan is "The revitalization of the Church of Christ."

To carry on this work, and push it forward, to organize it in every State Capital,—money is needed. A permanent headquarters must be secured. An endowment foundation is sought at once. It needs your help—and deserves it. If it arrests you—appeals to the heroic in you—stirs in you the original apostolic fervor, write in at once, give your opinion. REAL CRUSADERS WANTED. Send for Plan of Movement, and for Bible Healing books on approval.

AN EPISCOPAL PROPOSITION FOR CHURCH COMITY

The following letter is a really notable proposition. If the Episcopal Church will adopt it, it will mark a great forward step in bringing her into friendly fellowship with her sister churches.—THE EDITORS.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN WORK:

I have been musing on the words of the Psalmist (133:1), "Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity!" and my thoughts have, quite naturally, gone to the unification of all Christians. But let me say, at the outset, that my idea of Christian unity differs widely from that held by those who would have us all members of one church fold—a very bulky and unwieldy organization. I cannot believe that our Lord prayed that "they all may be one" with the intent that we belong to one organization, but that we be at oneness with one another. The latter part of that verse (John 17:21) shows that our Lord's great desire was that even as He and the Father were at oneness in purpose, so might His followers be.

I have the honor and joy to be the pastor of St. John's Church (Episcopal), Marietta, Pa., and it is my pleasure to use a standing invitation to Christians of all denominations to meet with us and to partake with us of the elements of the Lord's Supper, for in no other way may Christians enter into that oneness better than in eating the common meal in commemoration of our Lord's sacrifice.

But I do not proselyte. I would not lift a little finger to endeavor to persuade one who is satisfied with his church connection to leave it. Anyone is welcome to our celebration of the Ordinance of the Holy Communion, and he may do so without compromising himself or his ecclesiastical connection.

However, I find at times that there are those who, for one reason or another—sometimes it is in order that a family may be united, and this is a perfectly valid reason for wanting to unite with or transfer to another church—desire to become members of the Episcopal Church. But to Christians of undoubted church membership, just as to those who have never made profession of their faith nor yet publicly connected themselves with some church; to all seeking membership within her borders the Episcopal Church says, "No, not unless (or until) you submit to confirmation at the hands of a bishop!"

Now this is right in the case of one who has no church membership, but unjust and unfair to one who comes with a certificate of transfer from another evangelical body. For this certificate attests his worthiness as a member of Christ's flock, and if he is a member in good standing of the Presbyterian Church, for instance, that very fact should make him just as good a member of an Episcopal church.

The Episcopal Church declares and reiterates that confirmation does not constitute church membership, saying that this is gained at one's baptism. Again, we (Episcopalians) accept baptism performed by any evangelical minister. As baptism constitutes membership and may be performed by any Christian minister, why should not a Christian's reception into any Church be recognized, and the certificate of that reception be honored? We are not consistent in our exclusive attitude. Indeed, we stultify ourselves.

The above are logical facts and admit of no argument. They do, however, carry a principle which, if adopted by our Church, would help us to fall into line with the great Apostle's ambition (Eph. 4:13): "Till we all come in the unity (or oneness) of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ."

THE GROWING PROHIBITION MOVEMENT IN GERMANY

An Associated Press dispatch tells of great and growing interest in prohibition in Germany. A petition urging control of the liquor traffic by local option, signed by 460,000 voters, has recently gone to the Reichstag. It was submitted by Dr. O. F. Melle, President of the Methodist Theological Seminary at Frankfort-on-Main. When Dr. Melle went into the Reichstag he had a trunkful of signatures secured in two hundred cities and towns. On presenting the petition he stated that it was the result of only a week's work, and that millions of signatures could be secured in time. Dr. Melle is also Chairman of the Methodist Bishops' Committee on Temperance and Public Welfare. The movement under his leadership is the most widespread and apparently the most practical and effective that has ever appeared in Germany.

NEGRO HEALTH WEEK, APRIL 1-7

The Federal census of 1920 reports that the Negro death rate is 18.4 per thousand, as against 12.8 for the whites, just fifty per cent. higher. Infant mortality averages twice as high among Negroes as among whites, and the death rate from tuberculosis and typhoid about three times as high. The life expectation of Negroes is reported as forty years, against fifty-four years for whites. The economic loss involved in these conditions is immense. It is estimated that in the South more than two hundred thousand Negroes are seriously ill all the time from preventable causes—neglect, ignorance, unsanitary conditions. The direct financial loss entailed runs probably to a hundred million dollars a year. Of the 225,000 Negro deaths in the South each year, it is estimated that 100,000 might be prevented. These conditions entail not only a vast economic waste; they constitute also a grave social peril. Disease recognizes no segregated area. It respects no distinctions of wealth or class. America has found it necessary to quarantine against Asiatic rats, lest they infect us with bubonic plague. Much more is an unsanitary disease center in any community a focus of infection that menaces every part of it. Add to all this the humanitarian obligation which demands that we do everything in our power to ameliorate suffering and save life, and we have an appeal which imperatively demands remedial action. It is such considerations as these that have for some years brought together annually the social and welfare agencies of both races in the observance of Negro Health Week, the purpose of which is to carry the message of hygiene to every colored home and to enlist every community in a thoroughgoing campaign of sanitation. The date set this year is the week of April 1-7.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

COLONEL HASKELL ON THE RUSSIAN FAMINE

Colonel Haskell, head of the American Relief Administration in Russia, has announced that if all foreign relief work there came to an end only one million Russians would be liable to starvation. That announcement has surprised Americans generally. The delegation from the National Information Bureau, headed by Allen Wardell, reported only two months ago that while it was true that the intensity of the famine in Russia had decreased, nevertheless eight million Russians would be starving before the next harvest unless aid came from outside. Those who are best informed are most at a loss to understand Colonel Haskell's statements. The present program of the American Relief Administration—known in Russia as the Ara—provides for the feeding of three million persons. In the face of the prospective need, the idea had been that the Soviet government should be responsible for the feeding of four million people and foreign relief agencies four and a half million. The Soviet government last year fed two million people and also provided free transportation for all supplies and personnel for the Ara and paid the salaries of the Ara's Russian employees. With the new economic policy, the Russian government has given up the confiscation of crops and is now depending on taxes. Its resources are consequently less than they were a year ago. The Ara and the Russian government have found some difficulty in agreeing as to the amount of responsibility each should undertake. In addition, there have been many minor difficulties with lower officials of the Soviet government. Recently all the couriers of the American Relief Administration leaving Russia by way of the Latvian border were stopped and searched, and when one of Colonel Haskell's secretaries went for a vacation to Latvia the Russians would not allow him to return. The extremists among the Russian Communists have been anxious to get rid of the Ara because it has been a standing proof that capitalist America was not in the dire straits in which Russian newspapers had represented it to be. The fact that a capitalist country could supply them with surplus food and with such flour as they had not seen for six years was a silent but increasingly effective argument for a capitalist system in Russia. Colonel Haskell has sent out a number of reports recently that need explanation. Only six or seven weeks ago he gave out an interview that showed a most biased impression in regard to the Near East refugees. If he had had a well-rounded view of the situation he could not have said what he did. And there must be some reason for Colonel Haskell's change of front in regard to Russian conditions. We wish that his lips might be completely unstopped and that he might frankly give us the explanation.

A WORLD ECONOMIC CONFERENCE

The following statement sent to President Harding has been signed by seventy-eight students of Union Theological Seminary and by thirteen members of the faculty:

We, the undersigned faculty and students of the Union Theological Seminary, convinced that the present international crisis is becoming increasingly alarming and desperate, and constitutes a problem to which every earnest Christian must give most serious consideration, and further convinced that the time has come when the Christian Church must declare its conviction regarding the moral issues involved both in the existing situation and in the prevailing methods of international action which lie behind it, desire to state our convictions as follows:

We deplore the seizure of the Ruhr, believing that, whatever may be the technical legality of it under the Treaty of Versailles, French policy is morally unjustifiable as well as politically unsound, and can result only in increasing the international tension regarding the achievement of a lasting peace in Europe.

But we further believe that the indefensible character of the French policy should not be allowed to blind our eyes to the fact that this policy is in itself only an inevitable result of fundamentally wrong methods of dealing with international problems, and we are convinced that there can be no assurance of a world peace until these methods are changed. In particular, we absolutely disbelieve in the ultimate efficacy of war as a method of international arbitration.

We believe it is the moral duty of the United States to share fully in the task of reconstructing Europe and re-establishing international peace, and that the policy of the United States since the Armistice has been, and is now, an evasion of our full moral responsibility.

Finally, it is our conviction that the present crisis constitutes an impelling call to the people of the United States for national repentance for our part in allowing the crisis to come to pass, particularly for our denial of responsibility for the recovery of Europe since the close of the war, and we believe that the American Government should move at once to rectify our past deficiency by committing American resources, political, economic and moral, to the task of reconstructing Europe. To that end we urge as an immediate step that the American Government take the lead in an attempt to convene a world economic conference.

Among the faculty members signing the statement were Henry S. Coffin, Harry Emerson Fosdick, Eugene W. Lyman, Charles P. Fagnani, Dean Charles R. Gillett, Arthur L. Swift, Jr., Harrison S. Elliott, Harry F. Ward and William W. Rockwell.

THE BOLSHEVIST PLOT AGAINST CHRISTIANITY

On page 394 of this issue we are printing an account of the "Fall of the Metropolitans," a story which gives us some insight into how the Bolshevist government is trying to split up the Church and weaken its power in Russia. If it were simply a matter of splitting up the Church or weakening its power as an organization it would not be a vital concern. The fact is, however, that the Bolsheviks apparently really want to destroy part of the noble ideals of self-sacrifice and self-abnegation which are bound up with real Christianity. If they took the attitude of some of our own "radical" organizations, that of the I. W. W., for instance, it would be a different matter. Such organizations may disagree with the organized Church, but many of their members accept most earnestly the essential truth in the character and in the teachings of Jesus. The I. W. W. see "Comrade Jesus" as a great friend to humanity. The best of them want to be friends to humanity themselves, and in many cases, with great sincerity, they look to Jesus as their Leader. But the

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

Bolshevists, in spite of the unselfishness with which they have treated Persia and China and some of the other neighboring states, have, in general, broken down brotherly kindness where they have dominated. Let no American Church become a cat's paw for the Bolshevists in their attempt to weaken vital Christianity in Russia. We send out this appeal especially to the great churches like the Baptist and the Methodist, which, perhaps, especially hear the call to Russia just now. Let them face the whole problem of helping Russia with the thought of the permanent good of Russia itself, and let them utterly efface all thought of denominational statistics and ecumenical claims.

"WHILE THEY DANCE ON THE MAURETANIA"

"The Orient News" of Constantinople in an issue early this month printed a paragraph or two about the splendor of the dance on the Mauretania, where "many styles were startling in the extreme," and then in the next column it published the following letter under the heading "Another Tourist Party": "As my eye wandered over the one thousand lavishly dressed, jewel-bedecked tourists and their Constantinople friends reveling in the beautiful ballroom of the Mauretania last night my thoughts just naturally went out to another and more numerous party of 'tourists' only a few minutes distant, namely, ten thousand half-starved women and children, uprooted from their homes in Anatolia, waiting to die on the muddy floors of the Selimieh Barracks stables, Scutari, unless humanity comes to their assistance." People who have seen much that is horrible have never seen anything so horrible as these refugees waiting to die, crowded into stables. And it is all so unnecessary. Only a small portion of the great barracks is used. The rest is empty. The benevolent Turkish idea is to kill them off. What crass stupidity! How long, O Lord, how long! The Greeks have refused to carry out the exchange of prisoners with the Turks because the Turks are still forcing the Greeks to migrate. The lying Turkish or pro-Turkish press state that the departures are absolutely without coercion. Anybody who knows about the Near East ought to be able to read the falseness into the statements. Arthur Tremaine Chester, in his article in the March "Current History," gives a very twisted version of conditions. His father's utterances overreached themselves, but the admiral's son's are not so obvious.

IS A RUHR SETTLEMENT POSSIBLE?

Out of the maze of rumors from Berlin, Paris and London about developments in the Ruhr situation little real light emerges. It is evident, however, that Italy has withdrawn her support from the experiment. Belgium is obviously most anxious for a settlement. Britain is increasingly dissatisfied with the Bonar Law "watchful waiting" policy. Germany realizes the necessity of urging some sort of settlement if her industries are not to be ruined. France, disillusioned as to the possibility of a prompt victory, talks of indefinite occupation, loudly protests against any form of mediation, but declares her willingness to consider direct negotiations. The United States Government waits for "an opportunity to be helpful." The plan proposed by Lord Robert Cecil for the neutralization of the Rhineland under the supervision of the League of Nations, which has been informally submitted to the highest French political and military authorities, is said to have received a very favorable reception in Paris. The French believe that the Cecil proposal would accomplish, first, the reduction in Germany's recruiting capacity by about eight million and would make unavailable for mobilization purposes the Rhineland railways. Lord Robert's plan would leave Germany in complete possession of the Rhineland, except that a League Commission would exercise sufficient supervision to see that the neutralization pledges were not violated. Louis Loucheur, former Minister of the Liberated Regions, has, it is reported, voiced his strong approval of the Cecil plan. Assuming that the German industrialists are finally prepared to co-operate whole-heartedly with their government in the payment of reparations up to Germany's capacity, if a reasonable program is accepted by France, and assuming that France will be satisfied by the largest possible amount of reparations and by that measure of security which would come from the neutralization of the Rhine region, there would seem to be no insurmountable obstacle to a reasonable, prompt solution of the Ruhr impasse.

THE PARALYSIS OF HUMAN FEELING AT WASHINGTON

What is it that holds the hand of the administration at Washington from practically displaying human kindness in not a few ways? Two things are especially on our minds; the failure to grant amnesty to the war opinion prisoners and the failure of Congress to do anything for the Armenian and Greek refugees. The men in the Department of Justice ought to be men of sympathetic imagination. But what are they? Men who have interviewed them in behalf of these war opinion prisoners report this sample conversation. "I want to talk," said the interviewer, "about such and such a case." "Oh yes," said the squat lawyer of the department, "I remember that case. There was a statement forty or fifty pages long about it. I looked over the first four or five pages and then threw the whole — thing into the waste basket." No man stops to think what it means to lose five or ten or twenty years of living could have thrown such papers away without reaching the gist of what they had to say. Why is it that political prisoners and others, too, we may suppose, are subjected to torture to-day in our Federal prisons? For what is it but torture to have one's wrists locked to the wall above him at such a height that he cannot rest his full weight on the soles of his feet and then be compelled to stand in that position for seven hours a day with one hour's intermission at noon. Yet, such atrocities were committed upon human bodies at the Leavenworth Federal prison and elsewhere in America in the year of our Lord, 1919. Men have undergone such treatment for more than a week running, because they refused to work under military authorities or helped raise a din in protest against their tasteless, nutritionless food. What is it but lack of imagination that can make Congress fail to pass the law which would have, at least, let in a few more of the unhappy refugees from Turkey? In our churches, yes, in our papers and in our schools, too, we need such iteration of the second of the two great commandments and of the teaching of Jesus in his picture of the Last Judgment that the lesson shall be burned into the minds of every man who calls himself a Christian. Christianity cannot be where there is not full kindly humanity.

A COMMITTEE ON THE RELIGIOUS DRAMA

During the Middle Ages a considerable part of the religious instruction of the people came from the morality plays with which we are all more or less familiar. The spiral of development is apparently coming around once more to the drama as a means for religious instruction. So great has become the interest in it from that angle that the Federal Council has appointed a Committee on the Religious Drama. Rev. Fred Eastman, Educational Secretary of the Board of Home Missions of the Presbyterian Church, is chairman of the committee. Among the members of the committee are Miss Margaret Applegarth, who has herself written religious dramas; Mr. Percy J. Burrell, a director of community drama and pageants; Mrs. Donald Pratt, of the Commission on Church Pageantry and Drama of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and Miss Helen Willcox, of the Committee on Conservation and Advance of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The purpose of the committee is "to evaluate religious dramatic material already created, to create new material where needed, to set standards for production, and to encourage the use of the dramatic method in religious education through denominational and community-wide activities." The committee is assembling the best religious dramatic material available and expects to publish it in a series of yearly volumes comparable to the series of "Best Short Stories" and "Best Plays." It also has in mind to hold an institute next fall for the training of religious leaders in the dramatic method of education.

PROGRESS OF INTERRACIAL WORK IN KENTUCKY

Notable progress in the betterment of conditions for colored people and in the improvement of race relations was made in Kentucky last year. The State Commission on Interracial Co-operation, headed by the Governor, with membership of eighty, half of them colored, is made up of representative leaders in all lines, including the State Superintendent of Education, who is one of its most sympathetic members. It will be seen, therefore, that it is a most influential body, capable of bringing things to pass. The work is directed by Dr. James Bond, a colored leader of ability and fine spirit, who has had the sympathy and co-operation of the best people of the State. The efforts of the Commission during the past year were largely directed toward better school facilities for Negroes. Remarkable results were attained, including the following: A $125,000 high school addition, a new school, and the improvement of others, in Louisville; a $100,000 high school in Lexington; enlargement of high school at Richmond; new buildings at Mayfield, Jackson, La Grange and other points; participation in proceeds of school bond issues in Bowling Green, Owensboro and Middlesboro; and additional teachers and increased salaries in certain places. The Director was asked to assist also in locating the eight colored summer normals and was requested to address them all on the subject of interracial co-operation. He has taken the same message to the principal white colleges of the State and has been heard sympathetically everywhere. Some of these schools have courses in interracial relations and plans are under way to put such courses in others. Better playground facilities have been secured in Louisville, Mayfield and Jackson, and plans are under way for a municipal swimming pool in Louisville.

Legal aid has been extended in certain cases, privilege of membership in the Strawberry Association has been secured for the Negroes of Warren County, a vigorous Health Week campaign was conducted, reaching sixty thousand people, and one tense situation which threatened mob violence was cleared up. In addition to the State Interracial Commission there are about seventy county committees in Kentucky. The method is that of frank conference and sympathetic co-operation.

IS RELIGION MEETING PRESENT DAY NEEDS?

The National Republican Club at its last Saturday luncheon discussion took for its topic, "Is Religion Meeting Present-Day Needs and Conditions? If not, why not?" Dr. Henry Sloane Coffin, minister of the Madison Avenue Presbyterian Church, very frankly faced the question. He did not think that religion is waning, but he felt there are two groups of persons to whom it has in part lost its appeal. "First, large numbers among the class-conscious, industrial group have broken away from organized religion. Many of them feel that the Church is not sympathetic with the man who feels himself wrongly dealt with. This is a serious situation and should be recognized. Discussion concerning the Church ought to be encouraged. Any attempt to put the lid on discussion is a great mistake from the point of view of the man who believes in religion." The second group that has broken away from the Church, as Dr. Coffin sees it, in large part, is the intellectual group. "Go into any university," he said, "and you will find both in the faculty and the student body many who have little use for organized religion. Our churches have not been willing to face the advances in scientific and philosophical thought. The day has passed when we can place any limit upon investigation and discussion by men who wish to give their own interpretation to religion. It would be a calamity if the intellectual class should be separated from religion. That is what happened in Germany. There was a wide gulf there between the Church and the intellectual classes."

INDUSTRIAL UNREST—A WAY OUT

This is the title of the eighth pamphlet of the Christianity and Industry Series published by George H. Doran Company. It is written by Mr. Seeborn Rowntree, who is coming to be well-known in this country for his practical idealism with reference to industrial problems. The pamphlet has an introduction by Henry S. Dennison. Mr. Rowntree sets forth his industrial creed, an extraordinarily liberal statement which has added force because it is written by a successful and influential employer who speaks from the point of view not merely of theory but of demonstration. The pamphlet is obtainable from Mr. Kirby Page, editor of the series, 311 Division street, Hasbrouck Heights, N.J., at ten cents each.

How foolish for the British and American governments to begin a controversy over the elevation of the guns of their battleships! We are never going to use them against each other. Why shouldn't we have a gentlemen's agreement between us, as do Yale and Princeton about the eligibility of their athletic team players. If either college plays a man that is sufficient proof to the other that he is really eligible. The object of the Washington Conference was international goodwill and mutual confidence, not bickering over the letter of the bond.

Who Owns the Child, the Parents or the State?

OREGON has just decided that the State owns the child and not the parents. Henceforth the parent is to have little to say about the education of the child. He cannot be educated at home by parent, governess or tutor; he cannot be sent to a private school corresponding to Groton, Phillips Exeter or Phillips Andover, Taft, Sanford, St. Paul's or Brunswick, to be fitted for college; he cannot be sent to the Lutheran, Episcopal, Roman Catholic or any other denominational school; he must be sent to the public schools between the ages of eight and sixteen. Of course, the parents will still be allowed to instruct the child at home, out of school hours, and the church will be allowed to instruct him in religion out of school hours, at least at present. Of course, there is always the possibility, if not probability, of the State, when it gets started on a paternalistic course, taking over everything, and one need not be surprised to hear of Oregon going still further along this move toward Socialism by passing a law forbidding the sending of the child to any private Sunday-school or to any church to receive religious instruction. The State will possibly take this over, too.

The bill was put through with a small majority, 14,000, and with much propaganda of a sensational nature. A slogan, "One flag, one school, one language," played a great part in the election campaigns. There is rumor to the effect that it was the work of the Ku Klux Klan. Whether the Klan originated it or not, it certainly sponsored it and worked untiringly to put the legislation through. The general opinion in Oregon, as reflected in the press, is that the whole thing is a carefully planned blow at the parochial schools maintained by the Roman Catholic Church. For several years feeling toward these schools has been growing more and more bitter. This feeling is strong everywhere, but it seems to have been unusually strong in Oregon. It took only a little carefully organized propaganda work, using patriotism as a watchword, to crystallize this feeling into the present law. It was not done through the help of the press, for very few daily papers or weekly religious papers seem to have favored it. There is seemingly considerable reaction against it now, even by those who voted for it. There is a feeling that a law which is aimed directly at one part of the population and is a weapon of prejudice was put over as a patriotic measure.

The papers have devoted much space to it since it was passed, and almost without exception condemn it. The Protestant papers are taking the side of the Roman Catholics. The Adventist paper, "Signs of the Times," condemns the law as a blow against Americanism and that freedom for which America stands. It sounds a very much needed warning: "Americans must be on their guard these days. There are so many organizations springing up that aim to destroy the religious rights of the citizens of our land; that, if we sleep, we shall wake to find ourselves hopelessly enmeshed in the chains of religious intolerance and prohibiting laws." Naturally the Roman Catholic authorities have condemned the whole procedure in most emphatic terms. "Columbia" recognizes it as an overt attack upon the Roman Catholic schools and asks if the time has come when one great portion of the citizenship of America is not to have the protection of the American flag: "Everywhere the British flag flies we find that British rule guarantees in fact freedom of religion and of religious training. Why cannot this condition prevail in the United States?" Archbishop Christie of Oregon calls it an "iniquitous enactment" and insists that it is only the beginning of a national campaign aimed at curtailing the liberties of the Roman Catholic people, and demands that the bill be carried to the Supreme Court of the United States to have its constitutionality tested. He is sure it is unconstitutional and would have it tested immediately. Many people who voted for it evidently did not quite realize how it was going to hit Protestants as well as Catholics. Some of the bitterest things being said about it now are coming from that most Protestant body of all, the Lutheran Church. The Lutheran Schools Committee of Oregon has issued a statement in which the law is described as "an intolerable invasion of religious liberty." It "infringes upon religious liberty and the freedom of conscience." The law opens the way to "other forms of religious persecution," says this Lutheran pronouncement.

The whole thing is not of sudden growth, although of sudden appearance. For a long time it has been gathering size and momentum and all students of society have seen the menace slowly coming to expression. It is most unfortunate that it should come in such un-American form as this, and perhaps there is no menace to a free country equal to secret movements like the Ku Klux Klan. On the other hand, it should be frankly stated, as Bishop Garland, of Philadelphia, commenting on this law in the Philadelphia "Public Ledger," intimates, that the blame for the antagonism to Roman Catholic parochial schools, and even for the bigoted persecution of Roman Catholics, must not be wholly laid upon the Protestants. For fifty years the Roman Catholic Church has done much to invite just what at last has come in Oregon. As one who hates what is happening in Oregon, has close contact with many Roman Catholic officials all over the world and admires their devotion to the Kingdom, and as one who has no prejudice toward the Roman Catholic Church because of its religious faith, the writer may perhaps be allowed to say very frankly that the attitude of large sections of the Roman Catholic Church has done much to invite the antagonism now being displayed toward it, and even give rise to such movements as the Ku Klux Klan.

EDITORIAL

1. It has for years, in all parts of the country, tried to secure public money for the support of its private schools. This is absolutely un-American and has been one of the chief causes of bitterness. It is known by Protestant taxpayers that pupils in parochial schools are taught the Roman Catholic doctrines and they object to pay for this, just as much as Roman Catholics would hate to support a Methodist school, teaching Methodist doctrines. In many towns it has seemed as if all sorts of machinations, political and others, were being resorted to to get public money diverted to the teaching of Roman Catholic doctrines. We can recall how the Protestants throughout the country were thoroughly stirred up by the efforts made at Washington—rumor has it that they would not always bear too close inspection—to secure appropriations for Roman Catholic Indian schools and colleges. Every Protestant knew that these schools were religious as well as secular. We have said enough. We wish our Roman Catholic brethren would drop all this and if they want their own schools, pay for them, not asking Congregationalists and Methodists to support them. (Congregationalists and Methodists have their own schools also and do not ask Roman Catholic support.) Nothing would do more to stop this constant agitation against their church than for them to stop all requests, and especially all political wire-pulling, to secure aid for sectarian use. (We would rebuke any Protestant group just as severely should they demand State aid for sectarian use.)

2. Another thing that has greatly increased the irritation in Protestants has been the constant attempt of the Roman Catholics to keep all religious instruction out of the public schools. Not only have they insisted on the removal of the Bible, but they have never been willing to co-operate in any form of religious instruction. Roman Catholic ecclesiastics frequently refer to our public school system as Godless, and yet have opposed any effort to put religious instruction in them. It is no wonder that all this irritates Protestants. The whole attitude is so childish, too, so absurd, even silly. Just as if it was ever going to hurt any Roman Catholic child to hear the King James Version of the Bible read, or hurt any Protestant child to hear the Douay Version read. How easy it would be for any group of Protestants and Roman Catholics to get together and frame a handbook of the Christian faith, putting in it only the great essentials on which they both agree, and on the great fundamentals of the faith they are very much one. We should like to quote Bishop Garland here. Speaking on this Oregon matter in the Philadelphia "Public Ledger," after saying that the Protestant Episcopal Church at its General Convention in Portland protested against the Oregon law, he says:

"For one, I believe that the Roman Catholic Church is quite right in proclaiming that there must be a religious foundation for all education, but the time has come when, to be consistent, the leaders of that Church must act on the principle it proclaims and give its public support to an effort that will insure some moral and religious training in the public schools. No great church, our own, the Roman Catholic or any other, can afford to stand on the principle of the necessity of a religious basis for education and then by its influence and its vote deprive others of the same privileges and rights.

"That is one of the underlying causes of protest against present conditions, and I hope the day is not far distant when members of every church shall agree on some general principles that will insure moral and religious training in our public schools that will not be denominational in character."

3. While on this subject we should like to say one friendly word to our Roman Catholic brethren. They would disarm much of the suspicion which is directed against them if they would frankly and freely co-operate with their Protestant brethren in all sorts of religious, social and international movements where no question of doctrine is in anywise involved. This is more of a Protestant nation than Roman Catholic, at least at present, both in numbers and temperament. Great problems face the nation, problems that concern the whole Christian people. The Protestants have been trying to solve these problems and would welcome the co-operation of their Roman Catholic brethren. So far it has been almost impossible to secure the slightest co-operation with them. An outstanding instance is the meeting of the World Alliance at Copenhagen this last summer. The leaders of the various communions throughout the world were invited to Copenhagen to confer together on what the churches could do to foster good-will among the nations and abolish war with all its terrible disaster to the Christian civilization. Every communion came gladly except the Roman Catholic, and yet it would have meant so much for Europe had they been willing to come. How much the bitterness between the two great branches of the Church could be lessened if in New York, Boston, Chicago, Pittsburgh—any city—the twelve leading ecclesiastics and laymen in the Roman Catholic communion would accept an invitation of a Protestant group of the same size and spend the day sitting around the table with them, both groups expressing frankly their views and convictions over our schools, the observance of Sunday, on the moral and social problems facing the city, on divorce, on the relation of the Church to the Government, and many more problems on which there is such a divergence of opinion in the two groups.

One reason there is so much bitterness between the two groups is because they do not know each other. The average Protestant clergyman never exchanged a word with a Roman Catholic priest. The average Roman Catholic priest numbers no Protestant clergyman among his friends. Even in the small towns pastor and priest have only formal acquaintance. The average Protestant clergyman knows nothing about the Roman Catholic Church or for what it really stands, what it is trying to do in the community. The average priest knows even less about the Protestant Church. If such group conferences as we have suggested could be arranged, if there was no other outcome than mutual acquaintance, a great and beneficent end would be gained. Much of the present antagonism on both sides is due to ignorance of each other's ideals, character and work. Acquaintance would do much to dissipate this ignorance.

A Remarkable Experiment in Democracy

WE have just spent three weeks in the Hawaiian Islands, speaking sixty-eight times in the three weeks before all kinds of groups, including churches, schools, clubs, lodges and plantations. We talked to groups representing the various nationalities in the Islands, particularly Japanese, Chinese, Koreans, Portuguese, Filipinos and native Hawaiians as well as white Americans.

We were especially interested in the work being done in the public schools. It was our privilege to speak in twenty-four schools on the islands of Maui, Oahu and Hawaii. The public schools in these islands in mid-Pacific are conducting what to our minds is a most remarkable experiment in democracy.

The schools are largely composed of Orientals, especially Japanese, since the Japanese constitute more than half the entire island population. These children of alien parents will soon be American citizens, and the day is not far distant when the young Japanese voters will politically control the Hawaiian Islands by sheer force of numbers. We were struck again and again by the American spirit manifested by these little Oriental potential voters. It seemed to us that here in these schools, more than anywhere else under the American flag, the spirit of our early American forefathers is being developed.

There are two elements in education in the Islands that do not make for democracy. One is the Japanese language school. Practically all the Japanese children go directly from the public school to the private Japanese language school. Here they receive training in Japanese language, history and civilization. Personally, we feel that such schools are utterly at variance with sound principles of American education and citizenship, and that they ought to be prohibited by law.

Many of the older Japanese students resent bitterly the Japanese language schools. They say, "We are American citizens. We expect to live and die under the American flag. Why should we be taught a language and traditions that will not help us to be good Americans?" Of course, the Japanese language schools are in keeping with the Japanese official practise of dual citizenship. Looking into the future, when the Japanese voters will control the Islands, there can be no doubt as to the menace of special Japanese language schools. Their influence can be only pernicious. These young citizens should be taught and brought up as Americans and not as Japanese.

The other undemocratic element in education in the Hawaiian Islands is the caste spirit developed by the special schools for white children. A white child is not exactly ostracized if he goes to the public school, but as a matter of fact relatively very few white children are seen in the public schools. There is a tendency for the whites to feel that they belong to a superior caste. A white "upper-crust" caste is just as un-American and undemocratic and undesirable as a Japanese caste composed of children of alien parentage. The hope of Americanization and civilization in the Hawaiian Islands is in the public schools.

Lathrop Stoddard might glory in the white caste of "neo-aristocracy" in these islands, and sneer at the "underman" represented by the Orientals, but he has scant evidence for white intellectual superiority. Recently a Chinese boy, living on a plantation near Honolulu, won the American Legion prize for the best essay on Americanism by public school children. There were about fifty thousand contestants from all over the United States. This Chinese boy, thirteen years old, one of a family of fifteen children, won the prize. I heard him recite his essay one day at the Ad Club in Honolulu. He is a typical American boy. Right along the Oriental students are taking high scholastic rank.

An effort is being made at the present session of the Hawaiian Legislature to penalize the Orientals and the poor in all schools above the grammar grades. The suggestion is to place a tuition fee on all pupils in all schools above the grades. The desire of the sponsors is ostensibly to bring in more revenue for education. However, there are certain interests in the Islands that do not believe in education. "Education for the Oriental makes him a radical and tends to make him discontented with his wages and standard of living."

In order to have a sufficient supply of plantation laborers it is proposed to turn the clock of educational progress backward. A Japanese or Filipino boy who graduates from the high school is not going to be content to work on a plantation for thirty dollars a month, which is the prevailing plantation wage.

There have been various labor groups employed on the island plantations. First came the Chinese, then Japanese, then Portuguese, and at present Filipinos. Now it is proposed to so alter the Federal immigration law that it will be possible to bring over thousands of Chinese coolies as contract laborers. All efforts at labor organization are ruthlessly suppressed.

The Hawaiian Islands are the "melting pot" for America's future Oriental citizens. These future voters, trained in American ideals and traditions as they are in the public schools, can be trusted with the future of the Islands. They are also the leaven that will greatly help in lifting the Oriental "underman" into a western "neo-aristocrat." All honor to the public school teachers and leaders who are guiding this great experiment in democracy in the Hawaiian Islands.

The churches in the Islands are like the public schools—a great force working for democracy. Thousands of Oriental children are in the Sunday-schools. In most cases separate Sunday-schools are maintained for each of the various nationalities. The Sunday-schools are well attended.

The Central Union Church of Honolulu, of which Rev. Albert W. Palmer is the minister, is the leading church in the Hawaiian Islands. They have a congregation of over a thousand and are now erecting a new half million dollar church plant. This church made a contribution to the Near East Relief of $10,850. All the people in the Islands were very cordial and responsive to the Near East Relief appeal on behalf of the children in the Bible Lands.

The larger plantations all maintain welfare workers, who conduct various forms of social service activities. Most of these workers have had war experience of a similar character with the Y. M. C. A. or Y. W. C. A. The plantation meetings we addressed were of a very democratic character. In one meeting we had a Portuguese Roman Catholic priest, a Japanese Buddhist priest, a Korean and Filipino Christian minister. The audience was composed of all these various groups.

The welfare workers are conducting efficient night schools on many plantations and the workers are encouraged to attend. The most popular courses are on Americanization. The public school teachers co-operate in this work, as also do local ministers.

The Fall of the Metropolitans

[EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE]

WE get some inkling of what the world situation really is when we say that the countries which most fascinate us are those which are always more or less in trouble. Denmark, Norway and Sweden seem to go on their way quite normally and commendably, and their quiet way of life would seem to be just what we are desiring for the whole world, if we were to be taken at our word. One would suppose that people would rest and refresh themselves with news from Scandinavia, but no such thing. No one ever seems to go crazy over the Scandinavian countries. Yet Russia, where everything is about as wrong as it can be, fascinates us all. And it does so to such a degree that the Russian enthusiast ought to "pull up" every now and again and drop the whole subject for a month, for it is apt to lead on and on and on forever. There is no such thing as finality to anything Russian. The last book you read only makes you want to read one more.

Just now there are many who are fascinated with what is happening to the Russian Church, for it happens very fast and makes quite a new chapter in church history, and too many suppose that church history is all over. The great main body of that Church is hushed and silenced. It is dangerous for it to speak. What it hopes and thinks and feels and endures it is dangerous for it to express. The little group within it which is known as "The Living Church" has a voice and is allowed to use it, but nobody is allowed to hear from the great majority who stand in the background and wait.

A few samples of what is happening to-day in the Russian Church are here given. One after another the Metropolitans fall. Moscow, Petrograd, Odessa, Simferopol, and now the turn of Kiev, the Canterbury of Russia, has come at last. What took place at Petrograd is an illustration of the rest. After the condemnation of the greatly loved and saintly Benjamin, Metropolitan of Petrograd, a new Metropolitan quickly appeared. Who appointed him? Nobody ever quite knew, but only that an old and quiet priest, of the better sort for appearance sake, a man who had no ambitions for the place and was a bit obscure, with no special connection with the party which chose him, was approached and told that he must go and receive consecration for the archbishopric, and that he might take his choice between doing that and accepting imprisonment or exile. The Church party which dictated the affair has no power to pronounce exile or imprisonment, but it has friends who have that power and will exercise it at their suggestion. In a few weeks the reluctant man was back with the mitre upon his head and entered the sanctuary of Kazansky Cathedral at Petrograd. The long submissive multitude broke out in remonstrance, but it was stilled in a few moments. Never did a man take up a great task with more sadness or reluctance showing upon his face than the present Metropolitan of Petrograd.

The Metropolitan of Moscow, the Patriarch Tychon, still inhabits his two tiny cells on the parapet of Donskoy Monastery in Moscow. It is a strange turn-about of affairs that one of our evangelical papers should lately have become sponsor for the story that the famine-stricken people of Russia had besought him to yield up the Church treasures to relieve the famine and that he would not, when the fact was that he had offered to devote them if only those who surrendered them might have a little part in seeing that they went to relieve the famine and not somewhere else.

The Metropolitan of Odessa went quietly. Some day the Soviet guard appears with the order that he is to be removed. There is no discussion, just a waiting automobile and he goes no one knows where.

Things moved a little more slowly at Kiev because the Ukrainians are very independent and their racial characteristics are strong and their desire to separate from the rest of Russia is not yet wholly overcome. But though they moved slowly, they moved, and at last Kiev has felt the grip. Before the Metropolitan fell the time was not wholly wasted. It was better that the Ukrainians should seem to do it all themselves, and so the first step was the great rent in the Church in Ukraine by which a section of the Church rose up, appointed a Metropolitan of their own and then, having done so, demanded his consecration. This being refused, a service was held in St. Sophia's Cathedral in which the priests who were present and some of the laity consecrated him themselves. Having now a bishop, he promptly consecrated another, and a second Church was on its way. For a time it was assisted by the government because it drove one more wedge into the old Church, but the government kept its eye on the wedge. It was too Ukrainian to be wholly acceptable and it was not allowed to go too far. And when this was far enough forward, still a third Church appeared upon the scene, and with all the marks of government approval. It came fitted out with a new head who had been consecrated by Bishop Antonin of Moscow and called itself the "Jevaya Tsercov." A grand reception had been arranged at the railway station for the new, third and concurrent head of the Ukrainian Church, but as no one appeared to participate in it, he announced that owing to fatigue he could not take part in any demonstrations and went straight to the Pokrovsky Convent, which he had selected as his headquarters. If the world holds a more miserable set of women than Pokrovsky it would be hard to find them. Scores of them, after lives of service in nursing and helping the wretched, are old and sick and starving, and now they are warned that they may stay on in their quarters only by the payment of large fees and cannot worship save through the ministry of a priest of the new Church.

The worth of the Church to Russia must be proportionate to the pains taken to embarrass it. Invention of new things to trouble it never ceases. Just now the government is debating what day to choose as the weekly rest day to supplant the Sabbath and is likely to fix upon Tuesday. Then come threats that all the church buildings will be put on sale at public auction to the highest bidder for any purpose whatsoever, whether club, warehouse or cinematograph. Through all this the real and actual Metropolitan of Kiev has quietly held on his way, daily threatened, but never making a false move. Christmas came and around the greatest church at the hour of the worship, under the glare of a great light projector, and with mounted troops, a tank and machine guns drawn up to prevent any interference, masqueraders representing the Deity, the Trinity, the Saviour, the Virgin scampered about announcing the "Downfall of the Gods." Bursting bombs and racket of every kind accompanied the services, but with the strange result that many who had been estranged turned their steps churchward by way of the only protest they dared to make. A government which can one day stage a performance like this and on the next set up a Church which will make no protest against it ought to open very wide the eyes of Americans, and especially when that Church is trying to convince them that it offers an unparalleled opportunity for introducing spiritual religion into Russia.

No false move having yet been made by him, it was time to approach the Metropolitan of Kiev more directly, and one day the Soviet power laid before him a paper, demanding his signature to the statement that he was too old and feeble to exercise his functions and that he therefore abdicated. This he flatly refused to do, and his refusal put new heart into the people.

At last the people secured one boon which made things seem like the old days. They were allowed to hold a procession to descend to the banks of the Dneiper for the blessing of the waters. Vast crowds of people gathered before the Bratsky Convent to take part in this act. A detachment of cavalry was sent to prevent disorder, but there was none. The order was perfect. Russia is very orderly these days. The Metropolitan, as he returned from blessing the waters, was saluted by the Red soldiers with three volleys from their rifles. Every now and then they do some unpremeditated thing like this. They stray reverently into the churches at times. Then returning to the convent the Metropolitan spoke to throngs of worshipers on the words, "Let not your heart be troubled."

But it was the last time. On a day shortly afterward the automobile drew up at the Metropolitan's door in the great monastery and he entered it and was driven away, no one knows where. It was the Soviet automobile. A deputation of workingmen went to the government to protest against the Metropolitan's arrest and to demand his release. They were arrested, but set free toward evening. Others, not knowing of his arrest, but coming as now and then some of the humblest, do, to bring food for one of these churchmen, were also arrested and also in time set free.

Nothing is more characteristic of the American than the tendency to sympathize with "the under dog." Where he errs is in thinking that the under dog is always immediately discernible. Sometimes it takes a long time before we can make out who is the under one in any controversy.

Since the time of George Kennan the American world has entertained anything but cordial feelings toward the Russian Church. It has longed for the overthrow of that power of the prelacy which was once all intertwined with the most relentless autocracy. That overthrow came nearly six years ago. For six brief months of the Kerensky régime the long-pent desires for new life and reform burst forth into expression. They began to take form. The Church which had known neither reformation nor renaissance felt the breath of change and release. New things began to be possible. The old powers which the Church had exercised disappeared and there seemed a chance to break with the evil past. The year that is gone by has seen these buddings of hope and new effort and spirit more ruthlessly crushed than they ever were under the old régime. There is much in the Russian Church for which we hold no brief whatever. There are prelates of a type with whom we wish nothing to do. But to-day it is the best men in the Russian Church who are being slowly crushed and driven into the background and not allowed to speak. It is these who will not be allowed to have any voice in the approaching Assembly. It would be a strange miscarriage of sympathy if those of us who were fired years ago as boys with desire to see Russia released from the bondage which George Kennan revealed to us, if we who have grown up in detestation of the sins which men like Pobiedonostseff made the Russian Church to sin, should now be found through want of discernment to be siding against the very men who offer the best hope of lifting the Church out of those sins, and siding with those who wish nothing so much as that the Church, with its good and bad alike, should be destroyed. Truly, the moment of improvement is the moment of peril for all great institutions.

THE OBSERVER

Circuit Preacher for a While

I HAVE been a circuit preacher for a while. The Church Peace Union and the Federal Council sent me out on a ten days' circuit, and I have been preaching about three times a day, weekdays and Sundays. It has been a most interesting experience. I have slept in a sleeping car nearly every night, but found that I slept well. Yet I would not want to spend half my life in them as actors and "traveling men" have to do. I have had a good many interesting talks on the train where one meets all sorts and conditions of men. One learns a lot in this way. For instance, I got to talking with a man who publishes a big book of sixteen hundred pages on the automobile, containing drawings of every minutest piece of the machinery. From him I learned that many of the high schools in the West were putting in automobile courses. He had just sent an order of one thousand copies to be used in the schools of Sydney, Australia. From another man, who had been to New York to sell grain and beef from the Missouri valley, I learned that the sentiment in the great Middle West was rapidly veering from that of isolation for America to America's participation in foreign affairs because if America did not go in and straighten out Europe soon there would be no market for American grain and beef. (This has had much to do with Senator Borah's change of attitude.) If Germany and France became bankrupt—and they are fast heading in that direction—it meant half of America's market gone, and then some people will tell you that America is independent of the rest of the world, and has no obligations toward it and nothing to gain from co-operation with the other nations.

My chief delight has been in visiting so many splendid churches and meeting so many royal ministers. My first city was Detroit. It is a wonderful city, with great hotels, many automobile factories, home of the Ford car and with great churches. It was in Detroit that the question came again with renewed force: Where has my friend, John Haynes Holmes, been to church? In his book "New Churches for Old," he spends the first quarter telling us that the churches are dead, have no voice, and that nobody goes to them. It so happened that on the train to Detroit I read practically the same statements in "Unity," a radical weekly paper published in Chicago. What did I see in Detroit? I preached in three churches. In the morning I preached in Dr. Lynn Harold Hough's church, the Central Methodist. Five minutes before the service the ushers were having difficulty in finding seats—a weekly occurrence. There were two thousand people in the church and crowds of men. In the afternoon I was speaking to men in the Woodward Avenue Baptist Church—a big crowd. The church is packed at every service. In the evening I preached in the Presbyterian Church—Dr. Vance's. Here again the great building was packed. My friend, Herbert Houston, editor of "Our World," was speaking in Dr. Gaius Glenn Atkins's church and noted the same thing. I took particular pains to inquire if these were the usual Sunday congregations or whether they were larger because of a special occasion and found these congregations were out every Sunday. Furthermore I found that those ministers were the leading forces in Detroit and these churches touching the life of the city at every point as well as being great universities of religion. Now Detroit was not an exception for I found exactly the same conditions in Sioux Falls, Omaha and Buffalo. At Omaha I was told that people were being turned away from the Congregational Church Sunday evenings, when its able pastor, Dr. Frank G. Smith, is preaching one hour and ten minute sermons on the Bible. At Buffalo the First Presbyterian Church had one of the most inspiring congregations of men to which I ever spoke. At five o'clock every Sunday afternoon they have a special service where the application of the gospel to social, industrial and international problems is made. It is crowded every week. The total impression I got on this week's tour was that the people were going to church as much as ever they did; that the people of real influence in the communities were linked up with the churches; that the churches are more alive than they ever were to the great issues of the times and exerting a much greater influence than they ever did. I find the ministers too an abler lot of men than ever, with much more vision and broader outlook than the fathers had, and practically heading all the movements in the cities which look to a better city and a happy, healthier life. Another thing that interested me was to see what a conspicuous place these ministers hold in the business organizations of the cities. They seem to be able to bring anyone they wish to before the Chambers of Commerce. Almost always when I address a Ministers' Association on Monday morning I am taken to the Chamber of Commerce luncheon to talk to the leading men of the city.

I think Mr. Holmes and such men as the editors of "Unity" judge of the churches by New York and Chicago. The conditions there are no criterion, for there are no parishes there. In the average real American city: such as these I have just visited, and such cities as Harrisburg, Wilkes-Barre and Scranton, on another trip, such cities as Springfield, Worcester, Hartford, New Britain—these cities where the parish exists as it always has—I find the churches filled, more alive and more interested in good works than ever, and really the only potent influences for good in the country. For instance, I was sent, with Herbert Houston, editor of "Our World," to speak three times a day in these cities on international peace and the abolishing of war. The offices which had the arrangement of this campaign—fifty speakers are all over the country at the same time—immediately found that the only avenue of approach to the cities on this question was through the churches and the only people in the cities to arrange the meetings were the ministers. One big peace organization which has nothing to do with the churches came and asked if it could not co-operate with us, so it could get at the people with its message. Everybody knows this.

Why then does Mr. Holmes and his friends say the churches have no voice, no influence, etc.? Largely I think because they do not preach Socialism, Sovietism and become the official organs of the labor movement. I suppose it is also partly due to the fact that more and more Mr. Holmes and his followers are preaching a religion which is purely humanitarianism while the churches still preach God, man's relationship to God, and emphasize the mystical element in religion. Here they are right, for man is as much interested in the long run in reaching out and laying hold of those infinite, mystic graces and powers which he finds not even in his fellowmen. He is incurably mystical as well as humanitarian, and I shall rather hope to see more emphasis placed upon worship, adoration in the temple, common prayer, the sacrament, the rapt communion with God than ever, because I believe that it is out of that the only enduring, untiring humanitarianism will come.

I want in closing again to bear testimony to the sort of men whom I found leading our churches: Hough in Detroit, preaching to thousands every Sunday, with great culture and passion combined in his message; belonging to England as well as America, for he preaches to great throngs in England every summer and is popular beyond words; Vance instructing a solid congregation of the most influential men in Detroit every Sunday, and honored by the whole city, and in all its councils; Atkins, poet, prophet and mystic, drawing about him every Sunday the souls who long for escape from the world into the heights for an hour, and yet Atkins won the thousand dollar prize for a book setting forth the most practical plan for world peace; Fifield in Sioux Falls filling a great structure twice a Sunday, leading every good work in the city, in as close touch with the schools as with the churches, a dynamo of energy; Dean Woodruff of the Cathedral in Sioux Falls, friend and counsellor of all the churches, in close touch with one of the finest private schools in the Missouri valley; man of affairs and man of culture. Smith at Omaha, where his great church is a sort of Cathedral Church to Western Congregationalism; one of the most popular preachers of the country, fighter for righteousness, bubbling over with helpfulness as well as good humor: I might go on but after all these are the men who are manning our churches everywhere and what is the use of talking this "bunkum" about the decline of the churches? Where is this decline?

The Victory of the Risen Life

By Rev. Dr. S. Parkes Cadman

Pastor Central Congregational Church, Brooklyn

ESTER comes to multitudes of sorrowing ones who cannot perceive that God's promises in Christ Jesus our Lord have already been fulfilled. Mary Magdalene and "the other Mary" went to the grave of their adored Master forgetful that He had told them He would rise again. Their love for Him overcame their fear of His murderers, but it did not instill in them the faith which abolishes the fear of Death. The spices they bore to embalm His mutilated Body were mute witnesses of their despair. They were unaware that God's Holy One could not see corruption; that the last rites of reverent affection would never be required by Jesus. The path through Joseph's beautiful garden was overshadowed by their sense of irreparable loss. These women trod it encompassed by the night of hopelessness. Yet you and I know how needless their lamentations were. The Resurrection had already taken place, the pierced hands were uplifted to bless, the wounded feet wended their nearest way to the stricken recreants in the Upper Room. The Crucified Redeemer was elevated to His eternal Sovereignty and Priesthood. How utterly misplaced were such tears and tributes! But before we blame the Marys for their vain effort to wreath Victory's resplendent brow with the cypress, we should recall the countless throngs which imitate them; the blind, illogical despair which hovers over the numberless graves on distant battle grounds and there is often attended by a consequent skepticism.

Contemplate the comfortless condition of these armies of the living, less fortunate in many instances than those who have entered into their rest, mourners for whom the bitterness of Death is not yet overpast, nor the stone at the mouth of their sepulchre rolled away. It is to such that I address myself, to those whose hearts are palsied, whose heads hang down. For them I would make straight paths beyond the Garden unto the Risen Lord, beyond the far-off grave into the Life Eternal! Else that which is lamed will be turned out of the way, and the help and healing Easter should bring to their distress will be indefinitely postponed.

This Festival commemorates all the work of Christ in the world from first to last; what He was in Himself, what He came to accomplish, what He actually wrought, what He is constantly doing, and with what manifold methods the Gospel of the Resurrection lifts the fallen, cheers the faint, and invigorates the spiritually impotent. Let me add that no other communication from the Great Beyond can for a moment compare with the message of Easter. It is solitary in its spiritual grandeur, its moral authority, its evidences of religious reality garnered both from history and experience. Should you set it aside or postpone its consideration, you will intensify the heart-break of the world, and defeat God's overtures to your personal immortality.

Too often the supreme event in the conflict for righteousness has been employed to fortify theological strongholds instead of to illuminate human gloom. Some excellent but mistaken people imagine that once a set of doctrines has been confirmed or an ecclesiastical tribunal set up, the field is theirs. These doctrines are vital in their own place, but the sublime manifestation which Jesus made cannot be confined to any creed. It diffuses a deep and general joy. It bestows the spirit of the living God upon a universal scale. It enables otherwise sinful and powerless souls to attain new heights of pardon, purity, love and anticipation. It makes mortals partakers of the Divine nature. When the world we do not as yet fully know shakes the world we do know with a demonstration of spiritual might, which transforms human life and character and consecrates civilization to the holiest ends, we are obligated to spread the tidings of this Evangel of the Resurrection. A single step beyond where many of you have halted would bring you to religious certitude, to the Angel seated in the Tomb, to the solemn yet thrilling declaration, "He is not here, He is risen." And you are typical of the race as a whole. It is in their behalf that we report what the Church in her catholicity and unity has always heralded, that this same Jesus, Who was delivered up for human trespasses, has been raised again for human justification. The report is timely, and never more grateful than now.

The Gospel of the Resurrection is not a cryptic Gospel, with large reservations, hampered by every theological fence. It is as universal as sin, as prevalent as death, and far exceeds them. For where sin and death abounded, grace and mercy did much more abound. The verdicts of evil are quashed in the Supreme Court of God's Will. They are fleeting phenomena, which St. John calls a passing cloud obscuring the dawn of a perfect day. But they will disappear, and the Love which dictated our ransom from their tyranny will abide. To argue otherwise insults the omnipotence of the Father. He gave Christ to the nails and the tree that he might lift Him above every dominion of wrong, and, though we see not yet all things subjected to Him, we see Him, and in Him see the assured extinction of injustice, lies, oppression, war, and of the host of baleful practises which delay the kingdom's expansion. The idea that we can live decently and be oblivious to these questions, that we can be content to pursue the even tenor of our way, and patiently await the issue, is a vain notion, a poor, miserable deduction repellant to our ampler thinking. We ask, and we have the right to ask, why we were thrust into the arena of life. And the answer is, not to enrich God, but to be enriched by Him, to have villainies eradicated, and monstrosities brought low, and our spiritual equipment amply provided for worlds beyond the grave. Jesus has guaranteed these blessings. Lifted up, He draws all men unto Himself, not that they should dodge the fray, but earnestly engage in it, believing that He will bestow the courage, the strength, the resolution, which the fray requires.

I have ceased to speak of the Resurrection as a miracle in the ordinary meaning of the term. For me, and, as I venture to assert, for you also, the Resurrection was the normal expression of God's intention. It fulfilled every aim which original creation carried in its bosom. To suppose that the All Father would make His offspring capable of affection and of virtue, and then desert them to a mechanical fate, is to play fast and loose with average intelligence. By what preceded and what was subsequent to the Resurrection, by what the prophecies and the achievements of history record, I am compelled to enthrone Christ and everything connected with Him as the realization of Heaven's predetermination for earth. He comes to us again as Everlasting Right and Everlasting Love. There is no entrenched and armed iniquity. He cannot demolish. He is God's warrior against mental, emotional and ethical evil; the Hope of the penitent, the Light of the prodigal, the Potentate of peace, the giver of Life, the Monarch of your endless spiritual development. Mrs. Hamilton King, in her poem "The Disciples," tells us that—

When God formed in the hollow of His hand
This ball of earth among His other balls.
And set it in the shining firmament,

Between the greater and the lesser lights,
He chose it for the Star of Suffering.

The poetess has hit the center, and those who accept her version of our planet's mission will be the better able to know why the Resurrection should occur here. Man's pain is his praise, and, eventually, the forerunner of his spiritual distinction. What better would you have than a life in which you are summoned to unflinchingly resist sin, in the assurance that sin is not invincible? Imagine another sort of life, wherein you would exist as in a silken bridal chamber with sensuous pleasures, soft delights and garlanded pleasures. The outcome would be a breed of honeyed sloths, greedy for lollipops and filled with vanities. We are here, and are what we are, built for the battle which Jesus waged, because by no other means can feeble knees be strengthened, straight paths made, and the lame kept steadily forging to the front. It is the immortality of character, of spirits indispensable to both worlds, that the Resurrection insures. For other worlds God may have other words; for this world the Eternal Word is Christ and He bespeaks the Cross, the Grave, the golden strand where His bands gather for their jubilee. Those who suffer with Him shall be raised with Him. The prospect allures the righteous, encourages the fearful, and sanctifies the race.

On the Via Dolorosa in the Dead Sea Valley

By Allan A. Hunter

[Allan Hunter spent some two years in Palestine during and after the close of the war as a member of the American Red Cross Commission. He knows whereof he writes at first-hand.]

NOT along the traditional tiny street that twists among the limestone houses of Jerusalem up to the Holy Sepulcher did I find out there in Palestine the Via Dolorosa.

But in the most outlandish places. In the "Valley of the Shadow," for example; the heartless Dead Sea valley, where the actinic rays of the sun smote mercilessly by day and the pestilence of malarial mosquitoes smote incessantly at night, where the briars stung harmlessly but often, and the adders not often but fatally; where the Turks sniped with pip-squeaks at soldiers on the road, or dropped high explosives on encampments from their six-inch "Jericho Jane" and "Nablus Nancy."

To fight in the Dead Sea valley, amid all that sickening heat and maddening irritation, with a faith in men still fresh and strong—that was the Way of Pain. And I saw many walking upon it whom we of the city churches would straight-arm, would reject from membership among us. There were Ozzies and Jocks and Tommies that hour by hour flung shallow blasphemies from their lips. They appealed to Christ with shocking flippancy.

But they carried His cross.

They really did carry His cross. Not consciously, of course (for are the great things men do ever consciously great?), but unflinchingly all the same, and without bitterness.

When the Ruby Queens got to be a bore and no Gold Flakes were available in the regimental canteen, these men would growse; also when the excess tinned beef would go bad on the quartermaster's hands.

But when their supplies got seriously short, when their bodies were shaking with attacks of tertiary malaria (and not a jackal's chance of getting a quinine pill within five days), when they could not sweat for want of water, though it was one hundred degrees Fahrenheit—then their spirit began to show. An invalid like Henley could whistle in the dark how his head was bloody but unbowed. Tommy whistled out of unsimulated, unbreakable good cheer. If he spoke of his head as being "bloody," it was with no appeal to heroics; none at all. When things in the Dead Sea valley became most desperate he became most debonair:

"Ye lays on yet blanket at night—a wee snake is curled upon it—next morning ye wake up and find yourself dead."

Down in that lowest fissure on the globe's surface (more than one thousand feet below sea level) the "fathers of a feather" and the "ladies of hell" liked to lighten the burden of their cobbles or their pals by referring to the Judean battalion recruited in Harlem and London as "The Jordan Highlanders."

"Now, boys, shout the good old Jewish battle-cry together, 'No advance without security'!"

The Australians, those wearers of "the kangaroo feather," were not—one had better state this frankly—an academic group of men. I remember early one morning on the road up from the Valley of the Shadow to Hebron observing through an adjutant's glasses a company of them on horseback gathered around my Ford truck, which I had loaded carefully near Abraham's tomb with olive roots. The car had bucked off the road the night before, having hit a rock, and I was seeking aid from an English cavalry camp located half a mile up the road.

"They're making a good haul off your car," said the adjutant casually as he handed me his binoculars. And sure enough they were! Each "devil horseman" helping himself to three or four of my invaluable roots! Running down the road, I accosted the first pilferer: "Where did you get that wood?"

"Oh, down in the Jordan valley," he lied amiably.

I said nothing. One does not say anything to Australians bent on gathering fuel. One only smiles. But to the next rider with his loot tied to his saddle I remonstrated: "Look here! You people need that wood all right. But we have twenty Red Cross sisters in Jerusalem. They would like to have it in their hospital."

"Hey, Cobbers!" he shouted to the men behind him. "Take that wood back, the Yank sisters want it at their hospital in Jerusalem!"

The sanctity of property, particularly government property, was nothing to the Ozzies. They called it "winning" fuel, blankets—not stealing.

But let those careless warriors run up against a genuine case of need and they would respond with an amazing generosity. In the valley or up around Pisgah of the Moab Mountains they would share the last tepid drop of water in their bottle with a wounded man. And they have been known to hand not a few cigarettes to captured Turks.

I did not see it then, but it is plain enough to me now: what gave those unfaltering men in the Valley of the Shadow their kinship with Christ, their astounding kinship with Christ was an emancipation from bitterness. Some had heard their comrades gasp out in death from a sharp-shooter's bullet on Gallipoli. Many had fought through the thirst and dysentery and sandflies of Sinai, only to be bombarded again and again at Gaza. All had suffered at the hands of "Johnny the Turk." But they bore him surprisingly little malice. There was no rankling spite or lust for revenge in them, or next to none. They were surprisingly free from hatred. They fought loyally, but they were blinded by no red mist of stupid wrath as were the civilians.

I shall not forget that blazing September afternoon when a mob of Turkish prisoners stumbled into Jericho after having trudged down from the Moab Mountains and then across the Jordan River to the squalid little town of mud houses and Canaanitish fame.

Those Turks had a look of dumb endurance in their eyes, of utter despair and hunger and suffering that I hope never to see again. And when they dropped down in a huge vacant lot that was used for their temporary prison they appeared like so many filthy sacks.

The British soldiers who were detailed to guard them did no ostentatious service. As a matter of fact they had no cups of cold water to hand over to their enemies, and few enough cigarettes.

But it seemed to me their minds had been burned divinely pure of cancer and bitterness towards these Turks who had been allied against them.

The Via Dolorosa in the Valley of the Shadow by the Dead Sea, it was a cruel road for men to walk upon. But they went thereon unflinchingly, with a spirit erect and gay. The sufferings they endured were not in penalty for wrong that they had done. Those men were not responsible for the brutality, the unbelievable absurdity, of the war. They were only doing what they could to free others from the suffering they were undergoing.

The crown of thorns did not show on their faces: they carried the cross within their hearts.

And they came closer than they guessed to the green hill far away, far away from our comfortable post-war world, but not so far removed from their Valley of the Shadow.

A Letter from Lord Robert Cecil

[The following letter from Lord Robert Cecil appeared in the "International Interpreter" of March 3. It is very valuable to get the point of view of this most eminent English statesman. The letter has added interest inasmuch as Lord Robert has just arrived in this country, where he is giving a series of addresses on the nature and work of the League of Nations.—THE EDITORS.]

YOU ask me to say something about the United States and the League of Nations in the "Interpreter." To accept is dangerous, for I may be easily misunderstood. But to refuse in the circumstances would be cowardly. For I do believe that American co-operation in the League would be the greatest thing that could happen for the peace of the world.

No decent Englishman would venture to criticise the present policy of the United States. For is it not just what we tried to do years ago? We thought we could keep aloof from Continental Europe. We called it "splendid isolation." But it failed. If you are continually trading with other nations, selling them goods and buying others from them, lending them money, yes, and reading their books, listening to their plays and looking at their pictures, it just is not true that their welfare is a matter of indifference to you.

Suppose, to take an extreme case, Europe relapsed into the condition she was in in the ninth century—a prospect which a very distinguished American friend of mine, a Republican, used to speak of as not impossible—would that make no difference to America? Assume for an instant that it would be economically unimportant—a large assumption—is there nothing else? Does American progress, culture, civilization owe nothing to the older peoples? No intelligent European would admit the converse, for we all acknowledge that we owe much to the United States.

Put it at its lowest. Let us say that it is possible that Europe's continued existence and welfare may be of some advantage to America. Would it not be well, then, for the two sides of the Atlantic to take counsel together, to talk

The successive waves of persecution, massacre and deportations that befell the Near East have also struck heavily the little group of Greek Protestants. Since early in the 19th century, as a result of the activities of our missionaries, Greek Protestant Churches had been formed in Smyrna, Manissa, Samosun, Ismid, Ordou and other places near Marsovan, Talas and Cesarea.

All these churches have been destroyed and the members, including pastors, teachers and other leaders have been killed or deported and the survivors, mostly women, children and old men, have taken refuge in Greece.

The Little Greek Protestant Churches in Athens, Piraeus, Salonica, and Janina are now overcrowded for worship. Many of the refugees are still without shelter and deprived of the simple necessities of life. Among them are pastors, teachers and their families—or families of deceased workers and leaders.

The brethren in Greece have done their utmost to help their fellow Christian refugees, but the task is simply beyond their power. They appeal to the Evangelical Churches in Great Britain and America, to whom they have been always turning for help and guidance in normal times and all emergencies as to a mother.

These Protestant refugees were a real moral and spiritual power in their respective communities in Turkey, they will doubtless exercise similar influence in their new surroundings in Greece. To help them is really to help the future of all Greece. It is more than giving bread to the hungry. Besides, they are appealing as those of the household of faith.

In addition to what you have already given repeatedly towards the general relief in the Near East, would you not send at once some further aid towards the relief of this special group of homeless refugees in Greece, mostly women, children and old men?

All contributions should be sent to Cleveland H. Dodge, Treasurer, 151 Fifth Avenue, New York City, marked Greek Protestant.

Constantinople

March 14, 1923.

Vickrey, N.Y.

To-day's shipload of exiles from Asiatic Turkey increased to 32,000 the total number of refugees now at Constantinople, on their way to Athens. Sick, destitute and without food, clothing or homes to go to, they present a tremendous relief problem calling for prompt energetic action if they are not all to perish.

Constantinople is menaced by the worst epidemic of diseases in its tragic history. Near East Relief has gone to their assistance with American doctors, nurses, medicines, food-stuffs and clothing, thus assuming a new responsibility severely taxing its limited resources.

In the harbor, crowded with twenty-one warships of seven different nations, are four refugee ships crammed with deportees from Asia Minor, who have waited for days to be landed. Ashore, at eleven different places along the beautiful Bosphorus, earlier arrivals are huddled together in windowless, doorless, leaky buildings, under conditions beyond description. Afloat and ashore, smallpox, typhus, dysentery and pneumonia go unchecked. Yesterday's death toll in Bosphorus camps was seventy-two. Weakened by days of travel, by wagon and on foot from interior Anatolia to the Black Sea ports, Trebizonde and Samsoun, these wretched people fall easy victims to disease. Many of those who survived their march of terror to the sea died on shipboard and 60 per cent. of those who lived through the voyage on filthy, crowded ships, were diseased on arrival here. On one ship 200 died out of 2,500, and Doctor Wilfred Post, of Princeton, called it a "Black Hole of Calcutta."

At Scutari, where the worst conditions prevail, 10,000 deportees are existing in Selamli Barracks and stables. Deaths average 25 daily. Typhus to-day claimed the last member of a family of twelve to fall victim to that disease since arrival here. The fourth physician to die of the same malady while attending refugees succumbed yesterday. Dr. Post, on one of his rounds, counted 100 dead bodies. Wrapped in bundles of rags, death had come days before the living knew it. One room contained 53 bodies. Refugees were afraid to bury them for fear of contracting disease. 3,000 people, who a few weeks ago were prosperous farmers in Anatolia, live on mud floors of stables, where many of them become staring skeletons from undernourishment, and are waiting to die. Children are brought into the world a few feet from where the village priest offers prayers over the dead.

No less terrifying are scenes at Boadjikeuy Camp and other depositories of the destitute and starving exiles. Especially heart-rending is the plight of 1,200 dumped into a shelterless cove at Asiatic Kavak a few days ago, where they are exposed to cold and rain and where pneumonia is mowing them down.

Turkish gendarmes who guard these concentration camps have strict orders from Angora prohibiting taking photographs.

Word has just been received that the Turkish steamship Guljemal which brought 4,000 from the Black Sea to San Stefano is returning to Trebizonde for additional deportees to dump into these overcrowded camps to await removal to Greece. This notwithstanding fact that Greece has absorbed more than 1,000,000.

things over? And if that is to be done, is it not better that such talks should be not isolated efforts, but part of a regular scheme so that they shall produce some permanent effect, and not run away into the sand? Is the League of Nations much more than that, a regularized and co-ordinated system of international conferences chiefly with the object of avoiding war?

I have heard much talk of the League as a super-state, destructive of national sovereignty. It really is not so. Do Americans seriously believe that France or Japan or Italy, let alone the British Empire, have sacrificed their independence to a World State? Or that freedom loving peoples like the Swiss, the Dutch, the Scandinavian countries, are now controlled by a World Government? I do not forget Articles X and XVI of the Covenant. But let their critics cease to regard them as controversial half-bricks useful to hurl at their opponents, and read them quietly through with a desire to make the best of them. I assert, and I have the backing of the Assembly of the League representing all its members, that these articles say only that no state ought to try and set right an international grievance by aggressive war till all else has been tried, and that if it does each of its fellow members in the League will if, and only if, each is convinced that such indefensible aggression has taken place, break off all relations with the aggressor and consult with the other members of the League what further steps, if any, should be taken to restore the peace of the world. I am not saying these articles, or any other articles of the Covenant, are perfect. Very likely they could be improved. But I do say that the Covenant is a sincere attempt to secure peace, and that, taking everything into consideration, the League has been shown to be fairly efficient for the purpose. How much more efficient it will be when it has secured the co-operation of all nations those know best who know most about the League.

No one will dispute that the League is not yet strong enough to take advantage of all its opportunities. The thousands of human beings slaughtered in the Near East and the millions of money wasted in Germany and elsewhere are heart-rending witnesses of this truth. Still it has done much. It has averted three wars. it has established an International Court of Justice; it has laid the foundations of a real law of nations; it is helping nations to understand one another and improving their intercourse; it has struck vigorous blows at world evils like the traffic in women and children, and the sale of opium, cocaine and other noxious drugs; it has freed hundreds of thousands of starving captives; it has established a standard of government for backward peoples; it is protecting racial and religious minorities, and it has taken the first steps toward the completion on land and in the air of the Washington policy of disarmament at sea.

These are surely no small achievements for a "truncated" League. Doubtless the Covenant is imperfect—no one thinks it was verbally inspired. But if it is doing good work, if it is making for the peace of a distracted world, is it quite sound to stand aside altogether and decline to help even by counsel or moral support? Will you not tell us what you think is wrong, what improvements you desire, what are your conditions for co-operation? You will not find the members of the League obstinately opposed to change. True, the League can, it will, it must go on in any case. The peace of the world depends on it. But it is the plain fact that with your help the peace of the world will be more rapidly and certainly attained.

Preachers and Divorce

By Rev. C. F. Aked, D.D., LL.D.

IT is reported that a number of the clergy in a Southern city have agreed between themselves not to marry divorced persons, and have publicly announced their decision. They make an exception in the case of a man who has divorced his wife, or a woman who has divorced her husband, on the ground of marital unfaithfulness. They make no other exception.

So far as this is a matter of "conscience"—the word used in its popular sense—it is not a matter for argument. It goes without saying that a clergyman, like anybody else, must do what he conscientiously believes to be right. If he cannot in "conscience" marry a divorced person, why, there is an end of it—for him.

But this is not by any means the end of the story for everybody. And the outside world must not suppose that these clergymen are giving a final, or even an authoritative, interpretation of Christ's teaching about divorce.

It is doubtful whether there is in the Four Gospels a subject more perplexing. We do not know what Jesus said, and we do not know what Jesus meant. If a clergyman says definitely with regard to divorce, "The New Testament teaches"—this or that—he is either speaking with the recklessness of ignorance or presuming upon the ignorance of his audience.

The very fact that we do not know whether Jesus made adultery the one exceptional ground on which divorce might be permitted and the marriage of the innocent party tolerated, or whether He made no exception at all, fatally weakens the appeal to His authority. If we cannot be certain whether He makes this tremendous exception or not, of what can we be certain? Obviously, He is so badly reported by the evangelists—Matthew, Mark and Luke—that we cannot be sure what His teaching was.

Mark and Luke make no exception whatever; remarriage in any case is forbidden. Matthew makes the great exception. Now, did Matthew deliberately insert into our Lord's speech these words modifying the prohibition of divorce and remarriage? Or did Mark and Luke deliberately refuse to report the exception Jesus had explicitly made?

We do not know. And the appeal to the authority of our Lord loses force.

This is by no means the only difficulty. Matthew is singularly obscure. In the King James Version we read that the man who puts away his wife for some cause other than adultery "causeth her to commit adultery," and the American Revised Version merely alters it to "maketh her an adulteress." What this means people may argue until the end of time. It must be observed that there is here no word about remarriage. It is plainly stated that if a wife who has not been unfaithful is divorced the husband "causeth her to commit adultery." Why? It is sometimes answered, "remarriage is implied." It is not. There is in this clause no hint of remarriage. The implication is read into it without warrant by preachers who are trying to make out a case. It is not in the Saviour's words as reported.

Does it mean that a man who divorces his wife drives her to a life of vice because she cannot earn an honest living? That may have been the case in Palestine in the time of our Lord, but what present meaning can this have for America in the twentieth century?

In the same verse (in Matthew) there is another difficulty. This deals with remarriage. It is stated that the man who marries the divorced woman commits adultery; yet not all the scholarship in the world can be sure whether it means that the sin is committed by the man who marries a woman properly divorced because she has been unfaithful, or by the man who marries a woman improperly divorced because she has not been unfaithful.

In despair of ascertaining something definite from the letter of Scripture, we ask ourselves whether anything is to be learned from the conditions which existed in Palestine in the time of Jesus and His apostles. And it quickly appears that our Lord was speaking in the interest of women, as the Friend and Protector of women. Divorce was all but universal. It would be the fallacy of under-statement to say that "divorce was easy." A man could divorce his wife for any cause or for none. Court and testimony, evidence and verdict and judgment, were not needed. The man was tired of his wife, after a day or a year, and he gave her "a bill of divorcement." He told her to go—and she went. A woman could not divorce her husband in any circumstance, for any sin against love, for any crime. The words in Mark, "and if she herself shall put away her husband," are a gloss added after our Saviour's day for the benefit of Gentile readers.

Jesus stood then as ever the divine Champion of womanhood, the divine Friend of woman. He insisted that this barbarous treatment of the woman by the man, under form of marriage and legal divorce, should cease. A woman, in His eyes, had her rights. It would be a strange thing now and sad if the words of Jesus were turned into prohibitions and "sanctions" which once again did violence to women.

Against the free and easy divorce of His day it is clear that He set Himself in uncompromising opposition. For the immorality of it all, and the cruelty of it, for the license which it gave to the baseness of men and the contempt it set upon women, Jesus had no words but those of condemnation. He held up before the gaze of His time and before that of every succeeding age a lofty ideal, an ideal which cut clean across the habits and practices of His day and all the self-indulgence of vagrant appetites throughout all time. Where the mind of Christ is, in any age and country, there is the ideal of chastity; and the life-long marriage of one man to one woman, dissoluble only by death, with a law of absolute and equal morality binding upon men as well as women, and before marriage as well as after, is the Christian ideal toward which the world must ceaselessly aspire.

But this does not settle for us the question, What shall the individual clergyman do in the case of persons who have failed, as in one way or another we all fail, to reach the ideals of Christ? If a divorce has been granted by a court of law, shall the preacher himself sit as a court of appeal and refuse to recognize the court below as sufficient authority for remarriage? And if so, shall he stand by Matthew, who would allow him to marry the innocent party to a divorce granted for unfaithfulness? Or shall he stand by Mark and Luke, who would not allow him to marry the most innocent man or woman alive who had divorced a partner because of that partner's sin?

Assuming that the preacher, like those in the Southern city who have made known their position, has taken upon himself to reject Mark and Luke and has elected to abide by Matthew, then is he going to accept every fraudulent divorce procured from easy courts of law on grounds of adultery which has never been committed? A preacher who does not know that such fraudulent divorces are common in States which only grant divorces on this one ground is too innocent to be entrusted with grave discussions of human conduct. New York, for instance, has such a divorce law, and what happens? A man and his wife agree to obtain a divorce. The man consults his lawyers or other advisers. A professional young or youngish woman in the divorce detective line of business is sent to him. They go to some hotel, register as man and wife, go to a room together, read the afternoon paper, yawn in each other's faces, stare out of the window, remain for a couple of hours—and the court accepts this as evidence of a sin which they did not commit nor dream of committing. And the divorce is granted.

Is the preacher to satisfy his conscience with such a hypocritical divorce? It is clear that he cannot "try" over again a divorce granted years ago a thousand miles away before he will marry a man who has divorced his wife on "statutory grounds." What is the preacher likely to do but say: "I cannot go behind the finding of a court of law. I have to accept the facts as they appear on the record."

And is not this the proper thing for us preachers to do, anyway? For the sake of clearness, it may now be permissible for one preacher to put into the first person singular the conclusions to which he long since came and on which he bases his practice, thus:

There are many sins against love which are worse than the solitary act of unfaithfulness, which some clergymen consider the sole ground of divorce. If I am to regard adultery as ground of divorce and warrant for remarriage of the wronged party, I am bound to admit that there may be other causes of divorce which give equal warrant for remarriage. I am not in a position to investigate the grounds of the divorce. I cannot go deep into the story of the married life. I know nothing of those years of disagreement. I cannot call witnesses, put them upon oath, cross-examine them, and reach a decision which in honor and conscience I think entitled to precedence over the decision of a tribunal constituted by the law of the land. I have not the means to do this; I have not had the training which would fit me to do it properly if I had the means; and nobody has authorized me to do it. I am not a civil servant. I am not a judge of the divorce division of the Superior Court. What can I do but accept the conditions created by the law of the land, and when the law is altered change my practice to accord with it?

In the sight of God there may have been good reason for a divorce. In the sight of God this new marriage may be holy. The reverse may be true, but I am not in a position to find out. I must leave that to the Searcher of all hearts, and to these, the man and woman, who should remember their responsibility to Him. For myself, this clerical protest notwithstanding, I shall continue to marry any man and any woman whom the law authorizes me to marry, and the only question I shall ask is, "Do you know of any legal impediment?"

The Farmers' Co-operative Movement

By Benson Y. Landis

THIS article will give some information about the characteristics of farmers' co-operative marketing associations in the United States, indicate their present extent, point out frankly the problems and weaknesses, and record what this movement promises to contribute toward a better social order. For three years I have given much time to a study of the movement, and this included considerable personal investigation.

Just what a rural co-operative is, is a rather hard question to answer briefly. The best opinion among leaders of co-operative associations seems to favor an organization having the following features: Membership is limited to producers; each man is given one vote regardless of the amount of stock he holds; each farmer is allowed only a limited number of shares; capital invested receives a fixed rate of interest; no profit is made by the organization, and all earnings or dividends are turned back to the member as he has used the organization—this is the so-called "patronage dividend" over against a dividend distributed according to the amount of stock owned; each grower is bound by contract to deliver his products to the co-operative or pay a penalty; crops are "pooled" to assure an equal return for the same grade of products, no matter by whom or in what quantity grown. Many organizations which started by selling stock have shifted to the non-stock plan. By this method the farmer holds a membership, and companies can easily be begun on the non-stock plan if the members have signed contracts agreeing to deliver certain quantities of produce against which the organization can borrow money to start the organization and build or purchase equipment.

The California organizations measure up well to the standard enumerated in the paragraph above, as do a majority of the farmers' grain elevators, the livestock shipping associations, those among the dairymen, cotton and tobacco growers, and others. Many organizations have some co-operative features, the type being dictated by local preference, or sometimes by existing laws, though some of the bars to co-operative enterprises have been removed by recent national legislation. Some local organizations, like the grain elevator and livestock shipping associations, have been hurriedly started and are now perfecting their organizations, taking care of such important details as contracting for products, patronage dividends, or the one-man one-vote plan. The Federal Trade Commission when investigating the grain trade called co-operative every local elevator which was operated by a group of farmers for their benefit on some mutual or co-operative plan, in distinction to one run by one or a few individuals. The trend is to adopt the features outlined above in forming new organizations, and the older associations are shifting to them.

The modern farmers' co-operative movement in the United States began about 1890. Then there were several hundred organizations. Now there are at least fifteen thousand local organizations for buying and selling. (Perhaps as many local telephone and insurance companies are run by farmers on a mutual plan. Breeders' and cow testing associations and credit unions add to the imposing list of local co-operatives. These non-marketing associations are not discussed in this article.) The most numerous among the buying and selling organizations are grain elevators, livestock shipping associations, creameries, cheese factories, farmers' unions' dairymen's associations for marketing milk, truck and fruit exchanges and retail stores. The census figures gathered for the year 1919 and published in 1921 stating that less than ten per cent. of the farmers in the country are members of buying and selling co-operatives are admittedly too low or already hopelessly out of date. Mr. Bernard M. Baruch estimates that the volume of business done by agricultural co-operators increased six hundred per cent. in the year 1920. Out of twenty-five hundred seventy-five rural communities studied in 1920 one-fourth had one or more organizations.

But the formation of local organizations in the rural communities is only the first step of the co-operator. Let us suppose that "Rectangle County," Illinois, has fifteen co-operative livestock shipping associations in as many rural communities. In every sense of the word they are apt to live "unto themselves alone," so far as their dealings with city markets are concerned. Obviously, they easily compete with one another. They may ship stock to one city when the market there is glutted, and they could more profitably ship elsewhere. The way to strengthen the position of the individual farmer as a marketer is to form another co-operative marketing agency, in this case a commission firm which will be owned and run either by the local associations operating as units or by the individual farmers who are members of the local. This enables the farmers to supplant the privately organized city commission firm with one of their own.

As early as 1895 the California Fruit Growers' Exchange led the way as a central agency of the local fruit growers' organizations. This is perhaps the most famous co-operative organization in the country. The local organization picks, grades, packs and ships the fruit, and it is a part of the district exchange, which is in turn a part of the central agency. The central federation has selling experts in all the large cities dealing with the city wholesaler. California has at least thirty large co-operative associations handling beans, walnuts, raisins, eggs, milk, grapes, etc., all organized to handle their specialty. The prosperity of the farmers in this State is, to a large extent, due to their co-operative efforts. The amount of business done by these organizations amounts to over two hundred million dollars yearly. There are also federations of grain growers, such as the Northwestern Wheat Growers' Association, selling more than twenty million bushels a year, and the plans of the United States Grain Growers, Inc., to be the selling agency of the local elevator associations in the grain belt are fairly familiar, since they have been given much publicity in the past year. Grain Growers, which was started by the Committee of Seventeen of the Farm Bureau, has traveled slowly over a rocky path. According to the last reports, it has over one hundred million bushels of grain under contract and more than fifty-five thousand farmers as members, most of them through local organizations, but no grain has as yet been marketed. The members of the local co-operative livestock shipping associations, of which four thousand have been built up in the past few years, also have co-operative commission firms in at least eight of the terminal markets, so that the farmer can through his own marketing agencies take his stock to the door of the packing plant. One hundred and twenty of the local cheese factories in Wisconsin are banded together in a Cheese Producers' Federation which has been operating successfully for eight years, and in 1920 sold more than fourteen million pounds of cheese for its members. In Minnesota there is an association of creameries and another of cheese factories. The New York Dairymen's League has sixty thousand producing members and does a business of six million dollars a month. The cotton growers could surely not be organized, it was long thought, but ten per cent. of the 1921 crop went through the American Cotton Growers' Exchange. There are flourishing organizations in half a dozen Southern States. The tobacco growers of Kentucky, the Carolinas and Virginia have extensively organized. It is reported that one hundred and fifty thousand Southern farmers have signed co-operative contracts in the past two years, and all are banded in central marketing organizations. Among the growers of specialties, co-operative enterprises have long flourished best. The Maple Growers of New York reported more than seven thousand members by the spring of 1922. Among truck growers of the East there is unprecedented activity. There are at least several hundred prominent central agencies or federations of local co-operatives. Suffice it to say that at present there is more extensive and intensive organization than at any other time in our history. We are perhaps in the beginning of the co-operative era of agriculture. Its importance is not exceeded by any other event in our rural history.

Though great progress is being recorded in the volume of business done, in increasing the number of organizations, in adoption of the real co-operative principles, nevertheless there are many and difficult problems. There has been "too much emotion and not enough trained intellect," as Prof. John R. Commons, of Wisconsin, says. Managers have often lacked fitness, both for performing their more important duties and for keeping the necessary records. In many sections there has been over-expansion and hurried organization, an organizer having gone through a locality and laid an inadequate foundation. Members have not made enough sane and thorough survey of the reasonable amount of business available, with the result that, for instance among the livestock shipping associations of the Middle West, the problem with in the next few years will be, "expand, combine or die." Managers have often been inadequately paid. There needs to be enough vision and education among the membership. Education has been sadly lacking among many co-operative bodies—that is, knowledge of the requirements of membership, the problems facing the manager, etc.

There is much discrimination and antagonism on the part of the organized private distributors, because the co-operative becomes a big competitor. The private grain dealers and livestock commission firms, for instance, are always interested in hindering co-operative progress, though the packers and millers have long dealt successfully with various co-operative agencies. Furthermore, co-operatives do their own cause much harm by jealousies and rivalries, by devotion to their immediate organization instead of to the cause. There are many cases of unfortunate relationships between co-operative organizations. The lessons of co-operation have not all been learned.

Strictly speaking, the buying and selling co-operative is an agency which aims to save money in the distribution process. The distribution system is so inefficient and unjust that the farmer must go into marketing himself instead of allowing others to do the work for him. He must drive to town and city again with his produce, and he is driving much more efficiently than he ever did in the early days. There is no greater problem than that of distribution. It crops up in connection with coal as well as with bread. Great progress has been made by the farmers toward efficient distribution and it is well to weed out the inefficient middleman.

The city consumers who organize co-operative stores and the producers in the country, through their marketing organizations, should be able to work closely together to mutual advantage. Undoubtedly the two groups will soon be brought into more harmonious relationships.

And then the matter of "taking the premium out of capital," as G. Harold Powell used to call it, needs to be considered. "What if these co-operative principles got a hold on city business?" a friend recently asked. "What if they would work in running the great industries? Think of the far-reaching consequences!" Yes, think of them! What if our ordinary stockholder were paid only to the extent to which he had used the organization, according to the amount of business he had done? What if all profits were "socialized," as they are among the farmers' co-operatives? What if the one-man one-vote principle were the rule among the stockholders of railroad or steel companies? These non-profit federations and central agencies of co-operatives, which operate at their own cost and return their earnings to the individual in proportion as he has served, deserve our heed and study.

We will grant that too often the co-operator has looked in and not out. There has been too much thought of merely the amount of money that could be saved in the marketing process, rather than what benefits would accrue to the community. Co-operation has paid in dollars and cents, and the profit motive has been there as much as the service motive. But there is great promise that a real beginning has been made to make rural economic life more democratic and more co-operative, that the old competitive order is passing, that the farmers will contribute toward that co-operative social order which most of us grant must be built.

Disregard the city consumer movement in operating stores and factories, and what groups in this country have such co-operative organizations as we have just discussed? What groups "pool" resources in the same co-operative way? Is there not an advance step here, if not in bettering human nature, then in creating at least the kind of rules or the kind of organization which we must have if we would be more neighborly or brotherly in earning our daily bread? There are those who believe that this "peaceful agricultural revolution" will have results as far-reaching as did the industrial revolution which began in England in the last part of the eighteenth century and created our present economic order.

Duty of American Protestantism to European Protestantism

By Bishop James Cannon, Jr.

Of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South

NO Church in any land is so powerful that it can presume to ignore other churches, their methods of work, and the results of their labors. If it is truly Christian it will not be satisfied to violate in any way one of the greatest articles of our faith—the communion of saints. Indeed, the idea of a holy catholic church throughout all the world is nothing but dead form of words unless it is vitalized by the belief in the communion of saints, of all saints—of yellow saints, of brown saints, of black saints and white saints of French saints, of German saints, of Scandinavian saints, of Latin-American saints, of Chinese saints, of Japanese saints, of Negro saints, and American saints.

But the Church is slow to realize the sweeping nature of this faith. The sectarian cries, of which we read even in the days of Paul, have been perpetuated all down the centuries, and Armenians and Greeks and Romanists have carried their unseemly strife to the Church of the Nativity and the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. Not only have we had Romanists and Protestants, but we have had national churches in almost every country of Europe. Difference in language and difference in government have tended to isolate the Christians of different nations from each other, and because of frequent bloody wars barriers have grown up which it has been very difficult to break down or override in times of peace.

Notwithstanding the fact that our American religious leadership came originally from the churches of Europe, there has been practically no co-operative effort with those churches. There has been, on the part of the great mass of American Christians, very meager information concerning our Protestant brethren in Europe or the conditions under which they have labored. There have been conferences like the Lambeth among the Episcopalians, the Ecumenical Conference among the Methodists—these meeting only once in ten years—the Pan-Presbyterian Conference, the Pan-Baptist Conference, also meeting at intervals of several years. These have done something to bring about a better understanding, but there has been no great world organization, similar to the Roman Vatican, to bind together American and European Protestant churches.

Various things have caused American Protestants unconsciously to minimize the relative value and importance of European Protestantism. It has been considered to be too formal and ritualistic and without much deep spiritual life. It is also true that any form of state support of religious institutions is so alien to American Protestant thought and practice that it has been difficult for American Protestantism to believe that any Church could be strong and independently aggressive in its activities if it accepted any form of state support. The comparatively meager sums contributed for foreign missions by many continental Protestant churches have been considered indicative of a lack of missionary spirit, and therefore of weak propagating force and of a narrow provincialism resulting from semi-support and control by the state. Roman Catholicism, moreover, with its numerous churches and cathedrals, has bulked so large in the eyes of American travelers, compared with the relative strength of Roman Catholicism in the United States, that European Protestantism seemed to be overshadowed.

But the war has brought us of necessity into closer contact with European Protestantism. A nation cannot send its sons and daughters at the peril of their lives to any country without becoming more keen to discover the real facts concerning its people. We have discovered by our contacts with our Protestant brethren that there is a great wealth of genuine Christian spirit among them, and that while there is much more ritual and ceremonial, and much more dependence upon the state, than is customary or is agreeable to our American Protestants, yet there is less underlying secularism and sacerdotalism than the average American Protestant is inclined to believe. It is a clear gain to the Church universal, to the communion of saints, that American Protestantism is realizing more deeply than ever before that, despite all, the differences in organization, in method, in ritual, in ceremonial, the fundamental facts involved in Christian fellowship are present in the European churches. It is a joy to find that there is the same passionate devotion to our divine Lord and Saviour and the same loyalty to His divine love and sacrifice that we realize in our own churches at home.

With this increasing sense of fellowship there has followed of necessity the increasing desire to co-operate in every possible way in helping our Protestant brethren in Europe, not only to recover from the weakness, division and demoralization brought on by the war, but to become more effective in the accomplishment of their mission than ever before. It was the development of this strong, underlying belief of the communion of all saints that caused the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America to organize a Commission on Relations with Religious Bodies in Europe. That commission has endeavored to study and reach an understanding of the condition of European Protestantism.

The commission has been both hindered and helped in its work by conditions immediately following the war. It was at first exceedingly difficult to find any common meeting ground for the representatives of the Protestant churches of the different countries. They were like Joseph's brethren—they could not speak peaceably when they met. In some cases there were rancor and strife and recrimination. But the war also furnished an avenue of approach to American Protestantism. The physical relief which has been furnished to the suffering people of Europe has softened the hearts of men of all races and nations, and there is probably no organized form of Protestantism in Europe which has not been willing, and is not willing to-day, to listen attentively to any

By Joseph Hocking

SYNOPSIS:

Colonel Lester Trelawney arrives home in England after six years of military service in India and Mesopotamia. Being warned by his wife that things have become "so different" he spends the evening in getting acquainted again with his little family. Mrs. Trelawney seems worried over something. John seems older but just the same affectionate boy he left, but the two girls, Eleanor, aged twenty-one, and Peggy, seventeen, appear to have undergone a change that he is trying hard to understand, and Mrs. Trelawney seems unwilling or unable to describe, as she and the Colonel retire that evening. Meanwhile, John and the girls discuss their "long-lost father." "Anyone can see with half an eye that he won't have you going to such dances, neither will he have that fellow 'Barnes' coming to the house," says John. A low tapping on the window at this point sends Peggy into the garden, to meet her lover.

III. THE DISILLUSIONMENT.

"LOOK here, Eleanor," said John when Peggy had gone, "Dad'll have to know about this."

"I suppose he will," was the reply, "but I don't see why he should."

"I say, that's cool."

"Cool if you like, but it's true."

"It isn't true. Don't you see, Peg's an ass. She's lost her head about this fellow Barnes, and it should be put a stop to."

"Why? Do you know anything wrong about him?"

"He isn't our sort, for one thing, and for another, Peg's too young. She's only a kid, and it's not the thing for her to go out alone to meet him. I'm sure Dad won't have him coming to the house. He's common, he has no breeding—in short, he's a bounder. As for a kid like Peg going out like that, it's a bit too thick."

"Oh, Peg knows how to take care of herself. She's a bit too developed on the physical side, but she's level headed and knows her way around. She's years older than most girls her age. You'll see, she'll be back in ten minutes."

"If she isn't I'll go out and kick the fellow off the premises."

"Johnny, dear, you make me tired. You talk as though we lived a hundred years ago, when girls didn't know how to look after themselves, and when it was thought the duty of brothers to interfere with their sister's lives. Peg's an ass if you like, but she's all right. Besides, a girl has the right to live her own life."

"I tell you, Dad won't have it. He's not that sort. I saw that the moment I looked at him. Both of you have twisted Mother around your fingers, but there'll be a change now. Dad may be quiet, but he'll be obeyed."

"He'll find that Hampstead is not a barracks, and that this is a free country," replied Eleanor.

"I say, Eleanor, don't you like him? Don't you think he's just splendid?"

"Oh, yes, I like him all right. I should think he's a bit antiquated, and will need to learn a few things, but I fancy I shall be proud of him. I do hope he'll be reasonable, though."

Meanwhile Peggy had rushed into the garden and looked eagerly around.

"Jim," she whispered, "is that you?"

"Yes, Peg. I've come in spite of orders," he said, as he took the girl in his arms and kissed her ardently.

"But you must clear out in double-quick time, dear. I shouldn't have come out only I was afraid somebody might hear you."

"He's come then?"

"Of course he's come."

"What's he like?"

"Oh, a great swell, I suppose. Just the aristocratic 'pukka' officer. But he's not a bit like mother."

"What do you mean by that?"

"Oh, I can do what I like with her. I can frighten her into almost anything. But he's not like her. He doesn't say much, but there's a look in his eye that makes one hesitate. Once or twice to-night he almost made me afraid."

"I say, Peg."

"He did. Of course I would not own it to the 'pattern boy,' or even to Eleanor. But I fancy there'll be trouble."

"Never mind, Peg darling, you'll have me to stand by you."

Peg was silent.

"What's the matter, kid?"

"I've nothing to tell; but I don't think you'd better come for a day or two till I see how things are going. You see he's only just come home, and I don't quite know how things are going."

"But tell me what he's like."

"Oh, he's just the aristocratic officer of the old sort. He hasn't said much yet, but I can see he has silly, old-fashioned ideas, especially about girls. He believes in being very polite and courteous to them in the old-fashioned way, but I believe he'd go into fits if he thought I was out here with you now. He's that just sort. He made me think of Rip Van Winkle to-night. All the same, I can see that there'll be trouble before we're through."

"Well, be careful, Peg. Give me another kiss, kid, and play your game carefully."

DURING the next few days Colonel Trelawney was occupied with affairs at the War Office and elsewhere. He had many people to see, and reports to make to people in high places. As a consequence he was away from home all the day, and did not return home till dinner time.

It was nearly eight o'clock when he reached home, and feeling rather depressed. Somehow his home-coming had not brought him the happiness he had hoped. It is true his wife was just the same loving little soul he had always known her to be, but he could not understand his children. Especially was this true of the girls. In spite of all he could say or do a barrier existed between them, and while he had, as yet, said nothing to them about it, he was anything but pleased at their evident manner of thinking or of their modes of speech. Moreover, they had not seemed at ease in his presence. Immediately after dinner they had gone away by themselves, as though they wanted to be alone.

"I might be an ogre," he said to himself. "They seem to be utterly uneasy and unnatural when they are with me, as though they were afraid I should find out something about them. Of course, John's a fine boy, and I can see our becoming great friends, but even he doesn't speak as freely to me as I would like to have him. However, after Graythorpe has gone to-night we'll have a clear understanding about everything."

When he entered the dining room, however, he found only his wife there.

"Where are the children, Alice?" he asked.

"John had to go to the Davenports. Mr. Davenport wanted to see him about something at the works. He said he would be back about ten."

"And the girls, where are they?"

"They are gone out," his wife replied.

"Evidently; but where?"

Mrs. Trelawney looked uncomfortable. "I don't know," was her hesitating reply.

"Don't know? That's rather strange, isn't it? What time will they be home?"

"Lester, I really don't know."

"Little wife, this is serious."

"Oh, Lester, I've tried to do my best, but what could I do? Take Eleanor, for example. She was always a reserved, independent kind of girl and resented any sort of correction, and during the war everything came to a head. She got work in a government office where she had very good pay. Everybody did it, and of course I couldn't refuse. It—it was patriotic. She is very clever, too, and learned stenography and typewriting and all that sort of thing. Well, she got friendly with all sorts of people. She brought home some of them, nearly all girls of a class of whom I knew nothing. Fast, liquor-drinking women they were, who held all sorts of strange notions. They swore and discussed things which to me were—were shocking. But Eleanor only laughed when I protested, and told me that if she couldn't bring them home she should join one of their clubs in town. So—so you see how I was placed, don't you? As for Peggy, she went to a munition factory, and—and, oh, my dear—I don't know, but she seems to like the company of people that I would never think of associating with."

The Colonel listened quietly, but made no remarks for several seconds. Perhaps he was not so much surprised as his wife thought he would be.

"You say Eleanor discussed things which you thought shocking," he said at length; "what things?"

"Oh, free love, and that sort of thing. One of them actually declared to me that while she hated the thought of marriage as an utterly unnatural and degrading thing, she claimed the right to have children in order to be true to the maternal instinct that nature had implanted in every woman."

"And of course Eleanor listened to this stuff. Did she seem to agree?"

"I don't know. I suppose she did, for when I told her I would not have that kind of woman in the house she told me about some sort of club of which they were members, and which she proposed to join."

Again the Colonel reflected a few seconds before speaking.

"And Peggy," he said at length, "surely that child did not listen to this stuff?"

"Oh, yes, she did. And in a way she is the more difficult of the two to deal with. She's passionate and wilful, and—and I don't like talking about it, but she never seems happy unless she's with men. And she's picked up with some fellow named Barnes whom I utterly disapprove of."

Still the Colonel kept control of himself.

"What kind of fellow is he?" he asked at length.

"Oh, he's rather good-looking, after a fashion. Tall and big, and that kind of thing, but utterly common. He was in the army and had a commission, but from what I can learn he is now a clerk or something of that sort."

"And is she supposed to be engaged to him?"

"Yes—no—I don't know. You see, at first I protested against Peggy having anything to say to him; then when she threatened all sorts of wild things I thought it best to wait until you came home. Oh, if you had only been able to come home six months ago, as you thought you would, it, might have been stopped. And yet I don't know, everything and everybody is upset. John did his best, and as I told you, he's been such a comfort to me, but of course he's not like you. Still I don't know what I should have done without him. He doesn't say much, but I know he's had a restraining influence, especially upon Peggy."

"Let me understand," said the Colonel after a few minutes' silence. "From what I can gather, they have refused to allow you to control them at all, and they've pretty much gone their own way. Eleanor has got mixed up with a lot of free-thinking women, from whom she has imbibed all sorts of ideas, and has insisted on entire freedom from you."

"Yes, I'm afraid she has."

"As for Peggy, it seems that she's a little bit common."

"I don't like to think so, and yet I'm afraid she is. You see the war has upset everything. All the old-fashioned ideas I was brought up to believe in have been given the go-by."

At that moment the Colonel's visitor arrived, and so the conversation ceased. But Trelawney was sorely disturbed. He paid but little attention to what was said, and heaved a sigh of relief when he had gone. After that he found his way into a little room which had always gone by the name of "The Den," and tried to think out what his wife had said to him.

He sat for a long time thinking, occasionally looking at his watch. He had carefully drawn the curtains, and as the one light was shaded the room, from the outside, appeared to be in darkness.

Twelve o'clock struck, then one, then two, and still the girls did not come. More than once the Colonel appeared impatient, and almost angry, and then a look of affectionate yearning came into his eyes.

"Yes," he murmured more than once, "I must get to the bottom of this. It's bad, bad, very bad."

When the hands of the clock were nearing three he heard footsteps outside, followed by the sound of voices. Also there was laughter.

"Mayn't we come in?" This was in a man's voice.

"No, not for worlds."

Still more whispering, and then more laughter.

Presently the Colonel heard the sound of a latch-key inserted in the door, followed by more whispering voices.

"Evidently our long-lost father is in bed," he heard Peggy say.

"It would seem so. The mater has evidently told him nothing."

"But he must know we've been out all night, and I'm looking forward to a — of a row."

"It may be that he's decided to be sensible, and not take any notice of it."

He heard this as they passed the door of the room. Evidently it was not their purpose to go straight to bed, for they went through the hall as if with the intention of finding their way into "The Treadmill." For a few seconds he stood still as if thinking what was the best thing to do.

After waiting a few seconds he found his way to "The Treadmill" and quietly entered.

either speaking through individual denominations or, especially, through the Federal Council of the Churches.

It has been necessary for the Commission on Relations with Religious Bodies in Europe to proceed very carefully. In November, 1921, it called a conference in the City of New York which studied carefully what could be done, and it was decided to suggest to the various branches of European Protestantism that a conference be held at which to discuss the present needs and how to meet them. There was a hearty response to this proposal of our commission and the Bethesda Conference was held in Copenhagen on August 11th and 12th, attended by seventy-two delegates from twenty countries. Our commission stated in the beginning of the conference the desire of American Protestantism to co-operate in every possible way with European Protestants in the carrying out of the great work committed to their hands. We disclaimed any intention to determine for them what methods they should follow in carrying on their work. But we earnestly desired to learn more of present conditions among them, their difficulties, their needs, their discouragements and their hopes, so that we might be better able to inform American Protestantism what service it can render.

The discussions which followed proved that our commission had rendered great service in helping to bring about such a conference. In the face of the well-nigh appalling need of all the European churches there was developed a spirit of mutual sympathy for the difficulties and distress which were found to be common to all. And so great was this realization of common need that there was not simply a great longing for some form of co-operation, but a determination to overcome all obstacles to secure that result. So the agreement was made which called upon the Swiss Federation of Churches to set up a Federation of European Protestant Churches through which a relief work in their behalf could be carried on. To do this work efficiently will call for a budget of about six thousand dollars for the coming year, and a recent conference, called by the commission, decided that American Protestantism should give practical evidence of its greater desire for closer co-operation among European Protestantism by contributing two-thirds of the budget for the coming year.

The immediate purpose of the organization thus established is to secure full and accurate information concerning the condition of the Protestant churches of Europe, especially in central and southeastern Europe. What have been the effects of the war upon regular church life—church attendance, church membership, church revenues for all purposes, pastoral support, church buildings, orphanages, homes for aged, hospitals, schools, colleges, theological seminaries, home and foreign missions? In some countries the relation between Church and State has been so changed that it is necessary to establish a new basis of church membership and a new system of support for all forms of church work, and this at a time of great upheaval in political, commercial and social life. Old foundations have been overthrown, old systems cast aside, and doubt, uncertainty and fear of the future paralyze the stoutest hearts.

Out of all this chaos good can come. The Church, thrown upon its own resources, will doubtless finally develop a system of self-support entirely free from state dictation or control, and be far stronger than before, because it will be the recognized activity of the loyal personal followers of Christ. But the period of transition is critical, and the wisest, most devoted leadership may fail in the face of the tremendous obstacles which confront all constructive efforts in Europe to-day. It may be true that the conditions to-day are the natural results of the evil courses of yesterday. The important question to-day is, "How can American Protestantism help European Protestantism to stand upon its feet and to fulfil its mission?"

Whatever may be the arguments of politicians, the Holy Church Universal of the living God, with its communion of saints, cannot stand for one moment for a policy of isolation. Such a policy is a denial of the great missionary call of her Lord, and destructive of the purpose of her existence. The call to the American churches to evangelize Asia and Africa is no more urgent to-day than is the call to go to the help of our fellow Christians in Europe in this hour, not only of their extremity, but also of their opportunity.

In addition to material gifts, American Protestantism must give to European Protestantism a genuine brotherly sympathy in the carrying on of its Christian work. This work must be done by Europeans. Every nation must develop its own leaders and corps of workers. But American Protestantism, because of its favored position, can encourage and inspire. Romanism, with its strong centralized system, can concentrate its effort at special points and special times, and it is concentrating to-day in its effort to solidify its position and to increase its influence and power in countries where Protestantism has been crippled by the war. The Protestantism of those countries must hear the voice and feel the handclasp of American Protestantism, sympathizing with its difficulties and cheering it in its work.

The General Conference of the Unitarian and other Christian churches will meet in New Haven September 10-16. The Unitarian Laymen's League will hold its meeting at the same time and place. The Unitarians expect a large attendance. Their Laymen's League now has 281 chapters in the United States and Canada with nearly 14,000 members.

Around Singapore

[FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE]

WE had a beautiful voyage of six days across the oft-times cantankerous China Sea. Strangely enough, day by day, as we approached the Equator, the heat became less intense. The sweet sea air of the tropics swept through our little cabin. There were nine cabin passengers on the ship, three of them being women, and two of these had been born within thirty miles of each other on the other side of the world, near Philadelphia, whilst the parents of the third lived fifty miles distant from that city. We had never met before—here was a coincidence. The approach to Singapore is very beautiful, and the harbor is alive with ships of all descriptions, from every country. We reached the wharf on a little launch, sitting in the sunshine, which registered 148 degrees temperature, whilst the hot air from the small engine room helped to further disconcert us as it blew across the heaps of luggage on which we were compelled to sit.

Singapore is a polyglot city. Here the East and the West come into closer contact than any other place on earth. At every turn are crowds of Mohammedans with their fezes, Arabs, various brands of Indians, Chinese, Japanese, Malays and Europeans of many languages. A few Americans reside in Singapore. Here at the southeast corner of Asia many of the great commercial transactions between the Orient and the Occident are consummated. The Esplanade, close to the water-front, exhibits every phase of life, from the great hotels where money is lavishly expended by the rich to the crowded, dirty quarters where Malays and Chinese crowd each other with their curious customs and wares. For miles under the trees or in the shadows of the houses squat the natives. They cluster about the booths or out-door restaurants crying their wares and eating their strange dishes and foods. The business portion of Singapore consists of narrow, twisted streets with arcades to protect the European business people from the equatorial sun, for our genial old friend, the Equator, is only seventy miles away. Through these crowded thoroughfares pour half-naked coolies, pulling endless lines of rickshaws, and at times hastily evading the motor cars that work their way from one corner to another. The rickshaws are broad enough to accommodate two persons. The native portions of the city reek with dirt, garlic and people. Shining brown backs and bare corded limbs are greeted at every turn. The river life is the most picturesque part of this great city of the East. Innumerable boats, covered with bamboo mats to ward off the fierce sun rays, propelled by men with heavy poles or oars twenty feet long, are guided through a maze of craft up and down the narrow stream.

Here, as in so many ports in the Orient, we witnessed the sometimes disreputable conduct of some of the white people. Many of the young men drink a great deal—not a few of the women smoke and drink. To an onlooker it would appear as if the more money some of these people have, and the better their social position, the faster are their lives. At Singapore we stayed at the Raffles Hotel, the leading hostelry of the city. The first night we were there was the occasion of a week-end dance, and during the hour preceding dinner small groups, English principally, sat at the little tables in the great verandah taking glass after glass of wine, both men and women smoking cigarettes. By the time they went in to dinner, about nine o'clock, not a few of them were already foolish from intoxicants. The dance concluded toward three o'clock of the Sabbath morning, and during its progress four fights occurred. Church workers throughout the Orient have frequently informed me, as I have observed for myself, that the people of European stock, Americans included—mostly young men—seldom attend worship. What can the yellow races, who bitterly resent the sting of white commercial and military dominance, think of the representatives from our "Christian" lands when they behave in this manner?

I have met with some young Americans engaged in business in the Far East who keep clean; for instance, every man connected with the Standard Oil Company we have met with does not drink alcoholic beverages. Their lively wives, so far as I have seen, do not smoke. The Y. M. C. A. workers from England and America are, of course, a credit to the countries from which they come.

On the sea-front of Singapore is the playground for Europeans and Eurasians, but social contact between these two classes does not exist. The grounds are divided for the use of each. Thus it may appear very apparent that a European papa may play tennis on his exclusive side of the field, whilst his half-caste son, because he has had a native mother, must play on the other side.

In Singapore I had extremely illuminating conversations with some persons regarding the effects of the Great War. In conversation with a Dutch gentleman he narrated sad details associated with the collapse in business subsequent to the war, the ruin of many men and companies. He exclaimed: "It has not only been around here, but everywhere. You go out to Celebes or New Guinea, and there you see the poor natives, millions of them, who are starving. There is no demand for what they produce. They probably have never known that there was a war, yet they suffer because of it." On a subsequent occasion I was talking with another Dutch gentleman, who told some harrowing stories. He emphasized the fact that even the neutral countries, such as Holland, were racked by the passions that developed after the governments declared war in 1914, and that much family life was broken up because of different members' viewpoint of the strife. He spoke of instance, after instance when brothers and cousins joined the colors of different combatants and fought each other. He told me he had been in the Caribbean Sea in 1914, and in one of the great ports thereof at the outbreak of war there were English, German and French ships-of-war at anchor, adding, "Their commanders gave fine dinners to one another ever day, when suddenly the war came, and all immediately put to sea, and in two days they were fighting one another. It was horrible!" This big, red-blooded Dutchman deprecated the actions of governments in forcing their nationals into human slaughter, but as a sea captain remarked to me on this trip, "What can we do? How can we help ourselves?"

The missionary work of the English and Americans is extensive in Singapore. It was a pleasure to meet with the students of a number of the large schools in that city. We were indebted to the Anglican Bishop of Singapore and Bishop Bickley of the Methodist Church of America for the most sincere hospitality. On these occasions there were opportunities to discuss questions of ecclesiastical and international importance, and I learned much from these and other brethren in Christ. Kind friends also treated us to drives in the suburbs of Singapore, where the handsome homes and grounds of the foreigners and wealthy Chinese merchants are altogether delightful. After eight days full of Christian fellowship and interest we sailed for incomparable Java.

Joseph, the Preserver of His People

GENESIS 45:3-15.

"Honor thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long in the land which Jehovah thy God giveth thee."—Exodus 20:12.

WE do not have to search long before we discover the basal element of the career of this ancient pilgrim leader and we find—

1. A youth with a moral vision. There were premonitions of a prophetic quality in the lad's temperament as he told in his simplicity of his boyish dreams to his brethren and to his father. There must have been an attraction in the child's character beyond the fact that he was the son of Jacob's later years. The fond parent may have been disappointed in his older sons, as he might well have been, for their defection from the standards of morality, even of that primitive age. Jacob may also have had his yearnings as to the honor and blessing of this his younger offspring. It was not all favoritism that gave a coat of many colors to the lad. We might say of a little fellow like Joseph now that he was a good boy with a strain of the poet in him. Certainly this mark of dreamer was an indelible trait, fixed on the minds of those about him also. Whatever may have been the desire for curbing the exuberance of the family visionary, there was no occasion for the cruel hazing to which the rest of his brethren submitted him by putting him into the old well and actually selling him to strangers.

Joseph laid a foundation for his future position of influence by his insight into and helpfulness in fulfilling the dreams of other people. He was a slave, an emigrant, and a prisoner. All these features in some sense were handicaps for a high place in a strange land. Notwithstanding these limitations the lad found a tunnel through the complications of his new environment just as boys who have come to America from all nations with right purpose and worthy vision have made themselves sharers and molders of the best American life.

2. Capacity for constructive statesmanship. As indicating definite fitness for a great task, we turn to the record of Joseph in his early position. "And the keeper of the prison committed to Joseph's hands all the prisoners that were in the prison; and whatsoever they did there, he was the doer of it. The keeper of the prison looked not to anything that was under his hand, because Jehovah was with him, and that which he did, Jehovah made it to prosper" (Gen. 39:22, 23). This would undoubtedly indicate administrative ability, as witnessed by Joseph's management of a plantation and prison. The youth, however, did not, while he felt the injustice of his captivity, allow this to check his manifold activities or sour his spirit. "For indeed I was stolen away out of the land of the Hebrews: and here also have I done nothing that they should put me into the dungeon." Evidently, in the young man's career there was a consciousness of the help of an unseen Hand. When asked the meaning of the dreams of his fellow prisoners, he said: "Do not interpretations belong to God?" Still again, this feature of the vision forces itself to the foreground in Joseph's rise to power. This time it was Pharaoh also who dreamed. A mighty issue was impending. It was nothing more nor less than the safety of his vast empire. The peril was so fierce and the crisis so threatening that even the ungrateful chief butler was aroused to his faults, after a period of cruel neglect, to suggest his benefactor's ability to interpret dreams. Into the presence, therefore, of the proud monarch Joseph was suddenly summoned from his dungeon and made acquainted with the forecast of the reign of terror. The youth, still recognizing the source of his power as from above, spake, "It is not in me: God will give Pharaoh an answer of peace." He then portrayed the outline of the portentous calamity which hung over the nation. It was to this exile and ex-prisoner who showed a capacity for moral insight, whose record for business affairs could be verified by the court officers, the keepers of the royal prisoners, that Pharaoh decided to commit the carrying out of measures to anticipate and arrest the dread famine.

3. The youthful pioneer and preserver of his people. It was after all this imperial position which Joseph had acquired and conducted which contributed much to make him such a blessing to his own people. His world ministry procured national salvation for the Hebrews as well as the Egyptians. The personal qualities and favor of God placed him on a pedestal of vast influence. Now he was enabled under the continued divine direction to do a special service for his own countrymen. There is often an inner tube in the plans of Providence. We do his will and his work and find that we have made a way for ourselves and our own family interests. By his integrity and ability Joseph had found a footpath to power and then made a bridge from the land of Canaan to Egypt and established a new home for the roots of his race. He kept his father's family alive by his conduct of the food and famine campaign. The prime minister of Pharaoh never forgot for a moment his providential leading. As he became more and more influential he took account of it at every turn and crossroad in his life. Joseph's dealing with his kinsmen was like that of a noble elder brother. He had no personal resentment, but he sifted out the sin as part of the preparation of his brethren to enjoy the blessings of the foreign land, its protection and training as well as its food and franchises. He let them see their faults that they might realize the judgment of God against iniquity and falsehood, and his treatment brought to the surface the confession of these faults. Their memory would quickly recall their past deeds of dishonor. Joseph helped purify the family fountains of his people before they took possession of their new home. He was the moral preserver as well as the food purveyor. How beneficent such service would be now from the leaders among our emigrants who should recognize racial failures and show their fellow countrymen how to equip themselves for the nobler life of American citizens instead of appealing to their prejudices and helping to keep alive their divisive customs and national failings and clannish groupings.

ONE BOOK A WEEK

Under this caption, each week, we shall direct attention to some striking book, such as no Minister or those interested in religious thought and action can afford to remain unacquainted with

Human Life as the Biologist Sees It*

DR. KELLOGG, Secretary of the National Research Council and formerly Hoover's right-hand man in Belgian Relief, is one of the most helpful writers on scientific subjects that I know. His many years of work as a biologist in Stanford University have made him an authority in his field. His clear method of presentation and his broad human sympathy make his works a delight to read. I consider him a figure to be compared with J. Arthur Thompson, of Aberdeen, in the field of the essential unity between science and the fundamentals of religion.

In the introductory paragraphs to this most stimulating book he says: "I started studying human life as a biologist by studying first plants, then birds, and, finally, and for a long time insects. This might be called my undergraduate course in human life. I began my graduate course first with a baby—my own—for special subject, and then as she grew older I turned to something easier, just men and women with whom I had less personal relations and knew only as representatives of the animal species, man. I found that I could not advisedly let my serious biological studies be interfered with by such incidental but, some way, very confusing, things as sympathy and love and pride and hope."

Never does Dr. Kellogg lose his balanced perspective on life nor his sense of humor. "The biologist pays much attention to origins; often too much."

He speaks of the uncanny sense of familiarity that we have in watching a chimpanzee: "He seems to be a caricature of some people we know; he behaves curiously like some children, other people's children, that we recall."

"The scientist can be a bigot just as well as the theologian, politician, or anybody else."

Especially fine at the present time is the chapter on "The Biologist and War." Every minister ought to read this chapter. Let me simply give two brief quotations: "Altruism . . . is just as truly a fundamental biological factor of evolution as is the cruel, strictly self-regarding, exterminating kind of struggle for existence." "The protagonists of inevitable war declare that human nature does not change. The biologist declares that human nature does change both by virtue of the influences of strictly biological factors and especially more rapidly by virtue of the influences of social inheritance. Human nature to-day, which is certainly not the same as human nature in early glacial time, is quite as much the resultant of the work of social inheritance factors as it is of factors of biological inheritance. Human nature, not just the part that is inherited, but the whole of it, including the part that is acquired by each generation, not only changes, but can be made to change in definite direction by education, and it can be made to change with reasonable rapidity, a rapidity that seems very rapid indeed to the biologist accustomed to see change mostly depend on slowly modified heredity."

On the question of immortality and the soul Dr. Kellogg as a biologist is of course agnostic rather than mystic. On the issue of immortality he finds no scientific proof and rather tartly speaks of the prying work of psychical research: "I should, indeed, truly be appalled by death, the biologist says, and it would have a terror for me greater than it has even as a possible complete extinguisher of my personality, if it meant that it was the beginning for me of a perpetual personal spirit existence in which my thoughts and conversations were to be of the kind exemplified by those recorded in the psychical research and spiritist books." Unless I mistake the tenor of the following paragraph, he finds the real challenge to faith in another realm than that of pure science: "But he knows, if he is a wise and honest biologist, what I have so often repeated, namely, that he doesn't know it all. When the future or destiny of the human individual are the subject of inquiry the biologist has little more to say than I have already indicated. He remembers his laboratory and tells what he has observed in it. Then he remembers his wife and child and himself, and his heart, not the heart of his laboratory experiments, fills with such thrilling emotions and his brain conjures up such pictures of possibilities for himself and his family and for all human kind that he wonders if he is really the same being that observes things in a laboratory or museum. His laboratory tells him what a precarious and fragile thing life is, how material and condition-ruled and circumscribed a living creature is. But his wife and child and his own consciousness tell him how much more, how immeasurably more, there is in life than he learns in his laboratory. It is this extra-laboratory observation and realization of the possibilities and actualities of human life that make it, even to the biologist, the vivid, many-colored, suggestive, thrilling thing it is, the thing so full of occasionally realized great moments and of glimpses of infinitely great possibilities and sometimes it seems all mystery, all something more than of this world, and hence all something quite hopeless to study by the methods of his science, or even quite hopeless profitably even to wonder about. Why not take it and make the most of it?"

In the final section, "The Biologist and the Future," Dr. Kellogg points out "that future man can be consciously determined by man to-day, that human evolution has been turned over to humankind itself to direct. . . . This, of course, is what the preacher and the poet have always said about man, though on a basis of other conceptions as to how man has been given this power." "Now, if only," he pleads, "the every-day observer, poet and preacher would see human life in regard to those aspects on which the biologist is able to throw some special light, more as the biologist sees it, everything would be all right."

This is a sane and profitable book, well adapted to helping all who seek light on the fascinating problems of human life on the basis of observation rather than bald theory.

A SERIOUS SITUATION

EDITOR CHRISTIAN WORK:

It can be conclusively demonstrated that the fight against the railway shopmen has cost the railroads $600,000,000. This sum, of course, will be met directly or indirectly by the public. What it has cost the shopmen, their organizations, their wives and children, cannot be estimated. Something of what it is costing them now can be told and should be known. There are approximately two hundred thousand still out of the positions held by them with the railroads which have not settled with the men. The record of their sacrifices for what they believe to be a principle is a very remarkable story. It can only be fully appreciated by those who have come into close first-hand contact with it. I shall never forget an interview with one of the older men in Birmingham, Alabama. Standing just outside the doorway of the room where the little children and their parents were gathered around the Christmas tree, I opened up conversation with a workman. I asked if he was one of the shopmen, and in his slow, Southern drawl this was the substance of his reply: "I've been workin' for the L. & N. twenty years. I was just beginnin' to feel comfortable about the future and was buying a home just outside the gates of the L. & N. shops. They are trying in every way to force me to come back. I don't know how I'm goin' to meet the nex' payment on my little house, but I know I ain't goin' to give up my principles and I ain't gon' na go back on the other fellows." I remember so clearly the fine face of Fred Ross, the young chairman of the striking shopmen in Portland, Oregon. Before the strike he was on the way to promotion. I met him several times in the Labor Temple during the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church. The use of the Temple had been freely extended to the General Convention, and a number of church organizations met there daily. In order to reach these meetings one had to pass by the windows of the commissary where food and clothing were furnished to the families of the shopmen. It was a meager little commissary, barely able to tide over the minimum needs of those who were suffering, and still are. A few days after I left, I read that Fred Ross had been arrested on one of the many charges of violence for which hundreds of the shopmen have been imprisoned. This is one of the heaviest burdens and most difficult problems which the men and their organizations have to face, namely, false arrests, imprisonment, and the fabulously exorbitant bails that have been required.

Following the alleged confession of a man who has since been proven to be a company spy, one shopman was arrested and his bail fixed at $45,000; this despite the fact that no one was injured by the alleged act and the property damage was very small. In one place in Illinois, forty-five cases of alleged violence of the injunction against the shopmen have been filed. The cost of bail, court trial and maintenance of families of the men on trial has been very, very heavy.

The physical suffering of the women and children is very great. In one place I found that there was no coal—and but little food—in homes where six hundred people were living.

Here is a brief extract from a personal letter of one of the officials: "Take, for instance, in this city we have 1,750 men still on strike. No funds other than the small amount contributed by the local unions in this city have been received from any sources for more than twelve weeks. We operated a commissary until about two weeks ago, by which we were able to stretch what little money was available for relief purposes as far as possible. Despite the fact that only about $125 per week was needed to keep this in operation, we were obliged to suspend it until further funds are available. In the meantime the strikers themselves, out of their meager earnings, are doing their best to take care of their fellow-men less fortunate, until a just and equitable settlement of the strike is effected. This, I believe, is the situation in nearly all the railroad centers on roads where no settlements have been reached."

The case of the railway shopmen is, in several ways, a unique and pivotal one in the realm of industrial disputes. This is strikingly emphasized by one outstanding fact, that the railroads which have refused so far to settle with their men have been openly condemned by eminent railway executives of other railroads, as well as by the action of these latter roads in reaching a settlement. If, therefore, the men who are contending against the railroads on which no settlement has been reached lose now, it will be not only the loss of their cause, for which they have made such terrific sacrifices, but it will mean the triumph of the policy of the less liberal, humane and just railway executives.

The issue will probably be settled one way or the other within the next two months. Those who have close contact with the situation know that the railway executives believe the shopmen cannot last but a few weeks longer. On the other hand, the leaders of the shopmen are confident that if they can last these few weeks the railroads will be compelled to reach a settlement, because of the inefficiency and the inadequacy of the work being done by the strikebreakers in the shops. It cannot be denied that the shopmen have come practically to the end of their resources, and that unless there is substantial assistance almost immediately they cannot meet the situation.

It is because of my knowledge of the facts and because the appeal has come to me directly that I am taking the liberty of making this very imperfect statement through the columns of your paper. One of the leaders in this struggle says, in a recent personal letter: "No doubt but that you are in contact with many people who have a vision of social and industrial peace and democracy and who have enough faith in the efforts of the workers to be willing to assist them in this struggle."

Those who wish to contribute may send their checks either through me or to Mr. Clinton S. Communications or checks sent to me should be addressed: 1130 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

MR. PRESIDENT, ENFORCE THE LAW

The new "announcement" (sent out more in form of propaganda than news) that President Harding "after his vacation will meet the governors of all the states in conference at the national capitol to discuss the enforcement of the prohibition laws" is accompanied by twelve news column inches including a six-inch characteristic "wet" editorial from "Palm Beach Daily Post," all intended to impress the national public that enforcement is a deep problem and that the President's message to the governors will be that "the Federal Government is virtually powerless without the hearty co-operation of the states."

State co-operation is needed; but the burning question of the hour is—will the President as head of the Government take a stand in support of the constitution and furnish something for the states to rally in co-operation of? The Government never found itself powerless to enforce tobacco revenue laws without state aid. Hold the conference, Mr. President, but do not whine to the governors about the helplessness of the United States. Inspire them by saying that you will defend the constitution and the flag. Our Governor Pinchot can tell you in a ten minutes interview that the way to enforce is to enforce—The Index, Williamsport, Pennsylvania.

Dr. William Hiram Foulkes, general secretary of the Presbyterian New Era Movement, issued an appeal to the chief radio broadcasting stations of the United States for the transmission of special Holy Week programs. He asked that during the week preceding Easter there be broadcast by religious leaders appropriate passages of Scripture, preferably at the noon hour, so that throughout the nation all might pause for a moment of reverent spiritual thought. He also asked that on Good Friday, between noon and three o'clock, there be broadcast the reading of Scriptural passages, together with religious music and prayer. Dr. Foulkes urged that such special service be not in any sense sectarian, but that it represent the best Christian traditions of the United States. He offered the services of the staff of the Presbyterian New Era Movement to co-operate in this work, which he feels would be helpful to and appreciated by hosts who use the radio.

"THE GAP IN THE WALL"

By Rev. H. F. Huse,

Pastor of the United Baptist Church, Dover-Foxcroft, Maine

Within a period of twenty-three years I have had three pastorates. I have not therefore been one to shift about a great deal. I know how I have felt, however, when I have sought a change. I know the emotions that have stirred my own soul and that are shared, I believe, by my fellow-pastors in the same experience. We haven't too much enterprise in seeking a church. We find it hard to thrust ourselves upon the charity and kindness of friends for the assistance we need. Moreover, with the expenses of life we hesitate to step out of one pastorate until the way is opened to step into another; also because no workman in the vineyard wishes to be idle. What is needed and what we would like to see created is some business-like arrangement whereby a man without making a nuisance of himself or imposing upon his friends can feel that there is a proper agency, as a part of the denominational organization, to which he can appeal, state his case with the assurance that it will have kindly, definite and intelligent consideration.

The need is for well organized and effective ministerial and church bureaus. If in this connection the seminaries of the various denominations could but see their opportunity and act in the premises much might be accomplished in the way of a happier adjustment of these all-important and difficult matters of pastoral settlement and change, and at the same time enable the seminaries to function in a much larger way as servants of the churches and agencies of the kingdom.

Such a bureau would acquire all the available and needed data in connection with both churches and pastors. At the head of the bureau and under the faculty organization let there be a "pastor at large" whose sole business it may be to shepherd, as it were, the pastorless church and the churchless pastor, assisting the church to find the man best adapted to it, and the pastor the best church adapted to him. The business of such a "pastor at large" would be to get in touch with the pastorless church, to visit it, advise it of available men, and in the interim assist the church possibly in a more effective organization along lines of finance, evangelism, religious education and general church work.

Churches, knowing the seminaries had such a bureau, organized, efficient, in touch with pastors, would seek its assistance in the selection and settlement of a pastor. Likewise the pastors would look to the seminaries for the assistance they so much need in a trying hour. By means of the bureau information would at once be available to both churches and pastors. After a church had found out about a desirable man, or the pastor had found out about a desirable church through the bureau, a conference of the two parties might easily be arranged. How much would be gained, and how much better a man would feel in going to a church to spend a Sunday after having had a heart-to-heart talk with the committee representing the church! By this friendly preliminary touch how the strain of that first Sunday would be avoided!

The establishment of such a bureau would serve many very useful ends. In the course of time it would have valuable data in connection with churches and pastors. It would bring church after church into a relationship to the seminaries that now few churches have. The churches feel their relationship to the denominational organization as a whole, but how few churches feel any relationship to the seminaries! Moreover the "pastor at large" as head of the bureau could and would become a recruiting officer among the churches of young men for the ministry. A "pastor at large" of the Barnabas type, broad-minded, sympathetic, a true son of consolation, a man of some years and experience in the ministry, would make himself the friend in need to both the churchless pastor and the pastorless church.

I am aware of the fact that all the seminaries stand ready to help the churches and pastors in this business just as far as they can. But the work is done not as a definitely organized bureau and department of the seminary, which is a very different proposition from a service voluntarily given by those who can appropriate only such time as they can spare from other duties.

As to the finances of such a bureau by income from supplies of "the pastor at large," by definite fees from the churches served if not from the pastors placed, this department of the seminary might become if not wholly self-supporting at any rate no excessive burden to the treasury. Cost what it may, it is a service that pastors need and that the churches need, and whatever the cost it cannot fail to be a good investment, as it results in a speedier and happier adjustment of the pastoral settlement and change. It is a function that the seminary can well assume. The seminary owes it to the men it has trained, and to all the men who with whatever their training may be are seeking to preach the Gospel and extend our Redeemer's Kingdom.

ON ALLOWING THE OTHER MAN TO THINK FOR HIMSELF

EDITOR CHRISTIAN WORK:

Your correspondent from North Carolina, in the issue of March 10, appears to take Apostle Paul in hand on the matter of evangelism. I presume he is well qualified to do this.

In his letter to the Ephesians, the writer of it remarks: "He" (the Lord) "gave some apostles; and some prophets; and some evangelists; and some pastors and teachers," etc. Again, he urges Timothy to "do the work of an evangelist."

Why is it that "evangelists" are selected out from the list and made the object of criticism. The writer referred to would combine the offices named by St. Paul—those of pastor and evangelist, into one.

Why not make some other combinations, say, pastor and teacher. Besides the pastor, some of our churches employ a teacher, or teaching minister.

Why should not the pastor do it all? He has only two sermons a week to prepare; to make himself ready for a week-night service and other addresses, as demand may require. Then let him take up classes in Bible study, social service and capital-labor problems. After all this, or some way connected with it, let him go into such kind of evangelistic work as our friend from North Carolina may lay out for him. All this is but another ladle in the mush, a new cook to take a hand in the pie. Chance to get into the discussion would appear to be irresistible.

At Yale, some years ago, Timothy Dwight sat in the chair of New Testament exegesis. At that time the critics were starting in on "Future Probation," and "Baptism" had not been entirely passed by.

After laying out the ground pro and con, in the thorough manner usual with him and without any expression of personal opinion, I recall that one of the class called for the doctor's opinion on these problems of interpretation. The very deliberate answer came, "Well, I don't know that it makes much difference what I think, or do not think. You young men are of age, with a college training, and you should be able to take your choice."

There is one school of thought that thinks the older fellows who are "behind the times" are too insistent of their doctrinal views, and another school of thought that doesn't like the modern notions of the aforesaid school. So be it. Then, why should not each cherish his own notions and proceed to work them, and let the other go his own way.

But this course is not so interesting. It is proven more satisfactory when one is able to, or attempts to, convert the other from the error of his out-of-date fancies over to the more modern points of vision. Why is not "heresy" the proper thing? That's what they are telling us.

Come on, then, and let us all be heretics, and get in on this business of pulling the old Book in pieces and becoming "modern critics." But where would all the "modern critics" be, and what would be left for them to do, if we all were in the game? You see, no one is interested when the team jogs along at an even pace through town, but the runaway it is that gets the public eye all wide open.

How uninteresting seems the even, quiet, diligent work of the church to how many! Some one must occasionally stir up a hornet's nest just to see the stir it all makes. The churches and the schools are sorely in need of the Timothy Dwight type; men who can stand up under the strain of a new idea or vision, and having done all stand—and let the other fellow stand too.

REV. S. PARKES CADMAN AND THE RADIO

By George Wilson Jennings

A few Sundays ago it was my privilege to call at the home of a life-long friend who has been for a long time a helpless cripple; but notwithstanding his great trouble, he is a man of marvelous optimism, and also gifted in his love and knowledge of books, music and painting. My friend insisted upon my remaining that afternoon and "listening in" on the radio, which his progressive son had installed in the apartment. The contrivance the young man arranged regarding the radio for his father was indeed unique. With the outfit the service of the men's conference at the Young Men's Christian Association was an innovation. Rev. S. Parkes Cadman's address was as clear and plain as though this meeting was held in the little room in the lower part of our city. I shall never forget the look of eager joy on the invalid's face as he intently listened to Dr. Cadman's address, his earnest prayers, and the hymns sung at the time.

Dr. Cadman's utterances are the language of the heart—the language which "comes from the heart" and "goes to the heart"—always simple, always gracious, and graceful, full of power, thought and study. He is profound and eloquent, broad visioned, one who can treat humble subjects with delicacy, lofty things impressively, and moderate things temperately. This world-renowned preacher and lecturer deeply impresses a thinking man. The doctor knows it is the first rule in oratory that a man must appear such as he would persuade others to be, and that can be accomplished only by the force of his useful life.

Dr. Cadman's closing prayer on that Sunday appealed directly to my friend's heart and needs, for it was the expression of a faith reflective, clear, bringing the presence, the sympathy of the Being to whom the prayer was addressed. Reflecting on that Sunday afternoon, I asked myself: What wonders God hath wrought in these marvelous discoveries? Using mankind as an instrumentality in His hands to bring about what might be called a miraculous discovery, "broadcasting" over the entire country where many, many thousands of people in every walk of life have rare opportunities in this special line—those who are afflicted and helpless are in this enlightened age benefited and instructed as never before.

The words of Hawthorne recurred to the writer at this time—"Great men need to be lifted upon the shoulders of the whole world, in order to conceive their great ideas or perform their great deeds. That is, there must be an atmosphere of greatness about them."

To-day the radio is helping, and helping aright, in bringing Christian thoughts and teachings closer and more thoughtfully to the human family.

PROTEST AGAINST EXECUTION OF ARCHBISHOP OF MOSCOW

A Russian tribunal has condemned the Roman Catholic archbishop of Moscow and several priests to death and sentenced several other priests to prison for refusing to give up their church treasures for famine relief. The two million Roman Catholics of Russia are practically all Poles. The action against the archbishop and his associates has a good deal of politics mixed with it. The Soviet government charges the ecclesiastics with treating with an enemy state, i.e., Poland. Naturally the Poles and Roman Catholics everywhere have protested against the sentence. Pius XI has asked the Russian government to spare the archbishop on the ground that he is "my subject." That is an extraordinary assumption on the Pope's part in this day and generation. Secretary Hughes also has protested through Ambassador Houghton at Berlin, where there is an official representative of the Soviet government. The Russians have commuted the archbishop's sentence to ten years' imprisonment, but have confirmed the death sentence on his vicar general. Our government must take an equal interest in the trial of the Metropolitan Tikhon, a man of incomparably greater importance than this Roman Catholic archbishop. The Secretary's protest should constitute a precedent. Hereafter when an Armenian or Greek priest in Turkey is persecuted, or a Stundist preacher in Russia or a rabbi in Rumania or Hungary, our government should protest as it has in this case. It ought to exert itself immediately in behalf of the forty-five hundred Armenian refugees in Messina, of whom we speak in another column. They are in a far worse case than this Roman Catholic archbishop. Let us as a government be Christian enough to be a friend to the least, to those men who need friends far more than do the great people of the earth.

THE TROUBLES OF THE CLERGY IN RUSSIA

The foreign Roman Catholic archbishop of Moscow is by no means the only ecclesiastic in Russia who is in difficulty. The last new invention for troubling the members of the regular Church is that every clergyman of any grade must secure an authorization in order to have the right to officiate. The price of this authorization is, for the present, put at six hundred million rubles a year. That is only about two dollars in American money, but very few Russian priests can pay such a sum. This strikes another direct blow at the worship, and will close many churches. While the Soviet government is disposed to welcome any religious workers who will help to break up the Orthodox Church, it is not inclined to welcome Christian work in behalf of Jews. As everyone knows, a large proportion of the Soviet leaders are Jews. Probably none of them keep up their religious observances. But it looks as though they did not want their fellow Jews to turn Christian. The Bolshevik government some time ago admitted a representative of the London Mild-may Mission to the Jews to do relief work. When the authorities learned that the man was a missionary to the Jews, however, they forced him to leave Russia. The communists have done something to stimulate a Bolshevik movement among the Orthodox Jews, however. The head of this organization has just landed in New York. We do not know whether our own government will deport him as a Bolshevik agent or not.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

PROPAGANDA IN BEHALF OF DEATH

The "New York American" is read by eleven hundred thousand people every morning. The Hearst press altogether has a daily morning circulation of five million. What Arthur Brisbane writes appears in ten million papers each day. The other day the Hearst papers in Arthur Brisbane's column discussed the British proposals for an increase in their air force on account of the strength of the French air squadrons. Brisbane followed it up with this paragraph: "And what about that famous 'League of Nations'? If it can't keep England from worrying about her 'dear ally,' France, how will it prevent war in general? And why should this nation become mixed up with a league that cannot even protect Allied nations from fear of each other's flying machines? Great Britain's Air Ministry has developed a 1,600-horsepower flying engine that will burn crude oil instead of gasoline and carry ten to one hundred passengers across the Atlantic. Such an engine, properly developed, is worth more to England than half a dozen Leagues of Nations." This is the sort of talk that prepares the world for more war. We say that liberty of speech and of the press do not allow advocacy of crimes and violence. What is such a paragraph as this but the most insidious advocacy of violence, the sort of violence that leads to the death of men by the thousand and million? Would it not be a healthy thing if the law forbade the airing of such sentiments? In the Rhine area occupied by the Allies, Colonel Stone, of our forces, suppressed papers which published cartoons that excited international bitterness and would not allow the discussion of the question, Who started the war? because it would only fasten international hate in the children's minds. Why should not our laws say that war and international bitterness are crimes, and whoever stimulates them breaks the law?

HISTORY FOR THE SCHOOL CHILD VERSUS FACT

At the recent conference of the American Section of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, Harold R. Peat, one of the soldiers of the World War who is now devoting his life to the cause of peace, pointed out the great weakness in the teaching of history in our schools. "When I was in school," he said, "when I read of a war or read of a soldier I always thought of glory, romance and heroism. I never once, in any of the grades of my school as a Canadian boy, read the story of war as war is. I never read a chapter or a line that would have caused me as a child to hate war, and if my school teachers did not teach me to hate war, then they certainly taught me to glorify war." His examination of the text books of different nations has shown him that the word defeat does not appear in the pages of text books. It would be an excellent idea to have a conference of the ministers of education of all the nations to draw up an international history showing the facts relating to war, not how we have "licked" one another in the past. The Women's Conference agreed to make a special campaign against the National Defense Act which was passed in 1920. That act provides for a "citizen army" similar in many respects to the military policy of Germany before 1914. The conference plans also for a national summer school for peace education.

THE MOVEMENT FOR AN INTERNATIONAL LANGUAGE

Some four years ago F. G. Cottrell, an eminent American chemist, served on the committee to plan for the meeting of the International Research Council at Brussels. The committee agreed that the official languages of the conference should be French and English. This was all very simple, but when the Italian delegates arrived the whole scheme was blown into a thousand pieces. That incident impressed Professor Cottrell. Although a chemist, he became so deeply interested in the development of an international medium of intellectual exchange that he was made chairman of the committee on the subject appointed by that Brussels meeting. The movement in behalf of an international language is gaining in strength. In the autumn of 1921 the League of Nations appointed a committee to consider the topic. The League committee reported that Latin is too difficult to serve as an international auxiliary language, and that the acceptance of any modern national language would excite jealousy, and that therefore an invented language would be the best. The committee held that Esperanto and Ido are suitable, but it was not prepared to decide between them. The first of the modern international languages was Volapük, the invention of Monsignor Johann Martin Schleyer, a Roman Catholic priest of Baden. He brought it out in 1880. The roots in Volapük were mainly based upon the English language because, as Monsignor Schleyer said, it was spoken by one hundred million people, but the roots were so modified that people would not recognize them. Volapük means "world speech." Nevertheless, by 1899 there were 283 Volapük clubs spread all over the world and some thirty periodicals appearing in the language or dealing with it. In 1887 a Polish student, Louis Lazarus Zamenhof, brought out Esperanto. "Esperanto" was the pseudonym over which Zamenhof published his pamphlet. Esperanto is based on roots taken from English, German, French, Italian and Latin. Dr. Zamenhof really worked out his language practically in the same fundamental ideas as those of Schleyer, but he made it a good deal simpler. Esperanto had a wide growth. At the Paris Exhibition in 1900 Monsieur Leau, a French professor of mathematics, led in the formation of a "delegation for the adoption of an auxiliary language." After seven years of work the committee decided to adopt Esperanto in principle, but with certain modifications indicated by the secretaries' report and by the "project of Ido." The "project of Ido" was an anonymous pamphlet really written by the Marquis de Beaufront, at that time the most eminent supporter of Esperanto in the world. The supporters of Esperanto, however, would not accept the co-operation of the "delegation for the adoption of an auxiliary language," so that very unfortunately two languages now are contending for the place as the international tongue. There are three other suggestions based on Latin also before the international public—one called Pan-Roman or Universal, another called Latino Sine Flexione, and the third Romano. For anyone acquainted with Latin these three are very simple to understand. A goodly number of learned societies, including the American Council on Education, the American Classical League, the American Philological Association, and the National Research Council of America, have appointed committees to consider the question. The committee of the National Research Council is now undertaking real propaganda. Many of the labor organizations are much interested in the project. Indeed, Professor Cottrell reports that he found it possible to converse at first-hand with leaders of labor organizations in Europe in Ido. The advantages of an international language are so obvious that they do not need to be enumerated. If we are to come to an age of complete understanding we must be able to talk with each other directly and not depend on interpreters. Earl Grey believed that the war of 1914 never would have occurred if all of the parties to it could have talked one language. The committee of the National Research Council would be glad to know the names of people who would enter a class for the study of one of the international languages.

SUICIDE IN AMERICA

Seven years ago Rev. Harry March Warren, D.D., who was then a Baptist minister in New York City, founded a society to help keep people from suicide. On the board of this Save-a-Life League were some of the most prominent ministers and physicians of New York. About twelve thousand persons committed suicide in this country last year, one-third of them women and girls. The oldest suicide was a centenarian great-great-grandmother and the youngest a child of five years. The number of known suicides in 1921 was 8,410 males and 3,734 females. One of the great insurance companies estimates the number of suicides in 1922 as 13,530. If the number included the unknown suicides and those who made a deliberate but unsuccessful attempt to destroy themselves it would be doubled. A large number of suicides are educated, socially prominent and financially prosperous. Among the number last year were thirty-eight college students, fifty college professors and school teachers, nineteen preachers and leaders of religious work, fifty-two judges and lawyers, eighty-four physicians, about one hundred presidents and heads of large business concerns, seventy-nine millionaires, forty-six wealthy women and eighty-eight bankers, several of them bank presidents. In New York City alone 839 persons ended their lives last year. Some parts of the country report a sort of epidemic or suicide wave, one girls' suicide club having been discovered. Several persons killed themselves because of gossip. One girl committed suicide because she became depressed after bobbing her hair; one man because he was forced to quit playing golf. A woman killed herself after missing two trains. A man because he feared the end of the world was at hand. Another man because of a row over a cat. A designer was driven to suicide trying to guess the coming spring styles for women. One recently ended his life rather than face another cold winter. A young man killed himself "for the fun of it." And a woman left a note saying she was taking poison "just to get a new thrill." In 1919 477 children committed suicide; in 1920 there were 707; in 1921, 858; in 1922, over 900, or nearly 3,000 in four years. The average age of boy suicides is sixteen, of girls fifteen. When five school girls in four days commit suicide it is time the public asked the reason why. The conclusion reached probably will be that they were temperamentally disordered, or home conditions were intolerable, or that the school system is at fault. All three are the chief causes for child suicide. Child marriage is another serious cause. In 1920 there were sixteen hundred boys and twelve thousand girls fifteen years of age in the United States listed as married, and nearly five hundred of them were recorded as widowed or divorced. The married boys of sixteen numbered 3,222; those of seventeen, 7,690; those of eighteen, 24,644. Girls married at sixteen numbered 41,620; at seventeen, 90,930, and at eighteen, 186,645. Many of these children soon after marriage find that they have made a great mistake in their choice, quarrel, separate, get divorced and supply many of our suicides as well as homicides. Parents and teachers should educate children to avoid emotional excesses, to meet bravely the unpleasant things of life and to consider others as well as themselves. Dr. Thomas W. Salmon says that most suicides are preventable. The league has proved that people tempted to end their lives will first come and "talk it over," and that in most cases they can be saved. The Save-a-Life League believes that with proper equipment it could save thousands every year. "The weakening of religious belief in many persons," says the League's report, "is to blame for many suicides. The lack of the understanding of life's true value and a lack of communion with God and obedience to God's laws is the whole trouble. The fear of a possible punishment hereafter is an important deterrent factor, although not the only one, for true religion requires a man to think less of himself and more of others. . . . This spiritual counsel, calm reasoning and timely assistance (medical, legal or financial) will save almost anyone in despair."

HERESY IN THE MISSION FIELDS

The perturbation over modernism and heretical preaching in the pulpits and the teaching of heretical doctrines in the seminaries is not confined to Great Britain, Germany and America. It is manifesting itself in the mission fields in as emphatic form as one finds it at home. There is a conflict between the "Fundamentalist" and the "Modernist" going on in China that is as violent as it is becoming in America. Thus the Bible Union of China in its recent bulletin, entitled "Contending for the Faith in the Councils of the Church," deals with the efforts of Evangelical Traditionalists to withstand the inroads of Modernism. The bulletin abounds with citations of a militant and pessimistic character, of which the following is a good example. It is the utterance of a conservative editor on the other side of the Atlantic:

The rationalists parley no more. They are out to win. . . . It is necessary that all bodies of evangelicals stand together, regardless of minor differences. It is not necessary to abandon our distinctive views or organizations any more than it was necessary for Great Britain, France or America to abandon their distinct nationalities. But it is necessary that we find some way of united action, as did the Allies. The best plan now presented is that of the fundamentalists. The rationalists are great on strategy, and they are now determined to divide the conservative evangelical body. They are loudly proclaiming that the fundamentalists are a body of extreme, exclusive premillennialists, and that that movement simply represents that particular view. This is all untrue. The fundamentalists, as their name implies, are a body of evangelical believers who hold differing views upon non-essentials, such as the form of baptism, form of government, the emphasis upon human agency and divine sovereignty, etc., but who are soundly, thoroughly and intensely solidly one upon the great fundamentals of historic Christianity, such as the infallible Bible, the Trinity, including the deity of Christ, his supernatural teachings and works; his vicarious blood atonement, his bodily resurrection, his ascension, and his personal, bodily, sudden return to earth.

Mr. Watkin R. Roberts, of the Bible League of India, Burma and Ceylon, asserts that out of four thousand missionaries now working in those parts, not more than two thousand "believe in the Bible as the inerrant and infallible Word of God." Higher criticism is responsible for this, and "we now," he adds, "have to face the most appalling form of apostate teaching." Missionaries belonging to the Anglican, Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregationalist, Baptist and Y. M. C. A. bodies are all infected, and many of the Mission High Schools and Colleges in India are staffed by these people. Even Christian periodicals admit the contributions of Modernist writers.

His remedy is a very simple one. It is to appeal to headquarters. He declares that:

Unless the Christian Church in the homeland takes immediate and most drastic action independently, if necessary, on the missionary societies, these anti-Christian theories will so grip the modernist missionary community and its Indian Christian followers that our missionary propaganda will eventually degenerate into a merely ethical movement of social reform—with our Lord Jesus Christ classed as a mere reformer, along with heathen philosophers, and the whole movement finally culminating in an apostate world-federation of religions.

It is a great pity that the conflict should extend itself to the mission fields. We can stand it in America and Britain. Christianity is established and a little debate over the great problems of the faith helps rather than hurts the cause. It shows that the people still have some interest in the great doctrines of the faith when they will heartily contend for their interpretation of them. But it is different on the mission field. There it is necessary to present a united front to heathenism. In a great city there may be but two Christian Churches, both there to present Christianity to a hundred thousand who know nothing of it. If the two protagonists of the faith fall into dispute between themselves the cause suffers terribly. The heathen wonders if they do not laugh. As the Hindoo nurse in Maugns play "East of Suez" intimates that she had to be baptized by all the communions, Roman Catholic included, to make sure she was saved. It is greatly to be hoped that both those missionaries belonging to the Fundamentalist school and those belonging to the Liberal school will exercise great charity toward each other and refrain, so far as possible, from criticizing or attacking each other's theological positions and work in closest co-operation and unity in preaching the gospel. After all the missionary goes out to preach the gospel, not any particular theology, nor any particular view of the Bible. Theologies are many, the gospel is one.

THE BATTLES FOR OIL

There are three broad petroleum areas now known in the world—one which includes the seven oil fields in the United States; a second in the Caribbean basin, which includes Mexico, Central America, Colombia and Venezuela; a third in the Caspian-Black-Sea-Eastern-Mediterranean region, which includes southern Russia, southwestern Siberia, Mesopotamia and Palestine. It is estimated that the original oil content of these three fields is roughly ten billion barrels. If an allowance of ten billion barrels is made for undiscovered resources, we have a total of forty billion barrels of original deposits, one-fourth of which belonged to the United States. Of the ten billion, however, which belonged to the United States approximately one-half has been used up. Hence, Mexico, with an estimated four and one-half billion barrels, falls not far behind the actual present oil resources of the entire United States. Mr. Joseph E. Pogue, one of the best authorities on power resources in the United States, states in "Economics of Petroleum" that "the resource situation is serious, if not critical," and that "the rate of extraction of American petroleum must soon slow down," no matter what the unmined supply may be assumed to be. More efficient methods of mining and a more economical use of oil for a given unit of power may be expected to offset in considerable measure the decline in output. About three years ago the president of the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey estimated that in 1925 the requirements of the petroleum industry in the United States would approximate 650 million barrels, which is 220 million million barrels more than the requirements of 1919. This is very far in excess of the most optimistic estimate of the production of our own oil fields. Thus the importance of oil as a factor in determining international relationships is at once apparent. The war greatly stimulated interest in petroleum, not only by accentuating its importance, but by calling attention to the limitation in supply. Again quoting Mr. Pogue, it appears "that in 1917 the United States exercised political (or territorial) control over sixty-seven per cent. of the petroleum produced throughout the world, and commercial (financial) control over a slightly greater part, seventy-two percent. Proportions of substantially the same order of magnitude obtain for 1920." In addition to its own fields, those controlled predominantly by the United States are Mexico and Peru. The use of the terms "financial control" and "political control" interchangeably is of the greatest significance. Surveying the changes in the political and commercial map of the world during the last few years, Mr. Pogue finds that "there is an unmistakable correlation to be observed between the territorial adjustments and the unmined supplies of petroleum." The exhaustion of nearly fifty per cent. of the original petroleum resources of the United States means that about seven-eighths of the estimated resources of the world now lie outside the boundaries of the United States. Thus, while America has territorial control of two-thirds of the world's actual production of petroleum, she has financial (and political) control over only about one-eighth of the resources. It is a maxim of international relations that a government undertakes to the full limit of its power to protect the property rights of its nationals in foreign countries. In the light of these facts, it is not strange that there has been a tendency in the last few years, especially among smaller independent countries, toward nationalizing petroleum resources. This has been matched by keen rivalry among the greater powers for control of the petroleum resources in the Eastern Hemisphere. The acuteness of the present Near East controversy is apparently due even more to the existence of petroleum in Mesopotamia than to the extraordinarily grave human questions involved.

Real Progress Toward Unity

THERE can be no doubt that the world at large has been greatly disappointed in the progress toward unity since the famous appeal for unity was issued by the Lambeth Conference over two years ago. Perhaps the hopes of the Church Universal had never been raised so high as by that document signed by practically all the Episcopal bishops of the world. For the first time the great Anglican communion recognized all the other Protestant communions as true churches. The tone of the appeal was irenic and conciliatory, and the bishops expressed themselves as ready to make all concessions conscience would permit. The various Free church bodies of Great Britain received the appeal in the same kindly spirit in which it was offered, but, after careful consideration, declared that while they were willing to enter into further conferences—one or two such conferences have been held—yet some of the statements in the appeal presented such insuperable difficulties that there was not much hope of arriving at any real unity on the basis of the appeal. The great obstacle was that of orders, not of faith. Also, the cleavage between the sacramental and evangelical conception of the faith was a chasm too wide to be bridged. (Dr. T. Reaverly Glover dwelt mostly upon this point in his book on the Free Churches and the Lambeth Appeal, which book Dr. Clifford said expressed the point of view of the Free Churches as a whole.) The American churches have not been more hopeful in their attitude toward the appeal than have the British churches.

On the other hand, if the outcome of the Lambeth Appeal has not been encouraging, it should be noted with gratitude that in other directions the progress toward unity is making steady progress. This is apparent from the excellent summary prepared by the Continuation Committee of the World Conference on Faith and Order. This shows that in many places and in many branches of the Church not only is the plea for unity being uttered, but real steps toward it are being taken. This summary is so full of encouragement that we are glad to share it with our readers:

"Everywhere Christians are recognizing that the only hope of the world is the establishment of Christ's law of peace and righteousness and love, and that, until the churches are visibly united, they cannot proclaim that law effectively. Local efforts for partial reunion are, therefore, being made all over the globe, and the effort for the World Conference on Faith and Order to prepare the way for the unity of the churches is arousing increased interest.

"In Canada, the Congregationalists, Methodists and Presbyterians have reached almost the final stage of union, and Methodists and Anglicans are appointing commissions to confer.

"In England, members of the Church of England and of the Baptist, Congregational, Methodist, Moravian and Presbyterian churches held remarkable conferences last winter.

"In Australia, Anglicans, Baptists, Christians, Congregationalists, Methodists and Presbyterians are discussing the matter seriously.

"In South India, the United Church and the Church of England are continuing their hopeful negotiations.

"The Presbyterians, Church of England, Methodists, Congregationalists and other missionaries are continuing their efforts at Kikuyu in East Africa. Informal discussions are going on in the West Indies.

"The Church of Scotland and the United Free Church of Scotland have almost completed their reunion.

"In China, a National Christian Council has been formed by members, foreign and native, of most of the Christian missions, which it is hoped will prepare the way for direct efforts for one Church in China.

"In Egypt, members of the Church of England and the Greek Orthodox, Coptic, Syrian Orthodox, Armenian and Presbyterian churches are continuing hopeful conferences.

"In Ireland, the Presbyterians and the Church of Ireland are considering the matter.

"The recognition by the Ecumenical Patriarchate of the Holy Orthodox Eastern Churches of the validity of Anglican orders is a long step toward reunion between the Eastern Orthodox churches and the Anglican communion. The decision of the Ecumenical Patriarchate will need the assent of the other patriarchates and autonomous Eastern Orthodox churches before it becomes effective. The Ecumenical Patriarchate and the Old Catholic churches of Europe are approaching each other, and the relations between the Eastern Orthodox and the Armenian and Coptic churches are closer.

"Viscount Halifax has been having conversations with Cardinal Mercier as to reunion between the Churches of Rome and England.

"In the United States, the Episcopal Church has made canonical provisions by which its bishops will be enabled to give to ordained ministers of other churches an Episcopal commission.

EDITORIAL

"While federation is not a substitute for unity, it is a step toward it, and the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America is becoming more and more effective. The Federal Council of the Free Churches in England is likewise gaining in importance and efficiency, and federation movements are well advanced in Germany and Switzerland.

"The Northern and Southern bodies in the United States of the Methodists, Presbyterians and Baptists are still continuing their negotiations. Two of the largest bodies of Lutherans in the United States have united under the name of the United Lutheran Church of America, and the Evangelical Association of North America and the United Evangelical Church have just united under the name of the Evangelical Church, which has voted to destroy all records of the division which separated them many years ago."

The Commission on Faith and Order might have added two other hopeful instances to this list. One is that of the actual establishment of inter-communion between the Anglican and Swedish churches. The writer happened to be the guest of the Archbishop of Sweden on the day when the document signed by the Archbishop and two Swedish bishops, which concluded the agreement, was dispatched by special messenger to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and there was great rejoicing in Sweden. The Archbishop felt that one of the greatest steps for generations toward unity had been taken. The other incident to which reference should be made is that of the conference between a group of Anglican leaders and several leaders of the Free churches held at Lambeth Palace last year. Although the delegates did not officially represent their communions, yet they were among the most prominent men in both groups. The significant thing about the statement issued by the Conference was the distance the Anglican leaders went in recognizing the Free churches as real churches and the distance the Free churchmen went in recognizing the value of some form of bishopric in the Church. The statement was warmly criticized by many in both groups, but it was a sign of the times. No such statement could have been agreed upon twenty-five years ago.

Beer and Light Wines

IN dealing with momentous and vexing problems it is important that we keep close to facts. We gain nothing by indulging in rhetoric, or falling into passionate and ugly moods, or by playing with fantasies and phrases. Many Americans do not like the Eighteenth Amendment, and are calling for a law which will legalize the sale of beer and light wines. The persons who join in this cry are of two classes. A small group of them are fully informed and know exactly what they are saying and why they are saying it. The majority have never studied the problem and are carried away by popular clamor, repeating the things which others say. Those who know the facts know that the Eighteenth Amendment will not be repealed. The American people have put it into the Constitution, and there it is going to stay. It required a two-thirds vote of Congress to submit the Amendment to the States. It required three-fourths of the States to put the Amendment into the Constitution. Forty-six States have ratified the Amendment. It is a solid and indestructible part of the organic law of the land.

To get rid of it, the only thing possible is to nullify it. The most plausible way of nullifying it is to induce Congress to legalize the sale of beer and light wines. A light wine is a wine containing any proportion up to thirteen per cent. of alcohol. To advocate the sale of beer and light wines without specifying the per cent. of alcohol is to advocate the sale of drinks which are undeniably intoxicating. The Eighteenth Amendment prohibits "the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within the United States, and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof, for beverage purposes." When people demand that the Federal Government shall legalize the sale of beer and light wines, they demand that the Government shall legalize what the people in their Constitution have expressly prohibited. That is something which no honorable Government is likely to do.

If it be said that drinks containing a low per cent. of alcohol, say four or five or six per cent., are not intoxicating, the answer is that that depends on the person who drinks and the quantity of liquor drunk. The Army medical experts in the war found that a liquor containing only 1.4 per cent. of alcohol will intoxicate the average healthy soldier if a sufficient quantity be imbibed. Thousands of men and women get drunk on beer and light wine. Moreover, beer and wine create in multitudes the appetite which demands drinks which are stronger. The case against alcohol even in small quantities is complete and unanswerable. The experience of mankind has demonstrated that alcohol as a beverage is a plague and a curse. The physiologists, the life insurance experts, the great employers, the railroad companies, the social workers, the reformers, and the minister of the church of God, have been brought face to face with the facts. They all see that alcoholic drink is a continuous cause of pauperism and crime, insanity and degeneration. It is not fanatics or faddists, puritans or bigots who have decided that alcohol as a beverage must go. It is the nature and unshakable conclusion of the common sense and sober judgment of the sanest and best informed men and women now alive.

When people in the State of New York ask the Legislature to legalize the sale of beer and light wines, they ask the Legislature to do a foolish and futile and dangerous thing. New York State is a part of the nation. It is not an independent and sovereign power. It is bound by the laws passed by the United States Congress. If it defies a Federal law, it becomes a rebel State. No matter what the New York Legislature may do, the sale of beer and light wines cannot be legalized in this State, so long as Congress prohibits such sale. The United States Government has full authority to prohibit the sale of beer and light wines in the Empire State, even though our Assembly and Senate and Governor should all declare that such sale is legal.

Moreover, if the sale of beer and light wines should be legalized by Congress, that would be a nullification of the expressed will of the people declared in the manner prescribed by the Constitution. If the sale of liquor containing five per cent. or six per cent. of alcohol should be legalized, it would be absolutely impossible to prevent the sale of liquor containing eight per cent. or ten per cent. No conviction in a court would be possible without a chemical analysis of the contents of every bottle or glass. There are not enough chemists in the world to conduct the business which would be made necessary by the passage of such a law. The Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, Mr. Taft, has clearly stated what every informed person knows: "No such distinction as that between wines and beers on the one hand and spirituous liquors on the other is practicable as a police measure. Any such loophole as light wines and beer would make an Amendment a laughing stock." The brewers and distillers all know that the Prohibition Amendment will be a dead letter if once a beer and light wine bill is passed.

If Congress should legalize the sale of beer and light wines, the breweries and wineries would all be reopened. If wine and beer are to be drunk, there must be organizations to make them, and if they are to be sold, there must be places for selling. The saloon would come back, and with it the old gang which had debauched and terrorized so many communities that decent people declared it no longer endurable.

The effort to nullify Prohibition by allowing the sale of beer and light wines is an old trick which has been tried again and again. Beer amendments have been up in Michigan, Colorado, Washington, Oregon and Ohio, and in each of these States the beer amendment was overwhelmingly defeated. Such an amendment can never pass in a State where the majority of the voters are intelligent and informed. Georgia tried the experiment. In 1907 she passed a prohibition law, but a few months later she legalized the sale of near beer. The experiment was disastrous. Her law could not be enforced. By a great majority she finally gave up the experiment, and took her place in the list of prohibition States.

Three things are certain. We cannot have beer and light wines and prohibition too. We cannot have beer and light wines without the saloon and all the other abominations which go with it. We cannot have the legalization of the sale of beer and light wines in the State of New York as long as the Volstead Act is in force without defying our Government and insulting the United States flag.

A long time ago it became a proverb—"There is a way which seemeth right to a man, but the ends thereof are the ways of death."

THE OBSERVER

Dr. James Roscoe Day

WHEN the great architect Richardson, big in brain, body, soul and personality in general, and beloved friend of Phillips Brooks, died the great preacher said: "It is like as though one awoke in the morning and looked out the window to see the mountain that was always there and found it was gone." One has something of that feeling as he reads of the passing of Chancellor Day of Syracuse University. He, too, was big in body, brain, heart and of tremendous, dynamic personality. His very presence when he went into the pulpit dominated the congregation before he began to speak.

When I read yesterday of his death there immediately came back to me a beautiful August Sunday in the Adirondacks. It must have been fifteen years ago. I was spending the summer at the Lake Placid Club and Dr. Day was in a cottage near Lake Placid. One day it was announced that he would preach in the Methodist Episcopal Church the approaching Sunday. It was a glorious Sunday, brilliant sunlight, air crisp and clean. We rowed across the shining lake and found great throngs besieging the church. It was always so when he preached. For an hour and ten minutes he held us spellbound (how the idea of long sermons never injects itself into our consciousness when the real preacher, the prophet, speaks). He talked on the personality of Christ, how far was it capable of appropriation, adoption by ourselves. He dwelt upon several phases of Christ's character. I recall so well that while he was speaking of the gentleness of Christ and our assimilation of it he exclaimed: "What a commentary upon our humanity that the squirrels fear us and run and the birds fly away as we approach!" But he did not confine himself, as some do, to the gentleness of Christ's character. He said one of His superbest traits was

His capacity for indignation. He said he himself would not give a penny for a man who would not grow white hot with indignation over wicked men and evil deeds. He liked the man who occasionally burst his collar with wrath over some egregious act. Christ was the Great Hater as well as the Great Lover. The real Christian to-day could hate as well as love. It was great preaching, virile at times, tender at times as a mother over her babe, lit up with imagination, rich in real pathos, and real humor, ringing with trumpet tones, then as conversational as though we were at dinner table together. When it was over it was with sort of a jolt that we came back to the world after journeying through the immensities.

My readers will remember that this capacity of denunciation and Christian hatred of which Dr. Day spoke at this service was occasionally demonstrated in his own career. To take one instance only, on the question of accepting the Rockefeller money for religious and educational purposes, he burst out with volcanic heat. His words went round the world. In the first place, he thought the objection to the money was the softest, mushiest expression of sentimentality any weak woman could be accused of. It was a sign of the whole tendency to reduce all morality, public and private, to fantastic, unreal sentiment. These people who were condemning the Rockefellers could not conceive of conflict as playing any part in life. Their only conception of life was a perpetual honeymoon. Of course, the Rockefellers made their money by competition. Every red-blooded man did. He, for one, would hate to see a world where competition and contest were obliterated. He could not live in one, because he hated weak-kneed, sentimental men so much. The Rockefeller incident led him on to express himself hotly against the whole attitude of the government and the people toward big business. He thought government interference and regulation of business was the most ominous sign of the times. Men would not continue to risk their lives and capital in those great business enterprises necessary to our vast, complicated industrial structure if they were to be plagued and hampered and checked at every turn. The whole thing had its origin in the jealousy and envy of the unsuccessful and cheap politicians, attacking wealth and capital because they thus curried favor with the workingmen. If the workingmen only had sense they would see that the great corporations were the greatest blessing to labor that had ever been evolved in history. It put employment on a steady basis and wages had always increased with the growth of wealth. He resolutely refused to consider the Rockefeller, Carnegie and Gould money as "blood money" and took all he could get of it.

In the same way he hated agitators. He insisted on believing that most of them were unsuccessful men who turned against the established order, or young men too lazy to go to work, who took up socialistic agitation to earn a living. He used to say the world would be reasonably happy and make good, steady progress if people would stop agitating and settle down to good hard work. He had a real feeling, I think, that most of the ferment and unrest came from a dread of work more than from unjust industrial conditions. I imagine he rather felt that if all the workingmen would keep sober and work hard, trying to produce all they could, instead of trying to produce as little, the economic order would be improved more than by all the agitation of new theories of government in the world.

Socialism did not appeal to him in the least. He could not see how a new political or economic order would improve anything, where business men were all as eager for gain as they are now and the workingmen just as lazy. A tremendous individualist himself, and an eager, indefatigable worker, he could not conceive of a society where individuality and work were not the chief factors. It must not be inferred from what I am saying that Dr. Day was a stiff-necked, stand-pat man, satisfied with things as they are and fearing changes. Not at all. He knew all that was being said and written, but he said he knew human nature, too, "and," he used to say, "these agitators and prophets of revolution don't." He had no scorn for Utopias, but he did not believe you could get to them by one flying jump. He admitted that changes should be made, but that the only way to make them was by steady, orderly progress. He used to say that most revolutions left people in as bad a condition as they were before, if not a worse.

Dr. Day was a shining example of what one man can do who has the passion for achievement and the capacity for hard work. For years he was pastor of big churches and great throngs hung upon his words. At that time he preached almost daily, twice in his own church in New York, then here and there during the week. He wrote books. He developed Syracuse University into one of the great national institutions. He took active part in all the great controversies of the day. He was a doughty fighter, not because he loved fighting—some of his brethren have accused him of enjoying it—but because he believed in earnestly contending for the faith which was in him.

He greatly resembled Theodore Roosevelt in temper and personality, and Roosevelt was his ideal type of manhood.

By Rev. Harry Emerson Fosdick, D.D.

Preached at the First Presbyterian Church, New York, February 11, 1923

WE shall consider this morning what we mean when we speak of the divinity or deity of Jesus. One must sympathize with the man upon the street when he sees a question like this tossed into the newspapers, or, hearing churchmen call one another Arians, Monotheletes, Apollinarians, and other unpronounceable kinds of heretics, and wonders what it means. So much confusion is there in this realm that some people believe in the divinity of Jesus who are not quite sure what that signifies, and many others want to believe in it and try to believe in it, but find it so entangled with metaphysical questions, difficult to answer, that they have no freedom and joy in their belief at all. It ought to be useful to at least some of us if we talk simply and frankly about this fundamental assertion of the Christian faith. For the divinity of Jesus is the central assertion of the Christian faith, and at its heart it is not a dry-as-dust theological speculation, but a warm and vital assertion of the religious life.

No passage in the New Testament leads us more directly to the heart of the matter than the fourteenth chapter of John's Gospel, beginning with the eighth verse:

"Philip saith unto Him, Lord, show us the Father, and it sufficeth us. Jesus saith unto him, Have I been so long time with you, and dost thou not know Me, Philip? he that hath seen Me hath seen the Father; how sayest thou, Show us the Father? Believest thou not that I am in the Father, and the Father in Me?"

Some people think this passage a verbatim account of Jesus' words and some consider it John's interpretation of Jesus' words after he had gone, but in whichever way the passage be taken, it is one of the early assertions from the first church about Jesus' relationship with the Father.

At the beginning it is evident that whatever difficulty there may be about the Master's divinity, there is no question about His humanity. Philip and Jesus sit eating together at the table, and they converse as man to man. Philip has been living with Him now for a long time and, while evidently he still has difficulty in understanding the Master's relationship with the Father and needs to be admonished about that, he takes for granted the basic and indubitable fact of the manhood of his Lord. I am sure that this needs to be emphasized. A great deal of the unreality that is associated with the current discussion of the divinity of Jesus arises from the fact that it has quite lost touch with His real humanity. Jesus was real man and His divinity must always be asserted and interpreted in such ways as will not cast doubt on that unmistakable fact.

Surely, this is clear in the Gospels. The body of the Master was a normal body like our own: it grew, it was weary, hungry, thirsty: it suffered and it died like ours. Moreover, the Master had a normally human emotional life. Sometimes He was astonished, as at the people's lack of faith or the centurion's excess of it. Compassion often deeply moved His heart, as when He looked on the unshepherded multitudes or swung around the brow of Olivet and saw Jerusalem crowned with the Temple's golden dome. Often indignation swept His spirit as when He saw His Father's house made a den of thieves or poured out His anger against the hypocrites. Sometimes He rejoiced, and sometimes He was so depressed that He cried, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful even unto death," or "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken Me?"

Moreover, it is evident that the Master's mental life went through the development of a normal, human youth. As Luke says, "Jesus advanced in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and men." He went to the synagogue school and, sitting on the floor with His fellow pupils, recited in concert the lessons which the rabbi dictated. The information which His mind used was gathered, as ours is, by observation, and retained by memory. All His teaching is stamped with the impress of His recollection of the home in Nazareth. The cost of sparrows in the market place, putting patches on old garments, the working of leaven in the dough, hens gathering chickens under their wings, the sound of the wind blowing down the village street—how innumerable are the evidences of His observation and His memory!

More important for our immediate purpose is it to note the beautiful humanness of His spiritual life. You see it in His prayers. He relied on prayer to the Father for power to do His work. Sometimes He prayed in triumph, as on the Transfiguration Mountain, when His face shown. Sometimes He prayed in grief, as in Gethsemane, where it is written, "being in an agony He prayed more earnestly." Sometimes He prayed all night, or went out early in the morning to the hills alone, or at sunset time withdrew in solitude to open His heart to the inflowing tides of divine help. At the very center of His spiritual life was this filial dependence in God. He said, "The Father is greater than I." When men praised Him fulsomely He resented it: "Why callest thou Me good? none is good save one, even God." All His life was lived, His work done, His sorrows borne, and His temptations faced, with a humble, filial dependence on God.

With this clear assertion of the real humanity of Jesus in the Gospels most of us are familiar. But many are not familiar with the fact that throughout its early history the Church fought some of its most serious theological battles to maintain this real humanity of Jesus against those who cast doubt upon it. Many people seem to think that the central struggle of the early Church was to get people to believe in the divine origin of Jesus. Upon the contrary, after the Church got under way and Jesus was exalted as Lord, the current philosophy made it comparatively easy for the people of the second, third and fourth centuries to believe that Jesus came from the supernal realm, but made it comparatively difficult to believe that at the same time He possessed a genuine human life. Some of the greatest heretics of the early Church did not deny the divine origin of Jesus; they denied His humanity. The Gnostics did not doubt the heavenly origin of Jesus; they asserted it; but they doubted His real humanity. And the Church fought the Gnostics tooth and nail for years, until she drove them out. The Docetists, some of whom were Gnostics and some of whom were not, did not doubt the deity of Jesus; they asserted it confidently; they doubted His humanity—He only seemed to be born, they said, seemed to possess flesh and blood, seemed to suffer and to die. And the Church fought the Docetists and drove them out. The climax of this effort of the Church to maintain its hold upon the real humanity of Jesus came with Apollinaris. Suppose that I should tell you that Apollinaris was one of the great heretics of the Church and that his heresy concerned itself with the person of our Lord; you would think, would you not, that he denied the deity of Jesus. On the contrary, he asserted it completely and absolutely. What he denied was that Jesus had a human will and a human soul, and the Church condemned him utterly and threw him out. All through the early Church some of the most serious battles were fought in the endeavor to keep a firm hold upon the real humanity of the Master.

There are some Protestants in our day who pride themselves on being orthodox who need to take this very much to heart. I have heard them take a phrase, "Jesus is God," not to be found either in Scripture or the creeds, and set that up as a standard of regularity in doctrine. But to suppose that the phrase, "Jesus is God," is an adequate expression of the Christian faith about Christ is to display an abysmal ignorance of what the Church has stood for. That statement alone is not orthodoxy; it is heresy. It leaves out of account the plain and unmistakable fact that Jesus was also man. Jesus was man and He must be God in what sense He can be God, being assuredly man.

Here, then, we ground ourselves and start where the first disciples started. They did not begin with Jesus as God. They started with Jesus as man, and even here at the Last Supper Philip had not gotten so far beyond that as to prevent the Master saying, "Have I been so long time with you, and dost thou not know Me, Philip?"

II.

While, however, we start with the Master's manhood, we cannot stop there. To say that the disciples found humanity in Jesus and nothing more would be to leave out the major part of what they found. A visitor at one of the services of Frederick Denison Maurice in London, when that preacher was at the height of his power, came out completely awed and subdued, and said, "There was something there not of this world." To say that the disciples felt so about Jesus is to put it mildly. They were sure about his manhood, but it was manhood suffused and irradiated by a light that never was on sea or land. It subdued them, it awed them, it fascinated and mastered them, until the glory of their life came to be that they had known Him, loved Him, believed in Him. They did not start by believing in opinions about Him or doctrines concerning Him; they started by believing in Him. The objective of their faith was not a theory; it was His personality, His life. And the older I grow, the more certain

I am that that is what we always believe in when we believe hard: we are believing in somebody's life.

When, for example, we assert our faith in the monogamous ideal of the family, how little of the ardor and vividness which are associated with our feeling spring from any sociological theory of marriage! At times our shame over disintegrated family life is hot, our desire strong to re-establish in America firm ideals of the monogamous relationship. But at such times most of us are thinking of concrete homes that we have known, perhaps of our own fathers and mothers. We are believing in them and the lives that we saw them live. Some of us had beautiful homes, which, if multiplied, would be the salvation of America. When we defend the Christian ideal of marital relationship we are not so much believing in a theory of monogamy; we are believing in life that we have seen.

This principle ought not to be hard for us to understand on the day before Lincoln's birthday. Do we believe in the theory of democracy? I suppose we do, but sometimes it is very hard. Democracy often works so poorly that we wonder whether or not it can persist, and arguments drawn from sociology and political economy are not altogether satisfying, for one always can think of arguments upon the other side. But when one stops thinking of democracy as a theory and thinks about Abraham Lincoln, how different the effect is! We do believe in him. The more we know about his life the less can we help believing in him. He was democracy personified. And if one searches the deep secrets of America's confidence in democracy to-day he will find that it is not quite so much believing in a theory of government as it is believing in lives like that which democracy makes possible.

So, if one would get back to the vital centers of Christianity he must go behind our metaphysics, philosophies and doctrines to Christians who, like those first disciples, have believed in Jesus. That was the center of the first Christianity. They believed in Jesus. They knew that in His life they had found the life sublime. As another put it, "They would have had difficulty sometimes to tell you what they believed, but they could always have told you in whom they believed."

Nor has vital Christianity ever shifted its center from that kind of faith in Him. Do we believe in the theistic interpretation of the universe? I suppose we do, but if we are frank we must confess that sometimes it is very hard to do so. This universe is a queer place, and sometimes it is cruel. As John Stuart Mill says, "In sober truth, nearly all the things which men are hanged or imprisoned for doing to one another are nature's every-day performances."

When the poets are through singing about the beauties of nature there is something to be said on the other side.

"And then my heart with pleasure fills,
And dances with the daffodils."

That is part of the truth, but not all.

"O mother, praying God will save
Thy sailor—while thy head is bow'd,
His heavy-shotted hammock-shroud
Drops in his vast and wandering grave."

That is the other side. Life is too mysterious, too cruel to make it always easy to believe in the theistic interpretation of the universe. But just as soon as one stops thinking about a speculative theistic theory and begins to think of Jesus, what a different effect! We do believe in Him. The more we ponder on His life, the more sure we are that it is life sublime. To live like that, in faith and service, in hope, love, deathless trust, that is life indeed, and the fact that that life has emerged out of the universal life must mean something significant. Sometimes I think I believe in God largely because I cannot help believing in Jesus Christ.

Now, when Christians come to Christ like that and find in Him the quality which so differentiates Him from the rest of us, what are they going to do with it? So far as I see, there are just two things they can do. They can regard it as an accident or a revelation, one or the other. So a man might handle pieces of iron until for the first time he found a piece of magnetized iron. Something new is there. A strange and powerful element has come into his ken. What is it? It might be an accident. It might not mean anything at all. Or it might be a revelation of a universal force that can take hold of iron and transform it.

So these first disciples faced the Master, and they could not believe that that light in Him which was not of this world was an accident. Do you think it was an accident? That quality in Jesus is the most beautiful thing that ever was seen on this earth. It is the best we know. It is the loveliest possession that the race has to show for all its millenniums of travail on this planet. It has made more difference to the spiritual life of man than anything that ever happened here. And you think that it was an accident! I say that solution is impossible. That is the most irrational thing you can say about it. No, it is a revelation of the creative reality that lies at the heart of the universe.

So these first Christians went out into the Roman Empire with an ardent and convinced assertion on their lips. They had found God. When they tried to put their conviction into intellectual form they inevitably used such categories as were already in their minds—Jesus was Son of David, Messiah, Logos—but behind all such contemporary formulations of the truth was their basic experience. God had welled up among them, had taken hands and feet, had gotten him a face and a voice, and had spoken to them words of life. God could come into human life!—that was their message. God had come into human life, and they had seen the effulgence of His glory in the face of Jesus Christ. There was the Life where they could find God and where God could find them. So vital was that first Christian faith in the divinity of Christ!

III.

This experimental approach to our subject leads me to the two things which I wish particularly to say.

In the first place, how easy it is thus to believe in the divinity of Jesus! If you say it is hard, I answer that, upon the contrary, if a man have a spiritual interpretation of life at all, this ought to be a natural, spontaneous and glad expression of his faith. We are all wrong when we make this matter of believing in the divinity of Jesus a tangled philosophical affair. It is not that in the New Testament. Those men of the New Testament were not primarily philosophers, metaphysicians, theologians. They were plain folks. I believe they would have agreed with George Eliot in Adam Bede. Said Adam Bede, "I look at it as if the doctrines were like finding names for your feelings." Just so! Those first Christians had really found God in Christ, and when they constructed doctrines they were simply giving names to their experience.

In case some one here has been puzzled about this matter because it has been tangled up with the phrases of the historic creeds—the so-called Apostles' Creed, the Nicene Creed, the Athanasian Creed—let us speak about them for a moment. Personally, I was brought up in an ecclesiastical tradition which never used those classic creeds for the expression of its faith, and never in my life have I subscribed to them or repeated them. Such was my training from my youth. But, standing thus outside the ecclesiastical tradition which has used these creeds, when I hear some fresh and flippant modern mind condescending to them, treating the fathers who wrote them as quibblers and fools, I am strongly tempted to come in from the outside and bear a hand in their defense. For much of this modern talk about the creeds is founded on sheer ignorance of the circumstances out of which they rose and the real meaning which their words convey.

Take the Nicene Creed for example. When that welled up out of the heart of the Church as the expression of the generation's best religious faith, this is the problem which the Church faced. A current philosophy that had been borrowed from the Greeks had rent God and man apart. On the one side, it put God away off, pure Being, absolutely incapable of coming into contact with human life, and, on the other side, it put man down in the darkness of matter, incapable of being touched by the Divine. That was the current philosophy. God and man were torn utterly asunder. And that current philosophy was invading the Church and making people say that, because real God and real man never could touch each other, therefore, on the one side, Jesus could never have been really divine, but merely a superior angel, or, on the other side, when on earth He could not have been a real man, but only a phantom that looked like a man. And to save her very life the Church fought that destructive philosophy which so hopelessly separated the human and divine. Now turn to the Nicene Creed and read it with that current philosophy in your thought. It is saying that very God of very God became man. To say that is its central and consuming interest. Not for the sake of theology, but for the sake of a vital religious life, the Nicene fathers broke over that hopeless chasm between the divine and the human and proclaimed to all the world that God can come into human life.

If you say that this great and necessary truth of religion was there stated in terms of that generation's philosophy, the answer is, of course, assent. What else could they do? It never would occur to me to use the Nicene Creed as the natural expression of my faith. But the pith of the matter which the Nicene Creed was driving at is my faith. It is the faith of the whole Church, and if ever the Church loses it the Church is as good as dead. For Christianity is the religion of incarnation, and its central affirmation is that God can come into human life.

Now, the truth that God can come into human life, which was so hard for the people of the Nicene age to believe, ought not to be hard for us. We have no more in the background of our minds that old Greek philosophy which tore God and man apart. Our poets and prophets have been singing and preaching to us for generations that, wherever God is, He is here. "Where love is, there God is also." We even sing it:

"And every virtue we possess,
And every victory won,
And every thought of holiness,
Are His alone."

In our thinking no longer are God and man like oil and water that cannot mix; rather, all the best in us is God in us. When Livingstone goes down to Africa, how can you explain it? Will you say, "God sent him"? That is true, but you must go farther than that. Will you say, "God went with him"? That is true, but you must go deeper than that. Will you say, "God went in him"? Aye, that is the Christian affirmation: God went in him.

No more characteristic distinction separates the New Testament from the Old than this. In the Old Testament God is the lawgiver, who governs His people by rules, or He is a king, "that sitteth above the circle of the earth, and the inhabitants thereof are as grasshoppers." There are other emphases, to be sure, but they are not dominant. Just as soon, however, as you step over the borders of the New Testament you begin to find yourself in another world. Where is God in the New Testament? "God is love; and he that abideth in love abideth in God, and God abideth in him;" "Behold, I stand at the door and knock: if any man hear my voice and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with Me;" "Know ye not that ye are a temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?" You see, my friends, Christianity is the religion of incarnation, and its central affirmation is that God can come into human life.

When, therefore, those Christians of the New Testament rose up with joy to say that they had found God in Christ, their statement was no tangled, speculative, philosophical matter; it was the glad and spontaneous expression of their religious experience. Not if I can help it will I see Christianity reduced to lower terms than that. I hate this minimized religion, frozen, shrunk, dried up and presented in a formula. I believe in God, the real and living God, not far off, but here, and I have seen the effulgence of His spiritual glory in Jesus Christ. I will not quibble about a supposed difference that is not really there between His deity and His divinity. That distinction rests back on the old endeavor to think of God in terms of metaphysical substance, pure Being, conceived apart from spiritual quality, and then to define Christ's relations with Him in the same terms—an endeavor useless for religion and properly outlawed from good philosophy. In everything that matters to our spiritual life, very God came to us in Christ. To be sure, nobody should ever go to Jesus, to His manger and His cross, to find the omnipotence which swings Orion and the Pleiades. Omnipotence in that sense is not revealed there. Nobody in his senses ever went to Jesus for the latest news in physics or astronomy. Omniscience in that sense is not revealed there. "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father"—such was the Master's statement of the truth. That fatherly side of God—character, purpose, redeeming love—we do find incarnate in Christ.

My friends, if we have not laid hold on this central matter in terms of our own thinking, it is a cheap waste of time to criticize our fathers who did lay hold on it in terms of their thinking. So much of this modern attitude to the past discovers small faults and neglects great business. For example, Tennyson once wrote a poem that had this phrase in it, "the ringing grooves of change." He wrote that because he had just taken his first ride on a railroad train. He did not know that a railroad train ran on rails; he thought that it ran in grooves; and when next he wrote a poem he spoke of "the ringing grooves of change." That seems to us ridiculous. There is not a four-year old child in a New York home, we say, who does not know that a train runs on rails. Yes, but that is just the trouble with our modern age: there are multitudes of people who know that railroad trains run on rails and many other things like that, but some truths which folk like Tennyson knew well they do not know at all:

"Strong Son of God, immortal Love,
Whom we, that have not seen thy face,

By faith, and faith alone, embrace,
Believing where we cannot prove;

"Thou seemest human and divine,
The highest, holiest manhood, thou:
Our wills are ours, we know not how;
Our wills are ours, to make them thine."

IV.

We may well dwell, in conclusion, upon the fact that this vital faith in the divinity of Jesus is important if we are going to imitate Jesus, take Him for our ideal and try to be like Him. The argument is often put in precisely the opposite way. Sometimes in a Unitarian church one will hear the minister say, "We want Jesus for an ideal; we want to imitate Him and try to be like Him. But if He is the incarnation of God, that separates us utterly from Him. No, He is a good man! You must think of Him that way. Then you may try to be like Him." I never heard an argument that seemed so to stand the truth on its head. Jesus is, indeed, an extraordinarily good man. As Sidney Lanier sings:

"What if or yet, what mole, what flaw, what lapse,
What least defect or shadow of defect,
What rumor, tattled by an enemy,
Of inference loose, what lack of grace
Even in torture's grasp, or sleep's, or death's—
Oh, what amiss may I forgive in Thee,
Jesus, good Paragon, thou Crystal Christ?"

Jesus is, indeed, a marvelously good man. His goodness was about the only thing He had with which to make His impress on the world—no wealth, no prestige, no worldly learning, nothing but His goodness—and every year that goodness looms so much the higher that there are millions of us who are sure that its chief influence lies, not behind, but ahead. He was a marvelously good man—what words can do justice to His goodness? And now, my Unitarian friend, do you mean to tell me that being a good man like that, I can cheerfully and hopefully set out to imitate him? The proposition makes me feel like a sick man in a hospital, surrounded by other sick men, while an athlete, perfect in physique, stalks up and down before us saying, "Be like me; imitate me." Who would not like to do that? But it is not within our reach; it is beyond us. If Jesus is only a good man, He is an absolutely isolated phenomenon in human history.

If, however, that is not all the truth, if He is not simply a good man, if it was God in Him who created His quality, and if the same God is seeking entrance to our lives, trying to live out in us, according to our degree and capacity, the same spirit, then we may hope. Let us say it abruptly: it is not so much the humanity of Jesus that makes Him imitable; it is His divinity. If He be only a good man, He is an isolated phenomenon, like Shakespeare or Napoleon in other realms. How can I, pulling on my own bootstraps, set out to lift myself by imitation to the likeness of such? But if Jesus is divine and if divinity hedges us all about like the vital forces which in winter wait underneath the frozen ground until the spring comes, that is a gospel! While the trees of the wood are still bare the crocuses bloom, but if they were only crocuses, that would be no good news. If, however, they reveal the vibrant life which runs through all the arteries and veins of the waiting world, that news should make all the trees of the wood rejoice before the Lord; for He cometh in the springtime to redeem them all.

Such is the Gospel of the New Testament about Jesus and His relationship with our lives. He is not an isolated phenomenon. He is "the first born among many brethren." "Now are we children of God, and it is not yet made manifest what we shall be. We know that, if He shall be manifested, we shall be like Him;" "until we all attain unto the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a full-grown man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ." And here in this very passage where Jesus says that He is in the Father and the Father in Him, He also prays "that they may all be one; even as thou, Father, art in Me, and I in Thee, that they also may be in us."

Why is the New Testament so full of hope about redeemed humanity? Not alone because Jesus was human, but because Jesus was divine, the revelation of the living God who seeks to be incarnate in every one of us. If one says that we cannot hope to be fully equal to Him here, surely that is painfully obvious. As Emerson says, "A drop of water has the properties of the sea, but cannot exhibit a storm." So we reveal God without the deeps and tides and currents which Jesus knew, without the relationships with the world's life which His influence has sustained. Yet the God who was in Jesus is the same God who is in us. You cannot have one God and two kinds of divinity, and while like drops of water we are very small beside His sea, yet it was one of the supreme days in man's spiritual history when the New Testament started men singing that they were "children of God: and if children, then heirs; heirs of God and joint-heirs with Christ."

Of all foolish things, I can think of nothing more foolish than to look back over our race's history to discern amid its tragedy and struggle this one outstanding figure spiritually supreme, the "Son of the Most High," and then to cry, "Minimize Him; tone down your thought of Him; reduce Him so that we can all be like Him." No! Exalt Him. If God be not in Him, God is not anywhere. Lift Him up! The best hope of the race is that the living God is in Him and through Him may flow down through all the secret runnels of the race.

A French painter once came down from the provinces where all his life he had daubed along at his painting according to his ability, and in Florence saw for the first time a magnificent painting by Titian. He never had supposed that there was anything like that in all the world. After looking at it for a long time he was heard to say with mingled humility and pride, "I, too, am a painter." So Christians stand before the Master. O Christ, thou art the Lord of glory! Yet, Son of God supreme, Thou hast this effect upon Thy followers, that with mingled humility and pride we say, "I, too, am a son of God."

PRAYER.

Eternal God, our Father, we beseech Thee that Thou wilt give us the grace to love the highest when we see it and to believe in it with all our hearts. Give us a new and vital and living faith in Christ. He is the best we know, and because He is the best we know in man, He is the finest that we know from God. Help us to live for Him and through Him, that we may be sons of God, evermore to grow more like Him. In his name and for His sake we pray. Amen.

AMERICANS IN EASTERN ASIA

By TYLER DENNETT. The Macmillan Company, New York. Pages 725. $5.

This is a volume of unusual value. It can hardly be called popular in contents or style, and it is therefore not likely to appeal to the general reader who has no special interest in the subject and who simply wants something bright and readable. It is a solid and weighty discussion of a solid and weighty subject. The book is literally packed with facts. It gives evidence that the author has consulted an astonishing range of books bearing upon his subject and upon diplomatic and government publications, treaties, agreements, pamphlets, magazines, newspapers, and endless dispatches of American consuls to the Department of State. Each chapter closes with the bibliography dealing with the topic of that particular chapter, and at the end of the volume there is a general bibliography indicating the sources from which the author drew his materials. There are several important phases of the Far Eastern question which the book does not discuss, and those who are interested in those phases will have to go to other volumes. Mr. Dennett has set himself to the one special task indicated in the title, namely, "Americans in Eastern Asia." He has given a study of the origin and development of American policy in China, Japan and Korea, with some passing attention to Siam and the regions of the Indian and Pacific Oceans. The viewpoint of the book is Washington and not either Tokyo or Peking. While the subject has been treated in briefer form by a number of other writers on the Far East, no one else has taken the particular subject of Americans in Eastern Asia and made such a critical review of the policy and methods of the United States. He discusses this policy from the beginnings of American commerce in the East India trade, immediately following the close of the American Revolution down through the co-operative policy represented by every stage of the succeeding decades to the rise of Japan and the disintegration of the Chinese Empire. The volume weighs three pounds, so that it is not light either in the hand or to the mind, but the American who wishes to know just what his country has done, what it has stood for and what mistakes it has made in dealing with the Far East will find himself well rewarded by a careful study of this book.

JAPAN IN TRANSITION

By LORETTA L. SHAW, B.A. Pages 126. George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.25.

This book is so interesting and indicates such carefulness of observation and soundness of judgment that one wishes that it were longer. It is not possible for even the most competent of writers to give an adequate account of "Japan in transition" within the limits of 126 pages. However, as a readable sketch and a bird's-eye view, this little book is well worth while.

IN THE VANGUARD OF A RACE

By MRS. L. H. HAMMOND. Published by the Council of Women for Home Missions and the Missionary Education

Movement of the United States and Canada. Cloth, 75 cents; paper, 50 cents.

The subject matter of this book is entirely biographical with one exception. The introductory chapter traces the history of the development of the Anglo-Saxon race and shows how, in the past four or five hundred years the English-speaking world has evolved its ideals and the conventions of its social structure. The long and difficult upward trail is used as a striking illustration of the difficulty that the negro race has had to adjust itself to a similar evolution within the course of one or two generations. In the remainder of the book Mrs. Hammond sketches the careers of the Negro men and women who have made a contribution to the development of their own people. Booker T. Washington stands in the van, but there is wide variety in the occupations of those whose achievements are described in the book. Such fields as medicine, music, education and the ministry are illustrated in the characters selected.

Mrs. Hammond is a Southern white woman who knows the conditions of Southern life intimately and who writes from the standpoint of one who is in close and sympathetic touch with both races. She is the author of "In Black and White: An Interpretation of Southern Life," which has been a popular and useful book.

Social Studies

RURAL NEW YORK

By ELMER O. FIPPIN. 381 pages.

RURAL CALIFORNIA

By E. J. WICKSON. 399 pages.

RURAL MICHIGAN

By L. ALLEN CHASE. 492 pages. The Macmillan Company, New York. $2 each.

These three volumes are the first of a series which, if public demand warrants, will cover every State in this country and every province in Canada. The books are a real contribution to the knowledge of rural life within the States of which they treat. They cover the physical and climatic conditions, soils, the history and development of agriculture, agricultural and animal industries, marketing, highways, and transportation, educational and recreational resources, and governmental work for country life. Valuable statistical appendices give many facts in great detail. The book on Michigan, in addition, includes an excellent chapter on rural living conditions. The other two books would have been enhanced in value by similar chapters.

A religious weekly is no place for an extended criticism of works of this character. They differ somewhat as the States differ and according to the individuality of the author. They are readable save that in the volume on California there is a rather tiresome reiteration of the climatic and other "unusual" attractions of that State. Quite apart from their technical information these books have a great deal of value to the church administrator and to the country minister. It is

The successive waves of persecution, massacre and deportations that befell the Near East have also struck heavily the little group of Greek Protestants. Since early in the 19th century, as a result of the activities of our missionaries, Greek Protestant Churches had been formed in Smyrna, Manissa, Samosun, Ismid, Ordou and other places near Marsovan, Talas and Cesarea.

All these churches have been destroyed and the members, including pastors, teachers and other leaders have been killed or deported and the survivors, mostly women, children and old men, have taken refuge in Greece.

The Little Greek Protestant Churches in Athens, Piraeus, Salonica, and Janina are now overcrowded for worship. Many of the refugees are still without shelter and deprived of the simple necessities of life. Among them are pastors, teachers and their families—or families of deceased workers and leaders.

The brethren in Greece have done their utmost to help their fellow Christian refugees, but the task is simply beyond their power. They appeal to the Evangelical Churches in Great Britain and America, to whom they have been always turning for help and guidance in normal times and all emergencies as to a mother.

These Protestant refugees were a real moral and spiritual power in their respective communities in Turkey, they will doubtless exercise similar influence in their new surroundings in Greece. To help them is really to help the future of all Greece. It is more than giving bread to the hungry. Besides, they are appealing as those of the household of faith.

In addition to what you have already given repeatedly towards the general relief in the Near East, would you not send at once some further aid towards the relief of this special group of homeless refugees in Greece, mostly women, children and old men?

All contributions should be sent to Cleveland H. Dodge, Treasurer, 151 Fifth Avenue, New York City, marked Greek Protestant.

Near East Relief

New York CityVia Commercial
Constantinople

March 14, 1923.

Vickrey, N.Y.

To-day's shipload of exiles from Asiatic Turkey increased to 32,000 the total number of refugees now at Constantinople, on their way to Athens. Sick, destitute and without food, clothing or homes to go to, they present a tremendous relief problem calling for prompt energetic action if they are not all to perish.

Constantinople is menaced by the worst epidemic of diseases in its tragic history. Near East Relief has gone to their assistance with American doctors, nurses, medicines, food-stuffs and clothing, thus assuming a new responsibility severely taxing its limited resources.

In the harbor, crowded with twenty-one warships of seven different nations, are four refugee ships crammed with deportees from Asia Minor, who have waited for days to be landed. Ashore, at eleven different places along the beautiful Bosphorus, earlier arrivals are huddled together in windowless, doorless, leaky buildings, under conditions beyond description. Afloat and ashore, smallpox, typhus, dysentery and pneumonia go unchecked. Yesterday's death toll in Bosphorus camps was seventy-two. Weakened by days of travel, by wagon and on foot from interior Anatolia to the Black Sea ports, Trebizonde and Samsoun, these wretched people fall easy victims to disease. Many of those who survived their march of terror to the sea died on shipboard and 60 per cent. of those who lived through the voyage on filthy, crowded ships, were diseased on arrival here. On one ship 200 died out of 2,500, and Doctor Wilfred Post, of Princeton, called it a "Black Hole of Calcutta."

At Scutari, where the worst conditions prevail, 10,000 deportees are existing in Selamlı Barracks and stables. Deaths average 25 daily. Typhus to-day claimed the last member of a family of twelve to fall victim to that disease since arrival here. The fourth physician to die of the same malady while attending refugees succumbed yesterday. Dr. Post, on one of his rounds, counted 100 dead bodies. Wrapped in bundles of rags, death had come days before the living knew it. One room contained 53 bodies. Refugees were afraid to bury them for fear of contracting disease. 3,000 people, who a few weeks ago were prosperous farmers in Anatolia, live on mud floors of stables, where many of them become staring skeletons from undernourishment, and are waiting to die. Children are brought into the world a few feet from where the village priest offers prayers over the dead.

No less terrifying are scenes at Boadjikeuy Camp and other depositories of the destitute and starving exiles. Especially heart-rending is the plight of 1,200 dumped into a shelterless cove at Asiatic Kavak a few days ago, where they are exposed to cold and rain and where pneumonia is mowing them down.

Turkish gendarmes who guard these concentration camps have strict orders from Angora prohibiting taking photographs.

Word has just been received that the Turkish steamship Guljemal which brought 4,000 from the Black Sea to San Stefano is returning to Trebizonde for additional deportees to dump into these overcrowded camps to await removal to Greece. This notwithstanding fact that Greece has absorbed more than 1,000,000.

inconceivable that anyone going to work in any of these States should take up his task without thoroughly digesting the information here afforded. For the lack of such knowledge many a man has made serious mistakes. It is greatly to be hoped that the series can be completed.

SOCIAL CHANGE, WITH RESPECT TO CULTURE AND ORIGINAL NATURE

By WILLIAM FIELDING OGBURN, Professor of Sociology at Barnard College. B. W. Huebsch, Inc., New York City. 365 pages.

This book is one of the most significant of recent contributions to sociological literature. It is undogmatic. It has no air of finality. It is a discussion, with little claim for solutions. In Part One, Professor Ogburn is concerned first with social heritage, traditions, customs, laws, knowledge, moral standards, institutions, arts, etc., and second, with our biological heritage, instincts, emotions, etc. Part Two contains an interesting résumé of social evolution. Professor Ogburn points out that though biological change has been slight, if indeed it has happened at all, cultural change has been very marked and extensive. Also, there seems to be "no correlation between cultural changes and biological changes." "The significance of the biological factor for the study of social evolution is thus somewhat more limited than is usually thought." Part three is given over to "Cultural Inertia," Part Four to "Social Maladjustments, Part Five to "Adjustment Between Human Nature and Culture." A special point in Part Five is the opinion that man made civilization has not gone ahead very much more rapidly than man himself. The actions of man go on freely in various cultures. But the solution in cases of maladjustment seems to be rather to try to modify culture than to change the nature of man. Professor Ogburn also warns that changing culture on a large scale is an exceedingly hard and slow process, much more difficult than is usually thought.

THE LITTLE COUNTRY THEATER

By ALFRED ARVOLD. Published by the Macmillan Company. 220 pages. $2.50.

From the point of view of literary style and arrangement of material, it would be easy to find weaknesses in this book, but such criticism has no place in the review of a work which is the only one in its field, and which is of such tremendous usefulness to all who are interested in rural life. Nearly ten years ago Alfred Arvold and some of his students turned an old, dingy, dull-gray, second-floor chapel of the Administration Building of the North Dakota College of Agriculture into a little country theater. With home-made scenery, and simple green curtains, they began a significant work which is an example of what can be done with hundreds of village halls, school houses, vacant stores and church basements.

The book is a record of the achievements of this theater and of the spread of the country theater movement through North Dakota and beyond. One of the most valuable portions of the book is the appendix, which lists a large number of plays suitable for amateur production in rural communities. It also gives hints on the presentation of plays, a bibliography on presentation, costume, make-up, scenic effects and stage lighting, and the promotion of plays through the newspapers. A glossary of stage terms is appended, and in the final appendix there are the pictures and plans of certain buildings and open air theaters. One entire play, written by a student, is given, as well as portions or stories of several others. The volume should be invaluable to rural young people's societies and to socially-minded ministers and school teachers.

SOCIAL WORK IN THE LIGHT OF HISTORY

By STUART ALFRED QUEEN. Lippincott Series on Sociology, edited by PROFESSOR E. C. HAYES. 327 pages.

This is the first volume in the Lippincott Series on Sociology which is designed to cover both pure and practical sociology. It is also the first presentation of social work in the light of history. Social work is defined as the "art of adjusting personal relations, of helping to overcome difficulties which may arise, for example, between the native and foreign-born, between employer and employee, between school and home." The first part of the book deals with social work as it is to-day. In succeeding parts the author traces the steps by which we have come through nineteenth century humanitarianism to the English poor law and back to the philanthropy of the churches and communities of the middle ages. This rather unique arrangement leaves one with the impression that the bulk of the book is concerned with the giving of alms and the development of alms-giving to the high state of organized efficiency which we have to-day. The book closes with a summary chapter and conclusions. Specialists in different fields of social work might feel that the book was inadequate because it omitted or perhaps minimized their own particular interest. The reviewer, however, knows of no other volume in the English language which gives such a thorough-going glimpse of the total field of social work from the time of King Alfred of England on to the present.

RURAL SCHOOL SURVEY OF NEW YORK STATE

By THE JOINT COMMITTEE ON RURAL SCHOOLS, GEORGE A. WORKS, Chairman, Ithaca, New York. Volume I. 75 cents.

The first volume summarizes the other eight studies of this survey which have appeared or will shortly be off the press. The Committee of Twenty-one, which directed the inquiry, had on it three representatives each from the Grange, the Farm and Home Bureaus, the Dairymen's League, the State Department of Education, the State Teachers' Association, and the State College of Agriculture. The study was financed by The Commonwealth Fund, Inc., of New York City. There is a study of rural school teachers, a special point being the inexperience of the teacher of the one-room school. This teacher also comes from families unable to give their children professional education. The New York State system of examinations is rather roundly condemned, and consolidation, greater community activity, scholarship aid, rural departments in normal schools are recommended. Perhaps most significant in the study of the administrative phases is the recommendation that there be a new unit of local administration, the community, to be made up of the village and those school districts in its trade area. The committee got the views of 4,467 rural school patrons in regard to rural school improvement. The majority of these patrons wants the superintendent of schools elected by popular vote, opposes consolidation, and wants qualifications for school elections different from those of general elections. On these three points the committee disagrees. However, it commends the suggestions from patrons for a more flexible and varied curricula, more mature and trained teachers, and better distribution of tax money and State aid. The Committee has done an admirable piece of work in calling the attention of the public to the inequality of opportunity between the city and rural child. It holds, as do we, that the opportunity should be equal and that the resources of the State should be used to achieve that end.

THE GRANGE MASTER AND LECTURER

THE AGRICULTURAL BLOC

By SENATOR ARTHUR CAPPER.

THE LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

THE COUNTRY AGENT AND FARM BUREAU

By M. C. BURRITT.

The first three volumes of the Farmers' Bookshelf, published by Harcourt, Brace and Company, New York. With introductions by PRESIDENT K. L. BUTTERFIELD, editor of the series. $1.25 each.

The author of the first volume is secretary and past lecturer of the Michigan State Grange. The book is written to be of the most practical service to the local grange master and the lecturer, especially in setting up a more varied and interesting meeting. Senator Capper, of Kansas, who succeeded Judge Kenyon as head of the Farm Bloc, writes the first book which has appeared on this group which has so successfully engineered legislation during the past year and a half. A good part of the book is given to justifying the bloc's program, under such topics as "The Crisis in Agriculture," "The After-War Depression," "The High Cost of Living," "Deficiencies in Farm Finance," "The Burden of Transportation," "The Problems of Marketing," "The Struggles of Co-operation," "Protection for Agriculture," etc. There is then an exposition of "The Bloc's Program and Its Record." Mr. Burritt's book is the second to deal with the Farm Bureau and county agent. It is written for the farmer, much more than for the public. It is the most detailed of the three volumes. Part 1 deals with the County Agent's Service, and Part 2 with The Background and the Means of Service. The Farmers' Bookshelf adds interesting and popular literature to the growing volume of material on rural life.

THE SOCIAL GOSPEL AND PERSONAL RELIGION

By F. ERNEST JOHNSON. Published by The Association Press. 49 pp. 25 cents.

Mr. Johnson, writing for the Federal Council, of which he is a secretary, voices the new feeling in Protestantism that the Church, through its machinery for religious education and through its pulpits, may help direct every current of American life. He says, "Its ministry is spiritual . . . but it is the essence of the ministry that the Church should be able to offer a spiritual diagnosis of every maladjustment in our social life, and that its treatment should extend not merely to individuals, but to the social structure itself. "For this postulate he could no doubt have furnished abundant evidence from Wyclif, Knox, Wesley, Calvin, Carey and Livingstone. He has a chapter on the "Social Creed of the Churches."

Religious Education

THE CHURCH AT PLAY

By NORMAN E. RICHARDSON. Published by The Abingdon Press. $1.25.

This is a manual for directors of the social and recreational work of a church. The last four years have broadened the Church's program wonderfully. Pageantry came with a rush, for it filled a hole which the moving pictures had cut in church attendance. Recreational work has been a more gradual development, too often unrelated to the educational agencies of the Church. This book is for the recreational specialist, but attempts to relate the work to that of religious education. It covers the Scouts, the Camp-Fire and similar organizations. In a chapter on dramatics the dramatic club is recommended. A third of the book is on indoor and outdoor stunts and games.

A HAND-BOOK OF GAMES AND PROGRAMS

By WILLIAM RALPH LAPORTE. Published by The Abingdon Press. $1.

Professor Laport is in the U. S. C. at Los Angeles, where the recreational methods of the churches have been greatly developed. The whole book is on stunts and special programs, for indoors and outdoors, for young people and adolescents. It is to be compared with Miss Geister's "Ice-Breakers."

A STUDY OF THE PRIMARY CHILD

By MARY THEODORA WHITLEY. Published by The Westminster Press, Philadelphia. 60 cents.

Dr. Whitley is a professor in the Religious Education Department of Teachers' College, where the methods of teaching have gone through a revolution in recent years, but her book is revolutionary only in the sense that it puts the child at the center. She writes simply and beautifully, and her chapter about the first Sunday after promotions shows storytelling ability. In the clearest way she tells what the great experts on child-study are talking about. Nowadays there is a lot of new knowledge about children's health concerning which the modern primary teacher ought to be informed; for, as few people know, "hardly any child has all four of the sixth-year molars in good condition," and teeth are the point of entry for the infectious diseases of childhood.

This little book tells what children see in pictures—i.e., animals or people, and not backgrounds or colors; that first-graders know three thousand words; that nothing can be more unwise than to tell a child he must never fight; that a child learned the end of the Twenty-third Psalm as "Surely good Mrs. Murphy shall follow me all the days of my life," and why; and dozens of other things everyone who loves children will want to know about. Dr. Whitley says that the chief means of developing the attitude of oneness with the Church (which is what our Sunday-schools often miss) is doing, working together, engaging in a common activity, working out a project together and learning thereby sympathy, good-will and helpfulness. We recommend this book not only for training classes, but also for general reading.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL AT WORK IN TOWN AND COUNTRY

By WILLIAM MOUZON BRABHAM. Published by the George H. Doran Company. $1.50.

This book is from the Methodist Church South and is by a layman trained in the school of experience, who for years was in charge of the rural Sunday-school work of that denomination and now heads its Sunday-school administration. There is practically nothing about the newer methods of teaching (which are of great importance for the future), nor about through-the-week work. But there are two good chapters on winning the life of the pupil, and the plans for a one-room church building are away above the average. For many schools it should be a helpful book.

Poetry

THE BLACK PANTHER

By JOHN HALL WHEELOCK. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.

There can be no question that Mr. Wheelock is one of the most authentic poets writing to-day. He is possessed with the piercing sweetness of the mystery and uncertainty of life. There is an element of the prophetic in him. Evidently he communes much alone with his soul. This appears in this his late volume of poems, in which he brings the whole universe to express the feeling that demands expression in himself. The title of the book and the first sonnet in it are the symbol of this fact:

"There is a panther caged within my breast;
All day I feed him with my living heart;"

Spending his childhood in Long Island, Mr. Wheelock has absorbed the strange sense of immensity that dwells on those long sea-beaches and level marshes and rolling sand-dunes, and also something of the melancholy,

"The loveliness that haunts the world with pain—Light out of Paradise!"

One of the most beautiful of his poems, "Sea-Horizons," written from the background of these memories, comes to an exquisite conclusion in the last stanza:

"Inexorable Compassion, may I never Reach the last verge and limits of your love!
Beyond me, still beyond me melt forever
The eternal margins, fading as I move."

Mr. Wheelock has a very sure way of capturing the immediate sense of spiritual moods, as when he describes the coming of night by the seaside:

"Night swallowed up the sun,
And darkness, like a hood,
Sank—and the sea breathed on;
In silence and solitude
The eternal will was done."

He meditates on the conflict between "the carnal world forever well and young"

and the appeal of

"the defeated Christ
That for your love upon the cross tree hung."

He wrestles with the issue of immortality in the poem on Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, and "The Divine Fantasy" is one of the most extraordinary poems I have ever read on the struggle between the conception of a universe and a world of disorder. A brief quotation will suffice for a foretaste of this remarkable poem:

"Brother, what news out of the night, what word
From the frontiers of mind beyond our ken,
Of mysteries unimagined yet of men,
Compassed by travail of your spirit? O
Could you but reach us! Could we but know
Across the imperturbable old Dark
Some answering glimmer of the ancient Spark Lifted—some token, tangible to sense,
Of the indomitable Intelligence
That thrones on matter—language visible—
Crying, "Eternity—and all is well!
Brother, be of good cheer; we, too, have known!
Not lonely moves, not utterly alone,
Your sad fraternity through the dark of God:
But the confederate legions are abroad,
Life's flag advances on the starry way,
And Consciousness, still battling, still at bay,
Holds the bright forts against Oblivion—
What answering thrill would 'round the planet run!"

DEVICES AND DESIRES

By FRANCIS C. MACDONALD. Princeton University Press.
$1.50.

Mr. MacDonald's poetry contains a modern note in its general expression, although like all good poetry its main interest is the eternal aspect of varying moods. He is in love with beauty of all kinds, especially the beauty of fellowship and comradeship. He loves not only youth, but youths, and writes with a vigorous style, sometimes lacking in polish, but always permeated with strong feeling. I suppose one should not look in poetry for a conventional expression of either morality or religion, and yet one comes from this book with a strong conviction of the whole-souled religion and sane morality of the poet. There is a profound sense of good underlying these poems, as appears in "Optima Memoriae."

"Once, within a desolate place,
Broken, I cried aloud for grace;
Silence and night surrounded me,
Immortal, in eternity.
I waited, desperate, for a space.
A light, a voice! I slipped my fear
Back into time; my sight came clear
To heavenly vision, and I saw!
And with the joy of comradeship
His name came bravely to my lip:
His, whom we name but do not know,
And have misjudged a fear, an awe,
A scourge! I did not find him so!"

There is a vigorous demand for sane conduct and for the direction of life on the basis of the clearest reality a man can find. For example, in "Vladivostok Harbor":

"Thistles are gay, but bear no figs,
Grapes are not gathered from the thorn;
Soldiers and prostitutes and pigs . . .
Of such what destiny is born?"

"Deep in the heart of man and race
Purpose and faith must interlock:
Time will be tyrant for a space
And have his will of Vladivostok."

Mr. MacDonald revolts against the aimlessness of much of life and calls for its purification at any cost, as in the poems "To an Alchemist" and "On an Uncertain Day in Winter." His love and his pity for human nature are apparent in many poems, witness his picture of the young man:

"Of those whom noble death has saved
From life's inevitable shame.
Life would have been too strong for him who braved
The lesser assault of fame."

This poem is a strong picture of the disintegrated young man suddenly made one by the call to war.

Mr. MacDonald's travels through many countries of the East, Japan, China, Siam, and the islands of the sea, are the source of many exquisite pictures in verse. Like the "Sweet-Meat Vendor" (Bangkok), he has watched with an observant eye the conflict between the Christian and pagan religions, and in several poems he gives sidelights on this conflict. In "Paganism" he points to the tremendous hold that native gods have on people through their long association with the soil and the beloved scenes of childhood. In "The Native Christian to His Forsaken God" he pictures the conflict in the soul of a converted native in love with an unconverted woman. Again he stands amid the ruins of an ancient Buddhist temple, speaking of its past glories and its present desolation.

"Where now one priest, with toothless prayers,

THE LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

Chants to a tinkling modern bell.

"The sacred tree has rooted there
And overturns a sacred shrine;
And here beside a shattered stair
A god is rescued—by a vine!

"Faith after faith has flourished here,
Nor wrath nor pity been preferred;
And still from fruitless year to year
Prayer shall be offered—and unheard!

"Unheard? I may not say as much!
Nearby I see the Christian cross:
Shall Buddha perish at the touch,
Nor Christ be poorer for the loss?"

Other poems in the book offer lovely sketches of natural objects. Mr. MacDonald has a beautiful sense of the value of sounds, especially in the names of places; and a keen observation of colors. One poem at least is written in a pure vein of whimsy, where he describes the meeting of the four queens in the desert of Gobi,

"Away from friends and family,
And manners, and fuss, and chairs."

LAST POEMS

By A. E. HOUSMAN. Published by Henry Holt and Company. 79 pp. $1.50.

Mr. Housman, in a brief foreword to this volume, says: "I publish these poems, few though they are, because it is not likely that I shall be impelled to write much more." Indeed, one wonders why he should have been impelled to write some of these poems, because many of them are simply cries of despair—melodious and technically exquisite cries, but still despairing cries. He writes of life with irony and strikes often the chord of the vanity of all effort. At times there is a kind of grim courage about the verses:

"The troubles of our proud and angry dust
Are from eternity, and shall not fail.
Bear them we can, and if we can we must.
Shoulder the sky, my lad, and drink your ale."

But sometimes he expresses merely a puny and helpless cry:

"I, a stranger and afraid
In a world I never made."

and again:

"Keep we must, if keep we can,
These foreign laws of God and man."

Mr. Housman is certainly a discouraged imperialist and much occupied with the purely fatalistic aspects of soldiering, as is witnessed in the "Grenadier" and the "Lancer," and again in the verses,

"Oh stay with company and mirth
And daylight and the air;
Too full already is the grave
Of fellows that were good and brave
And died because they were."

Two poems seem to me to stand out strikingly from the melancholy tone of the book. "Epithalamium" has something of Miltonic power in its use of language and beauty of thought. One feels that the poet here has been touched by a genuine personal interest in other people and has turned away from lonely meditation upon the futility of mortal affairs. Also the untitled poem numbered XXXII has a beautiful turn to it, and expresses a noble experience of life:—the contrast between the youth's imagining himself about to die for his friends, and his finding as life goes on that he could save them, but that they did die for him.

One wishes that the exquisite poetical talent of Mr. Housman were oftener expended on the worthier themes of these latter poems, rather than on the melodious bewailing of death and fate and imperialism. And yet he has his place as all pessimists do in an imperfect world.

THE WALLS OF HAMELIN

By C. W. KENNEDY. Published by Princeton University Press. $1.50.

Mr. Kennedy writes with classical grace and with much of romantic passion. His mastery of metre is exquisite. His use of words is direct and precise. One feels that he is a real master of his instrument. In a certain way his poems lack something of the force of the more rigorous handling of the themes, but perhaps they make up for this in the memorableness of their expression. He is always in love with beauty and has something of Keats' sense of swooning under its power.

"O still and beautiful, brave death!
O swift, sweet pain!
To be made fey with beauty until breath
Is softly slain!"

But he does not find beauty solely in far-off romance, as one sees in "O Where doth Beauty Dwell."

"O not on honey-dew
Is beauty fed;
She doth her life renew
With wine and bread.

"She stands where thou dost stand,
Is where thou art;
Nearer than foot or hand,
Near as the heart."

As in all true poets, association and memory blend in the melody of his singing, and the very sense of the transitoriness of life deepens the poignant joy of the passing moment.

Mr. Kennedy's love of the sea and of ships, of the sea-shore and sand-dunes of Cape Cod, forms a delightful background in all his poetry. Something of the pathos of all those who love the sea appears in the writing,

"The sea winds murmur of dim to-morrows,
Joys of the brown earth, grief of the wave;
Tongueless wailing of old sea-sorrows
In the gray marsh whispering finds a grave."

Mr. Kennedy has the poet's ability to enter into the feeling of other people, and he does so beautifully in "As I went down to Provincetown," where he pictures the old man whose senses have left him, sitting in the sun,

"Skin like russet apples,
And shaking hands;
Eyes that searched for something
Beyond the sands."

And again in "A Preacher in the Market," and "Princeton, 1917," and most exquisitely in his picture of a woman's self-renunciation in "Beside the Hearth." "Day after Day" is one of the most powerful and moving pictures of sacrificial service that I have read. The last two lines, depicting the force of reaction, are instinct with perfect understanding:

THE LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

"Then strength grew dead within her—and she wept—Great tears of generations of despair."

There is a series of lovely songs for Christmas which would well repay memorizing. The last poem in the volume, "The Walls of Hamelin," may perhaps be called the summing up of the whole book, if a poet ever does such a thing.

"Except ye seek as a child,
With a child's heart,
Loveliness defiled
Shall be your part.

"Love goeth where love will
By land and sea,
Breaking all bonds until
The world is free.

"Love is the heart's desire
For the moon—for the star,
With frail wings that aspire
To all heavens that are. . . ."

CAROLINA CHANSONS

By DuBOISE HEYWARD and HERVEY ALLEN. Published by the Macmillan Company. 130 pp.

The reading of poetry interpretative of local communities is one of the best ways of increasing one's understanding of people. Personally I have long believed that the way to avoid the deadening provincialisms and yet obtain the value of the local color of any community is by entering into the mental and emotional experience of other places than one's own.

"These poems are impressionistic attempts to present the fleeting feeling of the moment, landscape moods, and the ephemeral attitudes of the past. Legends are material to be molded, and not facts to be recorded. Above all here is no pretense of propaganda." So say the authors of these delightful pictures of life in the semi-tropical landscape of the low country of coastal Carolina.

One can hardly write about these vivid pictorial poems of strange splendors and mysterious deeds. One is more inclined to quote. Here are pictures of pirates like Bonnet, who swash-buckled into the coast towns:

"The Orient flamed out in shawl and gown,
Until a sudden and unholy splendor
Irradiated all the quiet town.

And those who should have known, shared in the revels,
And passed their neighbors with averted face."

Here is a poem on the first landing of LaFayette near Georgetown. And another on the legend of the loss at sea of Theodosia, daughter of Aaron Burr; and the horrible legend of the "Leaping Poll." Here is a poem on the "Blockade Runner," which is worth a whole history of the Civil War in describing the feeling still existing in some of the backwaters of Southern life. "The Last Crew" describes the exploit of the "Fish-boat" said "to have been the first submarine vessel to sink an enemy ship in time of war." The exploit caused the death of the whole crew of the submarine, as indeed was clearly foreseen before the attack was made. The poem aches with the pathos of the fact of the incongruity of war in such a land:

"These sunny islands were not meant for wars;
See, how they curve away
Before the bay,
Bidding the voyager pause.
Warm with the hoarded suns of centuries,
They laugh like happy bathers, while the seas
Young with the garnered youth of many Springs, Break in their open arms,

And the slow-moving breeze
Draws languid fingers down their placid brows.
Even the surly ocean knows their charms,
And under the shrill laughter of the surf,
He booms and sings his heavy monotone.

Of course the picture of the Negro appears constantly in these pages:

"I hear them singing in the fields
Like voices from the long-ago;
They speak to me of somber worlds
And sorrows that the humble know;
Of sorrow—yet their tones release
A harmony of larger hours
From easy epochs long at peace
Amid an irony of flowers."

We see them on the way to Church:

"Sundays, along the moss-draped roads,
The beribboned black folk go to church
By threes and twos, carrying their shoes,
With orange turbans, gingham, rainbow hats;
Then bucks flaunt tiger-lily ties and watchet suits,
Smoking cob pipes and faintly sweet cheroots.
Wagons with oval wheels and kitchen chairs screech by,
Where Joseph-coated white-teethed maidens sit Demurely,
While the old mule rolls back the ivory of his eye.
Soon from the white-washed churches roll away
Among the live oak trees,
Rivers of melancholy harmonies,
Full of the sorrows of the centuries
The white man hears, but cannot feel."

Especially in an age when so many people live their lives in the rush of a modern city we do well to read such poems as these which present so vividly the tone of life in other days and other fashions and give us glimpses apart from all propaganda of the backwaters of the human soul.

UNDER THE TREE

By ELIZABETH MADOX ROBERTS. Published by B. W. Huebsch, Inc. 87 pp. $1.50.

This volume contains a number of verses written in a tone of childlike naïvete. The themes are slight and are often delicately treated; but occasionally they verge on pathos.

Two poems describe the observations of a child on people in church. For example: "Mr. Pennybaker at Church"—

"He holds his song book very low,
And then he stretches down his face,
And Mother said, "You mustn't watch,
He's only singing bass."

"He makes his voice go walking down,
Or else he hurries twice as fast
As all the rest, but even then
He finishes the song the last."

Another represents the wonder of a child watching the hens settle down to sleep in the barn. The "Crescent Moon" pictures the exuberant delight of playing children when they suddenly discovered

"The little new moon above the tree."

It is in occasional little glimpses of minute and accurate observation that Miss Roberts is at her best. As when she describes (always through the eyes of a child), a chicken coming under a bush in a shower:

THE LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

"He shivered a little under his skin.
And then he shut his eyeballs in."

This is naïf description of careful and sympathetic observation. But one may justly inquire if this is poetry in any real sense.

Perhaps the most poetical of all is "My Heart," which records the habit of little children of setting words to any sound which keeps on going—even the beating of their own hearts. There is real poetry in that thought. I think the book will recall to many the moods and questions of childhood and their quaint associations.

Miscellaneous

HIS CHILDREN'S CHILDREN

By ARTHUR TRAIN. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons. pp. 391. $2.

This is a salutary novel portraying briefly but pointedly the life of three generations in New York. There is Peter B. Kayne, "Pirate Emeritus" who established the family fortunes and now lives as remnant on the top floor of his son Rufus' house and occupies himself chiefly by sitting in Central Park and dreaming over children and squirrels enlivened by a pathetic interest in the youngest generation. Rufus Kayne and his wife, prosperous and worldly, conducting themselves according to the accepted conventions of the society to which they have aspired, seem hardly to notice their children. Claudia has married an English fortune hunter and finds herself involved in the terrible toils of the outlandish English divorce laws. Diana is saved from shipwreck chiefly by her devotion (acquired independently of all parental guidance) to outdoor life and the entrance of Maitland, the strong hero. Sheila, the youngest, is pictured "going the life" of the society débutante. Many other figures pass across the scenes of these pages and all of them seem drawn to the life. Pepperill, the bird-like lawyer; Larry, the millionaire sporting man; Dr. Dhal and his Butterfly Club, with the mysterious hold of this Eastern fakir on poor society dupes; Mercedes, the dancer; the silly youths that join the social whirl; the skilful managers of society affairs. The whole is a mirror of truth held up to the follies, foibles, and innate weakness of such a life. Nowhere does the author preach in the narrow sense of the word. Yet his story is a tremendous appeal to common sense, decency and ultimately to religion. The final scene is in a way an epitome of the whole book. Rufus Kayne involved in unjustified employment of the funds of the trust company of which he is president, finds it necessary to liquidate his own personal assets to meet the obligations. His fashionable house comes under the auctioneers hammer, and the usual mob of people is there to gather up the remains. A great tapestry which hangs in the hall is being bid for. Old Peter B. Kayne (from whom the events are being kept lest he be broken by the shame of his son), senses something and creeps down stairs to a gallery above the hall where the auction is proceeding. Somehow he dislodges the fastening which holds up the big tapestry and it falls, disclosing on the wall behind it a tablet unseen for many years on which the architect had inscribed: "Except the Lord build the house they labor in vain that build it."

The novel is well written, with sympathy and candidness and in a straightforward style, terse and delicate. The reader will find it both engrossing and stimulating.

THE CALL OF THE MOUNTAIN

By LEROY JEFFERS. Published by Dodd, Mead and Company. $5.

This is a book to thrill the heart of every one who loves the mountains. To those who know them not intimately, it will come as a real call. We hardly see how anyone can resist starting out to conquer one of our great western mountains or even starting for Switzerland itself, after he has read this book. It is a story of personal adventure, and such adventure!

Mr. Jeffers passed through all sorts of experiences, facing the "imminent deadly peril" in almost every hour of his adventures. The book is full of the joy of conquest, but more than that it is full all of the glory and wonder of the world. No one has caught the message of the mountains in fuller measure than has Mr. Jeffers, and no one has more beautifully interpreted their beauty to the world. It will become a classic of our American mountains as Whympers book has become the classic of the Alps.

Mr. Jeffers also dwells upon the inspiration of mountain climbing, both for physical health and faith in the great spiritual verities of the universe. The book is superbly illustrated and will find a place in the library of every lover of nature.

PROPHETS OF A NEW ERA

By DR. NEWELL DWIGHT HILLIS. Published by Fleming H. Revell Company. $1.50.

The criticisms of Dr. Hillis are never uninteresting. In this book he handles seven prophets, Dante, Savonarola, William the Silent, Cromwell, Milton, John Wesley, Garibaldi and Ruskin. He carries us through eight centuries beginning with the Dawn after the Dark Ages and ending with the Diffusion of the Beautiful. An indictment frequently brought against leaders in the world's work to-day is that they are weak. Diplomats, statesmen, rulers, religious leaders are blind men leading the blind bringing mankind at intervals into a ditch. It is fair criticism. Our need is strength. Now is the time to turn to the prophets for direction and stimulus. We need to listen to Savonarola as he faces the great man of Florence, Lorenzo the magnificent.

In one of the most interesting of the illustrations contained in this book Dr. Hillis says: "One day the Prince was seen walking in the garden of the monastery. An attendant came to Savonarola and announced that Lorenzo the Magnificent was in the garden. "Does he ask for me?" "No," replied the young monk. "Then let him walk." Shortly afterward the Prince sent a deputation to wait on the new Prior, telling him that it was not good form to preach against the Prince, who was the patron of St. Mark's to which Savonarola replied, "Did I receive my position from Lorenzo, or from Almighty God?" Savonarola's eyes blazed and he spoke in tones of thunder and the answer was, "From Almighty God." "Then," went on the Prior, "To Almighty God will I render homage." The Savonarola spirit is needed to-day. What an incentive his life to ministers of religion is. The world has lost its way because governments and peoples have refused to let Christ reign over them. The church of the Living God is doing a mighty work, but it can do more. It could do more if it would catch the fire of the great prophets. There are too many soft concealments, not courage enough to say the things that bite into the consciences of men who sit on industrial and political thrones. All timorous leaders should come to this book. It is a renewer of faith and enthusiasm and courage. It is blocked in with illustrations gathered to inspire the namby-pamby to action. It is a book of power, and that is the need of the age.

Three Best Books of the Year

The following are additions to the symposium published in our edition of February 24, in answer to the question, "Which three books among the publications of the last year have made the deepest impression upon you and why?"

ARTHUR J. BROWN.

Secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A.

"Belief in God," by Bishop Gore, for its clear and strong vindication of the necessity and the reasonableness of faith.
 "Outline of Science," by J. Arthur Thomson, for its readable presentation of the latest scientific theories and discoveries.

"A Gentleman in Prison," by Tokichi Ishii, for its intense human interest and its moving account of the transforming power of the Gospel of Christ.

FINIS S. IDLEMAN,

Minister of Central Christian Church, New York

"The Approach to the New Testament," by Moffatt, because it does "approach" the New Testament with all the light of modern research, and it gives the touch of truest mysticism.

"Jesus in the Experience of Men," by Glover, because it reflects the development of Christianity out of human environment.

"Aspects of Religious and Scientific Thought," by R. H. Hutton, because it is the work of one of the greatest minds in the Christian Church in recent years and reveals the range of Christian ethics and principles to widely varying themes. It is written in clear and simple language and every page is fascinating.

J. C. MASSEE,

Pastor of Tremont Temple Baptist Church, Boston.

"A Handful of Stars," by F. W. Boreham, appealed to me very strongly because the author has developed very highly the sense of homiletical meditation. His ready pen makes many a commonplace bush in the wilderness of thought glow with a living flame of a divine presence and message. Somehow he makes men and their life motives live in this volume. The book stimulated my faith, awakened my aspirations of holiness and strengthened my resolution to preach worthily the Gospel committed to my trust.

"His Appearing and His Kingdom," by Fred Eugene Hagin, was of unusual interest to me because of its faithful exposition and Scriptural basis for a great truth loved, but neglected by many. The book is altogether sane, reasonable and belief-compelling. I have not read its equal on the subject.

FRED B. SMITH,

Chairman of the Commission on Councils of Churches

The following named books have been read with great interest and help:

"Christianity and Progress," by Fosdick.

"The Mind in the Making," by James Harvey Robinson.

ROY B. GUILD,

Executive Secretary, The Commission on Councils of Churches

The following books have been read with great interest and with help:

"The Church in America," by Williams Adams Brown.

"The Mind in the Making," by James Harvey Robinson.

"Introduction to Rural Sociology," by Paul L. Vogt.

Visitors from European Churches

Prof. Karl Beth, of Vienna University, is in this country at present giving lectures in a number of our theological seminaries and also making contacts which will be helpful in the relief of the intellectuals of Austria. He is making his headquarters at the Federal Council.

Chaplain Eli Bertalot, of the Italian Church at Geneva, at present visiting in this country, received the degree of Doctor of Divinity at Ursinus College, Pennsylvania, on "Founders' Day."

Five hundred clergymen, attending the annual Council of Cities of the Methodist Episcopal Church, unanimously passed a resolution calling upon President Harding to liberate the remaining fifty-three war-opinion prisoners. They pointed out that all other nations had liberated such prisoners, and reminded the President that this country had long been regarded as the home of freedom of speech and press. They expressed the profound conviction that the best interests of democracy would be served by granting amnesty to the politicals. Passage of the resolution followed a stirring appeal for free speech by Bishop Francis J. McConnell, of Pittsburgh.

Prodigal Daughters*

By Joseph Hocking

SYNOPSIS:

Colonel Lester Trelawney arrives home in England after six years of military service in India and Mesopotamia to find his two daughters sadly beset by the flood of new morals, and ethics and dress of the "younger generation." Being warned by Mrs. Trelawney that Eleanor, aged 21, and Peggy, not quite 18, were no longer susceptible to discipline, he decides to observe them for himself, while he finishes some very important work at the War Department. Arriving home about eight o'clock one evening, he finds the girls have "gone out," but where their mother confesses she has not been told. He decides to wait until they return. About three o'clock he hears voices at the doorway and he follows them as they make their way into the school room.

IV. 'THE STORM BREAKS.

BOTH girls started as they saw him. Each of them sat in an armchair, their legs crossed, smoking.

Eleanor was the more restrained of the two. Although the entrance of her father was unexpected and startling, she kept her seat and went on smoking. Peggy, however, started to her feet, her eyes flashing and her lips quivering, as though she were preparing herself for a storm.

"Excuse me for intruding," said the Colonel quietly, "but I thought I would just let you know that I am not asleep."

Both of them were speechless. There was something in the quiet tones of his voice, something, too, in his very presence that made them afraid.

"I did not get home till eight o'clock," he went on, "and was naturally surprised not to find you here. I was still more surprised to know that your mother did not know where you were gone."

"She did not know, because we didn't think it best to tell her," replied Peggy, evidently ready for battle.

"I see," remarked the Colonel quietly. "May I ask why?"

"Because we thought she might tell you."

"Was there any objection to that?"

"There might be," was Peggy's curt reply.

"I see. You thought I might forbid your going."

There was a touch of anger in his voice which he could not repress. Peggy was quick to note this, and it gave her the courage to say what she and Eleanor had spoken about many times.

"It would have made no difference if you had."

"Indeed, is that so?" he replied quietly. "Anyhow, it gives one an idea how we stand."

He was on the point of saying more, when he looked at the child's angry, defiant eyes. In spite of everything she was a pretty, attractive girl. His memory called up a laughing-eyed, untidily dressed, wilful, but loving little maid, who found it difficult to enunciate her r's. He remembered her as generous hearted, too, difficult to deal with, certainly, but a tender-hearted little thing all the same, and he crushed back the words he was going to utter.

"Children," he said quietly, "you and I will have to understand one another. Naturally, on coming back after so many years I find things changed. But we Trelawneys have always been very proud of our women. We have idealized them somewhat. However, I need not speak about that now. I was much surprised to learn that this is not the first time you have gone out alone, and have returned in the early hours of the morning without getting your mother's consent. Also, you've been out without a proper chaperon. But we'll not discuss it to-night. I'm too distressed to speak as calmly as I ought, while you are not in the frame of mind to receive what I shall have to say in the right spirit. All the same, we shall have to come to an understanding, for I can assure you that this kind of thing must come to an end. To-morrow we will discuss everything fully. Meanwhile it is best that you should know that I am trying to look at things from your point of view, and that although your old dad has been away so long he loves you both very dearly. Good-night, or rather, good-morning. You'll want to go to bed."

He held the door open and waited for them to pass through. He did not offer to kiss them; he did not think it best. He saw the hot, rebellious flash in Peggy's eyes, and noted the supercilious and slightly bored attitude which Eleanor had assumed.

When they had gone the Colonel went back to his den and sat for a long time in deep thought. He had never dreamt of such a position and did not know what to do.

The next morning the Colonel knocked at Eleanor's door. "It's ten o'clock," he said pleasantly; "you'll be late for church if you aren't quick."

The girl did not speak.

"Did you hear me?" said the Colonel in a louder voice.

"Yes, I heard you."

"That's right. You'll be down in a few minutes, then?"

"No, I'm tried. I don't propose getting up yet."

"I say, I am disappointed," said the Colonel. "I had looked forward to your going to church with me on my first Sunday home."

"No, thank you," replied Eleanor, "I don't propose going."

The Colonel hesitated and seemed on the point of saying something more, but evidently decided to be silent. Then he made a movement as if to go to Peggy's room, but again stopped. There was a dangerous flash in his eyes as he went down-stairs, but he said nothing to his wife.

"Going to church, John?" he asked as the clock neared eleven.

"If you wish, dad," replied the boy.

When the Colonel and John returned an hour and a half later the former was very quiet.

When lunch came to an end the girls were preparing to leave the room, but were suddenly arrested by their father's voice.

"Will you all come into 'The Treadmill,'" he said quietly. "I want a little talk with you."

"I hope it won't take long," remarked Peggy; "I have an engagement at three o'clock."

Bringing Christ to Outlying Communities

A Story of the Outstation Work of Imperial Community Church

By David R. Piper

Editor of the "Community Churchman"

A SHADY green park in Imperial, California, which less than twenty years ago was a barren waste, was last spring the scene of a noteworthy gathering. The occasion marked the close of a membership contest in which the Bible school of the community church of Imperial had challenged the combined strength of its own four outstation Sunday-schools. And the outstation schools won the contest by a margin of thirty new members! An inspiring service on May 7 brought the contesting schools together as hosts of the parent school, and the pastor, Rev. John A. McGaughey, preached on the theme, "Victors." Following the church service the crowd, in number more than three hundred, had luncheon under the shade of the pepper trees, while a gentle breeze from the Gulf of California blew refreshingly over them; then all reassembled in classes for Bible study—representatives, these, of fifteen different evangelical denominations.

The Community Church of Imperial has from its inception been a home mission church. No, not a church receiving home mission aid. For it transplanted several such churches. But a church doing mission work at home. Perhaps that is because the members took seriously from their organization in January, 1920, that portion of their simple "Statement of Belief" which says: "It is my purpose, to the extent of my ability, to co-operate with my brethren in the support of His Church and in the extension of its influence." At any rate, the pastor, who came in April, 1920, has had the united support of his people in the extension work which he has carried forward almost from the moment of his arrival on the field.

It was a clear call. For while Imperial had been over-churched, the surrounding districts were without Protestant church privileges. The town churches were miles distant from many of the ranches. And the ranchers were themselves probably farther distant in spirit from the church than they had been in the eastern homes from which some of them had emigrated.

The first extension work to be undertaken by the Imperial church was in the Mesquite Lake district, the bed of a long-vanished inland lake located eight miles northeast of Imperial. Here the Mesquite schoolhouse was requisitioned for services and a sturdy little Sunday-school is now organized and flourishing under the leadership of a superintendent discovered living in the district itself. In conformity with the policy of the Imperial church, local leadership is being developed, and Mesquite now has some Bible teachers of exceptional ability.

Eight miles west of Imperial lay the Fern district. Here the soil is hard and the population constantly shifting, presenting a discouraging outlook. Nevertheless, two men, one a high school teacher and the other the head of a large mercantile business, joined hands with a consecrated determination to develop this community, and they are succeeding with a splendid little Sunday-school. Several of the Fern scholars have already become church members.

Two other outstations have recently been opened, one of them twenty miles southwest of Imperial on the international boundary at Mt. Signal, and the other eleven miles southeast in the rich and beautiful section known as Meloland. Although it is the newest, already Meloland is the largest of the four outstation schools. The combined average attendance at these four schools is now about 155.

Two Christian Endeavor Societies have also been organized, one at Mt. Signal and another at Mt. Rose, where as yet there is no Sunday-school.

Not content with its religious work, this busy church conducts four Americanization classes at its outstations for Mexicans. Last year it held a school of missions with eighty-four scholars enrolled.

One feature of the social work in town is a monthly get-together supper, at which all business of the congregation is discussed, followed by a general good time, with games for the younger persons present.

So thoroughly do the people of Imperial believe in their inter-denominational church that they voted, in the face of the hardest times the Imperial Valley had ever seen, to abolish the collection plate, because the results of their every-member canvass were found sufficient to meet all the needs of their expanding work. They also employed last fall an associate pastor at a salary of $1,800 to supervise the outstation work and assist in the expansion of the program of the mother church.

This section of California, largely as a result of the influence of the Imperial church, has developed a strong sentiment in favor of inter-denominational or community churches. The Congregationalists have for some time had two very successful community churches here, one at Seeley and the other at Calapatria. The Union Church of San Jacinto, formed by a federation of Disciples and Congregationalists in the same year the Imperial church was organized, is another strong influence making for inter-denominational reorganization in the communities of Southern California. One of the newest and most promising churches, a direct outgrowth of the influence and work of Dr. McGaughey of Imperial, is the Community Church, undenominational, of Calexico, which has recently called its first pastor.

In writing of the origin of the Imperial church, Dr. McGaughey states that it was an effort of local laymen, conceived under the inspiration of the Interchurch World Movement. And from this and numerous other evidences one is prone to believe that the Interchurch World Movement is like John Brown. Its body may be mouldering in the grave, where it was placed with tears—some of them crocodile tears—but its soul goes marching on.

COUNTRY CHURCH DEPARTMENT

Why Help the Farmer?

By Paul L. Vogt, Ph.D.

IN a letter recently written in reply to an inquiry as to the activities of the Board of Health of a certain State with reference to rural health, the following question is asked: "By the way, why is it that farmers need help? They seem to have gotten themselves into a condition that makes it necessary for outside intelligence to come in and lift them up. I know that the Government is not called upon to help the lawyers, nor to help the preachers, nor to help the dry goods dealers, nor to help the bankers. Indeed, the bankers and the dry goods dealers have to be weighted down a little. We are compelled to put sinkers on them or they will rise too fast, yet the farmer needs help. I expect, after all, the best way to help the farmer is to breed good farmers. It is true that all live upon the products of the farm, and we are interested in having the products come to us promptly, and if the farmers are not equal to farming, then, of course, the city folk and the university folk must take up the work. It is my observation that the average 'renter' is a moron. He reaches forty-five or fifty years of age and has acquired no property and is not raising enough farm products to give him the least bit of independence. If a man with brains takes up farming he will need no help to further his health, nor to further the production of farm products."

It is assumed that the inquiries and statements in the above quotation are made in entire good faith and are based upon conclusions arrived at after considerable thought. It is not known how nearly they represent the thought of the city business or professional groups generally. But they do represent questions that come up separately quite frequently and an attempt will be made to explain and to correct, if necessary, some impressions that such questions and statements indicate are somewhat widespread.

In the first place, it is not so certain that farmers need help more than other groups. A State Board of Health, for instance, does not devote its attention exclusively to farmers. They have regulations and policies that have to do with city health as well as rural; as, for example, regulation as to reporting and quarantining of contagious diseases; reporting of deaths, births, sanitation and inspection of health conditions. The only difference is that in the development of many health programs much greater advance has been made in looking after health in congested city centers than in isolated rural communities. The modern movement toward looking after rural health is not an uplift matter at all, but is simply an extension of service to rural communities that has long since been developed in cities and paid for out of the common wealth produced by the efforts of farmers as well as city people and made available by taxation. It is a recognition of the right of the farmer, in common with city people, to public service and does not imply a charitable program for the weak and helpless farmer.

Again, there is little evidence that the condition of the farmer is worse now than it was two or three generations ago, so far as health is concerned. It does appear, however, that rural populations have not advanced so rapidly as city populations in health care or in other ways. There are many reasons for this. One is the isolation of the farm family. Another is that the farm has contributed much of its brightest mentality to professional leadership in the cities, and the cities have benefited by this leadership instead of the country. A third reason is that in the general distribution of wealth economic organization has given to the city the advantage in taxable resources, and it has been able to go ahead in providing comforts and conveniences far ahead of those yet available in the country. This includes health care, hospitals, medical inspection of school children and visiting nurses.

It is not strictly accurate to say that the Government is not called upon to help bankers, lawyers, preachers, etc. The Government has been importuned, with considerable success since the days of Alexander Hamilton, to protect "infant industries," and some not so weak, by protective tariffs, subsidies, etc. With the exception of the sugar industry and the wool growers farmers have benefited very little except indirectly from a protective tariff policy. These tariffs have gone far to help build up wealthy city centers and to prevent a distribution of wealth that would give the farmer an equitable share in the commonwealth. The lawyer, banker and preacher in the city has been benefited by contact with the "help" the Government has given to business, industrial and commercial.

The popular impression that farmers are being helped by "outside" people is erroneous. Most of those engaged in rural service at the present time are products of the farm. And, although convenience in travel makes it necessary for them to live in cities, their contacts and interests are rural. And they are serving farmers and are a part of the agricultural or rural-minded groups just as surely as the lawyers, doctors and preachers in large centers are city-minded and interested primarily in the city.

The agricultural colleges and experiment stations have done a great work in agricultural education. They have led in taking educational facilities to the people. Yet the cities now have their extension courses in business, there are bureaus of economic research in connection with great educational institutions, and the tendency is to extend to city people the type of service agricultural colleges have pioneered in for their constituencies. This is one type of advance in which the farmers appear to have had the advantage of their city brethren.

The statement that the average renter is a "moron" is rather hard on the farm population when it is remembered that a large proportion of owners, particularly those who have passed life's meridian, have been renters at some time in their lives. It is also rather hard on the farmers in the better agricultural sections of the country, since in many sections where the most fertile land exists the majority of farmers are now renters, and their number is increasing. It is also somewhat of a credit to the ability of the "moron" because it certainly takes a high-grade of intellectual ability to successfully operate a farm that must yield a rent to an absentee landlord on land worth $200 to $600 per acre. It is no mere novice nor half-wit that can go into debt, handle gas-power machinery, buy and sell co-operatively and do the many other things required of the modern farmer, whether owner or renter. The facts are, that investigations in many sections of the country indicate that the renter secures a larger personal income than does the owner who operates his own farm. Ultimately, the tendency is for the landowner to appropriate margins through rising rents, but immediately the renter has the advantage. "Morons" could not do this. Investigations also indicate that the percentage of mental defectiveness in rural communities is not so very much greater than in urban centers. It is manifestly impossible, as proved by careful scientific investigation, that the average tenant farmer could be a "moron." There are not enough of them in the general population, rural or urban.

The recent advance in rural service is not "help" in the charitable sense. It is recognized as an economic advantage to prevent illness by a rural nursing program which teaches hygienic living. A healthy population can produce more wealth than one suffering from the misery of illness from typhoid, hookworm or tuberculosis. It is recognized as an economic advantage to have directors of recreational and social life, since leadership in providing wholesome forms of recreation is the most effective prevention of those forms of social activity that are degenerative in their influence. This is the spirit of the modern movement toward professional rural service, and, except in the case of those who are motivated by sentiment instead of sense, it is not charitable "help" of the weak but an extension of service to those who have a right to as much and as good service in the country as their fellow-citizens in the urban centers. In the truest sense it is not "help," but service that is given.

"I'm not quite sure how long our conversation will take," replied the Colonel. "It may be best for you to contemplate breaking your engagement, whatever it may be."

"Girls," he said, "have you given up going to church?"

There was no reply.

He repeated the question.

"Yes," replied Eleanor, "at least I have. Are you looking for your cigarettes, Peg? Have one of mine," and she threw her a case.

"Are they the cause of it," asked the colonel, motioning to the cigarettes. "You never saw your mother use those things."

"Because I have no use for religion," replied Eleanor, coolly ignoring his reference to their smoking.

"Ah, is that so? Then, may I ask why?"

"Really, father, I didn't expect to be asked to pass a theological examination. I have no use for religion because I can't see what use it is to me. I believe there are a few people, even yet, who find use for it. But that is their affair."

"But you have one?"

"None. That is as religion is ordinarily understood."

"I don't quite follow you."

"I'm sorry. The religion I was brought up to believe in doesn't appeal to me. It doesn't seem to hold water. I can't see the good of going to church. One is simply bored. Of course, I imagine most people have a religion of some sort; but again, that is their own affair. It's purely a personal matter."

"May I ask whether you've given up the ethics of the Christian religion?" asked the Colonel.

"Really, father, I've never considered the matter. The world's ideas have grown during the last two thousand years, and I imagine if one needs a religion one will have to think the matter out on his own lines."

"That's very interesting. Then from what you say I suppose you do not regard the Christian religion as having any authority over you?"

"I don't see why it should have."

"Eleanor, my dear, for shame! How can you say such things?" cried Mrs. Trelawney helplessly.

Although the girl was very pale, and her lips trembled somewhat, she retained remarkable control over herself. She extracted a cigarette from the case which Peggy had handed back to her and lit it with fairly steady fingers.

"Why for shame, mother?" she asked. "I suppose father doesn't want me to tell him any lies. He has asked me questions, and I have tried to answer him to the best of my ability."

"Then the Commandments are, according to your point of view, obsolete, I suppose?" asked the Colonel, taking no notice of his wife's interruption.

"Perhaps yes, perhaps no. What particular commandment do you refer to?"

"Honor thy father and thy mother," was the Colonel's reply. "Don't you believe in that?"

"Not in the sense in which you regard it. It may be that one's father and mother do not deserve honoring."

"There is another Biblical precept," went on the Colonel.

"Children, obey your parents.' Don't you believe in that?"

"Not necessarily. It may be all right for kiddies; but when one has grown up, one must use one's own judgment."

"I see," and the Colonel's voice became hard as he spoke; "then we'll leave the abstract aspect of the question and come to the personal. Do you regard it as your duty to obey me?"

Eleanor thought a few seconds before replying. Up to now she felt that she was going through her catechism very well. She saw, too, by the triumphant flash in Peggy's eyes that her sister thought she had carried her points triumphantly. But now she felt on less sure ground. Try as she might against it, there was something in her father's presence that awed her. Not so much because he was a strong, clear-headed man, but because he was her father. Had another man made any assumption of authority she would have strongly resented it, but she felt that for some inexplicable reason her father was different. Still she would stand by her guns. As she had told her sister more than once, she felt that the tug-of-war was coming, and she thought she was ready for it.

"Not if your commands opposed my judgment and hindered my freedom," was her answer.

"I see," replied the Colonel, "and I presume Peggy also has the same views."

"Yes, only a bit stronger," replied Peggy, and the tones of her voice bordered on the insolent.

The Colonel gave a quick glance around the room and saw his wife's anxious, almost horror-stricken look; noted, too, the eager interest in John's face. He felt that an important hour had come in the history of his family.

Moses: Liberator and Lawgiver

EXODUS 14:10, 13-22.

"Fear ye not, stand still, and see the salvation of Jehovah."

—Exodus 14:13.

AMONG the men of the dawn, clear-cut on the horizon of his dim and distant time, stands the figure of Moses, liberator and lawgiver, not for his age and people alone, but for all the generations of men. The descendant of an immigrant, a member of an oppressed people, the son of a peasant and the adopted child of royalty, he became the "earliest of labor leaders," the founder of constitutional government and the most eminent character in the world's hall of fame. When, on the mount of his transfiguration, Law and Prophecy met Him in whom they were fulfilled, Moses was one of the two men chosen as the highest representatives of the righteousness and glory of Jehovah to confer with our Lord on the exodus which he was to accomplish at Jerusalem. When he came down from the summits of Sinai, where he had received the vision of Jehovah and the knowledge of the law, "the skin of his face shone by reason of his speaking with Him." In the years since his face has been a shining one for all who have read the story of his life and pondered its relation to the history of the world.

The immigrants from whom he had descended had manifestly deteriorated during the years of their sojourn in Egypt. Their spiritual fiber had relaxed. The pious customs of their native land had largely fallen into disuse. Little by little they were blending into the luxurious and worldly atmosphere by which they were surrounded. Now, practically enslaved, hope was dying in their breasts. As a "peculiar people" they were rapidly losing their identity. The parents of Moses, however, must have been an exception to this fact. The mother, at least, seems to have preserved undimmed the light of her faith in the living God. Through the success of her plan, suggested by the keenness of mother love, her babe receives the two-fold influence of childhood training in the faith of his fathers and in the learning and culture of the great nation of the southland. By the one, he was protected from the religious contamination which was poisoning the minds of his alien countrymen; by the other, he was saved from the ignorance, poverty and lowering conditions which their life of practical servitude was bringing upon his countrymen in Egypt. In the first few but molding years of his childhood his mother nurse breathed into him the Hebrew's passion for his native land and his country's God. In a land which knew not Jehovah, his character was rooted in faith in Him. This is evident from the fact that, in the future, there is no record of any "conversion" in the experience of Moses as from a religion which he discovered to be false to one which he came to know was true; nor of any religious experience in his life which would indicate that he had shared in the spiritual deterioration of his captive countrymen and must be "born again." Rather, with singular evenness of experience, his life unfolded on the basis of his early instruction, faith and character into that strength of faith and fulness of surrender to Jehovah which made him the fitting agent of the divine purpose in the development of the Hebrew race.

To this determination of his character in his childhood training in the faith of his fathers were added, through his adoption into the royal family, the broadening and enriching influences of his opportunities in the house of the Pharaoh as the favorite of the princess. Such training as the sons of the court received was his. Before the Sanhedrin, Stephen said, "Moses was instructed in all the wisdom of the Egyptians" (Acts 7:22). We may call this his university training. Tradition has it that he was educated for the army. At any rate, to him opened the life of the schools, of the court, of the army, of the best the nation had to give. He must have become thoroughly familiar with the thinking, the spirit, the manner of life, the resources and the needs of Egypt, with which nation his future was to be so bound up in his struggle to free his people. In the very land with which he was to battle he learned those things which were to be indispensable to him as the leader of the industrial and social revolution he was to inaugurate.

By faith (Heb. 11:24-29) when he had come to manhood he chose to share the persecutions and shame of his people rather than the preferments and luxuries of the court of Egypt. By faith he forsook the land of his birth, enduring a hard lot because he saw the invisible God. By faith he established the institutions of God in a nation that felt no sympathy for them and gave him no word of cheer as he struggled for righteousness. By faith he was made strong to stand still and see the salvation of God. By faith he beheld the vision of a righteous nation and was given courage to perform the pioneer work of an industrial reformer, of a religious leader, of a nation builder. There is no better illustration of what Christ says about faith than this man who never saw him in the flesh. Christ told Peter that faith could do the impossible; it could remove mountains; that the smallest amount of faith of the real kind could overcome the largest impossibilities; if it were as a grain of mustard seed the mountain would remove to another place at its command; that everyone could have this power for his task, for whosoever, with faith, would say to the mountain, "Remove," it would remove and nothing would be impossible to him. More than any other word, faith expresses the dominating quality of Moses' character. His spirit of prayer (Deut. 3) was manifest as an atmosphere in his life. As Christ's face was lighted with the light from within in his transfiguration experience, so the face of Moses shone as he came down from his secret audience with God on Sinai, not with a light added to him, but with a light shining from the inner exaltation of his spirit. In the materialism of his day he gave evidence of a singular sense of the spirituality of the worship of God. His wrath against the lapse of the people in the worship of the golden calf (Ex. 32) was like the wrath of Christ when he drove from the Temple those who were making a house of merchandise of the place of prayer. In his character, the great contribution of Moses to his own and following generations was that in his life he set forth the power of a living faith, the consciousness of the presence of God with him which made him a model of courage and hope, and that he was so forceful an example of the truth that "God is a Spirit; and they that worship him must worship in spirit and in truth."

For the one act of impulsiveness, harassed as he was by the unreasonableness of the people (Num. 20:11), he was not permitted to enter the land of his hopes. Because in this one act he had failed to honor God, had disobeyed the divine directions, he could see the promised land only from afar, "Sweet fields beyond the swelling flood." His humble acceptance of his punishment marked his spiritual greatness and insight. His last days were filled not with repinings and murmurings because of

give to the Sunday-school teacher inspiring and practical insight into the essential spiritual messages of the International Uniform Lessons. The book consists of a series of short expository sermons on the lessons by such leading American preachers as Francis E. Clark, W. E. Barton, Charles Reynolds Brown, William Elliot Griffis, Cornelius H. Patton, John E. Tuttle, and others.

Dr. Frederick Lynch, editor of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, says in a recent letter:

"The other day The Monday Club Sermons for 1923 happened to come to my hand, and I was very much impressed both by the list of contributors, and by the unusually fine standard of the execution."

Dr. Lynch has arranged with us to run The Monday Club Sermons serially in THE CHRISTIAN WORK, beginning with the January 27th issue. But many Sunday-school teachers, pastors and superintendents will wish to own the whole series, so as to have it at all times conveniently at hand. his blasted hopes, but with unrelenting efforts to secure the results of all he had tried to do for God. In the most earnest way he impressed the people with their need of keeping in closest fellowship with God. He gave himself to prayer for one to succeed him, who shall lead the people in the way of God. He planned for the custody and preservation of the Book of the Law; and then, with words of blessing for the children of Israel, he went to the top of Pisgah, where, with the far-spread hills of the Promised Land before his eyes and the voice of his God in his ears, he died; to be buried in a grave which no man knew, yet to live in all lands and through all years.

Specimens of Biblical Literature

BY JAMES MULLENBERG of the University of Nebraska

THE author's purpose has been to stimulate a reading interest in the Bible—to treat it as pure literature. He has selected typical bits of poetry, prose, history, prophecy, parable, and the like, and presented them in their proper literary guise. All notes are relegated to the back of the book, so that the reader's attention is not distracted, but for the student careful helps are provided and parallel readings suggested. To many persons this book will present the riches of the Bible in a new aspect.

Is Yours A Big Little Church?

IN St. Louis, there is a church building so large that, except during Sunday service, it is only partially used. But it is run on strict business lines. It has been equipped throughout with Wilson movable partitions.

Now no meetings have to be held in big poorly heated or lighted rooms. There is always the right size room ready for the small clubs and societies that meet there daily. Nor has a meeting ever been over-crowded.

For Wilson partitions turn one room into many as well as many into one.

And the best part of it is, that the saving in light and heat has almost offset the cost of the partitions. May we send you a booklet that tells how you can do the same.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION IN HOME ECONOMICS

In 1921-22 approximately fifty-six all-day departments for vocational education in home economics, enrolling 2,719 girls, were maintained in public schools for colored children. One state reports that in the past year this work has more than doubled, and that there are keen interest and fine co-operation wherever these departments have been organized. Another reports that nine colored schools have signed a blank signifying their interest in vocational education in home economics and their willingness to observe the half-time program for vocational education. In one state twenty of the seventy-five schools applying for approval in 1922-23 were colored.

Five years ago these schools gave much attention to models in sewing and to individual cookery, and little to large problems of food, clothing, and other activities of the home. To-day proper food and clothing for the individual and family, care of the home, expenditure of income, home nursing, and care of children occupy integral and prominent places on the home-economics program.

Realizing the great need of qualified teachers to carry out a vocational program of home economics, a special effort has been made to raise the standards of instruction in teacher-training. The results have been very encouraging, both in regard to the number of students and in quality of work.—Adelaide C. Baylor in the Southern Workman.

THE FUNDAMENTALS

EDITOR CHRISTIAN WORK:

I just want to express my personal appreciation for the article in the March 17th number of THE CHRISTIAN WORK entitled "What Are the Fundamentals?" It is something that we regret everyone does not see nor is able to understand. The article appealed to me as a very rational statement of what the fundamentals are; and I did appreciate your conclusion especially, for we are truly allowing the spirit of Roman Catholicism to dominate us when we try to make our laymen and clergy to accept interpretation as well as the inspiration itself.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN WORK:

Your article, "What Are the Fundamentals?" in last week's paper, is wonderfully illuminating to one of the many "perplexed ones." Thank you.

I wish to express my hearty approval of and thank you for your article on "What Are the Fundamentals?" I am writing from a sick bed, but hope to give public expression to these ideas when opportunity offers.

"LOST AND FOUND" IN ATHENS

The ancient royal palace in the Greek capital is being used not only as a shelter of refugee orphans, but as the headquarters for the Near East Relief. Among the activities of the organization of great importance is the Lost and Found Bureau. Not for articles lost and found; the refugees have lost countless pieces of property and they are lost irretrievably. The bureau is for the bringing together of families and friends lost in the transfer from Anatolia or Thrace or Constantinople or in the struggling crowds of the new life.

In one month 12,000 inquiries, many of them from America and England, were received at Athens and posted at 500 refugee centers. Two thousand of the missing have been restored to their friends. Miss Myrtle Nolan, of Minneapolis, and Miss Louise MacLachlan, of Detroit, are managing this important work.

INDIAN RIGHTS

People who are interested in the welfare of our Indian tribes and in the Church's work among them will find much enlightenment in the fortieth annual report of the Indian Rights Association (905 Drexel Building, Philadelphia), an organization for promoting the civilization of the Indian. The report contains several favorable mentions of our mission stations. The peyote evil among the Indians is discussed at some length, one Roman priest reporting that his church now refuses to bury those who use peyote, and that all who receive the rite of confirmation take a vow to abstain from the habit.

THE FAIRNESS OF THE FOSTER TRIAL

The whole conduct of the trial of William Z. Foster at St. Joseph, Michigan, has been in line with the best traditions of America. Judge White has proved himself a true judge, ruling impartially between the two sides, with the sole desire that the truth might be brought out and judgment might be rendered according to the law. Lawyers for the prosecution and for the defense have been courteous and fair. There is no doubt that Foster attended the convention of the Communist Party at Bridgeman last August, and, of course, there was no doubt that the convention was held. The jury had to decide whether the Communist Party was a society formed to advocate criminal syndicalism as defined in the Michigan law, and whether Foster himself came to the meeting "with the conscious design and purpose to further and promote the teaching and advocacy by the Communist Party of the doctrines of criminal syndicalism." The Michigan statute defines criminal syndicalism as "the doctrine which advocates crime, sabotage, violence or other unlawful means of terrorism as a means of accomplishing industrial or political reform." As the judge well said, "The statute is not aimed against any advocacy of change in our industrial, political or social institutions, no matter how far-reaching or drastic such proposals for reform may be, unless there is coupled with such proposals the advocacy of criminal acts as a means or method of bringing them about." It is not against the law to prophecy that these changes will be accomplished by violence. "Such changes in our form of government," the judge said, "can only be lawfully brought about in the manner provided by the Constitution," that is, either through constitutional amendment or through a constitutional convention. Judge White warned the jury that the case they were trying was one which by its very nature might arouse their prejudices. He cautioned them to be extremely careful in analyzing the testimony and to weigh it carefully, honestly and conscientiously. The jury voted six for conviction to six for acquittal, so that it had to be dismissed without verdict. The comment of the one woman who served on the jury, Mrs. Olson, if she is typical, suggests a body of very sound sense in the people of Michigan. "The stage setting of the prosecution," she said, "seemed overplayed, with such a display of detectives and under-cover men that it appeared more like trying to railroad Foster than like prosecuting him." In her opinion, that was the reason that half of the jury voted to acquit him. She summarized the question at issue thus: "It was really a big battle for human rights. Any one has a right to advocate any doctrine he may wish, however absurd, provided he does it by peaceful means. It is the right of each individual to think for himself, but he must not act contrary to human justice, and he must not seek to force his views on others by violence." So long as the dominating public opinion in America sees the real point at issue as clearly as did Mrs. Olson we may expect orderly progress in this country.

THE EPISCOPIANS AND UNITY

The Episcopalians at the meeting of the Continuation Committee of the Conference on Faith and Order at Kew Gardens, New York, last week, showed that some of them are facing the actual situation. They are beginning to see that they have a considerable distance to go before their propositions for church unity can be taken very seriously. Somehow or other, the Episcopalians in their thinking in regard to the Church have lagged behind most of its sister communions. The Church of Scotland a generation ago took about the position that the Episcopalians do to-day. They tended to consider themselves "the Church" and to think that other Christian communions must become Presbyterian. We shall have to be patient with our Episcopal brethren. The idea of exchanging pulpits with men of other communions is still an "adventure" to them. That is only an index of their somewhat primitive state of mind. With the passage of time it will dawn on our Episcopal brethren that a Church itself must play the Christian, and that to be a real Christian one must be a gentleman. What should we think of a man who coolly said to his acquaintance, "I am better than thou?" We should simply call him a cad. The gentleman accepts the Mexican from Tuxpan or the Jew from Kiev for what he is in himself without regard to "the pit from which he was digged." We have perfect confidence that in due time the Episcopal Church will play the gentleman to its fellow churches. In the meanwhile, let us who are without its fold stay our souls in kind-hearted patience and pray earnestly that the time may be hastened when the Episcopalians may be vouchsafed a sense of humor.

ELLIS ISLAND AGAIN

It is part of the tradition of America that this land should be the refuge for the oppressed. Yet to-day when Russian refugees come to Ellis Island, orders are given in not a few cases for their return to Constantinople. So conservative an agency as the American Red Cross says that it is perilous for any of these Russians to go back to that region because when the proposed Lausanne treaty is signed and Turkey again possesses Constantinople, her treaty with Soviet Russia will compel her to send all the Russian refugees within Turkish territory back to their native land. That means death for the refugees. The Russian Refugee Relief Society of America has promised our Government that these Russian immigrants will not become public charges. There ought to be no difficulty in letting them in. Can it be that we are such Nietzscheans as to slam doors in the face of these people and send them back to death along with the Armenians and Greeks? In our immigrant policy we must practise the Golden Rule, and we must begin to apply it now.

EFFECTS OF LORD ROBERT'S VISIT

Men who have traveled through the center and west of our country in behalf of the League of Nations have found the people as a whole very ignorant about the League but very much interested in it. Apparently those political humorists who have described the League as dead have been taken seriously in some quarters. When people learn that the League practically is proving the major hope of Europe politically, and is without a rival in humanitarian work in the world, they begin to see the League in a new light. Lord Robert Cecil's visit has done an immense amount of good in giving people a view of the actual working of the League. Some of those who have been classed among the "irreconcilables" have discovered that they had erected a man of straw in their description of the League as a militaristic combination of the victors in the World War, ready to drag any League members into war in order to protect their ill-gotten gains from the Treaty of Versailles. Lord Robert remarked that before the League was in practice it may have been all very well to examine its language with a microscope and imagine all the evils that might possibly develop from some twist of the language, but now the meaning of the Covenant may be discovered by the history of the action of the League. Open-minded men recognize the force of that plea. The League's record in preventing three wars in as many years is an index of its spirit. In such a case as that of Vilna, held up as a League failure, the fact is that the trouble came because the League recommendation was rejected, not because it was accepted. Lord Robert has emphasized everywhere that the League depends on public opinion for the enforcement of its decisions. One of the most hopeful developments from Lord Robert's visit was Senator Pepper's announcement last Saturday that he now favors our entering the League with certain changes made in the Covenant. How great a change that marks is obvious when we consider that three years ago Senator Pepper was head of the anti-League organization known as the Association for the Preservation of American Independence.

INDIAN IGNORANCE ABOUT TURKEY

Most of us have listened with a great deal of skepticism to British accounts of the concern felt by Indian Moslems as to the fate of the Turks. But contact with the Indian Moslems proves that among millions of them such an interest does exist, a tremendous, utterly untutored and fanatic sympathy for the Turks in all their new ways and ambitions. Probably not one Moslem in ten thousand in India really knows the first elements of the Near Eastern problem or understands what it would mean for India if the Moslems there used the same methods as the Turks have used. When Moslem graduates in Christian Colleges in India hear the plain, unvarnished truth about the Turk, they are struck with amazement, and hardly know whether to be enraged or to weep for bitter disappointment. They have imbibed the idea that the Turks are a blessing to the human race and especially to the Moslem section of it. As one keen, young Moslem exclaimed when he learned the truth, "No one ever said such things to me before!" The fact is that the natives and the English in India seem to know far less of the Near East than would be expected. The general drift in India on all sides is an unreasoning sympathy with the Turks no matter what happens. The British themselves in India repeatedly express the wish to avoid another war at any cost. To-day "Civilization" would rather see a race murdered by wholesale than run the risk of a scratch on its hand.

THE HUGUENOT-WALLOON TOUR

The proposed Protestant tour in Europe next summer in connection with the celebration of the tercentenary of the Huguenot-Walloon settlement of America presents a great opportunity to Christian people. Those who go on it will meet many people of distinction and will see many things which the ordinary tourist never has the opportunity to see. Largely through the Knights of Columbus, a number of Roman Catholic tours have recently been made in Europe, tours which have had a real "advertising value" to the Roman Catholic Church. They have tended to create the impression that the Roman Catholic forces were very strong in America. So far as we know, there has never before been a distinctly Protestant tour of the Continent. When Protestants go to Europe they have not in the past made contacts with the Protestant forces there. But a fine group of church people, interested in the history of Protestant development, will help make countries like France, Italy and Belgium understand this country and the strength of the Church here. The governments concerned, the Dutch, Belgian and the French especially, plan a special welcome to the members of the party. The tour is open to the public. Those who are interested may learn full particulars from the Huguenot-Walloon New Netherland Commission, 105 East Twenty-second Street, New York City, or from Dr. H. W. Dunning, 188 Rawson Road, Brookline, Mass.

PRESBYTERIAN REORGANIZATION

The Presbyterian Church is now carrying out its plan for the combination of its sixteen boards and agencies into four boards. The new Board of Foreign Missions met for the first time recently. It combines the work of the former board and that of the Women's Board of Foreign Missions. Of the forty members of the new board twenty-two were nominated by the former Board of Foreign Missions, fifteen by the Women's Board and three by the Committee on Work in Europe. Among the members of the new board are: Dr. J. Ross Stevenson, D.D., the President of Princeton Theological Seminary; Dr. Eben B. Cobb, of Elizabeth, N. J.; Dr. Cleland B. McAfee, of McCormick Seminary; Dr. Charles C. Albertson, of the Lafayette Avenue Church, Brooklyn; Dr. George Alexander, of the First Presbyterian Church, New York; Dr. John Kelman, of the Fifth Avenue Church, New York; Mrs. John H. Finley, New York; Miss Margaret E. Hodge, of Philadelphia; Miss Marianna Rea, of Pittsburgh; Miss Jean Mackenzie, Riverdale-on-Hudson, N. Y.; Rev. William P. Merrill, D.D., New York, N. Y.; Rev. Tertius Van Dyke, New York, N. Y.; W. P. Stevenson, Roselle, N. J.; Alfred E. Marling, James M. Speers, Edwin M. Bulkley, William L. Amerman and John T. Underwood, of New York, N. Y.; John L. Severance, of Cleveland, Ohio; Ralph W. Harbison, Pittsburgh; Prof. Charles R. Erdman and Dr. J. C. R. Ewing, of Princeton, N. J.; Dr. William H. Hudnut, of Youngstown, Ohio.

THE NEED OF CHRISTIANITY

Dr. Frank Riale in an address at Duluth on the "Need of the Christian College" recently quoted Ogden Armour's remark that "the choice before us is Christ or chaos. I tell you we are sitting on a Bolshevik volcano, and as I have selected the men to be around me at this time, I have found that almost all of the men that I chose because I could rely on them were Christians, and sixty-five per cent. of them were graduates of the small Christian colleges that you are talking about." After the address a railroad president of Duluth told Dr. Riale that he wished he would come down to the office the next morning. When Dr. Riale went the railroad executive said: "What Ogden Armour said is mild compared to what a judge said. A little while ago at a meeting with seventeen railroad presidents around the table he said: 'Before we get down to business I want to say something.' Of course, they sat up to hear. 'You may smile at what I am going to say, but the world is in a h— of a way. I don't go to church much. I usually play golf Sunday mornings, but I tell you the only solution is the Christian Church and the Christian interpretation of life and education.'"

AMNESTY SERMONS WANTED

Commending the Church for its invaluable support in the campaign to free the political prisoners in American penitentiaries, the General Defense Committee of Chicago has issued an appeal to pastors throughout the country asking them to preach an amnesty sermon on General Amnesty Day, which will be Sunday, April 29. The committee mentions particularly the whole-hearted co-operation that has been given by the Federal Council of Churches, the Methodist Federation for Social Service, the National Catholic Welfare Council, fifty-one Protestant Episcopal bishops, the 1922 Council of Cities of the M. E. Church, the American Society of Friends, the Christian Science Monitor, one hundred Unitarian ministers acting jointly, and by various local church bodies scattered across the land. Literature dealing with the amnesty question is being sent to several thousand pastors in all States. Clergymen who fail to receive this literature may address the General Defense Committee at 1001 West Madison Street, Chicago.

THE STUDY OF SPANISH

Approximately 470 of the 612 regularly recognized colleges and universities in the United States teach Spanish, according to a recent number of "School and Society," which bases its information on a study made by the Section of Education of the Pan-American Union. The returns show that at the time of the investigation (spring of 1922) there were 56,947 persons studying Spanish in the 404 institutions that responded; but from other information it was estimated that there were about sixty-five other schools where Spanish is taught that did not reply to the inquiry. Nineteen schools of those reporting had not less than 500 students in their Spanish classes. Columbia University heads the list with 3,000. The University of Texas comes second with 1,649 and the University of Illinois third with 1,355.

The Revival of Anti-Semitism

WE happened to spend a recent Sunday in Detroit and while we did not have the pleasure of meeting Mr. Ford, we did have considerable conversation with some people who knew him very well—with one man who is a very intimate friend. In the course of our talk we asked what was the cause of Mr. Ford's intense hatred of the Jew, and what led him to make the famous attack a year ago through the press? One thing was evident at once, namely, that no one knew. We imagine that no one does really know the inner workings of Mr. Ford's mind. Various conjectures were made, the chief one being that when Mr. Ford started out to borrow a hundred million dollars, more or less, the Jewish bankers turned him down. We do not know whether there is any truth in that or not. One reason advanced arrested our attention, because, whether it is true in Mr. Ford's case or not, it is one of the reasons, if not for persecution, at least for dislike and social ostracism of the Jews in both Germany and America. We refer to the determined purpose and effort of many Jews to perpetuate not only their religious faith, but their racial and national traditions, characteristics and peculiarities in every land. Many of the Jewish leaders are to-day urging their fellow Jews to remain Jews whether in Germany or America. This is one of the things that has stirred Mr. Ford, and is one of the things that is contributory to what Jewish prejudice remains in America.

It leads us to make a few general remarks on the whole question. And let us say right at the beginning—we believe that this whole situation is greatly exaggerated. There is very little feeling against the Jew in America and Mr. Ford is so little representative of the general feeling that his agitation fell flat as a pancake and everybody has forgotten it. There is very little social ostracism either, so far as New York is concerned, and that is rapidly passing away. Such incidents as that of Harvard University are very rare and they are simply difficult problems in a time of readjustment. As a distinguished member of a great university remarked to us only last week: "Ours is a Christian institution. We lay stress on Christian education. We require chapel and we are going to require it. Our effort is more and more to emphasize the Christian character of our university and the Christian teaching. What are we going to do if the Jew comes to us?" Now this is a real problem, a real difficulty and our Jewish friends ought to be very sympathetic toward us. In New York, on the whole, the Jew is received socially on the basis of his character and standing as everybody else is. The tendency to discriminate grows less and less, and has almost disappeared except where some difficult problem exists which can only be solved by patience on both sides, and except where the Jew has not yet adjusted himself to American life.

It is the duty of every Christian to throw all his influence against racial discrimination of every sort, and it is our opinion that the Christians are more and more doing so. The Christian leaders whom we have met and the Christian journals that we have read, have criticized Mr. Ford's hysterical agitations and all anti-Jewish propaganda. So far as we know the Christian pulpits have been very sympathetic with the Jew whenever any anti-Semitic movement has shown its head—at least it has been so in America in recent years. On many committees and boards Jews and Christians are working harmoniously together. All this should be encouraged and should any general movement against the Jews show signs of appearance, the whole Christian Church should set its face solidly against it.

On the other hand—and it is here we would like to offer a few suggestions to our Jewish brethren—the Jews should do everything in their power to make it easy for the Christian people to take their side, and should strive with considerable effort to rid themselves of some of those characteristics or traits that cause irritation to many Americans. It must be said in all fairness that there are many Jews, some of them among the leaders, who take attitudes that make it much harder for those real Christians, the Christians who deplore any anti-Jewish feeling, and who protest when any differentiation or distinction is made that works against them—to be their friends. We refer particularly to those Jews who still want to keep their people Jews after they have cast in their lot with America. The Jew, if he wants frank, fair, sincere recognition in America, should drop everything distinctly Jewish except his religion. If he is to be an American, then he should become as wholly American as we expect the Irish or Italians to be, although they retain their Roman Catholic faith. We want to say with all frankness, that we think a good deal of the prejudice against the Jews in America is due to the fact that they insist on remaining Jews racially as well as religiously.

Where the Irish and the Germans have insisted on this there has been the same old prejudice. If one gets into the small towns where the Irish are a small minority, one finds the same prejudice shown by the Protestants that he finds against the Jews, and it is not because they are Roman Catholics so much as because they remain Irish and have seemed more interested in fighting Ireland's battles than worrying about American problems. We would like to see our Jewish friends, keeping their religious faith if they wish, give up everything else distinctly Jewish—Jewish and Yiddish newspapers—(even the most saintly Christian when he sees day after day great crowds of young Jews reading Yiddish papers, thinks of them as Jews rather than as Americans); ghettos as far as possible; organizations and institutions particularly Jewish. We could mention others. It ought to be as difficult to tell a Jew's origin racially, especially if he was born in America, by anything except his religion or name, as it is the average German's, Irishman's, Englishman's, Scotchman's, Swede's or anybody else's. They are proud of their origin, but they are not Scotchmen, Germans or Swedes any longer; they are Americans! Those of Jewish origin should be Americans in this same way. We believe that if the Jewish boy born in America would lose his race consciousness as fast as the German, Irish, Scotch or English, Swedish, even Italian boys are doing, the dislike of those Christians who have dislike, would largely disappear.

For instance, we believe that such a plea as that which appears in a recent issue of a Jewish paper, "East and West," for keeping the boy of Jewish descent a Jew in everything, works more harm to the Jew than does any agitation by Mr. Ford. In an article on "Education and Politics," the editor deplores the passing away in the youth of America of that particular type of Jewish character and mind that the ghetto used to produce. "Under modern conditions," he says, "life itself not only does not help create the Jewish type, but assists in destroying it." He would introduce education among the Jewish youth to keep them true to the Jewish type. (Note that he says Jewish type, not American type.) The article from beginning to end, gives the impression to a reader that the great calamity is the absorption of the Jew by his American environment, the same fear that the Kaiser used to express for the Germans who were emigrating to America and certain German groups tried for a while to keep the German consciousness stronger than the American. They did not succeed, neither will "East and West"—but it is this attitude that terribly riles up the real American.

One other word of friendly advice. We have much complaint from our Jewish friends of the cruel treatment of the Jew practised against him by the exclusive Christian. We condemn that exclusiveness as much as do our Jewish friends. Personally just as we are color-blind purposely, so we are race-blind. We see no difference in men except in character and disposition. If a man is good and generous we do not see his color, or know his race. Unfortunately, all our brethren have not reached this stage of perfection of which we boast. But they are striving toward it, perchance if they may gain it. Then their Jewish friends, who complain of their social exclusiveness, show an exclusiveness that is as much an obstacle to equal recognition as is the Christian's exclusiveness. A fine Jew complains that one Christian friend does not invite his family to his home: and yet this same Jew would object to his daughter marrying a Christian. Now no Jew who objects to son or daughter marrying a Christian, ought to be invited to a Christian's home to dinner or anything else. It is understood among Christians that young people who are brought together may fall in love and have a right to. Other Jews have silly notions about foods, although that is rapidly passing and the modern Jew, like a sensible man, is eating everything God sends him—or at least what he can get of it. In other little ways this exclusiveness makes itself felt. It is more and more passing away among the Jews as it is among the Christians, but we hope our Jewish friends will help us by denouncing all exclusiveness against Christians among the Jews as heartily as we denounce all exclusiveness against Jews by Christians.

A final word: Another way in which our Jewish friends can greatly help is by exercising great moderation and caution in their attack upon those Christian institutions which have become distinctly national. After all, America is a pretty thoroughly Christian country. Out of a population of one hundred million perhaps not more than three per cent. are of the Jewish faith. It is very aggravating to any people to have a little minority come into their land and immediately begin to undermine their cherished institutions.

The Jew has not always been guiltless in this regard. We once asked a very wise, broad-minded German what was the cause of the anti-Jewish feeling, so strong at that time in Berlin, and he said it was because the Jews were undermining their German institution—Sunday, the schools, and other things. This was probably not a sufficient explanation, but it was significant. In New York, certain groups of Jews have been antagonistic to Christian exercises in the public schools and some have protested against the New Testament being read before the pupils. Here there is an opportunity for the exercise of that tolerance and commonsense we are asking the Christians also to exercise. Let the Christian children hear the Prophets read in school and let the Jewish children hear the Gospel—neither group will get hurt in the slightest. Another place where the Jews can help is in regard to Sunday. Sunday is the day ninety-seven per cent. of the people of the United States have made their day for worship and for rest. It has also been sanctioned by practically all States as the rest-day, and laws made protecting the day. There is a feeling which is not confined to Mr. Ford that the Jews have done much to secularize this day. There is a common belief that most of the agitation to open theaters on Sunday comes from them. We have ourselves noted that certain Jews in New York have publicly advocated a law allowing Jewish merchants to open their shops on Sunday. All this is a great mistake and we devoutly hope that the broad-minded and liberal Jews will do everything in their power to remove this cause of irritation to Christians. If the Jews would change their Sabbath to our Sunday it would be a great step toward reconciliation. It does not make a particle of difference on what day one worships God—what day one fixes as Sabbath or Sunday. As a matter of fact, as every scholar knows, there is not the slightest evidence in the world that Saturday is the original Sabbath or Sunday the original Sunday. The calendar has been changed too often. What difference does it make anyhow?

We are writing all this in the friendliest spirit. We would give Christians exactly the same advice should they move to the new Jewish State in Palestine, and become citizens of it. The perfect reconciliation can only come when both sides are willing to drop all racial characteristics and traits and customs, that are not common to all Americans.

Present Conditions in the Bible Lands

WE think of the Bible lands as historic places of ancient times, and seldom think of those lands of antiquity in connection with current history. The Near East, as the Bible lands are known to-day, was under the control of the Ottoman Empire for centuries, and now is broken up into numerous vassal states of European powers or little quasi-independent states.

For a century Greece has been free from the Turkish yoke and for generations the region around Mt. Ararat has belonged to Russia. Since the World War, Egypt, Mesopotamia or Iraq, and the Arabian desert or the Hedjez, have achieved their nominal independence as sovereign states. Syria and Palestine are French and British mandate territories. Other mandated territory in Cilicia, held by the French, has been turned back to the Turks. This is also true of all the Asia Minor territory held by Greece and Italy.

The present Turkish state extends from Syria and Mesopotamia on the south to the Black Sea and Russia on the north, and from Adrianople in Thrace on the west to Persia on the east. The old Ottoman Empire has vanished along with the political functions of the Sultan, and we now have a Turkish state ruled by a democratically-elected Grand National Assembly sitting at Angora in Anatolia. The caliph of all the Mohammedans is no longer the supreme ruler of Turkey.

A million Christians in the Bible lands have suffered martyrdom at the hands of the Turks since 1915. At least another million Christians in the Bible lands are alive to-day because of American generosity as expressed through the Near East Relief. There are more than a hundred thousand Christian orphan children to-day in the Bible lands who live in institutions over which the American flag flies. These children, whose fathers and mothers have died martyr deaths, are the hope of the future in the Bible lands.

In Jerusalem the Near East Relief is caring for several hundred children, almost on the spot where Jesus gathered the little children about him and said: "It is not the will of your father who is in Heaven that one of these little ones should perish." In Bethlehem, where Christ was born, there are now several hundred refugee orphans from Turkey, sheltered near the site of the manger of old. In Nazareth, where Jesus spent his boyhood, there are now three hundred Armenian orphan boys in an industrial school. Like their Master, these lads are learning the trade of the carpenter and other useful occupations.

Recent events in the Near East have wrought enormous changes in the situation of the Near East Relief. New line-up brings altered responsibilities and new obligations. The expulsion of more than twenty thousand of our orphans from Anatolia has enforced the clear-cut understanding that Near East Relief will retain the responsibility for these children in their new homes in Syria and Greece.

In many ways the situation to-day is more satisfactory than a year ago. The orphans from Anatolia are now on friendly soil where they can enjoy, both now and in the future, full rights to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness, and where they can be educated to man's estate with the certainty that they will be permitted to become useful citizens of the world.

Many of the difficulties and handicaps of the old days in Anatolia have disappeared with this change of venue, and the money and effort spent on these orphans will unquestionably be a sound investment for the future. No longer can it be said that Near East Relief is bringing up children to provide material for future Turkish massacres.

The situation in the Caucasus also gives ground for hope. Within the next year there is reason to believe there will be a rapid trend toward normalcy in Armenia and Georgia. Our orphans there, some of whom are now approaching the age when they can take their places as citizens, will perhaps be the most important factor in the future of their country.

The refugee situation in Greece continues desperate. Among Greece's million refugees are many thousand orphan children whose plight should have constructive attention as soon as we have provided adequately for our own orphans from Anatolia. No phase of Greece's refugee problem is so serious as the plight of the children, many thousands of whom have already fallen victims to epidemics, cold and exposure. No phase of the refugee problem is more deserving of American sympathy and help.

Thus far, Near East Relief has been able to make only small beginnings in this direction, owing to the overwhelming problem of sheltering the tens of thousands whom we ourselves brought to safety following their expulsion by the Turks.

To-day, more than ever before, the future of the Near Eastern countries seems to be in the hands of the children. The most powerful single force towards regeneration and brotherhood will undoubtedly be our children brought up under American ideals and Christian citizenship by Near East Relief.

Three Supreme Missionary Reasons

THE Church must be a missionary Church. We can make this clear by laying down three propositions, which we may call the A B C of the position. These three propositions will show quite clearly that if all the missionary enterprise to-day is mistaken, we cannot wash our hands of responsibility; we must undertake a new missionary enterprise. If we are not satisfied with the efforts made by missionary societies, if we criticise those who have gone out, we cannot sit still—we must go out and do it ourselves. We must set about the task in a new way if we consider it has hitherto failed, because the duty remains, the debt is there still, our debt to the world, and whatever criticism we make of the way in which that debt has hitherto been discharged, it only leaves us the more under obligation to discharge it better.

Now these are the three propositions we would like to put before you, and try to sum them up in three words:

(a) It is the command of Christ. You remember, perhaps, that when the Duke of Wellington was consulted about missionary work, in the days of Sydney Smith and in the days when the Church was very indifferent, when he was asked whether that ought to be undertaken, he replied, with plain, soldierly bluntness: "You cannot question it, for there are your marching orders, 'Go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature.'" It is the plain command of Christ in whom we believe and whom we are to obey. We were to go and make the nations disciples, baptize them in His name, in the name of the Father and of the Spirit. We were to teach them all that He had commanded. We were to turn them into Christians as well as or better than we are ourselves. And it was on that understanding He made the promise, "I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." So that it is not permissible to claim that promise of His perpetual presence unless we are fulfilling the command which was its condition.

From (a) we pass to (b), the second proposition. If there were no explicit command, if Christ had never given that order to His disciples, we can see that it would be necessary still to proclaim to the world the truth which is given to us in Christ. For what is that truth? It is the fact, the marvelous fact, that God has broken through the silence and drawn aside the veil; that God has manifested Himself in our human life; that He has sought men with a paternal love; that He has won them with an almost incalculable sacrifice, and that He has offered to them the sonship and daughtership which result from accepting this gift, His pardon and love. That is a Christian fact. It is an event that happened; it is a truth that comes through that event; it is a Person that appears; it is a salvation wrought for the world by that Person. And if that Person had never said a word to us about telling the world we could not, without guilt, keep it to ourselves. It becomes an absolute necessity to make known the fact of Christ to all mankind.

And then the third point of our A B C, the (c), is this: It is a more difficult thing to put into words and to bring home without thinking carefully. But there is the experience of Christ. We do not know what it means to each one of you. We know what it has meant to great numbers of people, and we know what it means to us. You will agree with us, roughly, that the experience of Christ is much the best thing we have in this world, that we have in our own soul, and in our own life, this divine radiance of love and saving grace. The experience of Christ means that we are not alone, that we are not left to ourselves. We have someone who heals us when we are sick; someone who holds us back from sinning, and if we have sinned, still pities and restores us. We have a Friend that sticketh closer than a brother. We have someone who not only goes with us through this earthly life, but when we come to the end of life, and must pass through the mysterious veil into an unknown world. He is with us still. Someone who has given us eternal life, who has overcome death and opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers. What does this mean to us? It means for us all that we have a life of peace, of joy and blessing that none of us could have without it. It means that life is beautified and made holy; it means that love arises in our hearts, and we are driven to try to help and bless others with the love of Christ that is in us. We could go on trying to describe what Christ means to each one of us, and it is that fact, that experience of Christ within us, knowing what it means for us, that stirs us with a sense of deep responsibility for those multitudes of human beings who know nothing about it, and have no equivalent for it.

We would sum up these three fundamental statements, the A B C of the whole position, as Obedience, Justice, Benevolence, that compel us to give to men the blessing that is ours.

There is one other consideration of a rather broader kind. When we look at the world as a whole, and it is possible nowadays to look at the world as a whole, and to take into account all its varieties and all its antagonisms, we are aware that the great need of mankind is some unifying principle, some power that can bring them together with a sense of the oneness of man, and we are conscious that diplomacy and mere political manipulation is not likely to accomplish it. In fact, if there is one good result from the war it is this, that almost every thoughtful person now recognizes that the only hope for the unity of the world lies in the quickening of spiritual life, in a real religious belief. The Fatherhood of God, and the consequent brotherhood of man, is a necessity for the world's welfare. R. F. H.

Some Living Masters of the Pulpit

I HAVE been greatly interested in reading, from time to time, as they appeared in the periodicals, Dr. Joseph Fort Newton's studies of various great preachers with whom he has had intimate acquaintance and who he has occasion to hear from time to time and to read much. Just as it takes a great man to write the biography of a great man—a Boswell to write of Johnson, a Stanley to write of Arnold—so I suppose it takes a great preacher really to understand and appreciate genius in another. This is why these various sketches of Dr. Newton have so much more character to them and are so much more interesting than the average newspaper or magazine sketch of a noted preacher. When I learned that Dr. Newton's fifteen essays on his compatriots were out in book form I rejoiced. I took the book on the train with me and had soon read it from beginning to end. ("Some Living Masters of the Pulpit," by Joseph Fort Newton, D.D., published by George H. Doran Company, New York. $2.)

The book, too, is fascinating not only because of its remarkable insight, its inevitable hitting upon the secret of power in each character, and its exquisite literary charm—everything Dr. Newton writes has this charm—but because many of these men are intimate friends of us who read these pages. Many of us number Doctors Gordon, Hutton, Jefferson, Orchard, Glover, Cadman, Campbell, Bishop Quayle and Miss Royden among our intimate friends. Not so many of us know Dean Inge and Doctors Crothers, Truett and Powell. The chapter on Dr. Gunsaulus is written In Memoriam and Bishop Williams died even while the book was coming from the press. It is a great loss, too, for Bishop Williams was of the prophets. He held to the old faith; but saw that it was big enough to meet all human needs, social, industrial and international, as well as individual. It is good that he was asked to deliver the Yale Lectures on Preaching when he did, for "The Prophetic Ministry for To-day" will be his enduring monument. He was a bishop of the Church Universal and was a brave, lovable man. Dr. Newton refers to that memorable day, when the Bishop preached in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, in New York. It was a time when the country had lost its head over a few radicals and was demanding all sorts of harsh measures. The Bishop raised the question as to whether the worst foes the country had were not these radicals they were chasing down, but the privileged few who composed the "invisible government," the few reactionaries who were attempting to control the utterances of the pulpit and the teaching in our universities. The sermon called forth many bitter editorials in the daily press, one of which really was funny, for it almost implied that, inasmuch as the big business men build the churches and support them, they have a right to dictate what is preached in their pulpits.

It is not easy to say which of these remarkably vivid portrayals I enjoyed most. The chapters deal almost entirely with the personality of the preacher and his message. There is practically no attempt to tell the story of his life; but once in a while one gets a little glimpse of the preacher which adds to the charm of the book. Thus, in the second sketch, that of Dr. John A. Hutton, of Glasgow, there is a delightful glimpse of the great preacher in the City Temple pulpit: "What a sermon Dr. Hutton preached in the City Temple yesterday, both for its eloquence and its appropriateness. He dealt with 'The Temptation,' that is the one temptation which sums up all others, including that of the minister, to which he alluded with illuminative understanding. What is the Great Temptation, faced by Jesus in the wilderness and escaped by none of the sons of men? It is the cynical spirit, by which we are sorely tried in these days, and will be more terribly tried later, because it haunts all high moods. Subtly, artfully, it seeks to lower, somehow, the lights of the soul, to slay ideals, to betray and deliver us to base-mindedness. Satan, said the preacher, is the base-minded spirit; he is the denier, as God is the Affirmer, within all souls. Such preaching! He searches like a surgeon and heals like a physician. Seldom, if ever, have I had a man walk right into my heart with a lighted candle in his hand, as he did, and look into the dark corners. For years I had known Dr. Hutton as a master of the inner life, whether dealing with the Bible at close quarters or with the friends and aiders of faith, like Browning; and there are passages in the Winds of God that haunt me like great music. And no book in this dark time of war—in which, alas, the author has suffered his share of bitter loss—has gripped me more firmly, more surely, than his Loyalty, the Approach to Faith. There one hears not the great guns behind dim horizons, but their echo in the lonely places of the soul. As a guide to those who are walking in the middle years of life, where bafflements of faith are many and moral pitfalls are deep, there is no one like Hutton; no one to stand alongside him. Rich as his books are, his preaching is much more wonderful than his writings. His style is indeed a marvel, but one does not think of it while he is preaching. While his sermon has the finish of a literary essay, it is delivered with the enthusiasm of an evangelist. The whole man goes into it, uniting humor, pathos, poetry and hard reason, literature, life, unction with a certain wildness of abandon, as of one possessed, which is the note of truly great preaching. In my humble judgment he is the greatest preacher in Britain."

Dr. Newton seems to place Dr. Hutton at the head of the British preachers. I do not know, but I find myself reading his books again and again. To him and Jonathan Brierly I turn with unending delight. I do not know how many times I have read Dr. Hutton's recent lectures on preaching, "That the Ministry be not Blamed" and I have often said that his little book, "The Persistent Word of God" is the finest example in recent years of what expository preaching can be.

Again, in the chapter on Maude Royden, one gets a very enchanting picture of this wonderful seeress. It was Dr. Newton who "found her" as they say when a publisher finds some great author. It was he who "brought her out." She was well known as a lecturer on various subjects, especially those dealing with the status of women, but Dr. Newton put her in the pulpit of City Temple and the crowds came to hear her. She is an Anglican, but the Anglican Church could find no place for her. Dr. Newton gave her the evening service in the City Temple and great throngs came. Here is a charming glimpse of her ministry in the City Temple pulpit: "Sunday after Sunday large congregations gathered to hear Miss Royden, some drawn by curiosity at first, but all remained to pray; and if the majority of her audiences were women, it was to be noted that many men in khaki found her preaching a blessing. Naturally, in private, I had to bear the brunt of criticism, in a flood of letters sometimes angry, and often ugly. Of course the words of St. Paul about women keeping silence in church were worn threadbare—so few knew what he meant—and the gibe of Dr. Johnson about a woman preaching being like a dog trying to walk on his hind legs, was not forgotten. More than one letter reminded me of the dictum of Montaigne that 'Women are hardly fit to treat on matters of theology'; and so it went, with much ridicule of 'petticoats in the pulpit.' One Anglican layman did, however, modify the saying of Henry Sidgwick for my benefit: 'Of course, it's nonsense, but it's the right kind of nonsense.' As often as I met the Bishop of London, his chief concern seemed to be whether Miss Royden actually stood in the pulpit of the City Temple and whether or not she wore a hat! It did not matter; I was content to let facts refute folly, and Miss Royden soon made her place in what proved to be her rightful sphere."

American readers will also greatly enjoy the chapters on Dean Inge and Dr. Orchard. Dr. Newton is very just to both of them. Perhaps he does not appreciate Dean Inge as much as some of us do, but he really does recognize his greatness. I myself sometimes feel that no one in England has written with quite the incisive, caustic pen since Dean Swift himself. I am afraid that Dean Inge has got the appellation "The Gloomy Dean", largely because he sees the truth and dares to state it. There are very few people in England who would have dared to say at the close of the war that the labor unions practically held the nation up by the throat during the war and yet it is absolutely true and everybody knew it, but no one dared to say it. Neither does any one dare say that the labor movement in Great Britain is out for what it can get for nothing just as perhaps the old robber barons were, but it is largely true. Everybody knows it, but nobody dares say it but the dean. Dr. Newton recognizes this note of fearlessness, and yet I do not know whether he quite appreciates it or not. I note that he has a little disposition to feel that the Dean is pessimistic but here, again, everybody who really tells the truth is going to be considered pessimistic. The average optimist is the man who simply does not face the facts and while he is singing "God's in his Heaven, all's right in the world" 1914 comes upon us. We ought to be thankful that one or two men like Dean Inge are seeing things as they are and have the courage to warn us. Dr. Newton appreciates him, however, and in one sentence exclaims: "Yet, what austere sincerity is his; what intrepid courage; what weight of clear judgment; what prophetic power!"

Of course, I was intensely interested in his characterization of Dr. Orchard. Dr. Orchard is one of the things to be seen and heard by everyone who visits London. He is as much a puzzle to the average man as would be a denizen of another world suddenly alighting in the London streets. He is a sacramentalist and by the whole logic of necessity should spend his time before the altar celebrating mass. The priestly function should absorb all of his being, but it does not. Curiously enough, he is one of the two or three really brilliant preachers in England. He leaves his priestly station before the altar and mounts the pulpit and becomes a flaming prophet. Dr. Newton's appreciation of him is very just, and it is refreshing to find someone who understands him. His average non-conformist brother in London just looks at him in awe and passes on. To most of the ministers with whom I have spoken about him in London Orchard is simply a riddle. Dr. Newton sees that he is a prophet protesting against the extreme individualism of a certain type of Protestantism and demanding a social interpretation and application of Christianity as well as a social consciousness, which is the genius and nature of Catholicism, and as Dr. Newton himself says, he seeks to unite personal religious experience with its corporate and symbolical expression, thus joining two things hitherto held apart.

I might go on forever. The whole book is intensely fascinating and a rare two hours awaits him who picks it up.

The Call to the Ministry*

By Rev. Willard L. Sperry, D.D.

WHAT constitutes a "call to the ministry"? It is no mystical voice or emotional urge merely. It is above all else, at the present moment, the inner necessity which a man finds laid hard upon him to get, first of all, some answer to these problems in his own life. And this call is not primarily a call from a church, or from a creed. It is the imperious moral command of circumstance. It is the voice of God speaking to his own reasonable conscience. It is the necessity he feels to find out why he is here, what it all means, and what he ought to do. Beyond that, it is the call of troubled and perplexed human beings round about, asking for help in living, at the point where help is hardest to find, and yet when found means the most, the kind of help that comes from our deepest companionships in human experience. And any man who feels this necessity and hears these human voices has a sufficient call to the ministry.

If we were to recast the conception of the ministry in the familiar terms of present-day life, we might say that the modern minister is a research worker set aside by preoccupied men to study the realm of human motives and human values, and to venture fresh answers to the question, "What are we doing with life?" Ultimately, he is the man who is trying to win the power and to give others the power to say "God" in all the experiences of life. History, in the fortunes of its great systems of thought, conduct and organized social life, reveals a good many ways of saying "God." The minister must know the world's ways of saying "God" in broad outline, and must be prepared to reinterpret them in the light of present conditions. But the dead hand can never guide the living present. And no minister seeks simply to lay the dead hand on the perplexed living. He takes his start, not from the authority of the past, but from the perplexity and need of his own life and his own time. He cannot escape the thought with which Lord Bryce concluded his long study of democracy: "The civilized peoples seem to be passing into an unpredicted phase of thought and life." And he realizes that the letter of old creeds will not be able to make that transition. Old answers to the riddle of life can never entirely satisfy new conditions. And the minister to-day is the research worker set aside to deal with the fundamental questions of human values and human duties in the terms in which they state themselves in this new time.

Many a man who feels the pressure of these questions, and who recognizes the call to the ministry which they bring to him, will wonder whether he is qualified to enter the ministry. College men are confused about what they believe today, and painfully conscious of the fact that their creed is a brief and imperfect one as measured by the standards of conventional and orthodox theology. They hesitate to put themselves in a false position by entering a profession which seems to commit them to more than they can believe or accept. What constitutes theological qualification for entering the ministry under such conditions?

It seems to me perfectly clear that two broad convictions warrant a man in entering the ministry. The first conviction is this, that religion holds a better promise of satisfactory answers to the riddle of life than any other human interest. And the second more or less follows from it, that Christianity is the best and most adequate religion the world has thus far known. This is not sectarianism, nor orthodoxy. It is the testimony of the common conscience. William James used to say that Christianity was the completest of the religions man has known. Josiah Royce called it man's most important glimpse of the homeland of the human soul. George Bernard Shaw adds, in characteristic vein, that although we crucified Christ on a stick two thousand years ago we have never been able to get away from the conviction that he got hold of the right end of that stick, and that if we were better men we might try his way. If a man is convinced of those two matters it seems to me he has entire and sufficient warrant for entering the Christian ministry in some church of his choice and preference. I cannot suppose that any man would think of entering the ministry with less of a creed than that. I do not believe that any church can well ask of a man at the beginning of his life more of a creed than that. Religion is the best answer to the final problems of life. And Christianity is the best religion that we know anything about as yet.

Now, a good half of a minister's life is spent in preaching and getting ready to preach. And it is as a preacher that the minister is most characteristically known in the community. What is preaching to-day? It certainly is not re-echoing at second hand the thoughts of other men. And it is not thundering out old precepts and platitudes on the strength of a remote past.

Preaching at the present time is primarily a process of thinking aloud about life. It takes its start with the life of our own time, men's perplexities and needs. We have been told recently that the war discovered a vast fund of "inarticulate religion" in the rank and file of human life. Inarticulate religion is religion which has never really become conscious of itself, found itself, and got itself stated out in the open. The case for preaching at the present time rests on the inarticulate religion of the average man. A surgeon friend once said to me of his minister, "What really interests and helps me in that man is his ability to put into words what I have always wanted to say and have always felt ought to be said, and yet have never been able to say by myself. And that is a very great gift." That, after all, is what all art and every classic does for us. It says what we want to say and know ought to be said, and yet cannot say ourselves. That is why pictures and music and plays have a power over us. They help us to find ourselves. And this is the first thing the modern preacher has to do, to help dumb and perplexed men say out what is in them. It is told of William James that the student came out of his classroom feeling not, what a great man James is, but, how great I might be if I only knew myself and found myself. That was a fine tribute to a great teacher. Now, good preaching gets just that reaction. In this fallen world the preacher cannot always be the clear voice of God twice every week. But he can always be the voice of the people, trying to find and express themselves.

In the next place, the preacher is trying to change men's points of view. And there is confessedly no hope for the future of civilization to-day unless men's points of view are changed. There is no contribution which a man can possibly make to this generation so important and so absolutely essential as to help, even in the slightest way, to change men's way of thinking about the values of human life and the organization of human society. If our world is to be saved from suicidal disintegration it must discover afresh its communities of interest. And of all possible bonds of human union the thought of God is the surest and the strongest. Nothing so much needs to be said to the modern world as this, "One is your Father and all ye are brethren."

Teaching mathematics, healing diseases, discovering the causes and cure of cancer, getting a more stable banking system, raising the level of court procedure, limiting armaments, and refining the rules of war are all important. But of themselves they fall short of the final thing which has to be done if civilization is not to go down in ruins, and that is to change men's points of view. The trouble with our age is that in its purely mechanical and technical skill it has far outrun its social sciences and its moralities. An Oxford teacher said with utter truth that the catastrophe of the war was made possible by, and was due entirely to, our preoccupation with scientific and materialistic concerns, to the neglect of the humanities and the moral realities. And nothing that a man can possibly do with his life to-day is to be compared with the chance he has to help change men's basic ways of thinking about life.

There are many young men who admit all this, and who are really anxious above all else to help change the world's ways of thinking. They believe that the one true God is the Father of Jesus of the gospels, and that such a God can save the world. But they know that serving Him means changing many of our ways of thinking and living. And they feel that the thing cannot be said by a minister from a pulpit because the plainest fact about churches is to be found in a line of that hymn which says, "Nothing changes here." In short, they are afraid of orthodox theology, and of respectable conservative capitalism in the pews which they despair of ever making truly Christian. They are anxious to spend their lives doing what they think the ministry ought to do, but fear that churches do not offer them a chance to speak and act freely in the effort to change the world's way of thinking.

I can only report my own sober conclusions as to this absolutely vital matter. That men resent and resist the necessity for changing their ways of thinking and living is perfectly plain. Churches share in this temper; they have no monopoly of it. But the picture of the minister as a man whose soul is not his own and whose lips are sealed, living as the only remaining moral slave and coward in a world of otherwise absolutely free men is a grotesque caricature of the facts. If a man decides not to run away into a desert and live there forever in an easy and empty freedom, but to live in this world and to try to keep his own independence in the face of the stolid inertia of human institutions, liberty is costly everywhere, in the ministry or out of it. It is no easier to be a free man in the law or medicine or the teaching profession, in a bank or in the editorial room of a newspaper or in politics, than it is in the ministry. All things considered, it may be harder, because the world does not expect of the layman quite that integrity that it expects, rightly or wrongly, from the minister. Do not think for a moment that merely because you have decided not to enter the ministry you have insured your moral self-respect and independence for the rest of your life. The fight has only begun and the case will be fought out on other grounds where defeat is just as possible and perhaps even more probable.

My own observation is that if a man does not abuse his opportunities in a pulpit, to rant wildly at things as they are, or to indulge in sentimental utopian pipe-dreams, but thinks soberly and with a generous and hopeful mind about the changes in men's ways of thinking and living that Christianity asks, there is no place where he is so free to say what he really believes as in a pulpit. He will meet opposition and criticism, it is true, but he does not escape them by keeping out of a pulpit. And somehow deep in the common conscience, beneath all superficial resentment and worldly opposition, there is the conviction that just that is what the Church is for—to change men's ways of thinking and living. A disgruntled parishioner once complained that Newman's preaching interfered with the way he did business. And Newman answered, "Sir, it is the business of the Church to interfere with people." In the profoundest sense of the word that is true, and the world knows and silently admits it. Religion does interfere with life, radically and deliberately. But if that interference is made in the spirit of wisdom and charity, rather than of truculent abuse, I am prepared to defend the proposition that a man can call his soul his own in the ministry to-day and speak what is on his mind quite as freely from a liberal pulpit as from any other single point of vantage. Only, all this rests on the man's patent sincerity and humility and charity. Without these qualifications he will never be a free man in the ministry. But that is simply another way of saying that he would be a moral coward everywhere else.

Something of that sort, then, is the preaching work of the modern minister; to think aloud about life, so that he shall help perplexed men find themselves and say out through him what is in them, to the end that they may finally change their points of view and get new values for old in experience and in the organization of society—in short to make men believe that God is there, that He cares what they do, that He has a stake in them, and that "He must win the day."

There remains for final mention the other side of the minister's duty, that commonly called "parish work." This work at its broadest is always a piece of social engineering. It has to do with all the human and humane relationships of a community. It is an effort to tie up and enlist the resources of the members of a church for the effective service of the whole community through all of the organized philanthropic agencies. Parish administration is social service in the large, and concedes nothing to any of the secular social agencies. Hardly a day passes but a minister has to attempt to relate himself and his parish resources to the total social task of the community. Parish work to-day always involves finding contacts and outlets for a few hundred persons who ought to be seeking and helping their less fortunate fellow townsmen or citizens. Every minister is pledged in advance, both personally and as the commander of the time and money of other persons, to the major philanthropies of his community. He is seriously trying to organize his parish so that it can get to work at closer range and with greater effectiveness in the world at large, and in absolute co-operation with all the existing agencies.

But more definitely than all this the aim of parish work is simply to enable a man to know intimately and at first-hand the lives and needs of all sorts and conditions of other men. There is a certain amount of dull routine drudgery to be done in the way of parish visiting. At its worst it is a matter of tea cups and small talk. I do not know that it is any duller or more dreary than a good deal of routine drudgery in a shop or an office or on a doctor's rounds. John's measles and Mary's lessons are just as much a dull routine to the doctor or the teacher as they are to the minister. It is drudgery, put it any way you will, and a wise man ends by accepting drudgery as an inevitable part of any serious life.

But the end and aim of all this drudgery is to enable a man to know the lives of other human beings in detail, so that he is in a position to help them when they really need help. Samuel Barnett, the pioneer social settlement worker who founded Toynbee Hall, said that the best work that was being done in East London in his time was done, not by the workers who had broad impersonal schemes for social reform, but by those who were willing to take time and trouble with individuals. That is true of every profession and every piece of human service. The thing always comes down in the end to concrete human cases, and the solution is found, not in sweeping programs or large generalities, but in a man's willingness to take time and trouble with individuals. A man will not be a good minister who is not willing to do this. But neither will he be a good doctor, or a good teacher, or a good lawyer. I am more and more impressed by the fact that, as this world goes, the most successful professional men, the men who stand clearly at the top of their calling, are the men who are willing to take time and trouble with individuals. Your good specialist in medicine always does this. And if he is not willing to do it, because he thinks he is too busy to pay that price, he will just miss success in his life-work.

Now that is what parish work comes down to in the end. It is simply the willingness to take time and trouble with individuals, some inside a parish and others outside, who need that kind of help which religion brings to people who are in trouble. Those needs are, on the whole, the deepest and most imperative in human life. They are the needs of hope and courage and friendship and the willingness to go bravely on. Every minister is in duty bound to try to meet those needs, man to man and face to face. And preaching never takes priority over that kind of intimate, patient, hand-to-hand service of the world.

I think of a man who stumbled up to me the other night at the close of service. He had been wandering about the streets in the dark, had seen the lighted windows of the church, and had turned in there in the hope that he might find help. He did not ask for food or lodging or money. He said that he was on the verge of committing suicide and was afraid he would be driven to it before the night was over. And he wanted to find someone to stop him and save him. Is that emergency a trivial or fanciful one? No call that could ever be put to any man anywhere could be clearer or more imperious and challenging than the call of that frightened human life in its extremity. The kind of help that a minister ought to give, and can give, to such a need yields nothing, either in its reality or in the delicacy of its technique, to anything that a surgeon, or a lawyer, or a business man has to do to help this world.

The time comes, and comes frequently, in the life of the parish minister when he must enter the room that the doctor or surgeon has left because the art of healing can do no more, or when he is confronted with the angry and tangled problems of human relationships which have defied the solutions of the law, or when he must serve as the recipient of those confidences of the moral life which troubled human beings have to share with a friend. The work of the minister in these intimate and profoundly serious experiences yields absolutely nothing in its human importance or its human opportunity to the work of any other man. Superficially, parish work seems to the world a matter of trivial small talk, but actually it becomes, as a man's sympathies and insights develop, a patient grappling with those deepest and hardest problems of living which only religion can hope to solve. And the usually despised parish work of the average minister, when followed out to its ultimate conclusions, calls for the type of man who concedes nothing, either by way of opportunity or qualification, to any of his fellows in the great professions.

Of the compensations of the ministry it is difficult to speak in advance of experience itself. A man may enter the ministry to-day, hoping to earn a competence through all his working years. If he is a man of real ability he will have no difficulty in assuring for his home margins of comfort. And he is entitled to the advance assurance that however laggard individual parishes may be, and however reluctant to advance ministerial salaries to meet advancing standards and rising prices, the Protestant churches as a whole are facing this problem seriously and propose to set their ministers beyond hardship and anxiety, both during their working years and in their old age. The ministry does not commend itself to those whose only interest in life is the lure of a large income. But less and less is it shutting out those who feel deeply their moral responsibility to provide adequate support for a home with all its normal charges, and who are rightly unwilling to make the members of that home the victims of their inability to command a salary adequate for these needs. In short, the average man does make a living in the ministry, and the more than average man receives a compensation which puts him beyond anxiety and assures him of normal provision for the needs of a family.

But the more abiding compensations of the ministry are to be reckoned among life's "intangibles." The ministry brings to every man who follows it loyally the double compensation that accrues to a life lived with great ideas and profound truths on the one hand and with concrete human needs on the other hand. And a life lived in the service of God and of one's fellow men is its own best reward, in its own coin.

The Present Missionary Situation in Turkey

By Rev. Ernest W. Riggs

Associate Secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions

IT is not a pleasant task to portray the missionary situation as it is in the land of the greatest human tragedy in history. It will be my purpose to do so with the utmost candor, not trying to exaggerate the disasters that have overtaken the work or minimizing the serious difficulties which we face in the missionary task of to-day, and without holding out false hopes for the future.

The present tragedy had its beginning in the winter of 1914-15. Since that time the American Board has lost nearly thirty missionaries by death, about fifteen per cent. of our total force. Another fifteen per cent. has been transferred to other fields, while almost another fifteen per cent. has been retired through old age or incapacity due to ill health. Thus the missionary force of the American Board in Turkey has been nearly cut in half in eight years. Only a very small number has been added newly to the force during this period.

Of the institutions existing before the war, ninety per cent of the churches are closed, no college work is being done in any of the eight American Board colleges in Turkey, and most of them are completely closed. Of the ten hospitals, just one-half are being operated, some of them by the Near East Relief. Two of the college heads are dead, one was deported by the Turks, and three others have been refused permission by the Turkish government to return to their institutions. Of the forty-one educational institutions directly conducted by the American missionaries in Turkey before the war, but three, or eight per cent., are now open. Of the great number of village schools, none remain except in the region not under full control of the Turks. Our property loss in dollars is estimated at $2,-380,000.

When we consider the native workers, the situation is hardly more encouraging. Probably two-thirds of the native leadership trained up through years of patient effort are dead. The other one-third of pastors, teachers, preachers and Bible women have fled to other lands. Within a few days several appeals have come from these leaders for work, any kind of work, to keep them alive. And yet these are the long looked for native missionaries who were to replace the Americans in our great missionary enterprise in Turkey.

Our constituency is gone. Ninety-five per cent. of our people, if we exclude Constantinople, have disappeared from our field. They are dead or in exile, and the few that are left are ready to go.

Another serious disaster is the loss of position with the government. The capitulations are gone. Whether the governments of Europe or the United States accept it or not in practice, there have been no capitulatory rights in the interior of Turkey since 1914. Nearly fifty Americans have been deported without a semblance of trial and without any reason being officially assigned. One by one our schools have been closed. Despite the newspaper assertions of Ismet Pasha, the head of the Turkish delegation at Lausanne, those schools remain closed.

Still another difficulty in the way of the advance of missionary work in Turkey is a change of feeling here in America. There is a hatred of the Turk which is frank and outspoken and which leads even the best of our church members to hesitate to see money spent for his conversion or betterment. If the American Board could start a program of "wiping the Turk off the map" it would be a popular movement. Some say the Turk is unconvertible, that we have nothing to show for one hundred years of effort, and it is time to withdraw. Others point out that time and money are too precious to spend them in so difficult a field; that the same investment in China or India would bring in many fold more results. There are business interests which oppose the missionaries on the ground that they stir up trouble with the government which would otherwise grant them concessions.

Not the least tragic element in the situation is the heart-ache and even discouragement among the missionaries themselves. I know of several who openly say they will never return to work for the Turks. The problem of the refugees, the mere physical problem of keeping alive those who were our fellow workers in the former years, is a crushing one. The tragedy of the Armenian and Greek peoples has torn the souls of their American friends, especially as our own country and the nations of Europe have failed to take any strong stand to protect these minorities. A slow process of torture has been going on for seven years, and the end is not yet. No human beings with hearts of flesh could stand by and witness these things all about them without losing something of their courage or strength or hope.

One fact is evident from the survey of the tragedy of our work in Turkey. We were working for the Christian peoples, and only in a very secondary way for the Turks. Not only had there been no response from the Turks, but we had grown accustomed to expecting none. Most of our missionaries spent all their time working directly for and among the Christians. A very large proportion knew no Turkish at all, and those who had mastered it so as to write it freely were entirely wanting. A thorough study of Mohammedanism was also left out of our missionary preparation till the last few years.

This, which at first glance seems like a gigantic and unpardonable sin on the part of the missionaries to Turkey, finds some excuse when we realize that the principle upon which we were working was that we who were foreign were to inspire the Christians who were native, so that they in turn might evangelize their neighbors. The Armenians had begun this in real earnest as they were developing under the independent control of their own church the work for the Kurds. As a practical means of reaching the Turks, however, the theory broke down through the barrier between Turk and Christian, somewhat parallel to the barrier between the black and the white in the South, but vastly intensified through the past ten years.

Thus, while the results among the nominal Christians of Turkey have been phenomenal, the tangible results among the Turks are difficult to find. The open hostility between Protestant and Gregorian has disappeared, the open Bible in the language of the people has taken its official place in the Gregorian Church and a definite desire for a purified Church has seized its leaders. But not a single church of Turkish Christians exists, and but a very few scattered converts may be found in foreign lands; none in Turkey, where conversion means death.

If we look more deeply, however, we shall find that the impact of the century of missionary effort in Turkey has not been entirely negligible, even on the Turks themselves. There have been converts who died nobly for their faith. There was a Turkish church of eleven members with its pastor which was blotted out by violence, but the memory and inspiration of which remains. One Turkish convert, who with his wife and baby were baptized in Constantinople two years ago, landed recently in New York. With the sentence of deportation hanging over him, during a twenty-five days' detention at Ellis Island, he preached boldly to his Armenian fellow sufferers. Think of it, a Turk preaching the Gospel of love to Armenians on the doorstep of a so-called Christian America which was threatening both Turk and Armenian with death through a new deportation! No, the Turk is not unconvertible.

But more, there is a great group of Turks, men and women, who have received in our schools new ideals of life which they are trying to work out in their difficult environment. Go with me to an opera produced during the war. The theme is Joseph, a name sacred to Moslem, Jew and Christian. The music is the creation of a graduate of one of our great American colleges, while the words and direction are given by a woman, a Turk, but a graduate of another of our colleges. The story is sung in simple Turkish by Christian, Moslem and Jewish girls together, and the audience, largely made up of Moslem men and unveiled Moslem women, is absorbing the lofty sentiments which have been the highest inspiration of millions of Christians. And all of this is not in a church or a Christian school, but at the closing exercises of a Turkish girls' school! That audience was delivering a telling blow against the great wall that has been built up by Christian crusades and Moslem massacres between the Turk and the spirit of the Christ.

New and more friendly contacts were being built up. Turkish clubs with their lectures and classes were largely attended; Turkish audiences were easily gathered to hear men like Dr. Zwemer and Mr. Sherwood Eddy; Turkish literature was being more widely read by an awakened public. And despite the fact that these new opportunities are now again closed, it was but yesterday that the Turks in Aintab were rallying around the missionary agriculturist pledging him their support, and when the hospital in the same city was threatened with closure because its workers were to be deported the people of the city voted to have them remain, and they did remain. Despite the apparent opposition of the government, the people appreciate the services of the missionaries and want them to stay.

Our missionary program for Turkey must be worked out slowly, but a few things are clear.

1. We must not fail to follow up our Christian constituency in exile, giving them spiritual guidance and comfort as their bodies are being saved by the relief organizations. It is with this in mind that the large missionary work in the Caucasus has been built up. It is with this in mind that our workers are starting a school in Athens and planning enlargement in Salonica. It is with this in mind that our missionaries have followed the Armenians, with the consent and co-operation of our Presbyterian brethren, into Syria, and there among the exiles churches and schools have been started which, even in such adverse circumstances, are about forty per cent. self-supporting.

2. We must hold on in Turkey where we can. The very presence of the missionary means much, and ultimately a new work will begin where now there is little but the memory of a vast tragedy—and ashes.

3. We must train for Moslem work. It is to be the work of to-morrow, and we must not be unprepared as in the past, when we vainly hoped that the Armenians were to bear the largest share of direct evangelization.

4. Our hospitals must be strengthened and reopened. This is the most certain approach to the Turks.

5. Literature especially adapted to Turkish readers must be rapidly distributed. We are sadly lacking in modern material with the right approach. The new survey of Moslem literature has shown us a new path which we must follow at once.

6. We must join in the prayer of faith for the Turks, not half-heartedly, but recognizing that in their regeneration lies the only hope of permanent peace in the Near East.

We hold no battle line of force; we hold a service line of love. There is no fear of ultimate defeat on the field, but there is a terrible danger of the Church at home failing to uphold the workers by faith and prayer. The Christian missionary program is being severely tested. If we lose in Turkey, the loss is great throughout the Moslem world. But if we persevere in faith and prayer, with earnest love for the unlovely, the most unyielding barrier in the non-Christian world will be moved.

The Present Status of Evangelism of Moslems

By Rev. Samuel Marinus Zwemer, D.D.

ALTHOUGH the political chaos in the Near East rivets the attention of the public and the press, it is not the vital factor in evangelizing the Moslem world. Nor does this political situation, however perplexing, concern the whole Moslem world, but only a small fraction of its vast population. The economic and social condition of the Moslem world is to-day such, and has been such for decades and centuries, that to rehearse its elements would "stir a fever in the blood of age," and would make all of us willing to devote our whole time and strength to social service, in any Mohammedan land for its womanhood and childhood living under Moslem conditions. But the social and economic condition of the Moslem world is not the vital factor in evangelism. The vital and determining factor in the consideration of the Moslem world situation for a missionary conference is the spiritual factor.

This is my firm conviction because I believe that back of the other conditions is the religious factor, both on the side of Christianity and on the side of Islam. Although I realize the grave and age-long chasms that divide Islam from Islam, such as the Shiah and the Sunna sections, and other divisions almost equally deep, I do not believe as others that there is no unity in the Moslem world; because the first important fact in the present world situation, as I see it, is the unity of the whole Moslem world, the fifteen million Shiahs, as well as the nearly one hundred and ninety-five million Sunna-Mohammedans. This unity consists in the age-long antithesis of both communions in Islam, to Christ and Christianity.

Therefore, the unity of the Moslem world which is real (if any one doubts it, let them examine the volume of the "Survey of Christian Literature in the Mohammedan World" which will be published in a few months). This unity consists not in geographical proximity, although it might appear so as outlined on a map. Islam has invaded all continents and crossed the seven seas, yet its unity does not consist in geographical proximities, nor is that unity political. You can build up a very strong argument which nevertheless is weak, that the Caliphate movement in India, or the idea of a pan-Islamic movement on the part of the Turks, or the fear of some that the Mohammedan dervish orders (which spread like a network all over that map) are a political danger, but that is not the real and abiding unity of the Moslem world.

Nor is the unity racial because on that map, had I time to show it, all the races are represented; neither is it linguistic although the dominating sacred language, that binds together these Mohammedans is the speech of the Koran, Arabic. Nor is it ritual. To the world traveler, the muezzens call and the minaret, and a half dozen other peculiarities like the Moslem's cap or his rosary are proof of this apparent unity. Yet this is a mere external unity of ritual. The real unity of the Moslem world is the blending of all these elements and the vitalizing of them by the dynamic of the spirit of Islam. A spirit of faith, of conviction, of intolerance if you will, but an intolerance that has many points worthy of admiration.

The second factor in the present-day situation, is the marvelous accessibility of all Moslem lands and of all classes among Moslems to the messenger of Christ. Except Afghanistan, the holy cities of West Arabia, the present disturbed areas in Turkey, and around the Caspian—the whole Moslem world is open to the missionary. That means that seven-eighths of the Moslem world's population and nearly as much of the Moslem world's area, is accessible. We can make no excuse for not carrying the gospel to these Mohammedans; nor say the roads are not open for the carrying of our message. If there ever was an excuse of closed doors in regard to Islam that excuse has been forever abrogated by western invasion and colonization. All doors are wide open.

In the third place, there is an increasing responsiveness, as far as I can judge by correspondence from many lands, and by my own experience an increasing responsiveness among Mohammedans everywhere to the missionary message. Medical missions in Arabia, south and east, have proved that beyond the shadow of a doubt. The porter in Palestine, who followed Allenby's army, and is now carrying on that work, under Mr. Archibald Forder, himself a prince of porters, proving that all Syria and Palestine is open to the message of the printed page as it never was before. Public meetings held this last year in cities like Algiers, Casa Blanca, Tunis, Alexandria, Cairo and other great centers proved that you can gather together groups of intelligent Mohammedans anywhere and tactfully, lovingly, present the whole gospel, the only gospel, without let or hindrance. At Modjowarno in Java I spoke for an hour on the death of our Lord and its significance as a ransom for sin in a crowded church, one-half of the audience being Moslems and the other converts from Islam.

The output and the outreach of every press that carries on a work of printing the gospel and other books for Mohammedans and, most of all, the British and Foreign and the American Bible Societies, prove that there is to-day a hunger and a thirst for the Word of God, practically in every place where the Word of God is presented.

But, in the fourth place, there is also an increasing activity and enterprise and hostility on the part of the Moslem press. We might well expect this, because the Bible itself, as Christ, is always set up for "a sign that shall be spoken against." Opposition is a proof of progress. Hatred and persecution are evidence that the gospel of Jesus Christ is winning its way. Had I space I would like to refer to a sheaf of Mohammedan newspapers that I have, most of them in English, to prove the character of the present-day hostility in its united and vicious attack on the character of our Lord Jesus

The CHRISTIAN CENTURY

“THE GREATEST JOURNALISTIC FORCE working for social and international righteousness coming from any press of the Christian Church,”—so writes Bishop Francis J. McConnell, concerning The Christian Century. “The ablest and most influential religious paper in America,” says the Westminster Gazette (London), of this journal of religion. “The most discussed religious periodical in America,”—comes from many sources. Thus The Christian Century is regarded throughout the English speaking world as the voice of the awakening social conscience in twentieth century Christianity. It has taken a unique position as the journalistic common denominator of American Christian leadership.

We are now undertaking a program, for the next thirty days, of broadcasting the message of The Christian Century to ten thousand additional readers — thoughtful churchmen and churchwomen in all communions throughout the land. Specifically speaking, we have devised a plan which will make it easy for ten thousand people to “tune in” and enjoy the stimulating discussion of religion and the interpretation of world events from the Christian point of view, afforded by the weekly issues of The Christian Century.

THE CHRIST

DURING the past year the subscription list of The Christian Century has been fully doubled. We desire to cap the season by securing 10,000 additional new readers during the next thirty days. With 10,000 Christian leaders, lay and clerical, added to our present far-reaching subscription list, there will not be a nook or corner of the American church and of American public opinion that will not be influenced by the message of this journal of religion.

Following its characteristic purpose, The Christian Century will soon publish a series of notable articles by the leading exponents of social Christianity in our American churches. Such authoritative and brilliant writers as Professor CHARLES A. ELLWOOD, DR. ALBION W. SMALL, Bishop FRANCIS J. MCCONNELL, Dr. ALVA W. TAYLOR, DR. SAMUEL Z. BATTEN, Professor HARRY F. WARD, DR. A. E. HOLT, Professor ROSS L. FINNEY, and others will challenge the pagan motives, false ideas, principles and presuppositions of our social order with a view to the discovery of a truly Christian way of life for modern men. Among the questions they will consider are these:

- Is Nationalism Compatible with the Principles of Jesus?*
- Does a Tariff Violate Christian Ethics?*
- Is American Business Christian or Pagan?*
- Is the Ownership of Land Property Morally Defensible?*
- Is the Ownership of Capital in Itself a Clear Title to Income from Capital?*
- Does the Earth and its Resources Belong to Those Who "Grab First"?*
- Is Competition in Business Justifiable from a Christian Viewpoint?*
- Does the Principle of Competition in Business Really Bring Peace and Prosperity?*
- Are Profits the Legitimate First Concern of Industry?*
- Is Labor a Commodity?*
- Has Labor No Claim Beyond the Agreed Wage?*
- Has Religion Anything to Do With Industry?*
- Is War Inevitable?*

A TYPICAL LETTER

The Christian Century,
Chicago, Ill.

Gentlemen:

It is hard to write you concerning your magazine without being effusive. My heart fairly leaps on Mondays when I see it on my desk. There is hope for the Christian world if only such leadership as that provided in your paper could be extended so as to touch a sufficient number of ministers and laymen.

I am wondering how best to secure a large number of subscriptions in the families of our own church and community. Please give me the benefit of any experience in this matter. Let me know how we can put this thing over together. I would give anything if it had only been possible to have the assurance that a number of the families in our church had read your sterling weekly for the last few months.

Enthusiastically yours,

JNO. S. CARLILE.

PAPINI'S LIFE OF CHRIST

By GIOVANNI PAPINI

(Translated from the Italian by Dorothy Canfield Fisher)

WHO IS GIOVANNI PAPINI? He is the foremost man of letters in Italy; he has been hailed as a master by Bergson, and was a friend and disciple of William James; he has written novels, poems, plays, essays, and has studied all the systems of philosophy. Furthermore, he was a hater rather than a lover of his kind, an anarchist, atheist, nihilist. But now he turns, in Saul-of-Tarsus fashion, to the simple faith of Christ. His new book has been hailed in Europe as has no other book written within a decade. It has been translated into a dozen languages.

Here is the one book of the year that every minister and thoughtful Christian layman will have to buy. (Price of book, $3.50, plus 14 cents postage.)

Three Other Great Books You Should Have

THE RECONSTRUCTION OF RELIGION—By Charles A. Ellwood. Readers in seventeen states were recently canvassed by a leading bookseller as to religious books of late and current publication found most helpful. The volume most favored was the book by Professor Ellwood. This work points a way out of the confusion in which the religious world now finds itself. (Price of book, $2.25, plus 12 cents postage.)

THE WORLD'S GREAT RELIGIOUS POETRY—Caroline M. Hill, editor. This work, just from the press, brings into one volume the poems which are constantly called for in sermon-making; and it is furthermore the finest book for devotional reading published in many years. Dr. Frank Crane says, "My advice to ministers and church people everywhere is to get it at once." (Price, $5.00, plus 15 cents postage.)

THE NEW CONCORDANCE TO THE AMERICAN REVISED BIBLE—For a score of years you have waited for a concordance which you could use with your American Revised Bible. Here it is, just from the press. Dr. M. C. Hazard has done every Bible student great service in preparing such a book. You will buy it eventually. Why not now? (Price, $5.00, plus 15 cents postage.)

ANY OF THESE BOOKS WILL BE MAILED YOU AT ONCE, UPON YOUR ORDER.

NOTE: We can supply you with any book published, now in print. Watch the columns of The Christian Century for full information on the latest and best books on religion.

Christ—on the character of our common Christianity and on our missionary efforts.

The fifth outstanding fact in the present situation is the continued paucity of definite results in conversions from Islam. It is the same now as it was for all these hundred years. Now, if you ask for the real missionary situation, not the political situation, not the situation of diplomacy, not the situation of Near East Relief, or any other God-like work of social helpfulness or education or medical aid, but if you ask what have been the results in regard to those who have changed their allegiance and have said, "Not this man but Jesus Christ," then we missionaries come before you with fear and trembling because we desire to speak the truth only. We come before you then in the words of Peter that morning when Christ met him and asked him the question, and Peter said to Him with fearlessness, but with truthfulness, "Master, we have toiled all the night, and have taken nothing, nevertheless at thy Word we will let down the net."

Those three facts are the outstanding facts in the work of your missionaries on the foreign field among Moslems. We first confess our faithfulness, then our failure, then our faith. There have been critics at home who have said, "You have caught nothing because your methods are wrong. You have caught nothing because your lives are wrong. You have caught nothing because your way of approach is wrong," and they have indicted Raymund Lull and Henry Martyn and Karl Gottlieb Pfander, men of God who poured out their tears and life-blood for these Mohammedans, and said they were mere controversialists. We confess and do it without fear of contradiction, the faithfulness of the workers in all that great area. They have not slept all night. They have not loitered all night. They have toiled all night.

Look at the map. There is all Arabia. After thirty-three years of work, not thirty converts in the whole peninsula. In all North Africa, including Egypt, where they have toiled faithfully with a million native Christians, forty thousand of them in the Evangelical Church—all Egypt, all Tripoli, all Algeria, all Tunis, all Morocco together could not muster baptized converts to the number of three hundred. In Java and Sumatra we have eight hundred and sixty thousand converts from heathenism, but less than forty-five thousand from Islam.

God wants us to face the facts and not to camouflage them by the statistics of Oriental churches, or of people won from the Oriental churches to a more living faith. I believe that the evangelical missionary has a real message for the Oriental Christian who is surrounded by superstitions and often dwelling in the twilight of half truths. But that is not evangelizing the Mohammedans, and unless we face the clear issue of carrying the gospel of Jesus Christ to the Moslems we are not meeting the missionary situation in the Near East at all.

Princes in Poverty

By William Willard Howard

LET me tell briefly, in words without bitterness, in facts without criticism, the saddest story in all Europe's dreary expanse of hunger, hatred and suspicion. The high-lights of the story have flickered, from time to time, on the pages of magazines and newspapers, and then faded out to give place to the whirling panorama of passing things; so some of you who read this may know that probably as many as three million of the nobility and intelligentsia of old Russia fled from their ancestral lands and homes to escape death, or worse, at the hands of revolutionists.

The flickering story has given glimpses of the panic flight of the men and women who constituted the brains, the education, the culture, the creative ability and the administrative experience of a nation of a hundred and fifty million inhabitants; of grand dukes earning a few cents a day rolling cigarettes in a small room in Constantinople; of princesses serving as waitresses in restaurants; of generals of the old army working as porters; of princes driving taxicabs.

After these glittering high-lights faded out the unfortunate Russians merged into the obscurity of exploited things. They were passed by—forgotten. Of what happened to them in the shadows the flickering pages took no heed. I take up the facts where the academic literary spectacle left off.

In the newly-created states bordering on Bolshevik Russia, in the Balkans and in Central Europe are many thousands of these educated, cultured refugees existing in a condition of unthinkable poverty, sickness and suffering. Many have died. Many are dying, without appeals for help, without words of reproach—gentlefolk who gave their all to the Allied cause, and, having given, suffered at the last the supreme sacrifice without murmur or complaint.

The Allies dealt with the Russian refugees on the apparent theory that if you do not see a thing it does not exist; so when refugees grouped themselves together in considerable numbers, as at Constantinople, they were scattered to the winds of chance. The complacent belief was that the refugees would be absorbed and assimilated by the nations among whom they were scattered. The Allies dumped the refugees down upon the Balkans and Central Europe and said, "Thank God, that's done!"

There was only one thing wrong with this simple method of disposing of Russian refugees: it did not work. The Balkans and Central Europe did not absorb and assimilate the Russians. They were not unkind or unsympathetic, but they simply could not receive the Russians except as aliens who might have whatever there should be of employment and food and clothing that the natives did not happen to want for themselves.

In the rare instances in which the refugees did find employment the wages were considerably less than the wages paid to the natives for the same service; so that, even with work available, the refugees could not earn enough to sustain life.

sessions that they had been able to carry with them in their flight from Russia—a ring, a bit of old lace, a bracelet, a fur coat, a family jewel—but in time the supply of these things gave out, leaving for the individual only hunger and despair and at the end the inevitable disease that is the ostensible cause of death.

How many have died is not known. If one hundred thousand had died in one group in Constantinople the civilized world would have been shocked, but in scattered groups or family units half a million might have died without exciting passing comment. Judging solely by what I have seen of conditions in the wretched places in which exist the refugees whom I have visited, I believe that the mortality has been excessively heavy. I do not venture an estimate, because in these all too brief lines I tell only the things that I myself have seen of the living and of those about to die in this year of prosperity, 1923.

I have seen the widow of a colonel of the Imperial Russian Army lying ill upon a narrow bed from which sheets, quilts and blankets had been taken to buy food, in a bare, narrow room without heat or light, while the snow swirled outside the window—not a morsel of food, not a drop of medicine for the passing of an educated, cultured young woman whose early college training had included four languages, music and drawing.

I have bought sketches of an artist who had not eaten food for four days.

I have given help to an army colonel's widow who was so weak and dazed from hunger that she wept, while her little son moaned in illness on a bare cot. There was no medicine for the boy; no food for the mother. From simple weakness the mother had fallen in the street while seeking work.

I have seen an army colonel's widow trying helplessly to decide whether to remain in Eastern Europe and starve to death alone or try to return to her mother and sisters in the Volga region of Bolshevik Russia, where all might perish of hunger together.

I have seen a former naval officer begging piteously for work that he might relieve the three-days' fast of his wife and two children.

I have seen an actor from the court theater of Petrograd who had not eaten for two days.

I have called upon an elderly woman, the only survivor of an ennobled Russian family of ancient lineage who was existing miserably on eighty cents a month contributed by friends only a shade more fortunately situated than herself—one dead son a judge; the other dead son a governor of a district—a kindly, courteous gentlewoman who speaks five languages.

I have visited a widow who that day had sold her last warm coat for money with which to pay rent for one end of a room—a woman who twice had been decorated by the late Tsar for heroic conduct in assisting wounded soldiers under fire on the field of battle: the soldiers of the corps of fourteen regiments commanded by her husband, who was second in rank to Kuropatkin.

I have been received with gentle courtesy in a bare, cheerless, narrow room by a man and woman of the nobility of old Russia—the man a gentleman-in-waiting at the court of the Tsar, a governor of two provinces, the hereditary overlord of four villages and seven thousand fertile acres, the grand marshal of the nobility of his home district, an open-handed millionaire, a kindly and beloved master to his tenants—and now, penniless and hopeless, existing miserably, without sufficient food, in a room the rent of which is a gift of charity from other refugees.

I have saluted and spoken with a general of the old army selling newspapers on a street corner.

I have been told by the widow of a brigade commander that she could not leave the wretched place in which she lives because her only shoes were made of pieces of cloth stitched together.

I have employed a titled Russian lady whose fight to provide food for an invalid sister, her sister's three children and her own young daughter is one of those heroic struggles that is possible only in a woman at bay, fighting for the lives of those whom she loves.

Shall I prolong the tale? Shall I open the floodgates of my notebooks and pour upon your sensibilities scores of aching stories of the griefs, the sorrows, the hunger, the misery and the voiceless despair of men and women of your own stratum in life—educated, cultured gentlefolk caught in the man-trap of revolution and flung from its red jaws upon the barren shelter of alien lands? Shall I drag across the untroubled surface of your hearts the barb-tooth harrow of the sufferings that I have seen, of the anguish that I have heard, of the abysmal despair that knows no hope? Shall I multiply instance upon instance, until you shriek aloud for mercy? It were possible to do so, for I defy anyone of gentle birth and human sympathy to turn away from the recital of the ghastly tragedy once it were begun.

Never has the impulse to tell the full shocking truth been stronger within me, for in all the ten years that I have given to the organization and administration of emergency relief, at various times in Armenia, in Persia, in Albania, in Cuba and in North America, this is the first time that I have come face to face with the poverty, sickness and suffering of men and women of my own kind. It hurts, especially as you and I could have prevented much of the suffering, had we known about it sooner. But we did not know—and these gentlefolk died, one by one, and made no sign.

That I now know of the appalling condition of the survivors of the Russian exodus is an accident. I visited the Baltic provinces of old Russia seeking to buy cargoes of timber and iron for my ships—for in these days a shipowner, forced to operate his American-built ships in competition with the government-built and government-operated ships of his own country, must search the seven seas for cargoes. Anne Louise Howard, embarked upon the mild adventure of seeing Bolsheviks in the daily practice of Bolshevism, accompanied me.

In the streets of a city of Eastern Europe we saw women gathering up offal and shoveling snow. We asked for explanations. The women were "only some of those Russian refugees; they're always around begging for work, when there isn't enough work for the natives."

We saw an iron-gray man in a faded military overcoat selling newspapers at a street corner. That was "General Simeoni; used to command the Tsar's army at Tambov—well, really, you know, that sort of thing's so common we don't pay much attention."

We gave the afternoons and evenings of two solid weeks to a house-to-house, room-to-room investigation of the condition of the refugees. I gave the mornings to the business of ships. At the end of a fortnight, as I was leaning over the foot of a poor little bed in a narrow, cold room a woman ill of influenza coughed almost in my face. I returned to the hotel and went to bed for two weeks.

When the ceiling ceased to whirl around, and I came back to a remembrance of the things that I had seen and heard, I realized yet more acutely the sufferings of the refugees; for, in one tossing nightmare after another, between black midnight and gray dawn, I had wandered forth upon a cold, white world asking work of men whose hearts were colder still.

Anne Louise Howard had two dozen garments of feminine wear spread upon tables, chairs and sofas in her sitting room.

"These are your Russian blouses," she said. "You may remember that we gave out cloth and embroidery thread and money to some of the neediest of the women whom we visited, and asked them to make up samples of genuine hand-embroidered, hand-sewn Russian blouses, such as they had worn in Russia before the war. Well, here are the blouses."

I have reason to know that Anne Louise Howard is a highly qualified expert in matters of women's apparel, so I said, "What's the course?"

"I shall keep these three for my own wear," she answered. "You may give the rest to the poor."

"Are they as bad as all that?"

"Bad? They are beautiful! They have originality; they have individuality; they have color harmony; but only three of them have that indefinable something that Fifth Avenue demands—that effect which the man-dressmaker of Paris achieves when he takes a piece of cheesecloth and by a few twists of the wrist transforms it into a gown that sells for a thousand dollars. These three would sell in any shop in Fifth Avenue, because they have Fifth Avenue quality."

"Could not these three be reproduced in quantity and sent to Fifth Avenue to be sold, so that destitute Russian gentlefolk might have employment?"

"It would be difficult. The women of the nobility, the landed gentry and the intelligentsia of old Russia did exquisitely beautiful needlework as a matter of course. It was a hereditary accomplishment, handed down from mother to daughter, generation after generation. Each woman had her own ideas and her own instinctive taste in design, but probably not one of them knew or cared anything about the requirements of Fifth Avenue. They made embroidered blouses only for their own wear or as gifts to friends. The work was beautiful, but it was exclusively Russian. Probably nine-tenths of the refugee women now in Eastern Europe can do this beautiful work, but to ask them to modify their art to suit Fifth Avenue might be a problem."

"You might try, although I do not remember that your university curriculum included a course in blouse-making."

"I will try."

At the end of six weeks of the hardest kind of work Anne Louise Howard placed twelve blouses side by side with the rejected twenty-one and invited my inspection.

"Even a shipowner ill of influenza can see the difference," I said. "I do not know what it is, but the twelve new blouses have some quality that the others lack."

"It is that indefinable something which makes Fifth Avenue just a little different. These blouses will sell in any shop in Fifth Avenue between Madison Square and Central Park. Women who know Fifth Avenue quality when they see it will take them at sight."

"We have found the solution of the Russian refugee problem."

That was the beginning.

It required working capital; it required a sinking fund for experimental purposes; it required a working organization; it required thoroughly competent administration. The working capital and the sinking fund I could provide, at least for a beginning; a working organization I could create by the application of common-sense business methods; but a competent administration, from an American point of view, was something else—for the entire plan, to be of any practical use, must be self-perpetuating. Blouses must be made in Eastern Europe, shipped to the United States and there sold, and the proceeds of sales returned to Eastern Europe to be used over again in the same way—and all without loss of, or even reduction of, the original working capital. If that could not be done I might as well translate my working capital into terms of free soup and old clothes and hand it out to the refugees and be done with it.

Any practical man of affairs will know without prompting that the administration required the devoted volunteer services of an American woman of unusual mental equipment and force of character, together with sound business methods, a precise knowledge of women's wearing apparel of the better sort, an infallible judgment of form and color, an artistic eye for design and harmony, a knowledge of three or four languages, tact and diplomacy—and all backed by that inherited indefinable instinct that we call "taste in dress." Without such a woman it would be folly to undertake this form of help for the refugees.

Unless the "indefinable something" could be put into each blouse the work could not be perpetuated. There are approximately as many designs, patterns and colors of Russian blouses as there are Russians. No two blouses are alike. No two can be alike, because it is impossible to duplicate hand-made garments. If the making of blouses for American wearers were not restricted to American requirements the result would be chaos.

There was in Eastern Europe only one woman known to me fully qualified to undertake this form of relief work. I laid the plain facts before her.

"I will stay," said Anne Louise Howard.

So it was settled.

The creation of a working organization, although simple and easy in theory, was extremely difficult in practice. It is not easy to resist one's natural, human impulse to hand out money right and left to half-starved gentlewomen, instead of giving out cloth and embroidery thread and requiring them to do a certain specified amount of work in return for a stipulated sum of money. In many cases we did give out money as part payment in advance, usually one-third. You cannot expect a woman to work two weeks on a blouse if she has not eaten food for two days.

One naturally approaches with reluctance the task of allocating relief labor to a woman who has dined with royalty in the palace of the Tsar; one hesitates instinctively to give sewing and embroidery materials to a woman who has been decorated by the Tsar for heroic conduct on the field of battle; one feels a certain diffidence in discussing models and patterns of blouses with a woman who, all her life long until the coming of war, had imported her gowns direct from the most exclusive shops of Paris. It hurts more to offer help to one social and intellectual equal than to ten thousand peasants.

The gentlewomen of old Russia who came to us for work accepted our help eagerly—many with tears of gratitude; all with words of thanksgiving. In the worn garments and broken shoes of indescribable poverty and destitution they still were gentlefolk.

With one of the first finished blouses came this message:

"Into this garment has been stitched the gratitude of a woman's heart."

The foregoing was written in a far corner of Eastern Europe, with the snow beating at the windows and a wind from the steppes of Bolshevik Russia shrieking across a white and frozen world. Only yesterday I returned to the peace, prosperity and security of home.

Anne Louise Howard remains in that remote outpost of Europe, a lonely and heroic figure, grappling single-handed with a relief problem of colossal magnitude and tragic urgency.

Up to the time that I left for home we had put into successful operation a needlework industry that gave steady employment to two hundred Russian gentlewomen. With the few thousand dollars that we had carried with us to Europe, combined with the additional funds that I have forwarded by cable since my return, we are able to guarantee work to two hundred women—no more. This much we can do, alone and unaided—a priceless privilege of service to destitute women of our own walk in life.

But—those other hunger-shrunken gentlewomen—those throngs of educated, cultured women who begged, with sobs and tears, for that work which should lift them from the quagmire of despair—what of them? I could not help them, because I had reached a limit beyond which I could not go. All that I could do was to tell them that I would ask your help. So they are waiting, day by day, for a cablegram that shall be to them as a reprieve from a sentence of death.

I ask for a working fund with which to give employment to those waiting women. I ask you who read this to send in a subscription at once, so that I may send the cablegram without delay. I have not time now to explain more fully. All details will be explained later.

To those among you who desire to see photographs of the Russian Princess Blouses I will send an illustrated circular giving more than two dozen photo-engravings of blouses from which selections may be made. The circular will be ready for mailing as soon as engravers and printers can do their work.

The one urgent thing now is to cable money to Eastern Europe, so that those waiting women may have work. Some of them may die of hunger before help can reach them. All through the twenty days of my tempestuous journey home I was haunted, day and night, by the sobs and tears of those gentlewomen whom I could not help. Here in the serenity of home the ghastly tragedy seems like a nightmare—a condition of hunger and suffering so shocking as to lie far beyond the border of belief. If only you could know it as I know it each one of you also would regret bitterly that you individually could guarantee life and hope to only two hundred starving gentlewomen.

Subscriptions should be sent to the Russian Refugee Fund, care THE CHRISTIAN WORK, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

A Day with the Mohammedan Worshipers in Constantinople

By Rev. Henry A. Atkinson, D.D.

General Secretary, The Church Peace Union

[Dr. Atkinson spent last summer in Europe. His recent article on Serbia is fresh in the minds of our readers.]

LEAVING our hotel on the Pera side of the Galata bridge, we were sauntering along the crowded Constantinople street, with its riot of color and variety of smells, when my companion stopped before a bulletin board whereon was written in Turkish an admonition to the faithful to expect great events in the near future. "As I expected!" he said, with a dramatic gesture toward the board. I turned to him with some amusement, for as usual he was finding new food for his pessimism. "It means," he continued, "that the Moslem world is to hear in no mild way of the treatment of Turkey by the Allied Christian powers. There will be things doing in the mosques to-morrow. The ghost of defeat that now walks in the house of Mohammedanism is to be laid to rest. Suppose we spend Friday with the worshipers and try to learn what is being done."

This conversation took place some months ago and the scenes of that memorable day are vivid in my mind to-day. The Greek army has been routed since, Smyrna burned, and but for the immediate action of Great Britain in sending her fleet to the Dardanelles no one can imagine to what depths of savagery the truculent Turkish army might have descended in its triumphant march forward to regain its lost land power and prestige. The recent failure of the Lausanne Conference adds an additional black mark to the score.

The Turks is to some "barbarian," to others "the gentleman of Europe," but if you would know the truth you must understand his religion and see him at his devotions. One of the chief purposes I had in mind in visiting Constantinople was to find out what I could about Mohammedanism in operation and try to come to some judgment as to whether or not it is possible to form a world organization of Religions for International Friendship with Mohammedanism as one of the participating faiths. The city has three sabbath days each week. Friday for the Mohammedans, Saturday for the Jews and Sunday for the Christians, and so for three days I had a chance to look in on some of the varieties of religion as it is exemplified in Turkey. It was on Friday, and in its observance that I found my greatest interest and I felt that much light was shed on the question that I was seeking to solve.

It was a pleasant surprise to find such a willingness to show us the buildings and worship on the part of the priests and other authorities at the various mosques we visited. St. Sophia holds such an attraction for all people that naturally we turned first to it, and here we made our initial acquaintance with the "Faithful" at their prayers. It is an interesting thing to see a huge building filled with men all kneeling and facing in one direction. This sight we witnessed in every place of worship. At the hour of prayer the muezzin comes out on the platform near the top of the minaret and calls the people to come into the mosque and say their prayers. He shouts at the top of his voice, or rather he chants this creed of Mohammed in varying cadences: "Great One, I avow there is no God but God; I avow that Mohammed is his prophet; let us go and pray; let us go and save our souls; God is great, there is no God but God!" This translation gives but a feeble idea of the wild beauty of the chant—"Allah Akber! (repeated four times) Essahadon Allah il lala il-allah" (twice repeated), and so on with the weird inflections and savage emphasis. This call to prayer, as often as I heard it, never failed to exert a kind of hypnotic influence over me. Along the side of the mosque there is a row of fountains with running water and in front of each fountain a low flat stone. The muezzin calls to prayer five times during the twenty-four hours of the day, and each time the worshipers go to these fountains, where they perform the necessary ablutions. They are supposed to wash their hands and the arms as far as above the elbows, and also their feet. The act of washing is usually rather in the interests of ceremony than cleanliness. A "lick and a promise" is about all the hands and arms receive, and then a finger wet in the running water is passed along the edge of the dusty shoes or lightly rubbed over the bare feet. The washing complete, the worshiper next enters the mosque carrying his shoes, if he has any. The muezzin has taken his place on the stairway known as the Maafile, and from there he intones the service. It is all in Arabic, and practically none of the people understand more than a few words. Every time the words "God is great" are uttered the worshiper prostrates himself, bending the body forward toward Mecca. Attempts have been made, I was told, to translate the Koran into the Turkish language, but this has always been bitterly opposed on the grounds that every word of the original is inspired and is furthermore capable of being interpreted in a variety of ways. If, therefore, there should be a translation of these words in order to maintain the inherent quality of the original your translator must be inspired; if, on the other hand, he claims such inspiration he is putting himself on an equality with Mohammed, and this is the height of impiety. It seemed to me, as I heard this philosophy of the people explained, that there is after all not much difference between a Christian who believes in the literalistic interpretation of the Bible and a Mohammedan. More than once during the day I was impressed with two major facts—one that there is almost nothing in Mohammedanism that is not borrowed from either Judaism, Christianity or the old Persian religion. The other fact that impressed itself on me was that the same excesses and extravagances in worship that I saw here can be found among numerous Christian groups in America. Whittier recognized this fact and expresses it in his poem, "The Brewing of the Soma":

"They drank, and lo! in heart and brain
A new, glad life began;
The gray of hair grew young again,
The sick man laughed away his pain,
The cripple leaped and ran.

"Some fever of the blood and brain,
Some self-exalting spell,
The scourger's keen delight of pain,
The Dervish dance, the Orphic strain,
The wild-haired Bacchant's yell—

"And yet the past comes round again.
And new doth old fulfil;
In sensual transports wild as vain
We brew in many Christian fane
The heathen Soma still!

Even in the form of the mosques the Turk has copied the Greek cross. St. Sophia is a wonderful structure and the Mohammedans have tried to erase from it all that is Christian, but its form, that of the Greek cross, remains and it sets the ideal for every other principal mosque in the city.

At the Yildiz Palace we witnessed the ceremony of the Sultan going to pray, known as the Selamlık, which occurs only once a week on Friday. This weekly prayer seems to be the limit of the Sultan's worship, but it occurred to me that even as staunch a Baptist as President Harding might balk at one lonely prayer a week if it took an army supplemented by a detachment of firemen and police to get him to the church! I went to the American Legation and secured a pass which admitted us to the Royal Palace, and here we, with the other guests, were served with cigarettes and in every way treated as guests. From the terrace, raised a few feet from the road, we had an excellent view of the performance. First of all, the state carriage was driven into the ground to await the Sultan. Then there arrived two companies of cavalry soldiers mounted on beautiful horses, gorgeously caparisoned, and each soldier carried a long pike with a banner attached. The uniforms are blue and gold, and as these three hundred men rode forward and took their places along the side of the road where the Sultan would ride in a few minutes they formed a most impressive scene. The marines next arrived with their band, followed by a company of infantrymen. These were lined up on the other side of the road opposite the cavalry. Then there came another band—I think it belonged to some department of the palace guard who dressed in scarlet and much gold—formed the upper part of the line. Last of all there came a company of city firemen in full uniform, who joined the policemen, who were already in place. It is not easy to imagine a more elaborate ceremony and one with more color and life. Presently a bugle sounded; the upper gates were opened and the Sultan came in sight riding solitary in his carriage. The first band struck up one of the Turkish anthems and played just a few bars. The music was plaintive, weird, and all in a minor key, as is nearly all oriental music. The whole crowd shouted in Turkish, "Long live our blessed Sultan." By this time he had reached the spot where the second band was stationed, and in turn played a few bars, and the same shout was repeated. When he arrived at the mosque the Sultan alighted and walked into the building, followed at some twenty paces by the chief of the army—a general and high lord. We were able to get a good look at the Sultan. For he passed not more than a dozen yards from where we stood. He is a man of medium size and rather good looking—is alert, and when he stepped from his carriage walked with the firm, quick tread of a man of decision. The servants gave us delicious Turkish coffee and after the usual courtesies of farewell we departed and were next admitted to the mosque, where we listened to the service and saw the Sultan taking his part among common citizens and soldiers. In the mosque the Sultan and the beggar are on an equality before Allah. As Christians we were not permitted to go into the main floor of the mosque during the service, but from the gallery we had an excellent view of the whole ceremony and could hear with ease the service as it was read. The priest here seemed to be more intelligent than any other I saw or heard. He really put quite a good deal of feeling into the conduct of the ritual. In St. Sophia, when the Koran is read, the priest stands with a sword in his hand. Also, on the wall of this mosque there is the imprint of a bloody hand, said to have been put there by Mohammed II, the conqueror, when he entered the city. The blood on his hand was the blood of the Christians he had slaughtered in this old Christian church. It is this bloody hand that is still used as the signature of the Sultan, and it is the symbol of the nation, just as the eagle and the head of Liberty are with us. This warlike ferocity seems to be the central theme of the religion, just as it forms the foundation of the government. Thanks to Mohammed's teaching and its interpretation, the Turkish Empire is and has been nothing more than a military dictatorship from the days of the conquest of Constantinople in 1453 A. D. down to the present. The only exception is that short period during which Suleiman the Magnificent was in power, who is known even to-day as "Suleiman the Lawgiver."

But with all of its military accompaniments it was not at the Selamlık that we saw to what ferocity the faith of Mohammed might lead men. This was left for later in the day when we visited the mosque of the Whirling Dervishes and afterwards that of the Howling Dervishes. The Whirling Dervishes form an independent order founded some time about the middle of the thirteenth century. Their performance is a very dignified and solemn affair. As we watched, it seemed to us a silly performance for a lot of elderly men to bow to the leader and then engage in a stately dance, very much like an old-fashioned waltz, except that each dancer performs alone. The music was weird and dirge-like, but both the dance and it soon became wearisome and we left.

The Howling Dervishes meet in a small mosque almost in the heart of the European section of Constantinople. The main room of the mosque is not more than thirty feet square, and this is fenced in on three sides, leaving a very narrow space outside the enclosure, and here a few strangers are permitted to enter and look on at the service. There are wooden benches along the wall and altogether, I should think, twenty or twenty-five persons may find seats. A closed gallery is built above on three sides of the room. Here, behind lattices, the women are allowed to watch the performance. Within the sacred enclosure the eastern wall is cut by a niche and into this is built the Mihrab, or altar. The floor is covered with goatskin rugs. Soon after we arrived the High Priest entered, followed by twenty or thirty of the dervishes. Others came later, so that before the service was finished there were no less than eighty present, all seated upon the rugs and taking part. The service began by all of the priests bowing to the chief and then prostrating themselves with their faces toward the east. You can easily imagine what a small hot room with low ceiling would be with a packed mass of nearly a hundred people in it. But you cannot imagine the odor! It must be experienced. Unless you had seen them you could not conceive of a band of human beings as dirty and filthy as were those dervishes. There were at least a score of them who were especially holy, who wore green turbans signifying that they had made the pilgrimage to Mecca, and these were by far the dirtiest of the lot. The performance began by one of the dervishes, who sat next to the chief, lifting up his voice in a kind of wail. He mumbled his words and gurgled them in his throat. Every few minutes he would come to a full stop and then begin to cough and splutter like an automobile with water in the carbureter. All of the dervishes next joined with the leader in reciting the Koran. This chanting in unison was really very effective. Then the meeting began to get a bit wild. One wheezy old chap began to roll his head from side to side and sing a weird sort of song. Others joined, until everyone was either singing, shouting, beating his breast or pounding with the flat of his hands upon the floor in front of him, and at the same time rolling his head around on his shoulders in a most alarming manner. Finally the chief priest arose and by a gesture brought silence in the room. Then he repeated twice, "Allah-il-lah." The dervishes took it up and with rising inflection and faster speed and louder voices they repeated this over and over again, and began a furious shaking and rolling of heads. When it seemed that human endurance could stand the strain no longer the chief gave the signal and the howling ceased. He then gave them a new stunt, and this time repeated three times in quick succession the word "Mahmed." This was taken up with alacrity. The worshipers reminded me of a pack of hounds who suddenly strike a hot trail and set off at full speed, and barking at every jump. Imagine eighty men all rolling their heads and shouting, "Mahmed, Mahmed, Mahmed," as rapidly as possible and at the top of their voices. It was bedlam and lasted for fully ten minutes, when the chief changed the exercise, and they simply breathed hard, first taking the air into their lungs and then expelling it. At first it sounded like a group of men attempting to imitate a locomotive engine getting under way—then as they grew more furious it came to sound like a barn full of horses with the heavens. This exercise seemed to bring the insanity to a head, some began to groan, others to pound themselves, and as they labored the harder in their breathing they lifted themselves and lowered themselves as does a rower in the act of rowing. I have never before seen such sacrilege done to the human intellect! After ten minutes the chief gave the order to stop, and that group began to subside, and as it did so the noise was exactly like that made by an engine when the steam has been shut off and it begins to slow down. Hardly had the breathing become normal before the chief again put them to howling "Allah-il-lah." A young lad, who was dressed up as a prophet, began to howl and dance. He could not have been over ten years of age and he shouted, rolled his head and whirled about until he fell in a stupor. By this time the whole room was in turmoil. Men were whirling about, all were howling, some thought they were singing, and one old fellow had gotten so wrought up that he stood with arms on hips, head raised, eyes bulging, and swaying from side to side, was howling at the top of his voice. His howl was that of a moon-struck dog, and as I looked at him he seemed, with his black beard, just like a huge Newfoundland dog with dripping jaws and raised muzzle making night hideous with his complaints. At this juncture a poor old fellow, who had one of his eyes horribly injured, came crawling up to the chief priest and kissed the hem of his robe. The chief took up a steel or iron skewer, about four feet long, like those with which they spit a goose before roasting it. At the end of the skewer was a ball of iron which must have weighed three or four pounds. At the chief's command the man with the injured eye opened his mouth and the chief thrust that skewer right through his cheek; then he led him to one of the posts supporting the galleries above, and here he drove the end of the skewer deep into the wood and left the poor wretch nailed to the wall. The drag from the weight of the ball in the end of the skewer must have hurt frightfully, but the poor deluded half-crazed fanatic stood without a tremor, his face absolutely passive, except for a half-insane light in the eyes. Another came forward who was disfigured by a burn covering the whole side of his face. A similar steel was thrust through his cheek and he was nailed up to another post. A brother with a lame shoulder had one of these skewers thrust clean through the fleshy part of his shoulder, and one suffering from stomach trouble had the chief feel of him, after which, picking up a fold of flesh over his stomach, he neatly pinned one of the same spits through it. If you have any imagination, just try to imagine how such cures must have hurt much more than the malady to be cured! Others came forward and lay down upon the floor—on these the chief priest jumped up and down. Then the crowd outside the mosque began to bring children to the door, and on these he also stepped. By some rule he seemed to know exactly when and where he should put his greatest weight, and for how long the impal-

ing patients should last. I watched closely when he pulled out the skewers and as far as I could see the sufferings were borne with no sign of anguish. All this time the unearthly howling was kept up. Half a dozen of the most fanatic had dropped and lay with twitching eyelids and heaving bodies—they were in the coma of hypnotism. William Jones tells of similar results obtained by the use of gas:

"Nitrous oxide and ether, especially nitrous oxide, when sufficiently diluted with air, stimulate the mystical consciousness in an extraordinary degree. Depth beyond depth of truth seems revealed to the inhaler. This truth fades out, however, or escapes, at the moment of coming to; and if any words remain over in which it seemed to clothe itself they prove to be the veriest nonsense. Nevertheless, the sense of a profound meaning having been there persists; and I know more than one person who is persuaded that in the nitrous oxide trance we have a genuine metaphysical revelation."

There was one holy man present, a pilgrim from Turkestan. He was dirtier and more fanatical than any of the others. He had long black hair, looked like a goat and smelled worse. The chief priest stepped over to one of the posts which supported the upper stories of the building. The inner side of this post has been planed smooth. The chief wet his finger in his mouth and then caressed this post, mumbling some formula as he made these mystic motions. At once the holy man from Turkestan, with the shout of a conqueror, rushed across the room and dived head first into the post. So hard did he hit it with his bare forehead that he was thrown back half way across the room, but he was a fiend for punishment, and twice more he performed this idiotic feat and staggered away, his head a mass of bruises. For two hours this thing kept up. Here was the best illustration of self-induced insanity and the contagious hypnotism of a frenzied crowd that I have ever seen.

These Howling Dervishes do not make up the rank and file or the followers of Mohammed; but neither are they an isolated group. Dr. Peet and Dr. Riggs both told me that there are possibly ten thousand such fanatics in and around Constantinople and hundreds of thousands of them throughout Turkey, Africa and Arabia. It is easy to see how a mosque full of such fanatics, who for the good of their souls and the glory of Allah, are willing to undergo without a quiver of pain the most exquisite tortures for the greater glory of Allah and his prophet Mohammed and the sure salvation that would come to them would be pillage, rape, burn and murder. The fanatic is always a problem. When a religion like Mohammedanism offers such a field in fanaticism and that fanaticism finds an outlet in organized murder for the glory of Allah, may God pity the minority group who happens to stand in the way without powerful friends and protectors. There are men among the Moslems who see clearly and think correctly. I am satisfied from what I heard that if it seems wise to attempt to hold a World Conference of Religions we can find twenty-five or thirty men of the Mohammedan faith who would co-operate in such an enterprise, but they will not be found among the Howling Dervishes!

Prodigal Daughters*

By Joseph Hocking

SYNOPSIS

Colonel Lester Trelawney arrives home in England after six years of military service in India and Mesopotamia to find his two daughters sadly beset by the flood of new morals, and ethics and dress of the "younger generation." Being warned by Mrs. Trelawney that Eleanor, aged twenty-one, and Peggy, not quite eighteen, were no longer susceptible to discipline, he decides to observe them for himself, while she finishes some very important work at the War Department. He soon finds that matters are bad indeed and, proceeding to interview the young ladies, decides that "an important hour has come in the history of his family."

V.

V. THE RIGHT TO "LIVE THEIR LIVES."

"NEED scarcely say"—the Colonel spoke very quietly—"that this kind of thing has come upon me as a kind of shock. I find the loving friendships I had looked forward to made impossible."

"Not if you mean to be reasonable. Please remember that we are no longer babies in arms, without wills of our own. Neither are we anything like Jane Austen's heroines."

Peggy spoke defiantly, like one who was ready for battle.

"Of course, I have not called you in here without reason," went on the Colonel. "No one can tell the pain it gives me to do so; but, as I said last night, we must come to an understanding. Frankly, I cannot, and will not, have a repetition of last night's experience."

"You mean that you want to shut us up like nuns in a nunnery?"

"No, I don't mean anything of the sort. I remember that you are young, and that it is your right to enjoy yourself. I came home with the determination to give you all the enjoyment it was in my power to give. I wanted you to meet with young people of your own age. Of course, I expected you to be good, God-fearing Christian girls, and I hoped you would feel you had your duties in life; but I wanted you to take part in all good healthy pleasures."

Eleanor was silent, but Peggy forced a laugh. "Really, father, you remind one of Rip Van Winkle," she said.

The Colonel felt his anger rising, but he suppressed it.

"Possibly that may be the case," he replied. "Still I am trying to look at the situation fairly. I came home after several years' absence and find my two daughters defying their mother's authority. I find them refusing to tell her where they are going—"

"Why should we tell her?" snapped Peggy.

"I find, too, as was exemplified last night, that they go to indiscriminate dances without a chaperon, and return between two and three in the morning, accompanied by men of whom I know nothing."

"Well, we are no longer children," asserted Peggy.

"Don't try to misinterpret my words. In all the established, natural, healthy things of life, I should not think, within ordinary limitations, of interfering with you; but I have my duties as a parent, whether or not you have yours as children. One of those duties is to see that my children do not ruin their lives. For that reason I will not have them making undesirable acquaintances or going to amusements of which I don't approve. And please, children, remember that I am not thinking only of myself in this; I am thinking of you. Please remember, too, that I love you."

"Wouldn't it be well to drop the sentimental side of the question?" replied Eleanor coolly. "We have to take things as they are. Now, father, listen to reason. You have been away a good many years, during which time the thoughts of the world have changed and we have ceased to be children. We have learned to think for ourselves, to live our own lives, and choose our own companions. You come back to us, a stranger, and you expect us to get sentimental about you, and to allow you to dictate our way of life. Is that the position?"

"And if it is?"

"Well, then, I tell you plainly, I don't propose to submit."

"May I ask what you propose to do?"

"I propose to go my own way. To live my own life."

"So do I," interposed Peggy defiantly.

The Colonel was silent for a few seconds. The case was more difficult than he imagined. He found it easy to command a number of soldiers who were amenable to discipline; but he was for a moment at a loss how to treat his own children.

"Oh, my dear children," pleaded Mrs. Trelawney, "don't you see how foolish you are? Don't you realize that your father is older and wiser than you?"

"It comes to this," said the Colonel. "I find open rebellion in my house. I find that you, my children, declare war against me. I am more grieved than I can say; but I am not a martinet. I want to do what is right. But I must have obedience."

"What is that but being a martinet? You want to treat us as though we had no life or convictions of our own?"

"No," replied the Colonel, "I don't; but I must be master in my own house. And I will not have my children going to places of which I don't approve; I will not have my daughters going out to parties without a proper chaperon; I will not have them coming home at any time they choose, and I will not have them picking up with common fellows, as though they had no self-respect."

"I can see what you mean, and I'm not going to be dictated to, and if I like to go out with Jim I shall."

The Colonel still kept his temper.

"Do I understand that you are engaged to Jim—whoever he may be?" asked the Colonel, and there was a touch of sarcasm in his voice.

"And if I am, what then?"

"Well, for one thing, you are not of age, and therefore I shall have something to do with it, and for another, it is my duty to my child to see that any man she may care for is worthy of her. And now I think enough has been said for the present."

"Of course, you've done what we expected," replied Eleanor. "You have taken your own line of action, and you leave us no alternative but to take ours."

"Very well, if you will have it so, it must be so. I have tried to keep from saying anything harsh, and I'm deeply grieved that you've met me in this spirit."

Although she did not realize it, Mrs. Trelawney had made her husband's work difficult. Almost on every occasion when the girls had been headstrong and rebellious she had threatened them with what their father would do when he came home. She had painted him as a relentless disciplinarian, one who would put down disobedience with a strong hand. Their antagonism had been aroused before the Colonel arrived, and Eleanor and Peggy had often discussed the question as to what they would do if their father sought to interfere with them.

In spite of themselves, however, the Colonel's home-coming had influenced them. Instead of being a kind of ogre, they found him kind and loving. It was true he was old-fashioned in his views, but he was anything but the overbearing military autocrat which they had conjured up. There was a quiet strength, too, in his every word and movement which they could not understand, but which they could not help feeling. Still, and this was especially true of Eleanor, they determined not to yield an inch from the position they had taken up.

"May I ask"—Eleanor spoke frigidly—"whether I have to obtain your consent before going out for a walk this afternoon? I think I should like a little exercise."

"Yes, and I should like to know whether you object to our bringing in our friends?" Peggy burst out before the Colonel had a chance of replying to Eleanor.

"Certainly you may bring in your friends," replied the Colonel. "I always brought home my friends as a boy, and my father always encouraged me to do so."

"Does that mean that I can bring Jim home?"

The Colonel hesitated a few seconds. "Yes," he replied. "I shall be glad if you will. I think it will be well for me to see him."

John gave his father a quick glance. "I say, dad!" he cried protestingly.

"Yes, my boy, what is it?"

"You told me I might have George Davenport in to supper to-night"

"Certainly I did. What then?"

"Only that—that—" John stammered painfully.

"Yes, what is it?" persisted the Colonel.

"Nothing," replied John; "perhaps I'll get George to come another time."

"But why another time? To-night is quite convenient, and I want you to have your friend in. I want to meet him. You were pals at Rugby, and I want you to keep up your school friendships."

"All right, sir," replied John, but it was easy to see that he was angry.

"Of course, I am assuming that none of my children will have friends who are undesirable," went on the Colonel quietly. "As a youngster I would never think of bringing home a fellow that I thought my father would not approve of. Now, then, be off as soon as you like. It's a splendid afternoon and the air on the heath is glorious to-day."

The battle had ended in a kind of compromise. Indeed, it was not a battle at all. Rather, it was only a kind of preliminary skirmish, which had settled nothing.

VI. RODERICK RAVENSCROFT.

ABOUT seven o'clock that evening the door bell rang. When the Colonel opened the door he found a stranger. Colonel Trelawney?" queried the visitor.

"That is my name."

"Excuse me for calling, Colonel, but I took the liberty of paying a chance visit. My name is Ravenscroft—Roderick Ravenscroft."

"What, not the son of my old friend Dick Ravenscroft?"

"Yes, sir. I believe you and he were at school together."

"Come in, my boy. I'm awfully glad to see you. This is splendid. I was thinking about your father only yesterday, and was wondering where he was."

"He settled in London just before the war, sir. As you may remember, he practised law on the Northern Circuit, and when he became a king's counsel he came to town. We live in Hampstead."

"Splendid; then I shall soon be seeing him?"

"He'll be mighty glad to see you, sir. You are sure I shall not be in the way?"

"In the way? Certainly not. Of course, you'll stay to supper. My wife has just told me that the servants are out, so you'll quite understand that things will have to be of a go-as-you-please order. Alice, here is Roderick Ravenscroft, son of my old friend Dick Ravenscroft, who was at Rugby with me."

The newcomer was a fine-looking young fellow. Tall, well built, and with clean-cut features, he was good to look at. A splendid specimen of a well-bred, well-groomed young man.

"Well, what is your line of life?" asked the Colonel. "Excuse my asking, but I take the liberty as an old friend of your father's."

"I'm glad you asked, sir. I'm trying to follow my father. I left Oxford when I was twenty-two and soon after passed my exam for the bar. Then the war broke out, and of course I joined up. Up to a few months ago I was in khaki, when I got demobilized. Then I tried to settle down where I left off."

"A sensible thing, too. But those five years must have been bad preparation for the law?"

"In a way I suppose they were. On the other hand, I think they have done me quite a lot of good. They've helped me to understand men."

"Yes, I suppose they have. And you are doing well, I hope?"

"I think I've made a good start, sir, and on the whole things are shaping all right. It'll be pretty tough work, but I fancy I'll pull through."

"I don't know whether Mrs. Trelawney has told you, sir," he went on, "but I've taken the liberty of calling here several times these last few months," and Ravenscroft flushed as he spoke.

"That's right," replied the Colonel heartily. "I'm glad you have. I have only just begun to realize what a hard, lonely time my wife has had while I've been away. I am sure she will have appreciate your visits."

"The truth is," stammered Ravenscroft, "I—I've been very much interested in coming. I've been in rather a dilemma, too. You see your being away from home made everything very difficult. I thought I ought to tell Mrs. Trelawney, and yet I was not sure. Then I heard you were coming and I thought I'd wait."

The Colonel looked at him intently. "I'm not sure I understand," he said.

"No, I'm afraid I've put it badly. To tell you the truth, sir, I'm in love with Eleanor."

The Colonel opened his eyes very wide. "I had no suspicion of such a thing," he said. "My wife has not said a word about it."

"No, I've never told her, sir. I didn't feel as though I ought, especially when I heard you were coming home. But I felt that—that you should know. I did not want to come here under false pretences. But until I felt sure you'd approve of me I thought I'd no right to speak. And yet I couldn't keep away from the house."

"Have you spoken to Eleanor?"

"No, sir, not yet. But I'm sure she knows my feelings, and from the fact that she's always seemed glad to see me when I came—I—I kept on coming. I hope you understand, sir. I wanted to do the straight thing. I told my father about it, and he seemed to think that as you were away from home and therefore could not know nothing about me that—I was in a difficulty. But I thought I would come to-night in the hope of a few minutes' chat alone. I hope it's all right, sir?" and the young fellow looked anxiously into the Colonel's face.

Let me understand," replied the Colonel. "From what I gather, you have come to the house several times lately, and that you've fallen love with Eleanor?"

"That's it, sir"—this in eager tones.

"But as I was away from home you didn't think it right to speak to her."

"Well, sir, I heard you'd be coming home shortly, and my father thought I'd better wait till you came. He made me feel that it would scarcely be the straight thing to become engaged to her, that is assuming she liked me enough, until you knew what kind of a fellow I was. Of course, I could have asked Mrs. Trelawney, but that would have been different. I didn't want to take advantage of your absence, sir."

Roderick Ravenscroft appealed to the Colonel strongly. He reminded him of the old-fashioned courtesies which were dear to him, and the honest, outspoken frankness aroused his admiration.

"Of course, I can quite understand that you'd like to know more about me before you said anything definite," went on Ravenscroft. "But I'm dead in earnest, sir. You know my people and I did fairly well during the war. There are lots of people in Hampstead who know me and can tell you what kind of fellow I am. Of course, I shan't be in a position to marry for a year or so, but—but things are coming my way. In fact, I've a fairly big thing on hand now, and—and—it's difficult to say it, sir, but—but—I've kept straight, and—and I've never had any entanglements with girls, or anything of that sort."

The Colonel hesitated before speaking again. As far as he could see, Ravenscroft was a fine young fellow. He admired his manliness, his simplicity and his old-fashioned courtesy. But he was not quite sure of his ground.

"You say you have not spoken to Eleanor?"

"That is so, sir; as I told you, I did not think it right to speak in your absence, especially as you were shortly coming home. But I'm sure she knows."

"And do you know much of her? Have you seen a great deal of her?"

"Not as much as I should have liked. As luck would have it, my father has been able to put a good deal of work in my way, and I've been very busy. But I've come here whenever I could and I've taken her to amusements two or three times."

"But you've never said anything definite—you've never asked her to become engaged to you?"

"No, sir. I've told you why."

"And have you reason to think she would say yes?"

"I hope so, sir. Of course, I'm not sure, and—and sometimes I've not quite been able to understand her. But I'm in dead earnest, and I thought I ought to tell you. I wanted to come here very much, but I thought—it—was your right to know why I came."

"I appreciate your candor and your sincerity," replied the Colonel, "and I am sure you are a worthy son of my old friend. But as you may imagine, this is all very strange to me. When I left home Eleanor was only a child, and I cannot accustom myself to the idea that she is now twenty-one. Besides, I've hardly had time to look around and understand my bearings. I came home only last Monday, and I've been from early to late at the War Office and the Foreign Office ever since. That means that I've hardly had time to make the acquaintance of my own children. But let me say this at once. I shall be glad to see you here whenever you care to come. As for speaking to Eleanor, I think you'd better let it stand over for a time. I am saying that because—well, for one thing, although you are the son of my old friend, I don't know you. Mind, I like what I've seen of you, and if Eleanor reciprocates your feelings I feel sure—anyhow, let matters take their own course for a bit, and—and I shall be delighted to welcome you whenever you care to pay a visit to the house."

A little later voices were heard in the hall, and the Colonel judged by the flush on Ravenscroft's face that he had heard Eleanor speaking. In this he proved to be right, for at that moment Eleanor entered accompanied by a woman of from twenty-eight to thirty years of age.

"I hope I'm not intruding, Colonel," this lady said, after Eleanor had presented her as Miss Tamsin Cory.

"On the other hand," replied the Colonel, "I hope I shall always have pleasure in welcoming my children's friends."

Miss Cory was not slow to recognize the non-committal nature of this remark, but not being a lady of a very sensitive nature, and also being deceived by the Colonel's courteous tones, had no suspicion of his real thoughts concerning her.

"I hear you've been away a number of years," she ventured.

"Yes—six."

"And kind of out of the world, too, I suppose."

"Yes, if you can call India and Mesopotamia out of the world."

"Well, I do, in a way. Although I hear the people of India are waking up. From what I can gather, the old order of things has passed away, even there. I shouldn't be surprised if we lose our Indian Empire. And a good thing, too."

"And why?" asked the Colonel.

"It shows the movements of the age. It shows that the old, bad past has come to an end. Why should a little island like England govern a huge peninsula like India? I believe in self-determination for all peoples and races in relation to government."

"Indeed!"

"Yes. All the thought of the age is in that direction. Individually and nationally the world has been in swaddling clothes too long. No real progress is possible without absolute freedom to live our own lives both nationally and individually. Don't you think so?"

"I'm not sure I quite understand you," replied the Colonel.

"I dare say not. You see you've been out of it for several years."

"Yes, I've been doing my best to help in the government of races who don't know how to govern themselves."

"But I say, Eleanor, I haven't seen your mother yet. I hope she's well."

"I'm sorry," said Eleanor, "but I think mother will be waiting for Peggy. I can't think where she is. She promised to be here by half-past seven. Ah, here she is."

The Colonel glanced towards the door as his daughter spoke. As she had said, Peggy entered at that moment, accompanied by Barnes. Then followed a supper party, Barnes being a leader in the conversation, without adding to the comfort or enjoyment of the group. When the guests had departed the Colonel asked Eleanor and Peggy to remain with him.

The Extent of the Lynching Evil

THE States free from this blot are few in number. There are only four—Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island and Vermont—where such an atrocity has not been recorded for any community in the Commonwealth. In four others—Connecticut, Maine, New Jersey and Utah—there has been no recorded lynchings since 1889. During the past ten years the complete territory of ten additional States—Delaware, Idaho, Indiana, Iowa, Maryland, Michigan, Nevada, Pennsylvania, South Dakota and Wisconsin—has been joined to the white list.

Rape is usually alleged as the principal cause of lynchings. Certainly such a crime could not be attributed to the eighty-three women victims! As a matter of fact, nearly four-fifths of all the lynchings in thirty-seven years have been for alleged crimes other than rape or for alleged acts that are not crimes or misdemeanors under any law, common or statute.

Out of 4,097 victims only 829—60 whites and 789 Negroes—were lynched on the charge of rape or attempted rape. This is only 20.2 per cent. of the total. And it should be remembered that these men had been accused, not convicted, of the crime.

More than one-third of the victims lynched since 1889 were accused of homicide or felonious assault. About one-twelfth were accused of crime against property; some were alleged to have "insulted" white persons; and more than 145 were not recorded as accused of any crime whatsoever.

"Mob law" undermines the very foundations of government, law, and order. The future of our American system of government is involved.

On page 477 we publish an extremely suggestive letter from Rev. Henry F. Huse concerning his use of the radio. In the note accompanying the letter Mr. Huse adds: "It's a mighty good prayer meeting suggestion to get the radio listeners to bring to the meeting some of the good things they have thus heard. One young man in my church has done this and his word is like a fresh west wind on a muggy day."

Between March 9 and 23, 1,058 Greek deportees from Anatolia died from smallpox, typhus and pneumonia while waiting at Constantinople to be taken to Greece. The situation was aggravated by the arrival of four additional shiploads in the second week of the fortnight. Is it for the sake of letting the Turk kill people thus by the thousand, directly and indirectly, that we fought the Great War?

Ruth, the Faithful Daughter

RUTH 1-4:22

"Thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God."—
RUTH 1:16.

THE story of the book opens with Ruth in a position of extreme trial and difficulty. She is widowed after a few short years of married life, still in the flower of her youth and beauty. Not only are hers the grief and loneliness which come to all whose dreams are so shattered, but hers is, also, the added burden of widowhood in an Eastern land. There, marriage is woman's highest honor; widowhood, the most deplorable condition imaginable. Because she knows this and desires the welfare and happiness of her daughters above her own, Naomi urges them to return to their girlhood home. That this will leave her alone and friendless in her old age does not prevent Naomi from pressing it upon them. She will return to Judah and they to their own, there to find, in due time, husbands, happiness and home, reinstatement in the estimation of their people and the realization of their broken dreams. Naomi urges that she can offer them nothing. Her plea finally sends Orpah back; but Ruth decides to go with Naomi. She faces what this step involves—separation from her fatherland; from her kindred; from the hope of a home and children to do her honor; the poverty and hardships of a widow's lot in a strange land; a life of hard work with no hope of the things a girl's heart desires. Let an American girl put herself in Ruth's place and ask what her decision would be. But she not only does not hesitate in her decision; she practically compels Naomi to take her with her. She clings to her as Jacob did to the heavenly messenger; not that she may be blessed but that she may do all in her power for Naomi. And so they fare forth, the widowed and sonless mother, the young and widowed girl; two women, to face alone and friendless a future which has no ray of light; yet with a courage in the heart of Ruth which makes one forget in the contemplation of it the hardness of the way she has chosen.

In the cry of Ruth which at last won Naomi's consent to the sacrifice she would make, we find the expression of her character and spirit: "And Ruth said, Entreat me not to leave thee, and to return from following after thee; for whither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest, I will lodge; thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God; where thou diest, will I die, and there will I be buried; Jehovah do so to me, and more also, if aught but death part thee and me."

This is the utterance of deep and rare affection. Duty, doubtless, was not hidden from Ruth; but duty was her desire. Love touched with its magic her sense of what she owed to her mother-in-law and made it luminous and glad. Throughout the story, as in the persistence with which she clung to Naomi—"Ruth clave unto her"—runs the expression of her affectionate nature. In the gladness with which she takes up the humble task of the gleaner; in her willingness to be one of the serving women in the field; in the faithfulness of her toil in the telling of the incidents of the day to Naomi; in her attitude to Boaz and her desire to do everything that will gratify her mother, Ruth is always the loving daughter, animated by an affection which never wavers but which seems to grow fuller with each demand upon it.

Ruth is unquestionably a deeply religious woman. It is her humility of spirit before God which makes her affection so unselfish and her reverence so at the front in her life. It has been said of her, "Ruth saw the privilege of self-sacrificing service for one she loved, and of communion with the God of Israel." The same writer claims that Orpah saw only the things which are seen and temporal, and Ruth those which are unseen and eternal. Certainly, she saw and eagerly accepted the opportunity of serving Naomi; but how far she was, then, influenced by the desire to live where God was worshiped, who can say with assurance? Yet, while the prominent motives impelling her to give up all a girl desires and, as an immigrant, to follow Naomi in poverty and hardship were those which centered in her affection for her mother-in-law, in her gratitude for what she had undoubtedly been to her and had done for her, in her sense of duty raised into the feeling of privilege, and in her deep reverence for the living and dead it seems clear that she was possessed by the faith of Israel. With a solemnity which must come from a deep sense of his holiness and power she cries, "Jehovah do so to me, and more also, if aught but death part thee and me."

Hers was the reward promised those who love God and keep his covenant. Friends, home, honor and happiness came to her. The main point is not whether they invariably come to those who are faithful but, rather, that these blessings came to her because she was the handmaid of the Lord. The connection between the happy ending of the beautiful tale and her faith is evident. She becomes the wife of the good Boaz, and, thus, the ancestress of David and of Christ. The introduction of Ruth into the ancestry of David and of our Lord is remarkable. The entrance of an Ammonite or a Moabite into the congregation of Israel was strictly forbidden (Deut. 23:3). The letter of the Law was rigid; but this was a time of laxity. Judah was isolated from the rest of Israel. A certain independence of spirit had been produced. Later, the strictness of the Law was revived; but now the way is open for Ruth to come into the congregation of Israel; and so, from the recesses of the hills of Moab, "across the gulf which separates the two regions (Judah and Moab) came the gentle ancestress of David and of the Messiah."

ONE BOOK A WEEK

Under this caption, each week, we shall direct attention to some striking book, such as no Minister or those interested in religious thought and action can afford to remain unacquainted with

The Returning Tide of Faith*

THIS is a very unique and valuable book and the reader of it will appreciate a word about the author and how he came to write the book. The author is a very interesting man and not entirely unknown to Americans, as he visited this country in 1912 upon the invitation of Dr. John R. Mott, and some of his previous books, "The Mind of the Disciples," "Thoughts on Religion at the Front," "Thoughts on Unity" and "Religion Behind the Front and After the War" have been widely read in America. The Bishop of Pretoria, South Africa, is the son of the noted Bishop of Winchester, who is well known to the readers of THE

NEVILLE S. TALBOT, D.D.

CHRISTIAN WORK through his connection with the International Committee of the World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches. The younger Talbot caught his father's interest in world affairs and between school and college went to South Africa during the Boer War. He came home and studied at Christ College, Oxford. He did some parish work at Leeds, and then taught for a while at Oxford, but the world-impulse gripped him and he started for missionary work in India. But the great war caught him and he served in it four years and a half, part of the time as Assistant Chaplain General. He was consecrated Bishop of Pretoria in 1920. He entered upon his work fresh from studying the problems of religion among young men in the army. He knew that these young men comprised a perfect segment of British manhood. What he found among them he knew existed among men everywhere.

What he found in his close acquaintance with men was that they were all confused in their thought about God, Christ, man and the world in general. Often they had the vaguest notion of what the Christian faith was. The average man in his confusion stands in two dangers—one of being captured by our semi-pagan, materialistic civilization, the other of being exploited by the irrational and emotional cults everywhere springing up. It is the duty of the Church immediately to show both the claims and the reasonableness of the Christian faith to these men. The Church has not been sufficiently a teaching Church. (Here the Bishop agrees with the Archbishops' Committee on the Teaching Function of the Church, and with the conclusions of the writers of "The Army and Religion.") He says: "She is well developed on the side of the ministry of her sacraments. She needs reinforcement in the ministry of the Word. The whole Church needs to think out her message again fearlessly." It is because of this knowledge of the need of men and this condition that the Church must boldly meet this need that the Bishop has given us this book.

It is interesting that the chapters of this book first appeared in the columns of a well-known daily paper, "The Johannesburg Daily Mail," and attracted much attention. There are thirty-two chapters, short, succinct, direct, vivid, just as they appeared in the paper, and perhaps all the more valuable since they were thus addressed directly to the man in the street. The chapters begin with a diagnosis of the situation. First, we have learned that war is an unmitigated curse. It creates no values. Secondly, we have learned that Germany did not have a monopoly of self-interest. Selfishness pervades the whole of modern civilization. Thirdly, there is not enough room in this modern world for selfishness and ruthless competition. It has become too small, and both nations and men have got to learn a new way to life. "We see the problem. The war as such has bettered nothing. The ideas which produced the war are still current. There is no room for unlimited self-aggrandisement." Education has no power to remedy this. Education seems only to stimulate national ambition and race-consciousness. Where shall we turn? We ought to be able to turn to the Church, but the Church is divided into many sects and there does not come a united authoritative answer, as there should. The Church and all of us must get back to God. That becomes the first question for our day, Is there a God—if so, is He good, and what is His will for man? The first group of chapters or letters are devoted to answering these questions.

Then the author turns to Christ, for "Christ is the answer to the great questions about Himself." Three chapters are devoted to a study of Christ, and they are very helpful chapters because they lead us to Christ, not along the lines of argument, but by impression, so to speak. We come to

MAKING THE RADIO SERMON CONTRIBUTION TO THE CHURCH

EDITOR: CHRISTIAN WORK:

My experience with radio has been a much happier one than that of our brother whose letter appears in the issue of March 10, in which he complains of city services broadcasted at the same hour as the service in the village and small town. If the city church is to broadcast its service it cannot be otherwise than at the appointed hour for such service. Sometimes what cannot be avoided must be endured for better or worse. Personally I think it a most desirable activity for some church to be broadcasting its service through the many stations every Sunday night.

As a rule the church service in the village and town comes at an earlier hour than the service in the city. Where this is the rule there is no interference. This earlier hour makes it possible for the village church, by the installation of a receiving set, to invite its people to come out Sunday night and after service listen in to the service from away. This is a splendid kind of an after-meeting for social as well as spiritual ends.

Recently I secured the co-operation of a friend who has a fine receiving set with loud-speaking horn. He gladly acceded to the request and brought his set to my church for a radio service following our regular service. I spoke that night upon "Lessons from the Radio." There's the lesson of the invisible things of God; the necessity of tuning in with God if we would receive his salvation and blessing; the necessity of overcoming the interferences that sin thrusts in our way to prevent our getting the divine message. At the close, lifting the sliding partition, our radio operator with his set was introduced and he tuned in. The first service of this kind was somewhat disappointing because it was a bad night for transmission. But the second service was a delight. We tuned in at once without noise or disturbance to the service that was being broadcasted from the First Presbyterian Church, of Schenectady, New York, via Station WGY. Music, Scripture, prayer, notices and sermon came in perfectly, and as clearly as though we were in the very auditorium three hundred miles away. In the prayer by the pastor, Rev. Robert W. Anthony, there was the sentence, "Father, we pray thy rich blessing upon those who worship with us but whose faces we do not see." In a letter acknowledging our participation in his service Dr. Anthony wrote: "We have had word from widely scattered points in Wisconsin and Iowa and Maine. Yours is the first word of any congregation that has as a body joined us in the service." I raise the question: Is there not in radio an opportunity to induce people to come out to a service that will thus enable widely separated groups of the Lord's people to worship together and hold sweet fellowship in the tie that binds our hearts—the love of Christ and desire to extend his kingdom?

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT

The Returning Tide of Faith

By Bishop Neville Talbot of Pretoria

A statement of the cardinal issues of the Christian faith for the man in the street in quest of a clear understanding of what he really believes today.

P. WHITWELL WILSON SAYS: "This book is written by one whose beliefs have been tried as by fire, who emerges with a triumphant faith in the Incarnation and the Resurrection, and with a faith, obviously profound." $1.50

Order from your Bookseller or

Fleming H. Revell Company

Chicago, 17 N. Wabash Avenue

Without any advertisement of this first radio service word got about town, and at the usual hour the people began to fill the church. We had an unusual congregation that first night of almost three hundred people.

At Tremont Temple, Boston, and at Park street the sermons of both Dr. Massee and Dr. Conrad, sent out by WNAC, have been used of God in conversion and creating a quickened interest in the things of God. When this is done the village and town churches are certain to come in for a share of the blessing.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION IN AGRICULTURE

According to the 1920 census there were in the Southern States 244,978 colored boys between the ages of fourteen and twenty out of school and on farms who were available for agricultural instruction in part-time schools. It is safe to say that before the Federal Government undertook to co-operate with the States in promoting vocational education in agriculture, practically no attention had been given to such instruction in the public colored schools of the South. At the close of the first year's co-operation there were thirty-nine schools with an enrolment of 1,025 colored pupils receiving instruction in vocational agriculture; while at the close of the last fiscal year, in a period extending over five years, 165 colored schools received Federal aid and had an enrolment of 4,064 boys and girls taking vocational agriculture.

Probably the most important feature of the vocational program in agriculture is the supervised practical work that each vocational student is required to do for at least six months during the year. The father aids the agricultural teacher in giving advice and in helping to plan the practical work of the pupil. This is a very valuable educational asset and helps to bring together the work of the school and the home. The total returns from the supervised practical work of the pupils enrolled in vocational agricultural work in the colored schools for 1919-20 was $72,390.55; while for the year 1920-21 the re-

MORE SOLDIERS IN EUROPE

According to tables issued by the League of Nations, Europe in 1913 spent 19.7 per cent. of its revenues on armaments; in 1922 it was spending 24.2 per cent. According to the same tables, Europe maintained under arms 3,780,933 men in 1913; and 4,453,179 men in 1922, an increase of 672,246. Armament expenditures for Germany, Austria, Hungary and Bulgaria have been reduced by four hundred million dollars, and for the rest of Europe have been increased by six hundred million dollars. Such is a war to end war.

In our correspondence columns on page 381, in our issue of March 24, our letters under the topic "The Gap in the Wall" were so arranged that the authorship was not quite clear. Mr. Ehman, for instance, only wrote the section from the last asterisks down to his name. To no man should there be imputed more than his own!

The State Sunday School Association of Pennsylvania is announcing a series of institutes for workers with children. Conferences are for Sunday school officers and teachers, mothers of children under twelve. Dates arranged are: Lock Haven, First Methodist Church, April 3 and 4; Harrisburg, First Church of God, April 6 and 7; Oil City, First Presbyterian Church, April 10 and 11; and Greensburg, Young Men's Christian Association, April 13 and 14.

TOLERATION FOR FUNDAMENTALISTS, BUT NOT FOR THOSE REJECTING THE VIRGIN BIRTH

EDITOR CHRISTIAN WORK:

I suppose there will be dozens of people write you about your article entitled "What Are the Fundamentals?" But I feel constrained to add my bit.

Was the real basis of the Reformation the protest against the evils in the life of the Roman Church leaders? Was it not rather a protest against the Church's policy of keeping the members ignorant of the content of the Bible? I will admit that the Church used her power to force a set system of doctrine on the people, but I think there is no doubt that you seriously misrepresent the Fundamentalists by saying that they are attempting that. When they say that we should eject a teacher of known disloyalty to the content and spirit of the Word of God from a college or seminary that is supposed to stand foursquare for the accepted teachings of the Church, teachings that were fundamental to Clement of Alexandria and to Calvin alike, they are doing no more summary act than is a business firm in discharging an employee who does not care to conform to the policies of the organization.

Until there is shown a much more Christlike spirit on the part of the liberal thinkers than there has been for some time—I speak of them in toto—there will be little progress made by them in securing the "tolerance" that they ask of the Fundamentalists. Let the pot cease to call the kettle black on both sides.

The real basis of the whole business may be clearly seen in an article in "The Sunday School Times" for March 10 by Dr. Lowrie, of China. Ask Dr. Speer his opinion of Dr. Lowrie as Christian and scholar. A quotation from his article follows:

"Some of the intellectual characteristics of many of the Modernists drive me into the Bible Union. There is an element of disingenuousness in their mental attitude and in their use of language that seems to me to be alien to the spiritual descendants of Abraham, Moses, Samuel, . . . and Paul. No one certainly knows where they stand. They have to be 'investigated.' They use words deliberately in a disguised sense, using terms which have commonly the content of the most profoundly simple and manifest truths, with a veiled and alien significance. It is of supreme importance in the propagation and exposition of the Christian faith that words should be used frankly, candidly—"yea, yea," and "nay, nay"—for words are the body in which the thought of both God and man resides."

After all it is a question of whether men will or will not believe what the Bible plainly says as the unique Word of God. Statements you have made in your article as well as some made by you in the past indicate that you are now willing to question the plain statements of the Bible. The Bible, for instance, says very plainly that it was God's purpose to have Christ virgin born, and that He was so born. To reject this statement will result in a policy that if carried to its logical conclusion will surely result in denials of what the Church has always regarded as most fundamental. You are in error when you say that the method of the incarnation is not fundamental. It is because our only source of Christian authority says that this was the method of the incarnation. That makes this method fundamental. It is beside the point to say or hint that other methods of incarnation might have been as satisfactory as the one which the Bible says was the method. Doubt these records and you may doubt any of the records composing the Bible as it now stands. This logically follows, and this conclusion cannot be avoided.

The Church must have a clear-cut creed and faithful Christians must stick to fundamentals like the virgin birth of Jesus Christ. But of course the Church cannot force anyone to believe those fundamentals except those who would count themselves as its members.

[The truth that concerns us in the Bible is the truth that lays an imperative upon us. Christianity is a way of life, the way of the life of Christ. The imperativeness for us of that way is wholly apart from any biology of Jesus' birth.—THE EDITORS.]

WHAT ARE THE FUNDAMENTALS?

EDITOR CHRISTIAN WORK:

I have just been reading your editorial, "What Are the Fundamentals?" It seems to me that you have not really gone down to the bottom. The fundamentals are those things by which men live. They are, as you justly say, what determines character, what is necessary for real salvation, for the real sharing of the Kingdom of God. What is it that makes men like Jesus Christ? Is it not, first of all, the complete acceptance of the will of God; the sense that the foundation of all that is good, and the earnest giving of ourselves to following out all the will of that "Final Good"? Christianity is the great conclusion that the way of Christ, the way that He taught and the way that He lived, comes nearer to representing God's ideas than any other that we know. As a matter of our daily life, are we actually concerning ourselves with such abstruse terms as "incarnation," "inspiration" and "atonement"? (How far that last term, as it is commonly understood, is from the greatest human fatherhood! How much it must fall short of the real Fatherhood of the Father of us all!)

You say that one of the fundamentals of Christianity is the belief in the Resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ. That depends on what you mean by the resurrection. Cannot the simplest, the humblest, the most Christlike souls be completely agnostic touching the Resurrection? May not a man really be incorporating much of Christ in his complete confidence in God and in his self-forgetful thought for his brother and still hold no theory as to Christ's rising, yes, believe that Jesus was like all men and that His life here on earth came to an end as does that of all men?

For me, I am content to define Christianity as living as Christ lived, with His desire to do the will of God and His love for His neighbor. Must we not preach what Jesus preached as the fundamentals—"Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength, and thy neighbor as thyself"?

PASTOR.

PULPIT FREEDOM AND DR. GRANT

EDITOR CHRISTIAN WORK:

Your recent editorials relative to the departure of Dr. Grant from the established beliefs of the Episcopal Church will seem to many, I believe, a defense of an altogether false position. Dr. Manning's letter to the rector of the Church of the Ascension is in keeping with his office, the clear fulfilling of his duty. It is an appeal for manly honesty of conduct on the part of one under his jurisdiction. In the sixth paragraph the Bishop distinctly states that Dr. Grant or any other man has entire liberty of thought. He does not say that thought must be controlled. Dr. Grant may believe what he pleases about Jesus Christ, but as long as he is rector of an Episcopal church honor and good faith demand that he conform to the established faith of that church. When that faith is lost let him honorably resign and not force his new views where common honesty gives them no place.

When a man becomes a Unitarian let him seek a Unitarian pulpit, or speak in some church of his own. He will have entire freedom of utterance. Permit me to commend it to THE CHRISTIAN WORK. Dr. Grant's case is no new one, and in years past I have been mortified as well as astonished at the stand taken by religious papers in defense of dishonest holding on to some position from which a sense of true honor would have led a man to retire, with entire freedom to preach elsewhere as he would.

I would ask this question: You plead for freedom for a man to teach in the church all that God teaches him, etc., but what limit is to be placed on the extent to which that teaching may go? Who is to decide where God's teaching ends and man's unbelief, vagaries, denials begin? If a rector conscientiously becomes a follower of Ingersoll; if he returns to Judaism; if as pastor of an evangelical church he becomes a Universalist, is he still, according to your position, to impose his beliefs, which he believes to be from God, on an unwilling people? You may be quite willing for your pastor so to do, but the churches of evangelical denominations as a whole would look on such a thing as dishonorable in the man, and a deep wrong done to them.

With the marriage blessing (4:11, 12), which is the first record of a formal nuptial benediction in Scripture, the marriage and the birth of Obed, who is the father of Jesse, the father of David, the beautiful story ends; but it ends only to be repeated, in all that is fundamental in it, in life after life of those who, in every land, like Ruth, have been ideal daughters. The hope of our land and of the world is in the fact that there are so many thousands of daughters who have the spirit of Ruth. To impress the lessons of this story on the girls and young women of our time is one of the most necessary duties before the Church of Christ. Let it bring our homes back to that simplicity which is strength; to that reverence which is the condition of purity, of a law-abiding spirit, of all real service to one's neighbor; and to that unselfishness which is life's crown, when inspired and fed by the Spirit of God.

In his "Ode to a Nightingale," Keats sings:

"The voice I hear this passing night was heard

In ancient days by emperor and clown;
Perhaps the self-same song that found a path

Through the sad heart of Ruth, when, sick for home,

She stood in tears among the alien corn."

"Sick for home," more than once, no doubt she was; yet, sweeter than that of nightingale was the song in her heart which welled up out of faith in God. It is this song which all who are concerned for the dearest and most sacred interests of our time will pray may find a path through the hearts of daughters in every home in every land.

JOHN ELLERY TUTTLE.

Christ as the first disciples did, to "behold the man"; and we go away satisfied that we have seen God. The Bishop is true to tradition, for some, as did the disciples of old, refuse Christ after they have found Him. The new way of life in God is not easy at first—or does not seem easy to the novice. A process of re-creation must go on within one. One must be born again. One must get a new sense of values. Then God in Christ is not seen to be the answer to all our questions, but the full satisfaction, the incomparable joy. One of the unique things about the whole book is that the person of Christ, His life, death and resurrection is treated against the background of God. It is only as Christ is the true disclosure of God that we come to Christ's own divinity. (This is exactly the same position Bishop Gore has taken in his recent volume, "Belief in Christ.")

The message of those who were near to Christ is examined and much is made of the impression Christ made upon those who were nearest to Him, which, after all, is the real apotheotic. The interpretation of Christ by Paul and the other writers of the Epistle is studied in its human rather than in its theological setting. The Gospel is not thoroughly appreciated until one sees the wonders it worked both in the minds and the souls of those who knew Christ. The one thing that came over them all from their experience with Christ was the self-revelation of God in terms of a human life. The incarnation was the heart of the gospel. The atonement grows out of the incarnation. If God is in man He suffers with man, and only through suffering can He save him. The atonement, the at-one-ment, is a twofold process: it is the coming down of God in Christ to man; it is also the rising of man to God in partaking of the sufferings of Christ.

The Bishop devotes considerable space to showing how rational the doctrines of the second coming, the resurrection, heaven and hell are when their moral values are stressed rather than the physical, and there is a final chapter on the Virgin Birth. The Bishop in all these doctrines takes the ground held by the great body of liberal churchmen, but succeeds in making that ground very plausible and real. In all instances except that of the second coming of Christ, and future punishment, he will satisfy the most orthodox as well as the liberal. Indeed one thinks little of orthodoxy or heterodoxy in reading this book. One thinks only of how truly the great facts of the gospel meet the needs of the world. It is a great service that such men as the Bishop are rendering. We sometimes wish that every pastor, at just this time of confusion, would attempt to do this same thing for his people.

HOURS

EDITOR CHRISTIAN WORK:

The letter under the above caption in your issue of March 10, by L. Setterlund, calls for prayerful consideration by all who desire the maintenance of public worship. Mr. Setterlund has pointed us to a real danger threatening the prosperity and general usefulness of the local church by the broadcasting of radio sermons.

In my opinion a greater evil threatens the spirit life of individual believers who can be persuaded that the claims of holy Sabbath worship may be met by lounging at home listening to the radio voice of an invisible preacher.

I understand worship to be a worthy rendering of homage in prayer and praise, combined with humility; deference, respect and honor to Almighty God, with desire that He might impart to us such grace as will lead us to higher virtue and to greater service in the way of righteousness.

PRESSURE ON THE CONTRIBUTOR IN CLEVELAND

EDITOR CHRISTIAN WORK:

I was much interested in the article written by two contributors in a recent number of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, entitled "Community Chests and Merger Campaigns." Being a resident of Cleveland and having had a part in all the community chest drives, I think I know something about them as they were conducted in our city. I think no one who is at all philanthropically inclined will deny the great good and value of the community chest. The people have learnt as never before to work together for a good cause. There is, however, one point not touched upon in that article which I wish to make clear. You say in the editor's note, "Those who have taken part in Cleveland's great community chest campaigns heartily believe in it." Possibly they do; but do they also believe in the method largely used to bring it to success? The second writer gives your readers the result of the "drive" and the uses to which the fund was put, but does not take us behind the scenes to show how in large measure this money was raised.

When the "drives" previous to the last one were announced every business concern was anxious to be a one hundred per cent. business house, which meant that everyone of its employees gave something toward the fund. This, however, did not work everywhere, and so moral suasion was resorted to. A lady friend of mine employed in one of the largest establishments in the city returned unsigned the card she was supposed to sign, indicating the amount she wished to contribute. The next day I was engaged in conversation with her when the card was handed her a second time with the request that she sign it. She knew what that "request" meant and quickly did so.

The last "drive" was worse than any of the preceding, in that employers were bolder than before. In one factory, I was told (but I cannot vouch for the accuracy of it), the employer did not even make a request, but simply deducted the amount from his employees' pay. Nor were the employers satisfied this time that every employee would give something; they in some cases set down the minimum amount each one must give. Thus, to give a concrete case that came under my personal observation, an employer called all his force together and told them that some of them had given only one dollar previously, but now he expected each one to give five dollars at the very least, and that if anyone really felt he could not give that amount he should come to him privately, state his reasons, and that he (the employer) would pay it for him. They were given the privilege of either paying outright, or having a part of the amount deducted from their envelope every pay day till the entire amount was paid. I know a man who because of his many debts chose the latter course, and he is now paying and will be paying toward the fund for several months to come.

The community chest is a good thing and the cause is worthy, but the idea of a "drive" should not be applied to it in any sense. To be sure, the amount raised would not be so large if only strictly volunteers were called upon, but we Christians believe that one dollar given voluntarily carries more blessing with it and does more good than one thousand given grudgingly. Anyhow, that is not the way to raise money for any cause.

I hope that if other cities decide to emulate Cleveland they will not resort to such un-Christian tactics as have obtained in our city in the past.

IS BRYAN RIGHT MAN FOR PRESBYTERIAN MODERATOR?

Is William J. Bryan the right man for Moderator of the Presbyterian General Assembly? Mr. Bryan is a big man. He has been a real prophet in behalf of international peace. "The silver-tongued orator of the Platte" has always stood as a friend of the common man. Lately, to be sure, he thundered a little about evolution, but Mr. Bryan recognizes that his forte is not there. When one of our friends recently congratulated him on a great speech which he had delivered in behalf of good-will throughout the world and added, "Mr. Bryan, I like your stand on international peace much more than I do your stand on evolution," Bryan answered, "Thank you, sir, but remember I have been a peace man for over a generation and am always talking peace, whereas I speak on the other subject just occasionally." Mr. Bryan probably recognizes that he is not an expert on science. But for all that, it certainly does not seem that now is the time for the Presbyterian Church to elect for its Moderator a man whose election inevitably will have a theological aspect. The Presbyterians have just amalgamated their multifarious boards and agencies into four great boards. The Church must learn how to use the new organizations. When theological differences come to the fore they monopolize interest and energy. Now is not the time for the Presbyterian Church to use up its power on these questions. Let it get its tools for service into working shape, its machines to running smoothly and effectively. When the administrative problems are out of the way for the Church, then, if it cares to, it can settle its theological Kilkenny fight. It would be no more to the purpose to elect a man who was a red rag to the "conservatives" than it would be to elect such a man as Mr. Bryan. Let it choose such a man as Joseph Vance, who is familiar with the whole administrative problem which faces the Church to-day on account of its new organizations, and who has kept apart from the theological imbroglio.

CHURCH STATISTICS

The Federal Council and "The Christian Herald" gave out statistics of the growth of the churches at almost the same date this month. The figures are based on different reports or estimates and accordingly present a good many discrepancies. Dr. H. K. Carroll, in "The Christian Herald," figures that the churches gained 948,347 in membership in 1922. The Federal Council announces that the "religious bodies" of the United States gained 1,220,428 "over the preceding year." At any rate, it is obvious that church membership grew rapidly last year. The Federal Council takes the Roman Catholic figures at their face, 18,104,804. "The Christian Herald" scales them by fifteen per cent., because they represent estimated church population and include all baptized persons. The evangelical Protestant churches show a membership of 27,454,080. These figures cover communicants only. The Protestant constituency comes to 78,113,481. As for many years, the Methodist and Baptist groups are nip and tuck for leadership. The Federal Council figures award the palm to the Methodists, "The Christian Herald" to the Baptists. According to the former figures, the Methodist constituency is 23,253,854 persons, the Baptist 22,868,098; both considerably larger than the Roman Catholic. While the Jewish population of the United States is probably more than 3,300,000, the Jewish congregations report only 1,600,000. The Mormons claim a population of 604,082; the Eastern Orthodox churches have a membership of 456,054. The last named gained ten per cent. in one year. The Orthodox churches are increasing their effectiveness in this country and are reaching the Greek immigrants more completely. All the major bodies except the Congregationalists increased the number of their ministers. But a goodly number of the great denominations decreased the number of their local churches. That was true of the Presbyterians, of the Disciples, and the Episcopalians, as well as of the Congregationalists. It is probably a very healthy sign.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

PREPARING FOR WAR IN PEACE

There is abundant evidence that the War and Navy Departments are planning for greatly increased preparedness in this country. The magazines are carrying articles by responsible officers on the army and navy and their peace-time importance. The National Defense Act of June 4, 1920, outlines the military policy of the United States. This calls for a maximum standing army of 280,000 men and 17,000 officers, and a National Guard of eight hundred per Congressman, or about 435,000 in all. The Reserve Officers' Training Corps is expected to produce about five thousand officers annually. "The New York Times" last month stated that the Citizens' Military Training Camps expect to train thirty thousand men this summer, while the Reserve Officers' Training Corps look for about nine thousand students in their summer's courses. The National Defense Act of 1920 provides for a Chemical Warfare Service charged with investigation, development, manufacture or procurement and supply of smoke and incendiary materials, toxic gases and gas defense appliances, and the other equipment of chemical warfare; also the training of troops for such warfare, offensive and defensive. According to "The New York Times" for March 3, 1921, the Chemical Warfare Service has invented a new poison so deadly that three drops would kill a person whose skin it touches. The plans for civilian military training are of especial interest. The general scheme for the Organized Reserves, according to Brigadier General Lassiter, is that they will provide more than half the force that is to be ready for any great emergency. They should have a brief period of training every year. In all, this force would consist of about three million men. In "The Nation's Business" for January, 1923, Secretary Weeks says in an article entitled "Enlisting Business for Peace": "To-day certain definite programs for use in any emergency requiring mobilization of an army of considerably less than our full national strength have been developed. . . . Beyond that lies a path for equally careful preparation against a greater emergency, a war that would tax us to the utmost in man-power and resources." The War Department is also urging citizens' rifle practice as an important part of general civilian preparedness. Elaborate plans are being worked out so that the War Department will have accurate information on all manufacturing plants all over the country. Secretary Weeks also says: "There are being established between the War Department and American industrial life everywhere points of contact that should bring the American people into this business of making ready in peace for the task that the American people alone can accomplish in war." Colonel Wainwright is reaching out over the country to gauge and measure the existing manufacturing capacity and to appraise the war load each section is able to bear." Does all this mean that the last war was such a blessing that we must plan for another?

PROGRESS OF THE PEKING UNIVERSITY CAMPAIGN

Peking University, Peking, China, is raising a fund of one million dollars in order to move from the city, where it now is located, to a new site of one hundred acres, just northwest of the city, on the road to the Summer Palace. The university is an interdenominational institution under the auspices of the Presbyterian, Methodist and Congregational Missionary Boards and the London Missionary Society. Adopting American ideals and standards of education to Chinese needs and teaching the students in China instead of sending them to the United States, Peking University is producing Christian leaders who are Chinese with an occidental breadth of vision rather than Americanized Chinese out of touch with their own people's problems. The university's work is equal to that of any of the native-supported institutions. Its faculty represents the best American colleges. Its student body now numbers 430. Twenty-five are registered in the theological school, 330 in the men's college and eighty-nine in the women's. For lack of space the university has been compelled to turn away three students for every one that is received. The rejected students were often of equal caliber with those received. The three constituent colleges of the university are now located in scattered temporary buildings. The new plans provide for buildings thoroughly adequate for a college with standards as high as those of the best American and European institutions. While strictly modern in construction and equipment, they will yet retain considerable of the characteristics of Chinese architecture. That fact is an indication of the growing breadth of mind of our missionary leaders. They are not quite so eager as they were in years gone by to turn everyone into Americans or Europeans. Already under construction on the new site are a building for the Theological Seminary, given in memory of Bishop Ninde of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and an administrative building and one for classrooms for the Women's College, the latter the gift of the Russell Sage Foundation. Before the beginning of the present campaign promises had been secured for funds for the construction of the library, the chapel, a dormitory, for the Theological Seminary and two faculty residences. The campaign fund will be used for other units of the plant. So far meetings in behalf of Peking have been held in Poston, Portsmouth, Scranton, Philadelphia, Rochester, Buffalo, Columbus, Dayton and Toledo. Scranton has promised a recreation building to be named Luce-Scranton Hall. Mr. Luce, vice-president of Peking, is a Scranton man. Rochester has pledged fifty thousand dollars for a dormitory quadrangle. The university administration building, for which the money has been pledged, will be named Bashford Hall, in honor of the great Methodist missionary statesman. As the result of six months' work the trustees have received altogether pledges for $250,000, with $150,000 more in prospect.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

THE SHAKY BRITISH GOVERNMENT

Bonar Law's government has received a good many shocks in recent bi-elections, where it has lost pretty consistently. In April, on a snap vote, the Government was defeated in a matter touching the care of war veterans. The Laborites naturally were jubilant. When the Government took the defeat perfectly coolly and the next day gave no indication that it intended to pay any attention to it, the rank and file of the Laborites quite lost their temper. In Glasgow unemployment has been most bitter. There workingmen and their families have really been going hungry. It is no wonder that the Glasgow members feel conditions intensely. In the midst of the hubub in the House some Glasgow member began to sing the Red Flag, a labor song adopted by the Socialists and even by the Communists. It is hard to see anything very objectionable in the words of the song. It has at least a fine internationalism which is lacking in our national songs. But the fact that it was sung in the House of Commons aroused a good deal of comment. When the Speaker adjourned the House jostling in the lobbies led to some personal encounters—a very unfortunate affair. But the British are as solid a people now as ever. The next day the difficulty had been adjusted and parliamentary government went on at Westminster just as it had gone on for two and a half centuries before.

A DEACONESS HOME IN NEED

About one hundred years ago, in a wholly Catholic community, Theodore Fliedner founded in Kaiserswerth, near Duesseldorf, the first Protestant deaconess institution in the world. Kaiserswerth is the cradle of modern nursing, the mother of all Protestant deaconess institutions the world over. Fliedner came to America and founded here the first deaconess hospital, the Passavant in Pittsburgh, and the Milwaukee hospital. The Mary J. Drexel Home in Philadelphia was put on its feet by six Kaiserswerth deaconesses. The fall of the mark has destroyed its fees and bequests. The revolution has swept away most gifts. Some of the capitalists still give. But the invasion of the Ruhr has made their giving impossible. Kaiserswerth is doomed unless foreign countries help. The Protestant countries of Europe are helping. Switzerland gives a little. Sweden helps much. Finland, Denmark and Norway a little. Holland helps. What will Protestant America do—will it help? A deaconess house in Rotterdam lately sent seventy-five gulden to Kaiserswerth which the deaconesses saved by not eating meat for a month. Will America allow Kaiserswerth to go under? Kaiserswerth—which inspired Florence Nightingale! Kaiserswerth—which made its influence felt in all Protestant countries! Kaiserswerth—which had hospitals and schools before the war in Smyrna, Beirut, Constantinople, Jerusalem and Alexandria? Will America allow these deaconesses, who teach the poor and nurse the sick for the love of Christ, to starve? These devoted women face starvation cheerfully and uncomplainingly, singing hymns to God. Will America allow this daily example of Christ to perish? The fall of the mark makes it easier for us to help. If there is a generous response these deaconesses, who give of their scanty meals to their patients in order to save them, would again have milk. They would again have fats in their food. Their bread rations and vegetable rations need no longer be cut down. They even might have meat occasionally. "Whatsoever you do for one of these, you do for Me." Send all checks to W. H. R. Schultz, 295 Madison Avenue, New York, who is authorized to receive the money.

MAKING MUCH OF POPPY-COCK

It is difficult to see why such a reputable journal as, for instance, "The New York Times," should lend its columns extensively to the pointless vaporings of Samuel Gompers against the American Fund for Public Service, Inc. The American Fund for Public Service was started by a young millionaire, Charles Garland. When his father left him a fortune of about one million dollars two or three years ago Garland refused to accept it. He has turned the major part of it now into this fund. The trustees are a group of men of the stamp of Roger N. Baldwin, head of the Civil Liberties Union; Norman Thomas, now one of the editors of "The Nation," formerly minister of the American Parish, and Prof. Harry F. Ward, head of the Methodist Federation of Social Service. All the trustees are men who believe ardently in protecting the rights of the weak and the obscure. Some of them were "conscientious objectors" in the war. Whether we agree or disagree with the economic ideas held by some of them, they are at any rate genuine men who sincerely want to make this world a juster and kindlier place. To put their purpose in religious terminology, they are working in behalf of the Kingdom of God as they picture that kingdom. Mr. Gompers's description of them as "pink radicals" and "Bolsheviks" is simply an appeal to war psychology on his part. The trustees of the fund have lent money to the United Mine Workers of West Virginia, to the Katonah Workers' College, and to other organizations which are connected with the American Federation of Labor or have its support. There seems to be some point in the rejoinder of the trustees that Mr. Gompers's attack on the Fund may be connected with the refusal of its trustees to contribute to the Workers' Education Bureau of America. The whole matter is without any great public interest. It is only worth attention because it is so typical of the appeal which a good many men who represent things as they are are prone to make against those who would be glad to see us move forward in one way or another.

Of new contests there is no end. We have just received an announcement that the third annual lip reading tournament of the Metropolitan District will be held on the last Friday of this month and teams from Manhattan, Brooklyn, and Jersey City will compete. We expect ere long to be hearing of a national lip reading tournament. The deaf will yet have their day in the sporting sheets of the papers.

AROUND THE HORIZON

Seeing is believing. Attorney General Wickersham was converted to the League of Nations by attending its sessions at Geneva. A letter which has just come to our hands from Europe from a very prominent Professor of English Literature in Yale University runs: "You may be interested to know that I have just come from Geneva. I spent two weeks there, and was constantly at the League of Nations. I had previously thought it a well meaning, but rather ineffective institution. I was delighted with the spirit of the place; I have quite changed my views in regard to it, and while I feel the present temper of America is such that we could not talk of joining it at present, we will join it when we understand that it is not a super state."

Our enterprising contemporary, "The Christian Herald," has announced that it has incorporated the Herald Non-Theatrical Pictures Corporation to distribute "wholesome pictures, fit for all the family." "The Christian Herald" has already secured the endorsement of parent-teachers organizations and leaders in community, church and educational movements for its proposition. "The Christian Herald" will distribute the films through twenty-five branch offices scattered over the United States. We congratulate "The Herald" on proposing to fill a very great need.

Dr. W. E. Biederwolf and Homer Rodeheaver, who was formerly "Billy" Sunday's song leader, with a small company of helpers will start for the Orient after the close of the Bible Conference at Winona Lake this summer. Mr. Charles Gabriel, the hymn writer, and Miss Grace Saxe, who for many years had charge of the Bible work in "Billy" Sunday's meeting will be members of the party. The itinerary will cover Honolulu, Japan, Korea, China, Siam, Burma, India and Australia. The music is being put into such shape that Mr. Rodeheaver can sing the songs in the language of the natives in each country. Dr. Biederwolf will of course speak through an interpreter. The invitation for the trip was the result of Dr. Biederwolf's recent mission to the Orient and Australia. Dr. Biederwolf reports that on his recent trip he reached both the students of the universities and the people in general.

The Rand School of Social Science is run by the Socialists of New York for the instruction of their young people and the training of their leaders. Fifteen years ago, some of them wanted to raise a sum of money for the establishment of a research department in the school. They managed to secure $35. In 1915, the research department actually got under way, but it was dropped in 1921 in the anti-socialist wave. Now it has been revived and friends of the school have raised $6,500 for the research department. In other words, although Socialists and those who differ from the general opinion feel that liberty of thought and speech is more limited now than it was in the first decade of our century, nevertheless, within a month, it was possible for the school to raise two hundred times the amount that it could raise in those supposedly more liberal days.

We are very glad that the Simplified Spelling Board has determined to resume its campaign for the original program which it adopted sixteen years ago. Of the original list of three hundred words recommended for simplification, two hundred have been used by some six hundred newspapers and periodicals. The president of the Board is Professor Charles H. Grandgent, of Harvard. Professor Brander Mathews, of Columbia, is vice-president. Among the trustees are Melvin Dewey, Henry Holt, Fred J. Miller, and Professor Clarence L. Meador, of the University of Michigan. If the Simplified Spelling Board makes an active campaign, we suppose we shall once more run into such people as the woman who declared that the spelling of Paul was good enough for her; but after all there is a certain proportion of the population that has a modicum of education.

Warren C. Van Slyke, a New York lawyer, says that on a recent hunting trip in French Indo-China, he came across a race of aborigines who had no alphabet and whose language was limited to five hundred words. We hope Mr. Van Slyke has made out a complete list of their words. We should like to know what five hundred terms are the fundamental ones for the Indo-Chinese natives.

At the meeting of the American Chemical Association at New Haven, Francis P. Garvin, president of the Chemical Foundation, made a very sensible wish. "Much money," he said, "has been spent in the study of a lump of coal. I should like to see more money spent on the study of the chemistry of the human body." Chemical discoveries can cure diseases. Professor J. J. McLeod, of the University of Toronto, recently announced the discovery of a chemical cure for diabetes.

Carl O. Johns, of the Research Division of the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, says that petroleum pitch was used in building the tower of Babel and the walls of Babylon. We do not know whether the announcement is the result of a priori reasoning or of archeology. However, we are sure that it is more than mere Standard Oil advertising. Mr. Johns also says that the eternal fire of the fire worshipers fed on petroleum gases. It burned for many centuries at Baku, Russia. As late as 1880, priests from India still tended the fire in the Temple there.

The Chinese are very wise in some ways. A secretary for the Young Womens Christian Association writing from Mukden tells of the organization of a Married People's Club. After a speech on home decoration, the members adopted a resolution that once fortnightly the members would throw away all useless things about the house. That is a suggestion to every housekeeper in America. Let us adopt for our housekeeping slogan, "We will be as strong minded as a Chinese." Chinese are sometimes even franker than we are. In one of the private schools in Hangchow, if the students do not like a teacher, they wait on her in a body, and tell her to "pack up and go." In many of the schools the students strike so frequently as to cause alarm to their parents. But at the bottom of the strikes lies a passion for justice and freedom. There was a time when the Chinese student was taught by a teacher who came to the house and kept tired little youngsters over their books from early morning till late at night seven days in a week. Now the student has learned the modern word "freedom," but as Miss Ethel Hartley, of the Hangchow Y. W. C. A., says: "He has not learned the laws of freedom."

When the reporters interviewed Lord Robert Cecil the other day, one of them insisted on trying to get him to admit that the League was running on an impossible basis and that the nations never would keep their word. Lord Robert listened patiently and finally answered: "There is just as grave danger in distrusting everyone as there is in trusting everyone, and if you believe that everybody but yourself is a scoundrel you will go through life very unhappy." We recommend Lord Robert's remark to the Chicago "Tribune" and the Hearst papers and indeed, to a host of others in America.

The Young Women's Christian Association in China is developing Christian leadership in non-Christian schools in eighty-nine student centers; in twelve great cities it is providing practical education, recreation and wholesome social life; it conducts a Normal School of Physical Education at Shanghai, the only school of its kind in China; it supplies health education secretaries in government and mission schools. A number of Associations conduct their own training school, and many of the secretaries and leaders are Chinese.

"If something isn't done to stop militarism, militarism will stop civilization."—Lord Robert Cecil.

The Church and Divorce

SEVERAL things have conspired to bring up the question of the attitude of the Church toward divorce. Marriage is coming to be pretty much of a farce in America, the percentage of divorces having risen to an alarmingly high figure; divorce is as easily obtainable as a sack of flour at the grocer's. The divorces are more and more being granted purely on the ground of incompatibility, which simply means that husband and wife get tired of each other, or someone else comes along husband or wife likes better; where divorce is granted on grounds of unfaithfulness half the cases have all the appearance of collusion in the evidence. All this verges on free love, and it is no wonder that the Church is frightened.

The Roman Catholic Church stands firm. Divorces are not granted, and that is all there is to it. Some Roman Catholic marriages are a failure, but the parties simply live apart or live together on sufferance. In the Protestant Episcopal Church the tendency is toward the Roman Catholic position, as was quite evident from the debate at the last convention. Dr. Percy Stickney Grant has recently assailed this tendency and is an outspoken advocate of divorce on the grounds accepted by the world at large. Bishop Manning at the same time preached a sermon in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York, in which he upheld the Catholic position and said that if divorce was to be granted, as it now is coming to be, simply on request of one of the parties, we might as well do away with marriage altogether and have free love—we were practically coming to it! Among the Protestant churches in general there is no law or standard, each clergyman being free to follow his own conscience. Thus, Dr. Aked, in a recent article in THE CHRISTIAN WORK, takes the view that where a couple come to him with permission from the State to marry, it is not his business to question the couple, but to marry them. To this most violent protest has been made, to the effect that marriage is a religious ceremony as well as a civil, and that the clergyman should exercise the same judgment as the license bureau. It will be remembered that on one or two occasions where clergymen married couples after a notorious divorce they were quite generally excoriated by their brethren in the denomination, although there was no law against it. We are of the opinion that the majority of Protestant clergymen would, while not holding the Catholic view that marriage is a sacrament, yet would consider it at least a religious sanction of a civil permit, and would insist on exercising their judgment in the matter.

The present situation is very confusing and is distressing in the extreme. There is no consensus of opinion in the Church as a whole and good individuals hold widely varying views. Individual experience enters into it also. A determined enemy of divorce, on the ground that individual happiness must be put aside for the social good, suddenly finds himself plunged into misery which seems unbearable and endless and unconsciously his point of view changes. On the other hand, a judge, seeing the procession of couples seeking divorce purely on grounds of incompatibility, and seeing that society is making straight for free love, gets frightened and becomes almost Catholic in his point of view. (These two instances just noted are from actual records in the newspapers.) One may as well admit that the whole question is very perplexing, and one hesitates to be dogmatic about the matter. Also, it is very doubtful if any unanimous attitude could be secured in the Church.

There is no doubt, on the one hand, that our present easy divorce is creating a condition not far removed from free love. While it is not probable—and the judge quoted above agrees with us here—that people get married deliberately agreeing that it is only for a while, yet the knowledge that divorce can be had for the asking leads thousands to marry without much consideration of the seriousness of the act. Among certain circles, too, marriage is taken to be considerable of a joke. Reference to it in the average play is apt to be in a jocular vein. Most of the plays dealing with divorce—and there are many—treat marriage very lightly, and changing husbands seems as common and as uneventful as changing servants. One is meeting men and women in the best circles who have been divorced twice or three times, and seemingly nothing is thought of it. Bishop Manning is perfectly right in saying that certain groups in the community are living practically on a basis of free love. It is difficult to see how our present social structure can last much longer if divorce should be made any easier. Already some students of society are urging the doing away with marriage altogether. This is what the Catholic Church believes is the logical outcome of the Protestant countenancing of divorce in so many instances and of the cry for divorce for the asking now arising from the world. Perhaps some form of "trial marriage," as described by Mrs. Elsie Clews Parsons in her study of the marriage problem, may come first. All one can say is, that from the point of view of the presentation of the social structure, for the saving of the home, for keeping marriage a really holy, beautiful thing, for justice to children, the Catholic view, or at least one which would confine divorce purely to Scriptural grounds, is right and should be adopted by the Church universal. The individual would have to sacrifice his own happiness to the public good. The preservation of society is more important than the happiness of the individual.

On the other hand, one cannot help having the greatest sympathy with the man or woman who finds the marriage state one of continual unhappiness and even misery. A woman finds her husband is a brute, or a drunkard, or a libertine, or that he is a man coarse and repulsive in every way to her fine nature, interested in nothing that interests her; or a husband finds that his wife is unfaithful, fond of nothing but amusements, parties and dances, opposed to bearing children, or extravagant and peevish. Does it seem just to ask this husband or this wife to remain in this state forever and have no chance for happiness in life? Of course, the judge will tell you—and he no doubt is right—that not more than half the divorces are granted for any of these unbearable things. They are merely that people are tired of each other and want a change—in most cases want to be free to run around with someone else with whom they have already been freely associating. But that does not alter the case for those many who are really suffering from marriage, and the question is, how can they be helped? It would seem as though they ought to be allowed their freedom, as though it were cruel to subject any man or woman to the cruel hardship of living intimately with one who is hated rather than loved, yet if divorce is made easy marriage becomes nothing more than an agreement to live together for a while, and this borders on free love, and it takes all justice out of the lives of children. The country is full of poor little children who know nothing of a home life because their parents have abandoned it. The Catholics meet those desperate cases where men and women have reached such a stage that they cannot possibly live together by allowing "separation." This is not a real solution of the problem, because in so many cases the man or woman lives with someone else without marriage. The only alleviation of the situation at present—for we confess there is no immediate solution—seems to be the inculcation of more of that spirit of unselfishness, self-sacrifice and patience which is necessary to any happy state of co-operative existence. The Catholic maintains that the knowledge of those getting married that there will be no divorce greatly helps their people to practice these virtues, and that experience has proven that "incompatibility" is easily forgotten under certain conditions. One thing is certain, namely: that marriage should be treated very seriously in our churches, that it should be held up to young people as a holy and sacred thing, entailing very great obligations as well as fulfilling love, and that it is selfishness, whether in marriage or anywhere else, that makes all the trouble in the world. Our own impression is that the Church is going more and more to say, that while all sympathy should be shown and all help rendered to those unhappily married, the preservation of the social order, justice for children, and the sanctity of home life must come first.

Self-Righteousness and Jealousy

JEALOUSY is founded on a certain estimate of personal worth or merit and, different from envy, jealousy requires three parties not two—the jealous person, the person of whom he is jealous, and a third party behaving towards the second person in a way which the first resents. The elder son in the Parable was jealous of the welcome accorded to the returning prodigal, and the jealousy involved a criticism of the father for providing the welcome. It arose from the elder brother's estimate of his own service. He had never realized that, however well he did his own work, there was a pain in the father's heart arising from the incompleteness of the family. If the elder brother himself, like the father, had deplored the going away of the other, had really been in trouble over the fact that a young life was wasting itself, he, too, would have rejoiced in the return. Apparently his main feeling when his brother left home was a feeling of his own superiority and an expectation that his father would appreciate his fidelity all the more. This self-righteous estimate gave rise to jealousy, and "he would not go in." We all know what harm jealousy can inflict upon its objects. But the first infliction is upon the subject. A man who murders another from jealousy has murdered his own inner life before the act is committed. And apart from crime, jealousy shuts out a man from the loveliest things of life. "He would not go in" is a good description of the jealous person. There are delightful things he cannot share, joys and happiness he cannot partake of, feasts which he cannot enter. Quite apart from sex questions in which, of course, jealousy has often caused suffering and misery its operations in many fields of life where it does not work out in any infliction of suffering on others is devastating to the heart and mind of the subject entertaining it.

It is frequently the temptation of men who have worked for long years for some reform or other without receiving any general public recognition. Some more or less prominent person who has only just come round to their point of view gets hailed almost as a prophet, and the old worker is tempted to grudge him the public recognition he gets, and jealousy, if he allows it to rise in his heart, prevents him from having joy in the fact that public opinion has sufficiently changed to make possible that recognition. Most pioneers come to this point, and unless in their pioneering they have cared more for the cause than for themselves, they will fall at last deplorable victims to this jealousy that makes satisfaction and serenity of mind impossible. If any worker for a cause proceeds with a sense of merit attaching to every effort he makes, and cherished an expectation, of recognition according to merit, he is sure to come to the time when he will find others who have done much less far more recognized than himself, and jealousy will prevent him from going in to share that joyful attitude which a wider outlook on life brings. It is the self-righteousness which keeps a sort of ledger of merits, and counts society in debt to us, that causes the jealousy which distorts and impoverishes the inner life. It is a great thing to have and obey a sense of duty, but one danger of a dutiful life is that it should grow a sense of merit in such a way that society is never likely to bring the payments which are expected. A person great on duty may be a very loveless person. He may not evoke anything like the human response that another person who has great defects of character but who has human touches and great heart-flows will do. If we want to keep free from the jealousy that ruins happiness and spoils social life, we must see to it that, however virtuous and dutiful our behavior is we do not allow a spirit of self-righteousness to attach to it, nor build upon it any estimate of what society should return to us.

Now this question of attitude and spirit is most important in relation to religious realizations. Self-righteousness prevented many a Pharisee from having joy in the fact that publicans and sinners were in the habit of resorting to Jesus. Such a Pharisee was too much aware of his own merits, too thankful that he was not like other men, too glad that he had so many virtues which he could count up and parade even before God, to be able to appreciate the glory of forgiving love, or understand the sweep of the passion of redemption. In the view of Jesus this Pharisaic standpoint missed the deeper moral passion, and the glory of religion. The moralist who grudges the return of a transgressor to a dignified moral status has really been more interested in himself than in morality. The Pharisee who had been so faithful and precise in his religious duties, who could not bear to see publicans and sinners in the company of Jesus, had really finer thoughts of himself than he had of God. The truly moral man who is more interested in morality than he is in himself will welcome the progress of morality everywhere, and rejoice to see men turning from a bad to a good life. The religious man who knows the heart of God at all will rejoice at the coming home of any poor lost child.

Plummer quotes an awful saying of some Pharisee: "There is joy before God when those who provoke Him perish from the world." Jesus puts the contrast: "There is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth." The moment religion becomes exclusive it misses the true spirit of religion. However filled it may be with a sense of duty, if it lacks the heart that flows out in love towards men, and a desire that the very best should come to them, however bad they may have been, it cannot get the vision of the heart of God. To enter into the love of the Father is to assure your welcome and guarantee your sympathy to any poor lost, wandering child, who turns his face towards home. The Pharisaic attitude towards sinful men finds no place in the character of God.

Whatever your religion may have been in the way of observances, an unloving spirit is a disqualification for understanding the central truth of Christianity. Profligacy may lead a man far from God, but so too may self-righteousness. The prodigal was lost from home, the elder son was lost at home. Some men are lost to religion, others are lost in religion, because it is hard and formal and unloving. One may be lost in a dissolute life, another may be lost in a very respectable life. Some are lost in irreligion, others are lost in the Church. Whether a man is lost or saved depends upon whether he is sharing in the love of God. If he is not, then he fails to enter the true joy of living; he does not really know what religion means though he may have been connected with it from his youth. Jesus was constantly endeavoring to draw men into the circuit of the wide-embracing love of God, and to make this everywhere the dynamic of human life. That was why the outcasts turned to him. Such a love was their only hope. It was a bright light burning where all was dark before, it was like a divine rainbow of hope and promise spanning the storm of social obloquy, it was a dawn on the dark mountains.

What does this old world need to-day so much as a new belief in the forgiving love of God creating a new spirit in the life of humanity? The nations have been brought very near to utter damnation by the spirit of self-righteousness. Each party claimed to be right, and called the other to the penitent form. What every party needs is a revelation of its own defects, a willingness to make confession of its own wrongs, and then a willingness to enter a new comradeship based on a new appreciation of God's love and of mutual forgiveness, a comradeship that shall build up a new type of kingdom in which men can live all for the good of each and each for the good of all.

THE OBSERVER

The Letters of Dr. Denney

[This page is devoted to a weekly letter recording the significant events and movements of the day from the Christian point of view.]

THE death of Dr. Denney, took from us one of the greatest theologians of recent years. He was also a great leader in the Scottish Church councils. There was a gentle winning element in his nature, though, which was not so well known to his contemporaries. His personality was somewhat reticent and did not manifest itself so much in his preaching and lectures, not even in conversation. Here one got the intellectual organ of a great mind, but not so much of the touch of a winsome nature. This winsomeness, this exceedingly childlike side of his nature, came to the surface in his letters. Fortunately he wrote often and sometimes at length, and they were so valued that they were preserved by those fortunate enough to receive them and now Dr. James Moffatt has collected them, and given us the best. (They are published by the George H. Doran Company, New York, at $3.).

They are charming and not only throw much light on this great scholar's character, but they preserve for us his impressions of the passing moment and his judgment on many men and things. Dr. Moffatt has purposely preserved those letters which have the most personal touch in them, and in them Dr. Denney let his mind move without any constraint of the conventional. As Dr. Moffatt says: "Some of these letters were written when he was relaxing from work; they exhibit incidentally his love of children and of nature, especially of birds and hills, his sense of humor, his preferences and antipathies in literature, and the affection which throbbed in a nature that sometimes seemed formidable to those who did not know him intimately."

Dr. Moffatt points out how the letters record two changes that gradually came over Dr. Denney's mind and these progressive changes are quite patent as one reads on. The first was a deepening appreciation of the place of the Church in the Christian system. To quote one utterance from Dr. Denney: "If we want something effective done, there are two things we have to revive. We want revival of spiritual life in the Church, and along with that a revival in the minds of Christian people of the sense of the value of the Christian Church. Many have disparaged the Church in the past. But I am sure of this—that the Church is the great witness to Christ and spiritual things in the world, and that the witness of the Church as an institution, bearing its continuous testimony, is the thing on which the permanence of the Christian faith in the world depends. We have to plead the importance of the Church in maintaining the great traditions of faith through the generations of man." Dr. Moffatt adds: "The superior contempt for the Church affected by some young ministers nowadays was unintelligible to him."

The other change was toward a larger appreciation of the part science played in revealing the handiwork of God. It is interesting to note how, toward the end, he came to appreciate the contribution Henry Drummond made to religion through the scientific approach to the subject. When Professor Drummond published "Natural Law in the Spiritual World"—a rather superficial, but suggestive work, Dr. Denney vigorously attacked it in a pamphlet with the ironic title: "On Natural Law in the Spiritual World, by a Brother of the Natural Man." He did not like Professor Drummond's treatment of the natural man. "Christ is life: yes, and light and truth and love and righteousness; and wherever these exist in the world, confessed or unconfessed, in Greek, in Jew, in Buddhist or Brahmin, there Christ is, and life and grace and God." Again, in another letter he says: "Considering its extraordinary popularity, and its common relation to religion and science, it may seem rash to say so, but 'Natural Law in the Spiritual World' is a book that no lover of men will call religious and no student of theology, scientific." As Dr. Moffatt says, "This is severe, but it was no early unconsidered opinion. He held to it to the end." Dr. Moffatt adds: "Yet he came to attach more value to the study of science than he had done. I heard him once, speaking at a college dinner, tell how he had been pre-occupied as a student with Dr. Bruce's teaching about Jesus and indifferent to Professor Drummond's lectures on science. Now, he said, he recognized that acquaintance with the scientific outlook on the world was far more vital to religion and religious teaching than he had realized. Hence his candid praise of 'The Ascent of Man.'"

The letters written when he was a student and entering upon his ministerial career are among the most charming in the book. One of them written while a student in Germany has a peculiarly applicability to our times when the method of dealing with heresy is being much discussed. He has heard from home of the alarm being expressed over the effect of the lectures of Professor W. Robertson Smith and

Rev. David Macrae upon the students and the attempt to oust them from their chairs. He writes that he is not sure whether the Presbytery will accept him as a minister or not, and then ends his letter with these interesting words: "But if the Free Church or any other Church thinks that the orthodoxy of its students can be secured in this way, or that anything at all can be secured by making it impossible for its students to hear from their professors what it is impossible for the students to be students and not hear of somehow or other, then it is mightily mistaken."

Dr. Denney's most intimate friend was the Rev. J. P. Struthers, well-known to all familiar with Scottish Church matters. A large section of the book is devoted to the letters to this friend. They are charming. Here he freely gives his judgments on men and movements. He expresses likes and dislikes in very emphatic words. I was interested in noting his impatience with those preachers who, he says, seem to love to preach anything but the gospel. And as a general thing they know nothing of the various subjects on which they preach, while a minister has had a fair opportunity to learn something of what the gospel is. He is not an enemy of the higher criticism, but he does get impatient with those critics who approach the Bible bound to prove that "there is no good evidence that anything in the Bible was written by the man whose name it bears." He gets a little impatient with the philosophers too and seems inclined to think that much philosophy is vanity. "The last unprofitable labor I have done was to read Edward Caird's Gifford Lectures. That puts me in mind of a remark of a wiser man than Law: 'After that in the wisdom of God the world by its own wisdom knew not God, it pleased God to dispense with philosophers, etc., etc., and to save the world in its own absurd way.' The philosophers, however, are irreconcilable still, and think themselves in a position to patronize Heaven. It is pitiful." In these letters one finds how Dr. Denney bore on his heart the high and holy duty of giving his best to the congregation. He is continually writing to Struthers about his sermons and his preaching. He is reading all sorts of books always with the idea of enriching the content of his thought and seeking new light on the Word of God. How thoroughly he knows his Bible is revealed in the following rather startling utterance—yet an utterance that might have some truth in it: "Does it ever occur to you . . . that we read our Bibles too much, and that it might do us good to read none for a twelvemonth, just as it would do some people good if for as long they read nothing else? I have sometimes felt weary of the very look and sound of the New Testament; the words are so familiar that I can read without catching any meaning, and have to read again, far oftener than in another book, because I have slid a good bit unconsciously." These letters to Struthers contain some delicious stories. One is too good to pass by, although it is hard on that most estimable group of men who adorn the medical profession. His friend, Osborne has been very ill but "had hopes, based mainly on the fact that the doctors did not seem to know what is the matter with him." One of the physicians had charged Osborne a preposterous fee, whereupon Dr. Denney says: "I told Osborne the story Grant told me of the doctor who fell among brigands, and who, when challenged, 'your money or your life,' said, 'Gentlemen, I congratulate myself on your moderation; my practise is to take both.'"

I might go on, but I simply wanted to say what a delightful evening I had had with these letters. The latter half of the book is devoted to the letters he wrote after having been appointed Professor of Theology in Glasgow College and afterwards, principal. The letters naturally begin to deal with the larger aspects of his life, but they still retain the personal touch of the earlier group. They have much to say about the books of his contemporaries, and, of course, are concerned with the great questions vexing the Scottish Church. When the Great War came the letters take on a sadder tone and he becomes much concerned over the finances of the churches as well as over the future of the nation. He did heroic work in helping to keep the fund out of which the pastors were paid up to its highest level and had wonderful success. He writes much on the ethical aspect of war and peace and conscientious objection, and finally comes to the conclusion that the state had a right to compel men to fight, but insists that when it does so it "should be very careful to see that it is right for which the fighting has to be done."

The Living Christ in the Modern World

By Bishop Fred. B. Fisher, Calcutta, India

THE living Christ is at work in the world to-day. He is larger than our old conceptions of Him. Many theological systems have compressed Him into the thirty-three years during which He lived upon earth. This really makes Him a human Christ. We have known His life through childhood, young manhood, and upon the cross. We have caught a slight vision of His resurrection. Then we have thought of Him as sitting at the right hand of God. We have then worshiped Him for two thousand years as a Son of God, sitting at God's right hand in heaven, but in many ways unrelated to the problems and burdens of the people of the world. What is now happening is that Jesus has become the recognized and universal ideal of mankind. He has been taken down from that niche in heaven and is seen as the personal leader of the social movements of the world.

I met a young Socialist in Paris. His eyes blazed with the light of spiritual abandon and discipleship. He excoriated our churches. He declared that many of our cathedrals ought to be torn down and the stones used to build shelters for the poor, and then taunted me when I said the Church was the only answer to the problems of the present day by declaring that Jesus is the answer, not the Church as an organism. With eyes blazing, this youth cried, "The Christ I love is far diviner than you know. He is at the very head of this whole modern, social, industrial uprising, and I am not sure but that He is happier to lead us than He is to lead you."

From this point of view, it is the living Christ who stirs up a great deal of the unrest in the world to-day. The people have caught the vision of that Christ who came to give liberty to the captives, to give sight to the blind, and to heal the broken-hearted. When they get that vision, they begin to rise up. Any economic or social system which stifles this awakening is doomed. The very forces of life and growth will destroy it.

Mr. Gandhi in India, about whom many paragraphs have been written in the papers of the world, is an evidence of the activities of this larger Christ. Mr. Gandhi has been touched by this divine spirit. He has never been baptized, declares that he never will be, has set himself in opposition to our occidental life and ambitions; but he carries about with him a New Testament and regards Jesus as his highest ideal. He has settled strikes by calling upon the people to fast and by himself practising fasting until a solution has been arrived at. He has caught the spiritual meaning of the modern industrial movement.

Mr. Tagore is another evidence. He was reared in the Brahmo Samaj, where Christ is the center of worship. They have not beheld Him in all His greatness. They look upon Him as the great example somewhat after the manner of the Unitarians. But reared in this belief, Mr. Tagore has caught something of the spirit of Jesus and, though not a member of any of our organized Christian churches, is really helping to lift India into higher idealism and purer life. The motive, the spring back of it all, is Christ.

A few months ago a young Brahman asked me to intercede with his mother on his behalf because she had declared that he must be reinstated in his caste. He had spent six years in the university, had taken his arts degree, had studied the Bible, had come into contact with Christian professors and leaders. When his mother had arranged a feast, calling the family together, and had asked one of the priests to be present for the purpose of reinstating her son in the ancient system of the Hindus, this son became convinced that the practises which he beheld were such as he could not intellectually subscribe to or follow. They were crude, crass, ignorant. His life had been fed upon other ideals. And in the presence of the family he drove the priest away and declared that never could he submit to the required practises. His mother wept, his relatives in their disgust spat upon the ground; but he held steadily to his ideal, and asked me if I would baptize him. That young man has now turned definitely into the Christian life and expects to spend his life in Christian service.

In one section of India I was asked to dedicate a church. On arriving at the town I did not see any building that looked like a modern church. My guides pointed to an old temple. They said, "The worshipers of this temple have been in school for two years; all are looking toward Christianity. It is probable that they will be baptized within a few months. And they have turned over to us this old temple. It is this building that we ask you to transform into a Christian church." We took down the Hindu symbols. We took the idols from the altars. The building was cleaned and garnished. And I had the privilege of transforming this ancient edifice into a church of Jesus Christ. Is not this an evidence of a living Master at work among men?

During recent years I have been called into wards of towns with the request to baptize every man, woman and child. We began with the headman and baptized the ward council, and then all of the citizens. This was brought about by a very strange social, economic and religious awakening which is called the Mass Movement toward Christianity. The mayors of neighboring towns are called together in summer schools, where they are taught Christian principles, the life of Christ, and Christian hymns. They are sent back to their villages to tell the stories they have learned. They first call the town council together and report the "good news." Then the members of the council scatter themselves among the families and inform all their people. At the end of a number of months a Christian worker and a missionary will bring their spirit to bear upon this village life. What a privilege to baptize them all into the Kingdom of Christ. Would you not regard it as a miracle if the ward leaders of our American towns were to gather themselves together in a special convention to study the life of Christ, learn Christian hymns, and to go back to their cities, stand in public places, and call their people to repentance through Christ? It is no less a miracle in India. Here is an ancient social, paternal system that has been in sway for four thousand years crumbling and breaking at the touch of this living Christ. We have grown used to miracles in India, so that we no longer stand amazed in their presence, but constantly expect to see them in the commonest things of life.

Picture what a mass movement of this kind means. Here is a population of 320,000,000 people. Our Methodist Church, during the last half century, has baptized nearly a half million. I met in Boston the other day a man still living who had known William Butler, the founder of our Mission, before he ever went to India. That one man has lived to see the Methodist Church grow from a single member into a constituency of a half million in that non-Christian country. The Baptists, Presbyterians, Lutherans, Disciples and the Anglicans can all tell the same story. Without question, one of the greatest Christian phenomena in the history of the world is the modern Christian movement in India.

It affects far more people than the exodus of the Old Testament. Its outreach is limited only by the vastness of the millions. It is difficult for us to conceive the population of India. Someone asked me the other day to picture it. I stated that one might take the two American continents, beginning at Canada, strip Canada of its total population and place them in India; strip Alaska and the United States, Mexico, Central America, all the fourteen republics of South America; then go westward and strip the Hawaiian Islands, and, following the American flag to the Philippines, strip them; then come back to the West Indies on the Atlantic side of the Americas, strip them. Cross the Atlantic, take England, Scotland, Wales and Ireland; cross the English Channel, taking Belgium and France; put them all into India and you have not yet reached the total figure of India's vast and dense and struggling populations. What will it not mean to the world when these myriads have awakened to their human and divine capacities?

In my travels during the last eighteen years it has seemed to me that more and more I have beheld this living Christ at work among the populations of the world. Expanding ideals, expanding nations, expanding races! Christ is the power at work in all these enlarging movements.

It has been a cruel blow to me to come back from living in the midst of these wonderful currents of progress and the breaking down of national and racial barriers and to be thrown into my own dear United States, where here and there is enmity against Japan or enmity against colored races. The shock has been so great that the day I landed I said to a friend that it seemed to me that I had been dumped out of an ocean into a teacup.

The United States of America is made up of an international population. We have come from the ends of the earth. The continents of the world have sent their people to find their homes and their prosperity here. Surely, we shall find our largest life by following the international ideal. God grant that America may never work for herself alone, but that she may be willing even to lose herself for the sake of the world! I inherently trust her justice and fair play, and know that the pendulum is going to swing back toward the larger view and the more consecrated task.

And let us not forget that in the United States of America many of these evidences of social and economic unrest which we look upon with fear and with reaction are again but evidences of a living Christ at work among common people, giving them new ideals and causing them to stretch their wings in an attempt to fly into a new life.

It is evident, likewise, in the Church of Christ. The new ministry is a ministry with its face toward to-morrow, and the vital follower of Jesus Christ is the man or woman who can behold Him alive and at work in the world.

There is nothing I dislike to hear more than that hackneyed phrase, "back to Christ." It is utterly impossible to go back to Christ. The Christ about whom I am speaking is the one depicted in the first chapter of John, who was present before the world began, by whom all things were made and through whom the world has been sustained ever since. This divine Christ knows no latitude of age or race. This Christ is moving so rapidly in the world to-day that it is extremely difficult to keep pace with Him. Imagine anyone turning his eyes backward to find Him! The thing that they and I must do is to take wings and attempt to overtake Him. He is so far in advance of us that it is almost impossible for us to catch up with Him. I remember an old friend of mine taking me into a pumpkin garden, where we beheld pumpkins that were almost as large as the boy that beheld them, and he said, "Imagine attempting to put these pumpkins back into the seed!" And I, as a young man, was greatly impressed; and I now think of that homely illustration when I think of the stilted ideas of many Christian reactionaries. It is utterly impossible to compress our world, either social, economic or religious, into the limitations of our earlier conceptions of Jesus Christ.

What we need in all our life is to recognize this Christ at work. The editor of our daily newspaper, when he attempts to interpret the matters of the day, ought not to be ashamed to preach, in the columns of his paper, the fact that he beholds this Christ at work in the new situations that are being created. As he does this he will become the voice of the modern day. He will become the moulder of the new world. The preacher in the pulpit should not be ashamed to tell his people that he beholds this Christ at work in the church. The business man, whether he be the manager of a great industrial plant or of a big department store, should be willing to tell all his executives, assistants and laborers that he beholds in their new aspirations the evidences of this living Christ at work, and that he proposes likewise to adjust his life to the new ideals. The laboring man who is attempting by strike and the use of weapons to force the hand of his employer should not use the tactics of selfishness, but should come to the place where he is willing to say, "I am a follower of this living Christ and I propose to settle this thing in His spirit and on His terms." The one solution of the industrial problems, the racial problems, the international problems of the world to-day is to see the unifying power of this living Christ among us.

I am convinced that the present financial emergency which is upon our own church and others at this present time is simply the result of the failure to behold this living Christ and to follow Him. An attitude of pessimism and of discouragement has crept into our religious life. We have wondered whether our investments would really pay. If we can only behold this Christ at work we shall come to see that the investment of one dollar during the next year will do more than the investment of one hundred dollars twenty-five years hence in missionary endeavor. We must give not only the tithe of our income, but in many cases we may be called upon to give our total income, and under some circumstances our capital. We will be called upon to give our sons and our daughters. There never was a time in the world's history when investment of life and money will count so much. I am so satisfied that the heart of our churches is right that I expect a complete turning of the tide. I am convinced that our offering of money and time during the next year will be so great that we shall see a rising tide which will lift all the spiritual boats of the world.

The Renaissance Movement in China and Its Anti-Religious Aspects

By Rev. William Hiram Foulkes, D.D.

Secretary, The New Era Movement of the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A.

IT would be difficult to overestimate the force of the renaissance which is sweeping through China to-day. The movement has undoubtedly sprung out of the great upheaval through which the Orient has been passing since her first intimate contact with the West. It appears to be the crystallization of all those forces which seek to liberate China from the bondage of her intellectual and social past. By the very nature of the case, the movement includes leaders of various sorts, ranging all the way from those who desire to cling to the forms of the old faiths while gaining the spirit of the new, to those who want to break completely with the past and to usher in, by revolutionary processes, a new era which will issue in far more than a transplanted western culture.

There are, however, certain fundamentals to which all of the leaders subscribe. To bring the ideas and methods of scientific knowledge to the masses of the people; to set the young men and the young women free from those traditions and practises which prevent the development of the highest intellectual and moral initiative; to employ the new phonetic system to reach the masses of the people in their own vernacular; to sow the empire broadcast with printed facts and principles of true scientific learning; to vitalize the whole official educational system of China, which has put off the reformation without adequately putting on the new, either in equipment or support—all of these are goals which every devotee of the renaissance keeps for his eyes.

Already long strides have been made toward these far-away goals. A National Educational Conference was held last year in Canton, this year in Peking, and the next year a similar one will be held in Shantung. These conferences, to a large degree, determine the official educational policy of China. One cannot visit such a remarkable institution as the Southeastern University in Nanking, under the leadership of Dr. P. W. Kuo, a graduate of Wooster and a post-graduate of Columbia, a number of years ago, without realizing the seriousness and the success of the new educational system in China. The national movement in Peking, under the leadership of the celebrated Chancellor Tsai Yuan Pei, with its three thousand students, is another index of the new aspirations of intellectual China, although the university is suffering, as every public institution in China suffers, from non-support. At times, on this account, the very life of the enterprise is threatened.

Prominent in the renaissance movement are such men as Chancellor Tsai; Dr. Suh Hu, professor of philosophy and dean of the department of English in the National University of Peking; Dr. Chow Tso-jin, professor of Chinese literature in the National University and a novelist of first rank; Dr. Kao-I-hau, professor in the College of Law and Political Science in Peking and a lecturer on philosophy in the National University; Mr. Chang Tung-sen, the editor-in-chief of the "China Times," a paper that strongly advocates the renaissance, and Dr. Chen Tu Sen, formerly dean of the College of Letters of the National University, editor of "La Jeunesse," the man who has been called the father of the renaissance and whose seven volumes have waged the fiercest battles for the movement. These men, largely from the north, are ably reinforced in the south by so influential a man as Wang Chin Wei, Commissioner of Education in the Canton, and by many lesser luminaries throughout both north and south. It should not be overlooked that Dr. Chen Tu Sen is also now working in the south. Chancellor Tsai, the leader of the group, is a learned Chinese scholar, full of integrity and devotion. His willingness to go without salary and to carry the back-breaking load of a great university up the mountainside of financial embarrassment and over traditional barriers of every sort, brands him as a worthy proponent of the movement.

It may be of interest to quote some of the leaders of the renaissance whose names have just been given in order that one may see something of the sweep of the anti-religious aspects of the movement. All of the articles from which the quotations are taken were, with one exception, written specially for "The Life."

Dr. Chang Tung-sen, editor-in-chief of the "China Times," says in part: "I feel, in China, Christianity appears to be the most suitable of the three religions, Confucianism, Buddhism and Christianity, if we must promote any religion at all. The nature of Buddhism as described by Prof. Liang Seo Wing, of Peking, is backward-looking, and Confucianism lacks too much the fighting spirit. There, comparatively speaking, Christianity has certain elements which tend to correct the shortcomings of China to-day. The fundamental spirit of western civilization is forward-looking. In other words, it is to emancipate life, to transcend its pains and sorrows. . . . It has quite a few things which can help to correct the habits of the Chinese people. Therefore, from the point of view of practical use alone, I regard Christianity as comparatively more suitable than other religions. Of course, what I have stated is on the assumption that we must have a religion. My personal position is, however, that no religion is necessary. As to why I regard religion as unnecessary, that is beyond the scope of this brief statement."

Dr. I-han Kao gives his opinion as follows: "I as an individual never believed in any religion, and I do not care, therefore, to discuss religion. I dare say that as science progresses there will come a day when it will prove to be a satisfactory substitute for all religion. Therefore, the Chinese people ought to exert themselves to the utmost to study the European sciences, and it is not necessary for them to follow and worship the religion of the Europeans like a person who swallows a thing raw."

Tso Jen Chow reaches a somewhat different conclusion than either of the former leaders. His statement follows: "I have not made a very close and thorough study of Christianity, therefore I cannot give any criticism of it, but I have studied the Bible and I feel that the spirit of Christianity is very good, and I have made reference to it in several of my articles. I believe if we want to renew the hearts of the Chinese people, Christianity is very suitable. There may be a very small number of people who can use science, art or social service to take the place of their religious need, but the majority of the people are not able to do this. Therefore, I believe the best thing to do is to take the monotheistic religion, which can tolerate science to overthrow the polytheistic, cruel and barbarous religions of the present day in China, which, as a matter of fact, are really animistic religions. If we do that, then there is some hope for the development of the intellect of our people. But this should be done under two conditions, and these two conditions must be strictly observed. First, the God of this new religion must not in any way be identified with the idea of the old God. Otherwise, it will become a kind of Chinese God dressed in foreign costume. Second, we should not create any religious partisanship to become an obstacle of the development of the freedom of thought. These two mistakes have already shown themselves in concrete facts in the western history. Therefore, we must exert ourselves to the utmost to avoid them."

Dr. Suh Hu fearlessly enters the lists and outlines his clear-cut convictions as follows: "If you say that the Chinese people are a non-religious people, I cannot quite agree with you. If we will open our eyes to see, we can easily find many facts to disprove such a belief. Anybody who has been to Puto, Chiu-Hua, Tien Tai or other centers of Buddhism, anybody who has studied the history of Buddhism in China, will know this statement is not true. As to the position of the Chinese intellectuals with regard to Christianity in China, I believe that they should maintain two attitudes—first, one of toleration; second, one of understanding. To recognize that every person has religious freedom and also to recognize that the Chinese Christians have the freedom and the right to spread Christianity within rightful limits—this is what I regard as toleration. Study the Scriptures and other books of Christianity and study the history of Christianity, to know what blessings Christianity has brought to mankind in past history, and what mischief she has made, to know which part of Christianity is its essence and which part its dregs—this is what I regard as understanding."

In Dr. Y. Y. Tsu's translation of Mr. Chen Tu Seu's article, "Christianity and the Chinese People," written in 1920, there is the following: "At present, the natural sciences have made wonderful progress and certain theological teachings of Christianity, like creation, the trinity and miracles have lost their force, and the ordinary person thereby concludes that Christianity is refuted. My idea is that Christianity is the religion of love, and unless we accept the doctrine of Nietzsche condemning the love of fellow-men, then we cannot say that we have done with the Christian religion. The root teaching of Christianity is faith and love, and its other teachings are branches and leaves. We should appreciate the power of our emotional nature, but at the same time we should not forget that it is blind and irrational. Mere knowledge is not to be relied upon, but we should not throw knowledge away. In walking we depend upon the muscular power of our legs, but we need our eyesight to guide us. In the same way, our emotional nature supplies us the motor power of life, but our knowledge is our guide. The doctrines of creation, trinity and miracles are mostly traditions of the past which have been nullified by the historical and physical sciences. We should discard the old beliefs and search for new ones. What are the new beliefs? They are embodied in Jesus' wonderful personality. Not only are we to discard the old traditions, but also to remember that the existing theologies and ecclesiastical rituals are insignificant as compared with the personality of Jesus."

What are the deductions one is to make from the foregoing array of opinions and upon the background of the conditions they mirror in the changed intellectual and religious life of the Chinese? The most important conclusion to which one may come is to know what effect the anti-religious aspects and activities of the moment are having upon the Christian forces themselves. For my information upon this point I took pains to consult every leader with whom I came into contact. While not all of the testimony is identical, and while marked differences of judgment appeared, the following conclusions represent a fair consensus of the opinions of the leaders of our Chinese Christian forces:

First, the influence of the movement is more pronounced in the north than in Canton or the south of China. This is in part due to the temperamental difference between the typical Pekingese and the typical Cantonese mind. One is quite inclined to philosophical, classical and theoretic; the other to be practical, utilitarian and political.

Second, the movement is to be welcomed rather than repulsed. Its collapse would be a serious blow to the whole Christian enterprise. It is a sign of the creative vigor of new ideas that something new is actually taking place in old China. If the movement should be opposed or abandoned it would be a tragedy.

Third, the sincerity of the leaders of the movement who are anti-religious and anti-Christian is beyond reproach. These men must be met on their own high plane of intelligence and the more favorable views of the accomplishments of Christianity, both in the West and in the East, must be promulgated with vigor and at the same time without acrimony.

Fourth, the movement is beginning to have a genuine effect and must be permitted to have a larger one upon the intellectual life of the leaders of the Church in China. The fact, for instance, that out of three thousand students in the National University at Peking only twenty profess to be Christians and many of the others are avowed non-Christians and anti-Christians, puts upon the young leaders of the Church the necessity of intellectual alertness, sympathy, wide range, and at the same time thoroughgoing loyalty to the truth.

Fifth, the movement is in itself a proof that at last Christianity is being attacked in China, not on the ground that it is western, but because it is rooted in China itself. The day has dawned when the Chinese Church must defend its intellectual and theological integrity on its own ground and for its own sake, not as an offshoot of the West.

Sixth, the movement may be captured for the Christian forces of China, not by any tour de force, nor by any political intrigue, but by the raising up of a sufficient body of Chinese Christian leaders who will go into the very midst of the battle, fighting the issue where it exists and winning for the Christian faith that victory which has always been won wherever the true faith has had a real chance in the minds, hearts and lives of men and women.

Seventh, the implications of the renaissance movement for the Church in America are manifold, and it seems to me, imperative. For one thing, the type of Christianity into which the thousands of students from China every year are coming into contact with the various colleges and universities of America will be a determining factor in the solution of the problem when they return to their homes. If these students cannot be won and kept for Jesus Christ during their days in the United States, with all the Christian influences that are at work, the chances of their being won or of their becoming active Christian leaders upon their return to China are exceedingly remote. Then, too, the type of young men and women who are being sent out to China to-day needs to be of the highest and truest.

The upshot of it all is that there is no new way, no short cut to Christian leadership in China. It will have to be produced in the same way in which it has always been produced. Evangelists, pastors, teachers, physicians will have to be sown broadcast in every province. They cannot be foreigners. They must be Chinese. The opportunity of the Church in America in this, the eleventh hour of her day in China, is to give discriminating but whole-hearted support to the newly formed Chinese Christian Council and to the devoted body of evangelical leaders that are already at work, of various types and shades of thought, but, as I believe, Christian to the core. The spirit of Christian comity already at work must be magnified. Educational policies must be built around solid principles, and not around particular enterprises or denominational traditions. The report of the Educational Commission ought not to be shuttled back and forth between boards and missions, but should be put into effect. The training of leadership in highly developed institutions must occupy the center of thought, while there must be an equally clear recognition that the life of China must be reached in the small village if it is ever to be Christianized. We of the West must prepare to turn over our leadership in China to Chinese leaders, but we dare not do it until we have poured out a far greater abundance of our wealth in sons and daughters and in silver and gold. Paternalistic missions are passing, but there is a long day ahead for fraternal foreign assistance.

The renaissance in China is trembling on the verge of dawn. The darkened sky of the night of four thousand years is showing the promise of a new day. Shall it be the day of the Soviet, whose influence is very far-reaching upon the present leaders of the renaissance, or the day of the Lord, when patriots' dreams come true, and when a new China shall appear among the nations calling upon His name and acknowledge His Kingdom of righteousness and peace?

India's Awakening

By Sherwood Eddy, LL.D.

INDIA, vast and various, is almost a continent in itself, embracing one-fifth of the human race, including men of eight religious faiths, 147 different languages, and nearly 4,000 different castes. It represents a challenging need and a great spiritual opportunity. Nine-tenths of the population are in the 737,000 villages. Only some six per cent. can as yet read and write. But Indian leaders are demanding of the Government a reduction of the more than half the total budget that is now allotted to the costly army, the introduction of compulsory universal education, and of home rule within the British Empire. Here is the opportunity of a vast nation that once gave to the East the light of Asia, and may yet become a spiritual teacher to the world. It is this vast sub-continent that is now awakening.

Five dates mark the mile posts of India's awakening. In 1834 Macauley's educational minute established the teaching of English in the schools that led on, as he foresaw, to the social and political awakening of the people. The Indian mutiny which attempted to throw off the foreign yoke was followed by the Queen's Proclamation in 1858, recognizing the right of Indians to share in the government. In 1905 Japan's victory over Russia, which led to the revolution in the latter country, came as a powerful stimulus to awaken new aspirations in India's educated classes. In 1917, following the vast upheaval of the World War, India was granted responsible government, looking toward eventual home rule on the instalment plan. In 1922, not satisfied with the slow progress under foreign rule, Mr. Gandhi, the Nationalist leader who had carried on the movement for "non-co-operation with the Government," was imprisoned.

A high-minded idealist, pacifist and patriot, he had returned from South Africa, where he had won his fight for social justice for one hundred and fifty thousand of his fellow Indian subjects. He protested indignantly against the massacre at Amritsar in North India, where under General Dyer, an unarmed gathering was fired upon by his troops, several hundred being killed and wounded. Under Mr. Gandhi's leadership India was soon aflame with indignation. As he was working for self-government by the method of passive resistance and non-co-operation which, in spite of his protests, had led to violence on the part of some of his followers, he was tried and sent to prison for six years. Some fifteen thousand other nationalists were also said to have been imprisoned, yet India has been quiet since their arrest.

But whether these men are in prison or out, a new spirit is abroad in India. I have always believed Britain's rule in India was the finest instance in history of the government of one people by another. But the people view with distrust the foreign government which has imprisoned their great national hero and saint, who in his own person incarnates the determined national spirit of self-sacrifice for the achieving of self-government. The leaders all over India have said to me, "We admit the efficiency and material achievement of British rule in India. But after a hundred and fifty years of this rule have we been fitted for self-government or for perpetual tutelage for the economic and imperial advantage of England? We, as well as liberty-loving Anglo-Saxons, claim the right of 'self-determination.' We as well as the signers of the Declaration of Independence claim the right of government by consent of the governed. We simply do not give assent to the present foreign domination. Our cottage industries have been crushed by the invasion of modern industry. A few foreigners and native princes or capitalists are enriched while the average income of our three hundred and twenty million in poverty is only $17.66 a year, or less than five cents a day.

"Under present conditions we have no true self-determination nor equality of race treatment. Every day and hour we are made to feel the humiliation of the exploiting rule of a 'superior' white race and its material civilization which we resent and repudiate. The iron has entered our very soul. We found a voice and a prophet in Mr. Gandhi. And now our beloved leader is in prison under the foreign government. Our spirit is in prison with him. We are silent. We will not resort to violence, but we are nonetheless determined. This race superiority and foreign domination must go. We will be masters in our own house. We shall want many foreigners who will be well paid and well treated to remain as experts in many departments, but they must stay, if at all, as our friends and helpers, but not as our lords and masters. Enslavement is bad alike for the slave and his master. By quiet but persistent passive resistance we, as well as America or Canada, demand our freedom. But to obtain it we shall follow the method not of Prussian militarism or of physical force in which the ninety-seven impoverished nations of Europe trusted, but the method of Jesus Christ and his follower, Mahatma Gandhi, whom we shall follow in deathless devotion.

"Tell us, you liberty-loving Anglo-Saxons, after a hundred and fifty years of foreign rule from Germany or France, would you cravenly accept such a yoke without protest? Would you respect any people that did, or would you look upon them as an inferior and enslaved race? Once and for all we have rejected the claims and daily practice of 'superiority' of your race. It is this which we can never tolerate again. Are we ready for our freedom after one hundred and fifty years? If not, when shall we be? Will you ever leave until you have to? Since the war we too can say, 'Never again!' You may despise our methods of passivism, but time will tell which is the better. And which is stronger Prussian legions or a cross of self-sacrifice and a silent prison cell; Napoleon or Christ; material force or soul-force? But in the meantime we demand equality of race treatment, government by consent of the governed, full self-determination, or Home Rule for India within the Empire." This seems to be the sentiment of most of the educated Indians I have met all over India.

Never was there a time when India so needed a great leadership. The thirteen thousand mission schools with their half a million pupils have proved a factor in the past. Unlike Japan, the proportion of educated Christian leaders in India's public life is pathetically small. India needs, above all, the pure and simple Gospel of Jesus, but she needs it un-mixed and uncontaminated with Western dogmatism, imperialism and exploitation. Those who go to India must be in deep sympathy with her great people and must be free from any spirit of autocracy or paternalism. Emphatically, India needs quality rather than quantity. She needs well trained, humble, spiritual men who will go not to be leaders but to make them, and who in humble service and loving fellowship will seek to call out the great spiritual leadership which will be India's gift to the world. The day of imperialism, paternalism and money power has passed both for governments and for missions. A new day has dawned upon the world. An old order is dead or dying all about us. It must die within us as well, and the spirit of Christ must rise.

Mrs. C. F. Andrews, regarded by Indians as the most spiritual British missionary in India thus states the case in "The Indian Problem;" Sir John Seeley, in his book, "The Expansion of England," shows that India during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries is regarded as an instrument in the expansion of England. He says: "If the feeling of a common nationality began to exist there only feebly . . . from that day almost our Empire would cease to exist. The moment a mutiny is but threatened which shall be no mere mutiny, but the expression of a universal feeling of nationality, at that moment all hope is at an end, as all desire ought to be at an end, of preserving our Empire. . . . Subjection for a long time to a foreign yoke is one of the most potent causes of national deterioration."

Mr. Andrews continues: "I, for one, have come to believe that the state of the peasantry in India, under the crushing burden of military expenditure, is growing steadily worse. A dominance of one race over all others is by no means a sacred trust from God; it is rather a sordid commercial conquest and exploitation, in which process the 'White' race prejudice forms an important and integral part. I have watched, at close quarters, the rigid determination of Englishmen to create at all costs, a 'White' dominion, from which colored races shall be, as far as possible, excluded. I have watched how this sentiment has gone far beyond the Colonial Empire of Great Britain, and has led to the increasing brutality of Negro persecution in the United States of America. This 'White' race religion, as I have often called it, has thus appeared to me, during my travels, to have become an incorrigible passion of the lower Anglo-Saxon mind, having all the fanaticism of a baser cult. I do not wish, for one moment longer, either by word or deed, or even by silence, to be a participator in a 'White' race supremacy, which from the bottom of my heart I detest.

"I am eagerly longing to see this 'dead hand' removed from India altogether and the country once more entirely free and independent. I long to see India's own healthy and vigorous normal life begin again. While the Philippines are likely to obtain their independence after less than thirty years of a foreign rule by the United States, more than one hundred and sixty years have passed since the Battle of Plassey. 'Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, even so do unto them; for this is the Law and the Prophets.' While I have meditated, I have said to myself again and again, in silence, 'How can you, an Englishman, who love your own freedom and independence, as an Englishman, refuse to allow the very same freedom and the very same independence to every Indian?' As Sir Frank Beaman has put it very bluntly, 'We stole India.' In our heart of hearts, we all know that this is true; and we have had, what I have called an 'uneasy moral conscience' ever since.

"It is because Mahatma Gandhi is essentially not a politician that I have faith in the movement which he has founded. By far the greatest influence in his life from his English reading has been the Sermon on the Mount. The main indictment which the Non-Co-operation Movement is bringing against the system of administration now predominant in India is this—the system more and more terribly op-presses the poor. It crushes the poor. It tyrannizes over the poor. The burden of the oppression is growing more and more immense, and the system is too hard and wooden and impervious for any vital change to take place in it as it now stands."

The average per capita income for the three hundred and twenty million in India is only $17.66 a year or less than five cents a day. Over half the entire national budget is spent upon the army. All over India there is a growing demand for complete self-determination, or home rule. The British correspondent of the "Manchester Guardian" after a survey of the entire field estimates that it will come within a decade and that Great Britain should make the best terms she can before it is too late. If this proves true, M. Gandhi has discovered a force more powerful than all the dynamite on earth and the principles of Jesus may yet be vindicated in the Orient rather than the Occident. Certain it is that the mass mind of educated India has moved toward Christ under the powerful spiritual leadership of Mr. Gandhi. Such is the amazing fact of India's present awakening.

The Challenge of Japan

By Galen M. Fisher

Executive Secretary, the Committee on Social and Religious Surveys.

[This article is from a chapter of Mr. Fisher's book, "Creative Forces in Japan" (Missionary Education Movement, 150 Fifth Avenue, New York. Cloth 75c., paper 50c.). Mr. Fisher writes from long experience, having spent twenty years in Japan with the Y. M. C. A. He is now executive secretary of the Committee on Social and Religious Surveys. "Creative Forces in Japan" is especially written for adult discussion groups and is one of a series of excellent books on Japan for church groups of all ages.—THE EDITORS.]

IT is important to realize in advance that the Christianizing of a people which possesses so highly developed religious and social systems as the Japanese will be a long, complex undertaking. Hitherto, the Christian movement has made its gains almost entirely among students and other groups most responsive to new ideas. To make headway among the conservative groups will call for siege-work. Although suspicion and bitter opposition toward Christianity have largely disappeared, other difficulties have arisen. Thirty years ago Christian workers were acknowledged to be the bearers of superior ethical ideals, as represented by the hospitals and schools and reform movements which they introduced. Even outside the Christian circle, Japanese writers and publicists gradually accepted Christian standards by which to judge their institutions and ideas. The government adopted the programs of philanthropy and women's education, which had at first been the monopoly of the missionaries. The newspapers, for example, nowadays criticize public men for personal immorality which would have been ignored a few decades ago. Thus, without recognizing its indebtedness to the missionary movement and the numerically insignificant Japanese churches, educated public opinion has become to a large degree ethically Christian. So far as it goes, this constitutes a triumph for Christianity.

But it has deprived the Christian message of one of its chief grounds of appeal.

Another difficulty is the aggressive competition of Shinto and Buddhism with Christianity. In so far as the old religions are being purified, every Christian will rejoice, but he will be pardoned for fearing that the leopard can never entirely change his spots. Shinto can hardly get rid of its nationalist bias. Buddhism can hardly escape entirely from its negative pessimism. Yet the Shin Sect of Buddhism has gone a good way toward making its escape. Many of the old sects are borrowing without apology the methods and ideas of Christianity. That the results are generally pale imitations is to be expected. Ultimately, the impossibility of making a life-giving religion out of an eclectic combination of new and old wine will be apparent. But meanwhile modernized Buddhism and glorified Shinto will seriously impede the progress of Christian truth.

A still further stumbling-block is "Christian civilization." The era when the brilliance of occidental civilization cast a glamor upon the religion of the West has forever passed. The World War cast a lurid light on the "Christian nations." Their religion was seen to be impotent to subdue political and financial ambitions. The messengers of Christ in Asia now find "Christian civilization" rather to be apologized for than an effective apologetic for their message.

Just to mention these giants in the path of the Christian movement in Japan shows that the task ahead is no holiday parade. To make the Japanese people predominantly Christian will be a stupendous achievement. It is, therefore, fitting that we attempt to forecast some of the most important steps to that end.

The first requisite is the better co-ordination and use of all the Christian forces. At various times prominent Japanese laymen have agitated for the organic union of the denominations, but they have lacked the knowledge of church history and the leadership to carry it through against the passive resistance of the rank and file and the active opposition of some of the clergy. An all-inclusive organic union is doubtless visionary for the present, but a further combination of kindred denominations would appear to be both practicable and desirable. Already the Japanese have gone far in that direction: the results of the labors of the four Presbyterian and Reformed missions have been included in the Nihon Kirisuto Kyokai; the work of the two American and one Canadian Methodist missions has contributed to the formation of the single Japan Methodist Church; the missionaries of the Church of England, the Church of England in Canada, and the American Episcopal Church are all connected with the Sei-ko-kwai; a single association of Baptist churches has grown out of the work of two Baptist missions.

It may surprise occidental readers, but the fact is that sectarianism in recent years has been more obstinately perpetuated by the Japanese, especially the clergy, than by their missionary colleagues. The laity, on the contrary, would generally endorse plans for a considerable degree of church union. In the case, however, of the union or federation of Christian schools in order to pave the way for a union Christian university it was the Japanese alumni rather than the missionary teachers who objected. Has not the day fully come when a more resolute effort should be made both in Japan and among the supporting home churches to present a united fighting front?

But a more vital requisite for a victorious Christian movement is an adequate supply of competent Japanese leaders. The early Japanese converts, such as those in the Kumamoto and Yokohama bands, included a surprisingly high proportion of able leaders. But speaking generally, it seems as though the decade of reaction—the 'nineties—had left a gap in the ranks. That cold decade chilled the early flush of enthusiasm for the adventure of Christian service. The lure of political and commercial careers has proved stronger for many men than the rough, uncertain road of Christian ministry, and not a few who had stilled conscience by resolving to devote to the advancement of the Kingdom the prestige and wealth they might win in secular pursuits, have drifted far from their early purpose. The net result is that all the Christian callings are short of men and women equal to the exacting demands of the times.

Particular attention should be paid to the high schools and vocational schools—well-nigh a thousand of them—for students make the great decisions in their teens. Here is a field where many a missionary man or woman will find a fascinating opportunity. It might not be excessive if every tenth missionary were chosen with reference to such work—well educated, attractive, willing to work quietly with small groups, and irradiated with the love of Christ for heart-hungry youths. A second source of leaders, too little tapped as yet, is that reservoir of manhood, the village and small town. Japan is still a nation of peasants, for seventy-five per cent. are tillers of the land and fishermen. The army and the factories go to the countryside for their recruits. Many of the sages and apostles and statesmen of Old Japan were bred there. But the Christian Church, in spite of all its valuation of the common man and the precedent of Jesus' peasant disciples, has somehow found little time for getting hold of the sturdy Japanese peasant. The main reason has been a shortage of workers and funds, but there has also been a conviction that concentrating in the dominating centers, as St. Paul did, was wise strategy.

The strengthening of the Christian schools is one of the salient needs of the day. No one would deny the imporance of laying siege to the government school student body, but it is likewise vitally important to create a chain of Christian schools of the highest quality in every section of the Empire. In the long run, this would be one of the most highly multiplying uses of missionary men and money. Who prates of the competition between the evangelistic and the educational work? They are one and inseparable, interacting organs of one body. The schools work on the most plastic minds, not for a few minutes a week, but for months on end. They operate by peaceful penetration, not by sudden attack; but in a true sense they are evangelistic.

More missionaries of the right kind are needed. In the center are to be found the bulk of the Japanese Christians. They appreciate the great service of the missionary body nowadays as well as in the earlier stages. Still they are not blind to the shortcomings of the missionaries individually or of the "system." They would say, "Yes, a slight increase of the missionary force may be desirable, but far more to be desired is still more rigid selection of those who are sent, and the improvement of the working relations between them and the Japanese workers." This view would also represent fairly well, I believe, the conviction of the most competent missionaries in Japan.

The chief reasons for desiring that the present missionary force be maintained and slightly enlarged are these: The vast majority of the people have not been and cannot be effectively brought under Christian influence without reinforcements; the forces of the opposition—crass materialism, corrupt religions and mercenary cults misleading the people, destructive moral and social ideas from abroad—all these and more call for a more aggressive advance by the Christian forces; the seasoned spiritual character and the specialized training possessed by the best type of missionary are invaluable to the Kingdom of God in Japan.

But invariably such appeals are coupled with two provisos. The first is that they be missionaries of the right kind. The specifications for the "right kind" have been partially brought out in description of various representative missionaries, but it will be well to state all of them together here. The missionaries needed will, of course, differ in many ways, but the attitudes and convictions which they all must have without exception are these: (1) An absolute loyalty to Jesus Christ as Lord and Saviour and a growing experience of fellowship with God through Him; (2) a willingness to "play second fiddle" and be loyal, whether to Japanese or to fellow missionaries; (3) A primary concern, not for any denomination, but for the Kingdom of God, and eagerness to co-operate with all other Christians and men of good-will in its realization; (4) a flexible mind and teachable spirit; (5) a firm grasp of the essentials of Christian truth and an earnest desire to bring men into the Christian life; (6) a sympathy superior to racial, creedal and national distinctions; (7) a capacity to see the humorous and the hopeful sides of every situation; (8) a refined and appreciative spirit, capable of appealing to the romantic and esthetic temper of the Japanese; (9) a character that rings true.

The next proviso is that missionary-Japanese relationships in church work be made right. That is, of course, a matter of making the heart right even more than the formal arrangement. Hundreds of missionaries are working smoothly and effectively with Japanese associates. But there is more maladjustment than appears on the surface. The Japanese are reticent and reluctant to complain, especially when they know their missionary associates mean well. The missionaries do mean well, but they are often, like occidentals generally, dull in intuitive perception, and are likely to take at face value the conventional and considerate assurances of the Japanese that all is well. A loving, unselfish heart, watchful to detect friction, is certainly the first requisite for a solution. But the system must also be set right, lest even the best of intentions be thwarted. Dr. Arthur D. Berry expressed the basic principle in these words: "The independence and self-government of the Church in Japan is a settled fact. The missionary who is not willing to recognize it and, if asked, willing to work under Japanese direction, should be recalled and sent to some other field."

In conclusion, the issues at stake in the Far East are too great for the man in the street to grasp. Japan is so far away and the United States and Canada so mighty and self-sufficient that he may think it far-fetched to talk about Japan's future determining to any perceptible degree the destiny of North America. But Japan is the vanguard of Asia, and if Asia falls into the pit, western nations can no more help being dragged in than America can escape the down-draft of Europe's present debacle. An American scientist of international reputation after spending half of 1922 studying conditions on the Continent declared that European civilization would not recover for two generations and that Japan and China were bound to wield a correspondingly larger influence on the thought and destiny of both East and West. Americans now living are likely to behold them become as potent in world affairs as England and America have been for the past hundred years.

Thank God, the Japanese people to-day are plastic and ready to be recast. From nobles to navvies they are conscious that things are wrong and that they need new power to put them right. Consider the appalling clash of forces amid which the Japanese people are struggling to-day—autocracy and democracy, feudalism and industrialism, family authority and individual freedom, superstitious faiths and New Testament revelation—stout hearts may well quail and weak hearts despair. As Baron Kato, chief delegate to the Washington Conference, was returning to Japan he dropped this pregnant remark: "We did our best at Washington and will work hard to live up to the agreements, but we need the help of the teachers of religion to supplement what we did there." Now that the Baron is Premier he seems to be making an honest fight for a righteous policy toward China, Siberia and the United States, and for greater popular freedom at home. But he and other leaders of Japan confess that the one thing needful, an inward dynamic, they cannot supply.

If the evidence arrayed in this article is accepted at face value, it would seem to indicate that Christ has proved to be the desired dynamic in Japanese hearts, as we know Him to be in our own. But before settling back comfortably on anyone else's ready-made conclusions, either on this point or on the whole question of the place and power of Christ and the Church in Japan to-day and to-morrow, it will be well to take a bird's-eye view of the ground we have traversed.

Only a few segments of the entire complex situation in Japan to-day have been covered in this article, yet they were intended to be the most significant and representative segments. If that is a reasonable assumption, one should be able to answer with some confidence the question, What are the main conclusions to which the evidence points? No reader or study-group should accept another person's answer; but taking the privilege of an author and assuming the attitude of a judge, I would, for myself at least, formulate some of the conclusions in the following paragraphs:

The Japanese people are likely to exert a mighty influence upon the peoples of Asia and also upon the rest of the world. For a generation to come their influence in Asia may entitle them to be called "the rudder of the Orient."

The phenomenal expansion of industry and the landslide of population into the cities, coupled with universal education, the emergence of the common people and the recognition of women's rights have powerfully affected the character and life of the people. Venerable customs and ethical standards have lost their authority. The sway of the old faiths has waned as scientific education has advanced. Even the military career, typified by the sword ("soul of the samurai"), has lost its prestige, discredited by the excesses of the militarists in all lands since the World War and undermined by the cumulative effect of Christian teaching. The advance of liberalism and popular rights and the decline of repressive upper-class domination have become irresistible. But unless the spirit and standards of Jesus become steadily more potent in Japanese society all these emancipating tendencies will lead toward a refined but selfish materialism and toward exchange of upper-class for lower-class domination.

The conflict between the old family authority and the new personal liberty presses hard on the younger generation. Many of them have run the gamut of naturalism, agnosticism and cynicism, and when they come to themselves they yearn for some sure word of life. Out of the depths of their bewilderment and need shallow men and women are seizing upon strange travesties of religion, while the more serious-minded are taking refuge in the more spiritual elements of Buddhism and Shinto; and still other earnest souls, who know little about Christ, have become enamored of the character of St. Francis of Assisi, and by way of his footsteps are groping their way toward the light of Christ himself.

Were the Master to appear in Japan to-day He would doubtless recognize many more friends and allies than our dull eyes can descry. We depend too much upon labels and definitions, while He "looketh on the heart." But I fully believe that He would hail the folk of Japan who bear His name—the Church conceived most broadly and in all its branches and auxiliaries—despite their distorted representation of Him, as the driving center of the forces that are to establish His Kingdom among the Japanese people. Their reinforcement and upbuilding, therefore, is a paramount duty.

After his last visit to Japan, Dr. Robert E. Speer wrote: "The present is the day of all days for the churches at home to support these churches and missions in Japan by enabling them to put forth the maximum of direct evangelistic effort and to use to the limit every opportunity of press and school."

What poignant grief must Christ feel over the disloyalty and niggardliness and timidity of many of His followers in North America and Great Britain as they sit supine before Japan's urgent need! What unsuspected powers and graces may He call forth in the yet unevangelized Japanese people! But to many of them His liberating touch will only go as we stand by the meager Christian forces now in Japan.

Three years ago at the World's Sunday-School Convention in Tokyo occurred a scene full of symbolic meaning. It vividly represented the forces which are playing a leading part in re-creating Japan. A great chorus of young Japanese Christians, reinforced by a hundred missionaries, made the galleries of the Imperial Theater resound to the thrilling harmonies of the "Hallelujah Chorus." All distinctions of Orient and Occident, of foreigner and Japanese, were fused into one mighty ensemble. In the heart of the capital, within sight of the Imperial Palace, rang forth the prophetic words, "The Lord God Omnipotent reigneth! The kingdoms of this world are become the Kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ. And He shall reign forever and ever!"

Queries for Critics

[Portions of address delivered by Frederick W. Stevens, American representative of the Banking Consortium, before the faculty and students of the Peking Union Medical College, February 25, 1923.]

NOW and then I hear reputable foreigners in China—I am not now speaking of the excessively intellectual class—express the opinion that the Christian missions are not helping China. The Christian missionaries have long known about this, I am told, but have allowed the statements to go largely unnoticed. Perhaps it is time that something be said by laymen on the subject. These remarks are made by people not particularly interested in nor familiar with mission work. They have not investigated and they draw conclusions from misinformation. None of them are in this audience, I feel sure. When I hear a man express such an opinion I want to be a lawyer again and have the privilege of asking him questions. I shall mention some of them. I do not ask these questions of anyone here; they would be more properly addressed to the foreigner, perfectly honorable and well meaning, who has jumped at the conclusion that the principal thing that is done by the Christian missionaries in China is to teach the Bible to Chinese who are looking for free rice; to the poor soul who, ignorant of the satisfaction that a life of unselfish service gives, has thought that the typical missionary comes out here principally for the purpose of getting an easy living. I want to ask him:

What do you really know about the work of the Christian missions in China?

How many of their twenty-four Y. M. C. A. city centers or their twelve Y. W. C. A. centers and eighty-nine student associations; how many of their many schools, academies, colleges and universities, workshops and hospitals, churches and Sunday-schools and other places of activity have you investigated or even visited?

With how many Christian missionaries themselves have you talked seriously about their work? Or with how many Chinese who know about such activities?

Have you read any issue of the China Mission Year Book that tells about them?

Do you know what is being done in the cities of China through homes for boys and homes for girls and otherwise by the Salvation Army, a great and worthy Christian missionary organization?

Do you know even a little about the many fine activities long continued among the very poor of China by the Russian Catholic Church?

Do you know of anything in human form more repulsive than Chinese beggar women, and do you know that it is educated, genteel Christian missionary women who are little by little getting them and their children off the streets, cleaning them and getting them into self-supporting condition?

Do you know what the Christian missionaries are doing among the Chinese peasants to bring a little joy into their gray lives?

Do you know that about eighty per cent. of the Chinese people are farmers, with about sixty million farm holdings, that they are backward in methods; that their position in relation to adequate food supply and articles to be sold in foreign markets is threatened; that about eighty-five per cent. of China's exports are products of the soil, and that Christian mission institutions are doing nearly all that is being done at all for their economic as well as their spiritual and social welfare? Do you know a single thing about the importance of agriculture in the yearly program of the missionary organizations, about soil fertility, plant diseases, seed selection, animal husbandry, as they relate to Christian missionary efforts in China? Do you know of the missionary work in sanitation and health promotion, or in helping to rid China of the awful narcotic curse?

Do you know that there are about 236,000 Chinese children in missionary day schools, not counting the 190,000 in the Roman Catholic schools, and that most of them would have no schooling but for the missionary schools?

Do you know that the Chinese modern system of Education in China began with the work of the Chinese mission teachers, and that modern medicine was mediated to China by the Christian medical missionaries? Do you know that China was devoid of anything resembling modern hospitals and trained nurses until they resulted from missionary effort, and that now there are over three hundred mission hospitals in China, nearly one hundred of which are conducted on approximately modern standards with up-to-date equipment and nursing, and that there are few cities in China having even one such Chinese hospital which is of non-missionary origin?

Do you know that the building up of the nursing profession in China is at the present time almost entirely in the hands of missionaries and of Christianized Chinese?

Do you know that although leprosy has existed in China from time immemorial, and there are now four hundred thousand in China, the first lepers' hospital or asylum was established by a missionary society?

Do you know that there was never in China a hospital or asylum for the insane until one was provided by missionaries?

Do you know the missionary type? Do you know with what respect and confidence the people within the range of the missions have come to regard the missionaries, and that they are advisers and friends to the whole community in all kinds of trouble?

Have you ever looked into the faces of an audience of Christianized Chinese when being addressed by that superb American, John R. Mott?

Have you some better way than the one followed by the Christian missionaries for implanting into the minds of the Chinese masses ideas of right living that will help uplift China?

Have you considered how important a factor moral regeneration is in China's political and industrial development?

Do you know of a single organized activity in China, on a scale of importance, that aims at moral improvement or that is calculated to bring it about, and that is not traceable in its origin to the Christian mission?

I began asking questions about China on all manner of subjects when I first came here. I have been inquiring among all kinds of people, from many parts of China, for such an activity of importance of non-Christian origin without finding one; and the failure to find one has made a deep impression upon me. If anyone in this audience should write me about one I would consider it a favor.

These careless talkers with only a "little learning" about Christian mission work in China go back home and, wishing to seem wise on all things pertaining to China, doubtless express there the same opinion about the ineffectiveness of the Christian missions. I believe it is a common mistake in foreign lands to regard all former residents of China as oracles upon all matters pertaining to China and the Chinese, while in fact, as an example of ignorance, there are hundreds of foreigners in China who are ignorant of the real facts about Christian missions in China as if they had never come to China.

And what has been the result upon this, the Christian religion, of all these centuries of tests? It has grown in power, century after century. It is stronger to-day as a motive force than in any previous century. On its merits, shown by the action of its followers, it is spreading over the earth the doctrine of the brotherhood of man. It thrives on opposition. Since 1900, when it was said that the end of Christian missions and Christianity in China had come, Christianity has spread enormously here. Who would have thought in 1900 that in less than twenty-five years there would be in China several large Christian universities, eagerly attended by thousands of Chinese students, and three hundred Christian hospitals, or that there would be such a large number of other Christian institutions and agencies?

The Christian religion works through many channels. It has many by-products. It accounts, for example, for the millions of dollars sent from America for China famine relief. Most of that huge sum was raised by the efforts of Christian workers in America. The growth, power, influence and by-products of this religion are not to be measured, however, merely by charitable contributions, nor by counting churches or church members, preachers or missionaries, Y. M. C. A.'s or Y. W. C. A.'s, workshops or hospitals, orphanages or old people's homes, homes for homeless boys or homes for homeless girls, Christian colleges or other Christian institutions; yet all these are among its instruments for doing good. Such growth, power and influence can only be truly measured by the increase of the spirit of unselfishness, which is its chief product; and no narrow-minded man, no one who is intellectual and nothing else, can do the measuring and obtain a true result.

My remarks have related principally to the Christian religion. I have come to believe that America's greatest contribution to China, greater even than America's political friendship, is the work of the American Christian missionaries in China. This statement may indicate the importance I attach to the need of moral regeneration in China before there will come great political and industrial improvement.

The College Girl and the Wolf

By William Willard Howard

SEVENTEEN below zero; dry snow blown by a gale from the white silence of Lapland; overhead swirling clouds and roaring wind; underfoot ridges and drifts in the empty streets of a city that once had been a commercial pillar of monarchist Russia; the cold and darkness of five o'clock of a winter morning in the Far North.

From the courtyard of an old wooden building came a slender young woman, bending over, struggling through the drifts, clutching at a railing. As she emerged from the shelter of the courtyard the wind and snow, roaring around a corner, caught at her frayed garments and flung her bodily into a snowdrift.

Weak and dizzy from lack of food, the young woman rose unsteadily, and clinging for protection to the lee of the houses, made her way down the street. Across an open space, where the full fury of the gale pounced upon her, over a bridge, and on down into the narrow, twisting streets of the business district.

In a side street the young woman came upon a building where there were lights and the sound of voices and the rumble of machinery. She pushed open the entrance door and staggered inside half-frozen, gasping, giddy. In the room three women and two men stared at her stolidly.

"It is Vera Trenukhin," said one of the women. "She has left her breakfast at the bedside of her little boy, so that when he wakes he may eat. Is it not the truth, Vera Trenukhin?"

The young woman sank upon a bundle of old newspapers and leaned weakly against the wall.

"What would you?" she said. "Must not the child eat?"

She pulled a crust of black bread from the pocket of her tattered coat and gnawed at it. A fat man attached to a walrus mustache pushed a pile of ink-wet newspapers across a counter.

"Vera Trenukhin!" he shouted. "Ninety-five papers. Go quickly, lest complaint be made."

The walrus-person was the delivery clerk of a small daily newspaper. The place was the delivery room. Back of it, in the press room, an ancient printing press wheezed and clanked and rattled.

The young woman thrust a remnant of the black crust into her pocket, nodded to the three women and two men who, with herself, constituted the delivery force of the primitive publication, picked up the pile of newspapers and pushed out into the cold and darkness and storm.

Down a wide, dark street, where the wind tossed the snow into ridges and drifts, through the arched doorway of a tall, gloomy building, into a cave-dark entrance hall, the young woman battled her way, shivering, panting, coughing. Leaving her bundle of papers in a corner she selected one paper and began the long, weary climb up five flights of stairs, her only guide in the darkness her sense of touch upon baluster and wall. Like a shadow of the night she mounted stair after stair. The ceilings of the building were high; the stairs were long. Up under the roof she left the paper at a closed door, which she found by groping along the wall. She turned swiftly and fled down the stairs, a gliding shadow in the gloom.

Back in the cavernous entrance hall she groped for her bundle of newspapers, found it, and pushed out again into the cold and the snow. The first newspaper of her route had been delivered. She had earned one-seventh of one cent.

Building after building she entered—one in a block, two in a block, one in four blocks. She crossed a quarter of a mile of vacant lots, struggled into the doorway of a tall building and sank down, gasping and shivering, protected for a brief interval from the cold and snow; then up again—three flights, four flights—for the papers must be delivered, lest the walrus man express displeasure, even to the extreme of dismissal.

Hour after hour in the darkness of the winter morning the young woman struggled with her set task, the while growing weaker from lack of food and the physical strain of climbing stairs that seemingly reached from earth to swirling clouds.

Came a faint gray blur which, at nine o'clock, grew slowly into the pallid smudge of light that is the short winter day in latitude 58° north. With the dawn the gale blew itself out, leaving in the air a breathless quiet of stinging cold. Overhead were sullen clouds through which the sun, hanging low in the southern sky, could not penetrate; underfoot were billows and banks of snow.

Women carrying shovels and scrapers and long-handled brush brooms came into the streets to clear footpaths along the sidewalks and passageways for sleighs in the roadways. Many of the women were educated, cultured Russian refugees who had fled from monarchist Russia to escape death at the hands of revolutionists.

An hour after dawn Vera Trenukhin still struggled through the drifts and climbed interminable stairs, but slowly, wearily, with dragging footsteps. The muscles of slim knees and ankles quivered in pain; tendons of tortured feet cried out in protest; still Vera Trenukhin, by force of will, compelled them to drag her tired frame up endless stairs and along far-stretching snow-bound streets.

By ten o'clock Vera Trenukhin came to the end of her physical strength. Knee and foot and ankle refused to function. Muscle and sinew called in vain for the energy that adequate food supplies.

Dimly Vera Trenukhin realized that unless she could deliver the last score of papers she would lose even this meager source of income. The walrus man would be even as a floe of ice out there in the Baltic Sea. She must go forward—or die.

Of her own volition Vera Trenukhin would have sat there in a dark corner and died of cold rather than try to go on; but in the bare, cheerless charity room that she called home was a little boy—a winsome child with corn-silk hair and with eyes that brought back memories of that fine, upstanding colonel of cavalry who had been his father; that gallant gentleman who sleeps under the snow somewhere in the regions where, in the World War, Tsar and Kaiser sent brave men to death. So long as this fair legacy from her dead husband waited in the bare, narrow room for her return Vera Trenukhin must go on.

What matter if knee and foot and ankle refused to function further? They must go on. If they rebel, the brain, the spirit, the soul, must compel them to go on.

Vera Trenukhin leaned against the baluster of a winding stair and sobbed aloud. Far back in the golden past lay the bright days—the happy family life, the titled friends, the joyous years at the foremost women's college in Russia, the graduation with royalty looking on, the smiling colonel of cavalry, the engagement, the wedding with the hosts of friends and lavish gifts, the year of wedded bliss, and then—world war and chaos and death, and, at the last, revolution upon revolution and the collapse of civilization. Followed then the hunger and misery of an existence in Bolshevik Russia, the flight with the child, the final escape at night, on foot, to the doubtful shelter of a border state.

From sheltered ease and care-free affluence this college-bred girl had fallen, through no fault or failure of her own, to a task by means of which, in six hours of stair-climbing in cold and darkness, she could earn the pitiful sum of thirteen cents; yet, leaning against the baluster, Vera Trenukhin wept in physical pain and through fear that she might lose even this beggar's pittance that was her only protection against the wolf that followed always in her footsteps. Vera Trenukhin knew that something akin to heart disease had fastened itself upon her unawares, doubtless through overwork and lack of food, and that some day—

But God never gave motherhood to any living creature that He did not give also the power to fight for her offspring; so Vera Trenukhin, daughter of generations of gentlewomen, faced forward and commanded her overwrought and exhausted muscles to resume their suspended motions. By spiritual force—call it will-power—she compelled knees and feet and ankles to move.

It can be done. Long after muscles and tendons and sinews have lost all power of motion, long after they have died and blended their individual functions into one blinding, stinging pain, they can be kept going by the masterful purpose of the spirit. I know, because I have done it: once in the mountains of Albania; twice in the mountains of Persia.

For an hour Vera Trenukhin dragged herself in and out of houses, up and down countless stairs, through snow-blocked streets, in bitter cold that froze the tears upon her cheeks, until, at eleven o'clock, the interminable task was finished.

Limping in pain, Vera Trenukhin stumbled down the icy steps that led to the dismal cellar that she called home. She clasped in one trembling arm a small parcel of food—a half loaf of black bread, a shred of sausage, a potato, a bit of turnip, a leaf of cabbage—the makings of a bowl of soup for herself and her child. So long as she had that precious packet of food she could close the door against the wolf.

The walls of the cellar oozed moisture; the damp floor showed footprints where the corn-silk boy had run to meet his mother.

Vera Trenukhin unwound the frozen wrappings from her aching feet, stretched her pain-racked form upon a narrow cot, and lay as one dead for three hours. She had earned thirteen cents. She had paid nine cents for food. With the remaining four cents she would buy fuel with which to cook the food.

In the afternoon a refugee in the adjoining cellar brought in the half of an apple for the boy.

"Was it a bad morning, Vera Trenukhin?" she asked.

"The work always is hard, Daria Matushka," answered Vera Trenukhin. "Two hundred flights of stairs; five thousand stair treads."

"Was the heart unruly to-day?"

"Even now it thumps, Daria Matushka. Climbing two-thirds of a mile of stairs is not good for the weak heart. But where did you get so fine an apple?"

"I found it, with other scraps of food, at the back entrance of a house in which lives a rich official of some foreign land. It is a good apple, Vera Trenukhin. The child will be pleased."

"I thank you, Daria Matushka. You have a kind heart. God will reward you: it is beyond my power."

The neighbor, whose own subsistence was salvage from kitchen doors of prosperous natives and wasteful foreigners, had saved for the corn-silk boy the choice morsel of her morning's collection. Only God knows what the poor do for the poor.

Can you imagine a woman who speaks four languages going from kitchen door to kitchen door picking up the unconsidered trifles thrown into the discard by wasteful cooks? I have seen it, many times.

After I finished writing the foregoing lines I went to call upon Vera Trenukhin in the damp and wretched place in which she lives. She met me with a smile and the frank understanding with which one educated human being meets another the world over, no matter what the difference in race. She told me that she was ill; that her heart was giving her trouble.

I came away from Vera Trenukhin feeling that I never should see her again, for the inevitable end must come to her, as it will come to many thousands of others of these fine thoroughbreds who are existing only by the power of the spirit. Vera Trenukhin cannot go on. Flesh and blood cannot endure.

There will come a day when she will return to the corn-silk boy without the little packet of food. If she has not the little packet of food she cannot close the door against the wolf. Then one day the wolf will—go in.

It is for gentlewomen worse off than Vera Trenukhin that I ask for a working fund with which to give employment to those members of the nobility, landed gentry and intelligentsia who fled from their ancestral lands and homes in monarchist Russia to escape death at the hands of revolutionists and now are existing in a condition of unutterable poverty and distress in the countries bordering on Bolshevik Russia.

You who read this may think that no one could be worse off than Vera Trenukhin, with the certainty of physical exhaustion and death ever before her, but there are many thousands of educated, cultured gentlewomen worse off, because they have not employment enough to yield even thirteen cents a day.

I cannot give employment to Vera Trenukhin because the needlework relief industry that Anne Louise Howard and I have put into operation in a far outpost of Eastern Europe is intended exclusively for gentlewoman who do not have work of any kind. Vera Trenukhin has employment—such as it is.

Working with our private means, Anne Louise Howard and I are giving employment to two hundred gentlewomen. But there are many others, worse off than Vera Trenukhin, who beg for a share in the employment. It is for these despairing women that I ask contributions to an increased working fund.

Subscriptions should be sent to the Russia Refugee Fund, care THE CHRISTIAN WORK, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

A forty-page booklet giving photo-engravings of twenty-five styles of hand-embroidered, hand-sewn Russian Princess Blouses made by the two hundred gentlewomen now at work in the relief industry is ready for mailing. A copy will be sent, postage prepaid, to any address for the asking.

Lord Robert Cecil on International Co-operation—II.

[NOTE.—No visitor from foreign shores for many years has received a more enthusiastic reception than the great English statesman, Lord Robert Cecil. He has come to America upon the invitation of the Foreign Policy Association to speak upon the movements in Europe making for international good-will, and particularly upon the League of Nations. He has already made several addresses in America, but perhaps the most outstanding one is the first address made before a great assembly in New York on the evening of April 2. This address was broadcast into eight hundred thousand homes and was reported in full by several of the great metropolitan dailies. It is so full of information and suggestion and is so irenic and conciliatory in its tone, that it has attracted universal attention. It deserves the careful reading of every American who believes that this country has international obligations. Lord Robert is one of the statesmen who always looks at every problem from a world viewpoint. We felt sure that the readers of THE CHRISTIAN WORK would want to see this notable utterance. We are therefore printing it in three instalments.—THE EDITORS.]

LEAGUE OF NATIONS

"LADIES and gentlemen, the central idea of the League of Nations, as I understand it, is a system of international conferences and co-operation, not depending on coercion, without coercion, without force, without any interference with the sovereignty or full independence and freedom of action of any of its members, working not for any selfish interests, but for the establishment of better and more brotherly relations between the nations, and for the establishment of peace upon the earth. That is the idea of the League.

"I believe myself that in its broad lines, the covenant, that much criticized document, carries out that idea. But I am not bigoted about it nor is any other intelligent advocate of the League. We don't say that the covenant is perfect or was inspired from heaven. We are prepared, all of us, to support amendments if amendments are necessary.

"I myself believe that the theory that the League of Nations as established by the covenant could be used as in degree a super-State is a figment of heated imagination. But if I am wrong and if it can be pointed out that there is any article in the covenant which is justly open to such a charge, for what my assistance is worth I tender it in support of any amendment that may be necessary to put it right.

"But I do beg those who criticize the League not to rest on a priori considerations, particularly if those a priori considerations are founded upon an imperfect knowledge of the text of the covenant. Let them not only read the covenant, but let them, I beg them, study the workings, the actual workings, of the League. I assert that the League has already done much for the betterment of mankind. I assert that through its means hundreds and thousands of prisoners of war have been rescued from hardship and starvation. I assert that effective measures have been taken to prevent the spread of epidemics over Europe from the oppressed and miserable districts of Eastern Russia.

"I assert that more has been done in the three years since the League of Nations came into existence for putting an end to that terrible evil, the trade in noxious drugs, than has been done for fifty years before the League of Nations came into being, and I assert that with almost equal speed conventions have been agreed on through the instrumentality of the League which will really, I hope, put a spoke in the wheel of those devilish beings who carry on the white slave traffic.

"I assert that the League has been the means of settling several grave international disputes. I assert that in settling those disputes the League has shown a high impartiality, not hesitating to decide if justice was required in favor of the weaker than the stronger of the disputants. I assert that the League's recommendations—and remember that the League only proceeds by recommendations, never by force—its decisions on the people concerned—but I assert that those recommendations have been accepted in almost every case.

"Why, ladies and gentlemen, let me give you one instance well known. A small country, but very striking—I refer to the case of Albania.

CASE OF ALBANIA

"What happened? Here was a country, a little country, about a million inhabitants just brought into existence, recognized by the League for the first time, struggling into statehood. It comes to the League. It asks for protection against a much larger neighbor. The League finds the larger neighbor has actually invaded Albania with its troops, that its troops are moving forward. The Council is unmoved. The neighbor is warned what it must not do; it must not oppress, it must not go to war until whatever grievances it has have been considered in a peaceful way, and the neighbor withdraws instantly all its troops, withdraws them without doing any harm to the country, withdraws them with so little soreness, so little of that terrible feeling which so often results in international decisions by other means, leaving an open sore afterward to break out and cause irreparable damage.

"So little of the soreness exists in this case that the two nations immediately afterward entered into a treaty of amity and commerce. And I myself heard the Foreign Minister of the invading state, speaking at the tribunal of the Assembly of the League, declare that the relations between the two countries were now excellent and friendly and attribute that happy result to the mediation and influence of the League.

"Now, ladies and gentlemen, it is all very well to say that Albania is a tiny country; it is all very well to say that what can be done in a small country cannot necessarily be done in a large one, but I reply that it shows that the line we are on is the right line; that the machinery devised is not unsuitable for the purpose; that we have got a good machine, and the only thing that we want is sufficient motive power in that machine to make it able to accomplish all its tasks, however great. Well, ladies and gentlemen, there are many other things the League has done.

"You have heard quite recently of its great work in establishing a Permanent Court of International Justice, fenced round with every precaution for independence and impartiality. You have heard how it has done much to rescue Austria from a condition of economic despair. Of course, there is the work it has done in the direction of the reduction of armaments, work necessarily incomplete at present, but far more promising than anything that has ever been done before. Ladies and gentlemen, I have taken disarmament as my chief subject this evening, as the chief example of international work, which I desired to bring before you. I have taken it because the work of the League toward disarmament is to my mind characteristic of the spirit of the League.

"A well-known Englishman once said that force was no remedy. Ladies and gentlemen, that is abundantly true. As our English proverb has it, you can bring a horse to water, but you cannot make him drink. You can do much by force, but when it comes to constructive reform and reconstruction, force is of the very least possible value. You have only got to see—I won't dwell on it—you have only got to compare the comparative impotence of the Supreme Council, which rests on force, with the prolific efforts of the League during the same period, which rests on persuasion.

RELIES ON PUBLIC OPINION

"For the League rests on persuasion, and not on force; it relies on public opinions as its great agent. The best men and women in the world to-day, whether they are treated as aggregates of nations or in their individual capacity, though they may do wrong, desire what is right. And, therefore, if you can concentrate on the affairs of the world, the instructed public opinion of the men and women in the world, you have got the greatest agency for improvement that is available among human affairs.

"Well, ladies and gentlemen, that is the broad case on principle that I put to you for my views; and you may say, well, that is all very fine, but what do you want, what have you come to America for? Has not America already done quite enough for Europe? Ladies and gentlemen, I recognize most fully all that America has done for Europe. I tried in my opening observations to express something of the gratitude we in Europe feel for her assistance and for her sacrifices in the late war. I do not come, as far as I am concerned, to ask for a single dollar or a single man.

"If you will allow me to say so, I am not come as a suppliant to America. I came here to tell you what I know of the action and the objects of the League and to hear from you, as I hope I shall hear, criticisms and suggestions, not made in a merely carping spirit, but constructed with a desire to advance the great cause in which I firmly believe the American people have as much at heart as any people in the world.

"I do not venture to ask you to do anything, but I will ask you one or two questions. I have no complaint or criticism at all—very much the reverse—for what America has done for Europe. But has she done—I only ask it—has she done enough for herself? She desires to avoid—no one can complain of it—entanglements in the affairs of Europe. She wishes to keep herself free from the wickedness and perversity, so I am told, of the whole world, ladies and gentlemen.

"But can she be freed? Is it possible for her to carry out that policy? Why, ladies and gentlemen, in 1917 the people of America, I am sure, desired peace as much as any people in the world, as much as we English desired it ourselves. And yet, as I am informed by an almost unanimous national decision, she decided that it was essential for her to go into the war. It was essential, she thought, on that occasion. Suppose there is another World War, involving, as all world wars must involve, great questions of right and wrong. Are you sure that America won't feel herself forced, as she did in 1917, again to enter that war? Is there any one here who will tell me that the decision of 1917 was wrong? I do not believe it.

"And if it wasn't wrong then, can they be certain that they will not be forced to an equally right decision in a future world war? But if that were so, is it not intensely desirable that there should be no world war, even from the point of view of American interests? Is it really true that she can afford to stand aside, and allow any kind of a disaster to happen in Europe, and kind of war to begin there, hoping, gambling on the chance that it won't so far extend as to compel her, be it by her moral or her material interests, to take her part in that war? I ask you the question. It is for you to decide, and if you say yes, there should be some safeguard against future war.

SAFEGUARD AGAINST WAR

"Then I do earnestly ask you, not to tell me but to tell yourselves, to think what that safeguard should be; whether there is some better safeguard than we poor fifty-two nations have devised for ourselves; and, if so, what are the alternations, what are the changes, what are the modifications that you think are essential in order to make a satisfactory protection and safeguard against this overflowing evil? For when war begins no one can limit its extent. That is the truth which history teaches, and which all intelligent men and women should recognize.

"Well, ladies and gentlemen, I put to you those questions. In any case, we in Europe must go on; we cannot draw back from this great experiment. We are bound by every consideration of prudence and honor to pursue it to the end. Prudence, because we see no other hopeful means to preserve our civilization; honor, because we who remain solemnly pledged ourselves to those who died that we would make it our first object to prevent a recurrence of the calamity that overwhelmed them.

"Surely you will forgive me if I say that 'the world will little know or remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did. It is for us, the living, rather to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought have so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us, fought for by those honored dead, with increased devotion to that cause to which they gave the last full measure of devotion, and that we highly resolve that these dead have not died in vain.'"

A Rare Opportunity to Serve the Under-Privileged

By Rev. D. N. Furnajieff

Pastor of the Evangelical Church in Sofia.

ONE of the few countries not appealing for American generosity to-day for relief is Bulgaria. Though a rather poor country, the thrifty habits of its sturdy population have wonderfully preserved its health, its hopes and its manhood.

American missionaries have been carrying on work there the last sixty years with very gratifying results. About seventy churches and communities have sprung up therefrom, all courageous, busy and hopeful of making their influence strongly felt by the nation for evangelical Christianity.

There are to-day two American collegiate schools for women and one collegiate theological school for young men, whose educational value and moral training are highly valued by the people and government of Bulgaria. Here is an illustration:

Recently we decided to move the two American schools in Samokov to Sofia in order to afford them better opportunities to serve the nation. For this purpose the government offered us a large plot of land, on a splendid elevation suburban to Sofia, free of charge, on the only condition that we begin building within three years from the date the National Assembly voted this donation. Later on the government voted to give us the timber free of charge and the entire services of ten men from the army of compulsory labor. What is the secret of this? Surely the influence of the schools themselves.

The Rev. L. F. Ostrander, a missionary, writes: "Americans are interested in Bulgaria and her future, because of the character and achievements of her people. . . . The Bulgars are the most democratic and tolerant people of the Balkans. Their development in recent years has been wonderful, and in the matter of literacy they hold the first place among all the nations of Eastern and Southeastern Europe. Much of this she owes to the influence of Robert College and the other American schools within her borders." For these we tender our gratitude to the American people.

It is a remarkable fact that thus far neither Greece nor Serbia nor Rumania have permitted American schools on their soil, while Bulgaria welcomes and appreciates them. Is this not a proof that Bulgaria is a liberal, magnanimous and progressive country? Freedom of speech and religious propaganda are accorded equally to natives and foreigners. There is no greater liberty anywhere else in Europe. This liberty bears good results for the entire population. In connection with the First Evangelical Church in Sofia there was organized several years ago a Young People's Christian Society, and its membership represents all the religious communions and various nationalities in the city. The society has done commendable work.

Under these conditions, if the Church could offer its younger generation adequate facilities for community service, for vigorous manhood and womanhood, we could see unprecedented and amazing results. Happily, the Church has decided to commence community work, particularly among and through the younger generation. Plans are made and a subscription opened for putting up a community house to be known as the Young People's Home. Its object is to offer facilities for young people's Bible classes, service clubs, mothers' clubs, fathers' clubs, citizenship club, international club, library, reading room, music room, games and play rooms, gymnasium for indoor and winter athletics and exercises, top-floor dormitory for the benefit of innocent youths away from home influences, and a large auditorium for lectures, concerts and entertainments. Big auditoriums in Sofia are scarce and expensive. When we have been visited by Drs. Mott, Eddy and Wilder, speaking for the World Student Christian Federation; by Fred B. Smith, speaking for International Friendship and Peace, and by other world-known men, we have had no small difficulties to find suitable halls for their speeches, and often had to pay high rents. A building of this type cannot fail to promote health and happiness, concord and pure Christian social life, and a real democratic atmosphere as an offset to cares, drudgery and ignorance. It will furnish amusements amid morally uplifting surroundings; it will draw together people of different races, languages, social positions and religious convictions; it will help to unify in one common endeavor the quick and the phlegmatic, the rationalistic and the mystical, thus creating of them all one actual brotherhood in the very center of the Balkans, Sofia, and all of that under the spirit and power of the Man of Galilee.

This will be the first and the only structure of its kind in the Balkans so far; and this is giving an opportunity to and serving the underprivileged. Balkan conditions must change, but we must first enlighten, ennoble and free the Balkan peoples from their prejudices, race hatred, selfishness and the chains of sin before we can see real democracy, peace and brotherhood realized there. It is the duty of all who believe that the principles of Christianity are the only logical solution of national and international difficulties and conditions to spread the knowledge and influence of Christianity if we would see the Prince of Peace ruling and blessing mankind.

The First Evangelical Church in Sofia has a lot and a sum of 135,000 levs raised among its members already. The ladies are now working to fit up the mothers' club room, the choir is working to get a piano, the children of the church orphanage are lively workers for bathing facilities and possibly a swimming pool, etc.

In spite of all this, a sum of $50,000 is needed for this object.

Isn't the object noble?

Can you help us? God bless you.

[A committee of sixteen prominent American citizens is backing up this plan for a Cosmopolitan Community House in Sofia, of which committee the Rev. Nehemiah Boynton, D.D., is the chairman, and the Rev. Frederick Lynch, D.D., is the secretary, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York.]

ONE BOOK A WEEK

Under this caption, each week, we shall direct attention to some striking book, such as no Minister or those interested in religious thought and action can afford to remain unacquainted with

Man and the Attainment of Immortality*

PROFESSOR SIMPSON is a very able successor to Henry Drummond in the chair of Natural Science in the Free Church Theological School at Edinburgh. "Man and the Attainment of Immortality" came out in Great Britain in December of last year. In the next three months three thousand copies of it were sold. That is an extraordinary circulation for a serious book. The book itself is the explanation of its circulation.

As the basis of his argument, Professor Simpson traces the history of man from the inorganic to Christ. Simply as a résumé of the knowledge which we have acquired within the twentieth century, Professor Simpson's book is valuable to the layman in science. Piltown, Neanderthal, Rhodesian man, all these terms are familiar by now to most of us, but their relation to each other and to us in our minds is blurred and the average layman has small idea of the culture of Palaeolithic, Mesolithic and Neolithic man. For the clearer understanding of man's possibilities it is good to have in mind the course by which he has come. It is well to look back on the pit from which he was digged.

Professor Simpson traces the evolution of individuality. The inorganic substance can be divided and each part of it still has the properties of the whole. In the first organic life the cell divides and divides and divides again, and each cell has all that the other cells have. Even after special functions are connected with special cells, as with the worms, still the organism can be divided and grow a complete organism from each part. Even with the higher mammals there is not the self-consciousness which is necessary for real individuality; and in man we are all connected by the very process of birth and generation. But personality as it develops is more and more a complete unit, indivisible, that is, "individual." In the first electron God is exerting His energy. Creation is the expression of love. Love must have some object toward which it can flow. Because God is love, He must have beings whom He can love. As there is a critical step from the inorganic to the organic in the archeozoic seas, as there is another critical step from the cell which performs every function to the special cell, and again a critical step from passivity to motion, as there is another step from the unself-conscious animal to the self-conscious man, so why should there not be a step from an existence which terminates with the dissolution of the physical body to an existence which is independent of the physical body?

Man, Professor Simpson believes, is immortable; that is, he may become immortal. He believes that what Jesus said, "If any man will save his life, he shall lose it; if any man will lose his life, he shall save it," is genuinely true; that he who is interested only in himself, whose life is centered on that self, cannot continue; but that he whose life is like the life of God, a selfless life, a life that is love, thereby becomes a possessor of "eternal life." There is much in the New Testament to indicate that Jesus and the disciples and Paul took the same ground. The best critical study would indicate that wherever Jesus referred to Gehenna, He referred actually to the place of destruction in the Valley of Hinnon. Paul's theory of the future and of death is not always self-consistent. Some things which he said suggest that he accepted the current Jewish ideas, but the general trend of his thinking is that those who live a life of love, a life of the Cross, share in the Resurrection, but those who do not do so have no part in it.

For those of us whose thinking runs on the lines of science, Professor Simpson has done a great service in bringing immortality within the bounds of reason. They may not be convinced of his argument, but he makes immortality scientifically respectable.

Don't Bryanize Assembly

Plea of a Presbyterian Layman Who Depreciates Heresy Hunting

[From the New York Times.]

ONE of the morning papers reports that there is a movement organized to elect William J. Bryan Moderator of the Presbyterian General Assembly, to meet in May at Indianapolis.

The report is disturbing in that it includes the statement that the purpose is to so elect him in order to further the anti-Fosdick aims of the heresy hunters of that denomination. No Presbyterian elder can afford to let himself be used in such a way.

Mr. Bryan as a man and a Presbyterian has a fine record of sincere Christian service. As a politician he has been forgotten and forgiven; as a theologian he is—what the reader pleases. But if he runs for Moderator as a theological or ecclesiastical politician to grind a particular axe, then he is a danger, and steps should be taken against his candidacy.

I have the most sincere respect for Mr. Bryan's belief in and championship of Holy Scripture—I presented him, during the great Men and Religion Movement, years ago, to an open-air crowd in Union Square and marveled at the ease with which his magnificent voice reached and held the dense throng that reached to the very walls of the buildings on Seventeenth Street. But with his narrow theology I have no patience.

What is this controversy into the attempted "steam-roller settlement" of which he is to be thrust?

Concisely, it is this: The "Old First," at Eleventh Street and Fifth Avenue, is the historic mother of Presbyterian churches in New York. George Alexander, D.D., the "Bishop" of the Presbytery, and formerly and for many years the loved and revered pastor of the University Place church, which, together with the Madison Square church, was consolidated with the "Old First," is the pastor of the combined parish. His denominational loyalty and deep spirituality are universally known and acknowledged.

Dr. Fosdick was never called to the pastorate of the church, nor installed therein. The Church Session employs him to preach. The idea is that that church may properly be emphasized as a source of preaching the Gospel, and throngs attend the services and hear the Gospel message. He was known to be a Baptist all along. He is still. It is amusingly significant that it is reported that at one time, not many years ago, the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, a stronghold of conservatism, called him to its pastorate.

The point is that the General Assembly has no jurisdiction over Dr. Fosdick. If he sustained a pastoral relation to the "Old First," then it would have appellate jurisdiction to review, in due course, any action by the Presbytery of New York, which alone has original jurisdiction, subject to complaint or appeal, through the Synod, to the General Assembly.

In Chapter XIV of the Form of Government the Assembly is given power to reprove, warn or bear testimony "against error in doctrine . . . in any church, presbytery or synod," which section ends, however, with the words, "the promotion of charity, truth and holiness through all the churches."

Let us assume that the Assembly was ultimately to deal with the Fosdick matter under the section of the Book of Discipline, No. LXXVI. What could be done?

"Junctures may sometimes neglect to perform their duty, by which neglect heretical opinion . . . may be allowed to gain ground." The Assembly would first have to be "well advised of such neglect" on the part of the inferior judicatory.

It has power to require its records to be produced and "shall either proceed to examine and decide the whole matter, as completely as if proper record had been made, or it shall cite the lower judicatory and proceed" as in Section LXXV, which provides for citation and production of the records below.

The mistake the heresy hunters are making is that they assume the habitual dissemination of heresy by the object of their attacks, and the approval thereof by the Presbytery, while they rely on isolated statements (apart from the context of the whole) said to have been uttered in the series of sermons which fairness requires in any judgment of a man's attitude as a Christian minister should be taken together and as a whole.

I hold no brief; I did not hear the sermons; I have read the attacks, and as a loyal and orthodox layman of the church, who has labored long and hard in its interests, I protest against this stirring up of strife. Nothing can so easily destroy all the efforts toward church unity that have been culminating in bringing about a World Conference on Faith and Order as this misguided activity of the "Three P" Presbyterians (Pittsburgh, Philadelphia and Princeton).

They were largely influential in administering a "cup of cold water" in the name of Defenders of the Faith by dashing it in the face of the Plan of Organic Union agreed to by the Council on Organic Union. They are as much the foes of organic union and the peace of the whole Christian Church as are the still obstinate Episcopalians who would make apostolic-succession-ordination the sine qua non of any plan of union of the evangelical churches.

The General Assembly as a great church council is sure to act under the guidance of the head of the Church; but the Presbyterians have a singular ecclesiastical phrase, "providential and satisfactory," which warrants the additional remark that it is a great democratic assemblage and capable in that very human aspect of being stampeded into temporary error.

Therefore, it is imperative that those in the Church who do not wish to see the days of the Briggs trial revived take notice of this movement to Bryanize the Assembly, with all that implies.

The Presbytery and its parishes are at peace. The pastor of the citadel of orthodoxy is a director of Union Seminary. The "Old First" is drawing within reach of the Gospel message tens of thousands who might otherwise never go to church. Shall jealousy or inquisitorial zeal be allowed successfully to masquerade as James I did and embroil the ecclesiastics and the church workers in a fratricidal controversy? God forbid!

David, the Poet King

I SAMUEL 16:1-13.

"Surely goodness and loving kindness shall follow me all the days of my life."—Psalms 23:6.

THE Hebrews made poor success of the monarchical type of government. The history of their attempts at a kingdom seems to support Samuel's declaration that their demand for a king was a rejection of Jehovah, who had been their leader in the theocracy. Saul, who looked every inch a king, and who came to his coronation full of promise, failed. Solomon, though having a reign of great splendor, left a disintegrating kingdom. And the whole subsequent history of the northern and southern kingdoms is pathetic till the day they were carried away into captivity and their glory forever departed.

David is the one outstanding exception in this story of failure. He had kingly qualities that made for success. He is said to have received a realm of six thousand miles and to have left to his successor one of sixty thousand square miles. He has left a name that will ever remain great.

In David we have an illustration of how God often prepares men for great tasks in ways that we would not have chosen. Who would have supposed that the barefoot rail-splitter would ever have been President of the United States? Who would have selected the shepherd boy, whose life had been largely spent in the open, as Israel's king? That is not the way that kings are usually made. Even Samuel, who had unusual spiritual discernment, did not recognize in this ruddy youth the kingly type. How true it is that God does not choose as men choose, for men look on the outward appearance, but God looks on the heart. To the ordinary observer, Saul would have seemed of much more kingly caliber than David. But David possessed qualities of mind and heart in unusual combination that made his reign a success and have made his name illustrious. Even his preparation, which seems so unusual, gave him opportunity to develop certain qualities of character that contributed to his success. It gave him a sense of God's presence and power that could scarcely have been gotten in any other way. One who had not lived in the open could never have written the Nineteenth Psalm with its sense of the glory of God. The shepherd's life also made him brave. To protect the sheep he took courage and developed strength. When he came to his contest with Goliath, which brought him into the public eye, he was ready for it in courage and skill and faith by the very shepherd life he had lived.

The fine patience which he exhibited in waiting God's time reveals an unusual quality of soul. Even after he had been anointed by Samuel it was a long and rough path by which he came to the throne. Often young men cannot wait God's time. When once they have caught a vision they want to cut cross-lots to its realization. David had been given the promise of the kingdom, but so long as Saul was wearing the crown he did not chafe under the delay. He had such fine respect for the Lord's anointed that he would not lift his hand against Saul when he was within his power. It is not often that we find such a spirit as David exhibited when he spared Saul who was hunting him down like a dog and had more than once tried to take his life with his own hand. It was a brilliant example of a supreme trust in God's plans.

David had a genius for friendship which is always an element of success in one in a public place. To be able to make and hold friends is the sign of a large soul. There are few stories in all history that reveal such a strong and beautiful friendship as that between David and Jonathan. True it is that the larger credit seems to belong to Jonathan in this unusual attachment, for he was seemingly working directly against his own interest in helping preserve David's life, who was to succeed to the throne in his place. But if the larger credit is Jonathan's, it is evident that the secret of that friendship was in the soul of David. He had the quality of soul that knit others to him.

The genuineness of his love is seen in his lament at the death of Saul and Jonathan. It is a beautiful testimony to the life of his friend and a sincere lamentation over his death. "Saul and Jonathan were lovely and pleasant in their lives, and in their death they were not divided. I am distressed for thee, my brother Jonathan: very pleasant hast thou been unto me: thy love to me was wonderful, passing the love of women. How are the mighty fallen!"

That his friendship was sincere is witnessed by David's kindness to the crippled Mephibosheth, whom he took into his family and treated as his own son because he was of the house of Saul and David loved him for Jonathan's sake.

Genius is often revealed by the men with whom a great man surrounds himself. If one has organizing ability and can choose and hold strong counselors his success is assured. Washington had such a genius and the men with whom he surrounded himself in his cabinet made his administration, as first President of a new republic, secure. David showed this same genius. He kept the counselors and military leaders who had been Saul's support and added others to them in a way that revealed his knowledge of human nature and the tact of a shrewd politician.

David's character was ripened by sorrow. How often do men come to their best by some path that leads through darkness! The death of a favorite child softened him, and toward the close of his life the rebellion of Absalom all but crushed him. Absalom was a spoiled child. His beauty and popularity had turned his head, but he was David's son and how the father-heart of the king went out to him when he was killed in battle! There is a pathos almost beyond anything we have in literature in David's mourning for him: "O my son Absalom, my son, my son Absalom! would God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son!"

The one blot on the story of this great life is his sad fall in the day of his high power. It was a fall that involved—

two of the foulest of sins and betrayed one who had been a loyal subject and brave soldier. Sometimes we are almost glad when we find the evidences of human weakness in these great souls whom we are apt to picture as without faults. It gives us a kind of comfort to know that such men as Joseph and David and John and Paul had their failings. If it had not been for this fall of David's we would not have had the Fifty-first Psalm which stands unique in all penitential literature. Indeed, when the question is asked, how David could be called a man after God's own heart with this foul blot on his career, the answer is found in the Fifty-first Psalm. God loves a soul that, having sinned, can repent with such passion as is revealed in this wonderful psalm.

The thing that has made David's name so great and will keep its glory undimmed for all time is the literary genius that he combined with religious passion. We might forget the splendor of his reign as a king, but, so long as men worship God, they will not forget the psalms in which he has voiced for all men, in all times, the aspirations of the human soul. We do not know how many of the psalms he wrote, surely not all of them and probably not as many as was once supposed. But we are sure from evidence both internal and external that he wrote many of those which most deeply reveal the longings of the human soul for God. No voice has spoken in all the ages, except that voice that spoke as never man spoke, which has been so widely heard and to whose messages men everywhere have found themselves in accord. Probably the best known gem in Christendom is the Twenty-third Psalm.

How rare it is to find a great king, with the tact of a practical politician and the ability of a military leader, possessing the passion of the seer and the literary genius of the poet! Like the instruments of an orchestra, some delicate and some strong, which blend to give us the exquisite symphony, so this poet-king possessed those qualities of strength and beauty that blended to make a character and career unapproached in Old Testament history and literature.

"THE NORTH CHURCH"

The North Presbyterian Church, of Pittsburgh, which celebrated its sixtieth anniversary last week, is probably the only church with such a name where the reference is not to local geography. The North Church was founded as an offshoot of the Central Church in the dark days of the Civil War. It took its name because of the intense Northern sympathies of its charter members.

Just after the war a large number of American-born sailors came to the New York Sailors' Home and Institute on West street. But the number has gone down considerably now. Most of the men who have come this winter have been British and naturalized Americans. But there is no falling off in the number of sailors who want accommodations. In the six months of the winter season there were only three vacant rooms in the home. Frequently the rooms had to be used twice a day by men of different shifts. If one wants to believe in prohibition, let him talk with the superintendent of a sailors' home!

DR. FOSDICK ON UNITARIANISM

EDITOR CHRISTIAN WORK:

May I request the Christian courtesy of permission to correct in your columns a serious misrepresentation of Unitarianism made by Dr. Fosdick (of course, without intention) in his, on the whole, most excellent and satisfactory sermon on "The Divinity of Christ," published in your issue of April 7. He represents Unitarians as not believing in the incarnation of God in Christ, and not believing in the divinity of Christ. This is wrong. Every representative Unitarian to-day believes deeply in both. What we do not believe in is that the incarnation of God is limited—is confined to a single person, Jesus, in the world's humanity—or that divinity is thus limited. Dr. Fosdick seems to think that Unitarians are Arians. But no Unitarians to-day are Arians, as all our literature and all our preaching shows. He says: "Sometimes in a Unitarian church we will hear the minister say, 'We want Jesus for our ideal; we want to imitate him and try to be like him. But if he is the incarnation of God, that separates him utterly from us.'" No! I do not think anybody ever hears Unitarian ministers say that. What they do say is that if Jesus is the sole, the only, incarnation of God, or if the incarnation of God in Him is not the same in kind as in us, then that separates him utterly from us. But we all deny (as Dr. Fosdick himself does, and as the New Testament repeatedly does) that Jesus is God's only incarnation, or an incarnation different in kind (we believe it different only in degree) from his incarnation in us all. All Unitarians believe earnestly that God was incarnated in Jesus, but we also believe just as earnestly that he is incarnate in all humanity and that all humanity is divine. Indeed, if there is any doctrine that we preach more than any other I think I may safely say it is the divinity or divineness of humanity. In thus preaching, of course, we say just what Dr. Fosdick does—that Jesus draws no line separating himself from humanity, that he classes himself with humanity, making his own relation to God the same as that of other men. And in support of this claim, of course, we quote exactly the same passages of Scripture that Dr. Fosdick quotes, namely, those that call all men "sons of God" and "children of God"; those which declare others as well as Christ "partakers of the divine nature"; those which say, "beloved now are we the sons of God," and "everyone that loveth is begotten of God"; those in which Jesus himself calls God "our Father" (not his alone), and in which he says, "My Father and your Father, my God and your God," "Even as thou Father, art in me, and I in Thee, that they also may be one in us."

I trust, Mr. Editor, that you will be glad to give to your readers this correction of a misunderstanding which has inadvertently appeared in your columns of the religious faith of a sister Christian church.

REPORT ON THE FUND FOR THE RAILWAY SHOPMEN

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN WORK:

I feel that I owe it to your paper and to those who through you have contributed (and are contributing) to the Railway Shopmen's Relief and Defense Fund to make a brief statement at this time. Total contributions so far have amounted to $7,724.75. In addition, Liberty bonds amounting to $23,000 have been loaned to the committee for use as collateral in securing bail in a few of the many cases of alleged violations of the law by shopmen.

Though the need is far beyond that amount, a great deal of good has been done and letters of almost heart-rending gratitude are coming in, together with new appeals. The prolonged struggle of the shopmen has resulted in exhaustion of funds, mortgage of homes, debt and hunger, sufficient to break the courage of the strongest. Personally I have never seen greater fortitude nor a finer spirit than these men and their families have displayed. Many of them state that even the small relief afforded by this fund has strengthened the morale of the men in many places.

An official of the machinists in Denver writes: "In behalf of the dear little children and these loyal men and women please accept our heartfelt thanks. Words are not adequate to describe how truly grateful we are to you and the kind friends who have responded to your appeal."

A minister writes from Texas: "I have worked with and for the men and cause since the inception of the strike as pastor of some 450 members who are directly affected by these conditions. The men are putting up a noble fight, and I do not believe they will be starved into submission, with the tide of the public turning in their favor again."

The following is from a letter of one of the shopmen: "I have a crippled wife and seven children. I have lost $1,600 in this strike, but I think it will come out all O.K. yet. Please help us out when you can, for we need the money and we need it bad. But I am going to see this thing through."

The following from New Haven, Connecticut, is typical of some of the appeals:

BIBLE HEALING

and "Greater Works Than These"

Within the Church

JESUS CHRIST, the redeemer of human life in every phase when properly apprehended, came that we might have it abundantly! Are we having it? That's an important question. It's the important question. If we are not having it, how can we get it? The answer to this, surely, is the most vital thing in the world. But the very source of all life is God. Therefore, if we realize God, in ourselves, we rise to full, free, conquering, victorious, satisfactory, abundant life. Ah, yes, but—

There's the rub; making the contact! Really, isn't life's hardest problem just the making of the contact—between God and my own life? Making my life—spark! Dead coals—ashes, fizzle, inefficiency—failure! Defeated lives! Isn't this the recurring biography? Isn't it the monotonous raven-croak of "nevermore," when all the time we are craving vim, vigor, vitality—vivacity, virility, verve. Yes—we don't spark. How well we know it. The engine is dead. Who will show us how to contact?

THAT'S Just What Bible Healing Does

It's the secret that Jesus used—and so he laid extraordinary emphasis upon it for us. The works that I do shall ye do. If ye love me keep my commandments. Without me ye can do nothing. You can't spark. "But if ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you." Bible Healing is the abiding in Christ. It shows you the open door. It says, "This is the way, walk ye in it"—up to the shining portal—up to a dominant life! Do you want it?

DR. BENSON HAS FOUND THIS DOMINANT LIFE

He wants others to have it. He yearns to help you have it. He, too, knew defeat—for years. He is a young man—almost a boy, late thirties. But he has found a great secret. The pearl of great price, and because it IS REALITY the world in a few months time has heard that he has found it. The treasure of Tut-ankh-amen's tomb in Egypt does not compare with it. Even the Egyptian Gazette, immediately after Benson's launching of Bible Healing, published the matter. News cables were busy. Japan and Korea have several Bible Healing organizations already. Truth flies on the wings of the morning to the uttermost parts of the earth. It does look as if the Bible Healing movement might do in the church what countless millions of lives need, both in the church and out of it. Jesus said, "Preach the Kingdom, heal the sick." We are doing it, broadcast.

The cause needs help—and it is getting help.

Already a friend has provided the funds to open up a modest headquarters. A magazine is soon to be published. You are to be taken into confidence in every move. Will you procure and send contributions? Think of the names who have sponsored the launching—Jowett and Jefferson, Meyer and Norwood, Keigwin, Young and Cadman, and a dozen others just as noted—and as trusted. Ultimately we are going to have a whole building all our own, and it will stand as "a house by the side of the road, and be a friend to man." This is the church's prerogative. The big men of the world are lining up for it. God is in this thing, and it cannot but progress triumphantly. New York Presbytery's Committee on Bible Healing will be a wonderful help. We are at your service—conducting healing missions all the time. Command us. God is proving daily that His hand is not shortened, and that "We have about fifty families that live in houses owned by the company, and the officials are making a special drive on these men. In the event that they are behind in their rent they will be put on the sidewalks. It looks very bad for them at the present time. Many are also behind in their grocery bills. We are having to put them all off from day to day in the hope that something will happen whereby we can get over the situation without any serious results to our cause."

A responsible committee has charge of the distribution of this fund, with headquarters in the Machinists' Temple, Philadelphia. The committee is co-operating with the Railway Employees' Department of the American Federation of Labor. The secretary of the committee is a representative of the machinists, Mr. Clinton S. Golden, Machinists' Temple, 1239 Spring Garden street, Philadelphia. The treasurer is Miss Dora Olive at the same address.

My own work in this matter is being done as chairman of the Committee on Labor of the Church League for Industrial Democracy.

At present the fund is entirely exhausted and contributions, however small, will be deeply appreciated and of real help.

BUDDHIST PRIESTS SELL CHARMS AGAINST CONSCRIPTION

It is a fact that young men no longer consider it an honor to be drafted into the army in Japan, and it is known that countless devices are resorted to to escape service. Buddhist priests have been arrested for selling charms supposed to give exemption against conscription.

The peace movement itself is a definitely growing factor in the national life of Japan. Its leaders are men of wide influence who have sacrificed power and position to work for peace and world understanding. In the front rank is Mr. Ozaki, formerly Minister of Education, Minister of Justice and Mayor of Tokyo. Another is D. Tagawa (he attended the Washington Conference), a member of the Diet, and Major General Kono, who resigned his commission to fight militarism, and J. Seyeda, once director of the Imperial railroads and president of the Industrial Bank of Japan, and a host of other whose solid building at the bottom has laid the basis for a movement that cannot be defeated.

FASCINATING stories of prehistoric boys—their constant danger in encountering wild animals, their hardships and successes. An unusual decorative treatment throughout adds to the charm of the book. Here we read of the power of Od, the Great Spirit; of Eck, the crippled boy who learned to ride on a wild horse; of the importance of Sing, the Story Teller; and many other tales. After the boys have read it they will want to pass it on to be enjoyed by their elders. H. M. Burr writes the kind of books that boys like—he knows their “mental kinks” and supplies the needed stimulation.

PRESIDENT'S SPEECH BEFORE THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

A week before Congress adjourned, President Harding asked the Senate to approve our entry into the Permanent Court of International Justice. The Senate concluded that it did not have time to take up the question in the few days before it adjourned. Accordingly, it has been generally expected that the President would make our entry into the court the principal topic of his speeches on his trip to Alaska this summer. He began his campaign in behalf of our entry into the court at the Associated Press dinner in New York last week, citing the national platforms of the Republican party for the last twenty years. He showed that the party had pledged itself to the idea of an international court with increasing specificness. The Republican platform in 1916 declared, "We believe in the peaceful settlement of international disputes and favor the establishment of a World Court for that purpose." The President's assertion that during the campaign of 1920 he had definitely committed himself against our entry into the League must be interesting reading to the famous Thirty-One who sent out word to the country that the quickets way into the League was by electing Mr. Harding President. In his speech last week (Tuesday) President Harding, referring to his speech on August 28, 1920, delivered during the presidential campaign, said: "I said frankly and very definitely I did not favor the United States entering the League of Nations." He now gives no hope for the present administration's entering the League. To quote his last week's speech again, "In compliance with its pledges, the new administration which came into power in March, 1921, definitely and decisively put aside all thought of the United States entering the League of Nations. It does not propose to enter now by the side door, or the back door, or the cellar door." Later in the week, William Church Osborn, referring to the President's remark, commented that it was open to us then to "back in by the front door." To quote further from the President's speech, "I have no unseemly comment to offer on the League. If it is serving the Old World helpfully, more power to it. I would welcome the demonstration of its utility in a condition which loudly calls for help. But it is not for us. The Senate has so declared, the Executive has so declared, the people themselves have so declared. Nothing could be stamped more decisively with finality." We trust the President will not hold that position in the campaign of 1924, but will hold then that our entry into the League of Nations is once more an open question.

THE INTERNATIONAL FOUNDATIONS

There are many signs that the world is growing more and more a neighborhood. One of the most attractive of them is the springing up of societies to express the particular friendship of one nation with another, the Japan Society, the China Society of America, the American Scandinavian Foundation, the English-Speaking Union, the Baltic American Society—these are only a partial list of such organizations. Their work is pretty well typified by that of the Netherlands America Foundation. The purpose of that society, in its own wording, is "to promote mutual understanding and deepen friendship between the Netherlands and the United States." Over in Holland is a like foundation by the same name. Already in America there is a Netherlands America Affiliation which includes both the Netherlands America Foundation and the Netherlands Chamber of Commerce in New York and will spread to include any other organization interested in the relations between Holland and the United States. The Foundation edits a magazine, "Holland and Her Colonies"; it presents a series of expositions of Dutch paintings, engravings, woodcuts, pottery and the minor arts; it encourages Dutch artists to visit America and American artists to visit Holland; it is ready to aid visitors of either country to the other in order that they may enjoy and understand the land to which they have come; it plans to imitate the example of the American Scandinavian Foundation in instituting exchange scholarships, so that young Americans may study in Dutch universities and young Hollanders may study here; it will promote exchange professorships, and will be a source of information to prospective Dutch students to America and American students in Holland both as to curriculum and finances. Such societies have a great function in helping two nations to understand and like each other.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

HARVARD'S STAND ON RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

This past year Harvard has been facing two questions involving race discrimination. In the first place, the number of Jews among her undergraduates has increased so fast that some Harvard men have feared that their presence would seriously modify the tone of the college. The second question arose through President Lowell's letter to the eminent Negro, Roscoe Conklin Bruce, that his son would not be allowed to room in the freshman dormitories at Cambridge because he was a Negro. This month the Board of Overseers received the report of its committee appointed last June to study means of sifting students for admission and definitely faced the question which had arisen touching Bruce. In regard to the latter question, they voted that "all members of the freshman class shall reside and board in the freshman halls, except those who are permitted by the Dean of Harvard College to live elsewhere. In the application of this rule men of the white and colored races shall not be compelled to live and eat together, nor shall any man be excluded by reason of his color." It is a little difficult to understand the ruling. It apparently means that colored men and white men shall not be compelled to room together, and that a white man who felt that he did not want to eat at the table with a Negro need not do so. On the other hand, it seems to mean that Negroes regularly shall live in the freshman dormitories and board with the other students. The overseers approved the report of the Committee on Selective Admission that Harvard should make no discrimination on grounds of race or religion. That is excellent, the only way to maintain the American tradition of the equality of all men, particularly of all educated people. The committee suggested, instead, that Harvard attempt to sift its incoming freshmen more carefully by the intellectual standards. The overseers, accepting the committee's suggestions, raised admission requirements and adopted a rule that "no candidate should be admitted whose examination in English composition was not passable." This rule, however, does not apply to candidates for whom English is a foreign tongue. More than half of the students of Harvard still come from New England. The university wants to be thoroughly national. In order to encourage students from the South and West the overseers further adopted a regulation that "pupils whose scholastic rank places them in the highest seventh of the boys of their graduating class may, if recommended by their school, be admitted to college without examination." The college will follow the record of these boys and withdraw the privilege from any school whose graduates prove unworthy of it. By the adoption of these new admission requirements, Harvard puts itself more in line with the growing tendency in American colleges to attempt to sift their students and take only the most capable. Harvard did not adopt the suggestion of using intelligence tests as one element in the selection of students. The tests, no matter how honestly they were used, might be regarded as a covert device to eliminate those deemed racially or socially undesirable. When Harvard has laid that ghost, however, we expect to see her adopt intelligence tests as one means of sifting candidates for admission.

THE INTERNATIONAL CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF ROME

The American papers have not widely reported the remarkable meeting of the International Chamber of Commerce at Rome, but some very significant resolutions passed. Perhaps the resolution of chief interest was that on the question of reparations. At this time, when the world is in a state of suspense over the question of reparations from Germany to France, these resolutions deserve careful study. In substance they say: Just reparations should be demanded, but it is futile to consider the amount of reparations without, at the same time, considering the ability of the nations to pay, establishing measures that will assure payments, and above all, permitting the maintenance of all nations. But, best of all, the resolutions say that all reparations must be accompanied by confidence, security must be provided against frontier violation, "and the world must be relieved of the burden of unnecessary armament." The resolutions also insist that a general conference of nations interested in the final adjustment of all these problems is absolutely essential and inevitable. The preamble states in very emphatic terms that this continued economic disorder is not only bad in itself, but has in it the seed of further unhappy developments, and that the peoples of the world are entitled to a just solution of these problems with the least possible delay. The preamble also expresses the belief that the fundamental principles leading to such a settlement are very clear and with united action of the nations capable of early application. The International Chamber of Commerce offered its services to help solve the reparations question. If the governments wish to avail themselves of the practical experience of the business men of the various nations the Chamber stands in readiness to render such assistance as may be desired.

THE PEOPLE WHO MET IN PALO ALTO

Our office is receiving every day interesting accounts of new efforts for good-will that are being made by the churches and of new organizations that are being called into existence, and our desks are deluged by splendid resolutions passed by the churches. This is very encouraging. A particularly interesting movement is under way in Palo Alto. All the churches there, Roman Catholic as well as Protestant, have united in a "People's Movement for International Peace." A local council, which is to hold frequent meetings and direct the movement, has been formed, composed of two delegates from each unit. This organization is the outgrowth of a suggestion made at a prayer meeting in the Presbyterian church. A recent meeting adopted a fine set of resolutions, drawn up by a Methodist minister and a Catholic priest. The gist of them is that the Christian people of Palo Alto believe that a determined effort to abolish war should be the dominant concern of the people of every land. Americans agree that Americanism is a trust. Americans are also agreed in disliking war. They believe that in the outlawing of war the initiative should be taken, not only by central agencies and government officials, but by the organized people in every community throughout the land. They have set themselves to organize the people of their community. They have pledged themselves to sincere effort in behalf of the following objectives: The constant teaching of the duty of international friendship and the wickedness and futility of violence and revenge; the promotion of friendly understanding between different nations and of justice to all races and nations; the adoption of further agreements for disarmament of land and naval forces; and finally the inducing of representatives of the United States Government to enter into conference with the representatives of the world, "to make provision for peaceful methods of settling international disputes and to compel observance of such methods."

TO MAKE THE CHAPLAIN'S WORK EFFECTIVE

Army officers say that within the last decade there has been a very real gain in effectiveness in the work of the chaplain. The Chaplains' Corps has had the disadvantage in the past that it was unorganized. It had no one head. One of the first reforms in the corps undertaken during the World War was the appointment of a Chief Chaplain. John T. Axton, the Chief Chaplain appointed, was a very happy choice. But even now the Chaplains' Corps suffers in comparison to other non-combatant branches of the Army service. Whereas, in the Medical or Dental Corps a man becomes a captain after three years, a major after twelve, a lieutenant colonel at eighteen and then goes on in rank, the chaplain has to wait five years before reaching the rank of captain, fourteen years before reaching that of major, twenty years before becoming a lieutenant colonel, and never can be advanced beyond that grade except in the case of the Chief Chaplain. He stands virtually on a par with the veterinary officer, except that the veterinary can rise higher in rank than the chaplain. Moreover, while the Dental and Medical Corps are provided with adequate equipment, many posts and cantonments have no satisfactory buildings for religious services. The chaplain has been hampered by lack of equipment, and post after post has no chaplain at all. Secretary Weeks is apparently impressed by the value of the chaplain's services to produce the best sort of morale among our soldiers. A new army order prescribes that army bands shall be at the disposal of the chaplains as they are for other officers. As we note elsewhere, the Secretary of War has called a conference of some fifteen of the leading army chaplains along with fifty of the real religious leaders of America to hold a three-day conference in Washington next month on how to intensify the religious program of the army. Last week a luncheon conference of a hundred or so army officers and religious leaders about New York unanimously passed a resolution asking the War Department to see that the chaplain was given every facility for his services and placed on a par with the other non-combatant corps. Army officers, both of the line and of the Chaplains' Corps, are greatly encouraged at such a display of interest in the chaplain's work. Major General Bullard at that luncheon said: "I regard this meeting as one of the most significant and promising things in all my experience of forty years. The great public, if it wishes any service to be effective, must take an interest in it." Army regulations prescribe that the chaplain's work shall be thoroughly undenominational. Where any man on account of his particular faith cannot minister in a satisfactory way to all the soldiers in his command he is required to bring in assistance from outside. Roman Catholic chaplains frequently call in the services of able Protestant ministers in communities where they are located, and of course Protestants in a similar way secure the service of Roman Catholic priests for the administration of masses, and so on. The real chaplain can come into contact with his men as officers of other arms of the service cannot. In many cases he is the means through which his men may make desirable local friendships. Local churches by entertainments, by supplying special music, by affording opportunities for the soldiers to meet their young people, can help not only the chaplain's work, but the general morale of the army.

A RHODES PLAN FOR AMERICA

Perhaps Cecil Rhodes will be remembered as long on account of his institution of the Rhodes Scholarships as for any other reason. Under the terms of his gift, a representative of every State in the Union is studying at Oxford each year. Mrs. Henry P. Davison, widow of the late eminent head of the American Red Cross, has just given sufficient funds to allow six English students, three from Oxford and three from Cambridge, to spend at least one year of study at Harvard, Yale or Princeton. The Englishmen must either be undergraduates or bachelors of arts in their own universities. It has been arranged that the time they study at American colleges should be counted toward their residence requirements for their degrees at Oxford or Cambridge. Mrs. Davison made the gift in memory of her husband, who at the time of his death was considering a plan to enable English students "to know what America really is." Of course, there is not the same charm for an Englishman to study in America as there is for an American to study in England. One cannot honestly deny that our educated young men seem generally rather crude compared to the educated young Englishman. The English school system is better fitted for the education of the child of exceptional ability than is ours. We have gone to an excess in our public school in regarding the average child or even the child a little below the average as the norm and we have planned our curriculum for him. The result is we have sacrificed a great deal of time on the part of our abler children. Certainly, we shall have to alter that before our young men will compare with Englishmen in their culture. And then, too, the English background gives to the young men a more natural acquaintance with the past than our American boys get. Here we are not only always seeking some new thing, but many of us are ignoring the sources of all our lasting ideas

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

THE BUCHANAN TEXT OF THE GOSPELS

New York papers this past week have devoted some space to the claim put forward by Dr. E. S. Buchanan that a so-called Codex Huntingtonianus is in reality a palimpsest, whose original text precedes the accepted version of the Gospels. This manuscript, which is now in the vaults of the Hispanic Society of America in New York, was stolen from the Cathedral at Tarragona, Spain, according to Dr. Buchanan, and was bought by Archer M. Huntington as part of his great Spanish collection. The obvious manuscript dates from the thirteenth century. Dr. Buchanan, who has attained some reputation through editing ancient Latin texts of the Bible, claims that while he had access to the manuscript in 1917 and 1918, he discovered that the parchment had been written on before the present text was inscribed on it. The old text, he said, had been obliterated by the use of some sort of acid. It is, of course, familiar that the early scribes frequently used parchment which had already been used, erasing the old manuscript before they wrote on their new text. Dr. Buchanan claims that he has managed to decipher considerable portions of the original writing and has found it a Latin text which goes back for its sources even to the first or second centuries, antedating any of the texts on which our authorized version is founded. Dr. Buchanan has translated parts of this Latin palimpsest which he claims to have discovered. Six years ago he published an article on his discovery in the Bibliotheca Sacra. His translation of the Latin palimpsest makes it out very different from our received text. For instance, his form of the Lords' Prayer begins "Father of Spirits, sanctify the spirits of men by the Saviour of spirits, that they may be partners by the Saviour of spirits of the glory of the spirits of the children of God." It continues in this wordy fashion. Dr. Buchanan says that there is no mention of Hell or the Day of Judgment in the text, and that it does not display the anti-feminism which he discovers in the received text. For instance, Dr. Buchanan's version makes out that Mary and Martha sat down to meat with Jesus and His disciples at Bethany instead of serving at the table as they do in the received version, and the women are mentioned specifically as bringing their children to the Lord to be blessed, whereas our text runs, "They brought." Dr. Buchanan is an able man, but most Biblical scholars would not regard his "discovery" very seriously.

THE THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY CONFERENCES

Without making any great to-do, the Committee on Social and Religious Surveys is steadily accomplishing valuable work. One of its most important undertakings has been a study of our American theological seminaries, conducted by Dr. Robert S. Kelly, head of the educational division of the committee. Now that the survey is completed, the committee has been bringing the seminaries face to face with its findings through a series of sectional conferences conducted by Dr. Kelly. Some of the material with which the committee has brought to light is more or less disconcerting to the self-complaisance of the seminaries. Some by no means obscure seminaries use virtually the same curriculum that they had before the Civil War. The new knowledge of religious psychology and the return to a greater interest in Jesus' central ideal of the Kingdom of God have not yet affected the teaching in these institutions. About Philadelphia the attitude of the seminaries was defensive. In general, their representatives have been sincerely interested in the committee's findings and have showed a disposition to want to rectify their mistakes. None of the conferences was more significant or more full of hope than the one held on Washington's Birthday at Nashville. The Southern Baptists are the one great Protestant denomination which does not belong to the Federal Council. Neither would the Southern Baptists share in the Interchurch World Movement. But their four great seminaries were represented at the Seminary Conference at Nashville. The conference, indeed, included all the leading seminaries of the South, some sixteen institutions altogether. The conference organized a permanent Council of the Theological Seminaries of the Southern States and empowered the executive committee of the Council to call the next meeting after the members have had time to study the printed report of the Seminary Survey. This report, which will be published by George H. Doran Company, will appear shortly. On the very same day at Memphis the Southern Baptist Educational Association and the Southern Methodist Educational Association held a joint meeting and organized the Council of Church Schools for the Southern States. So Washington's Birthday was a notable day in the religious history of the South, for such interdenomination co-operation is a new thing there.

A feeling of unrest, one of the reactions of the war, is still manifest among college students, though among colored students it is not so marked, in the opinion of President Judson S. Hill, who for forty-two years has been head of the Morristown Normal and Industrial Institute for colored people. Dr. Hill places great faith in colored students, who, he says show an equal if not greater interest in their studies and in outside activities as do white students. They have the same love for athletics and share with enthusiasm in the social doings of their schools. The Institute is justly proud of its manual laboring classes. The students are carrying their studies to a practical end by working on the four new buildings now in process of erection at Morristown. Every step in the construction of the buildings is being done by them, from the cutting of trees and shaping them into planks to making the bricks in a kiln of their own manufacture. The buildings being constructed are two dormitories, a refectory and a steam heating plant.

The other day "The New York Times" carried a dispatch to the effect that Dr. Nibad Rechad Bey had been appointed Turkish Minister to the United States. An inquiry at the State Department revealed the fact that this report was without foundation. In the absence of diplomatic relationships between the United States and Turkey no Minister from Turkey could be received. Was the dispatch one more sample of Turkish propaganda, or was it due to the disordered imagination of a reporter?

ideal country, the country as it ought to be, and they judged all policies and expedients in the light of their clear insight.

Amos, a keeper of sheep and a dresser of vineyards, in the country about Tekoa, was the first of the literary prophets and one of the profoundest moral revealers of any age. He was not afraid of "the face of clay. He dared to say before any man, or any group of men, what he actually thought. He understood the movements going on around him as clearly as he understood the habits of his sheep.

"He read each wound, each weakness clear,
He struck his finger on the place,
And said, 'Thou ailest here, and here.'"

But the great thing, after all, which he announces in his plumb-line figure is the fact of an unescapable, inexorable, pervasive law of moral gravitation in the universe. There is no caprice about moral results. You cannot hoodwink the forces which fulfil events. As fire burns your hand, if you play with it carelessly, as gravity will tumble you over the precipice, if you step falsely on the narrow ledge, so, too, the swing of inevitable moral consequences will follow as a doom the deeds of men and of nations. "By no clever trickery," wrote one of our sound present-day teachers, "can profligacy or low living come into possession of the beatitudes." There hangs the plumb-line, dropped as from the hand of God, and by it every deed is tested. There is no favoritism, no wheedling, no capricious exception. If the life is unplumb, if the deeds and policies of it swing away from a line of rectitude, nothing can save the structure from collapse—nothing but a rebuilding of it in conformity with the moral laws of gravitation.

This deeper prophecy which lays bare the eternal nature of things and which announces days of judgment as always coming is a characteristic not only of Amos and the other rugged prophets of Israel and Judah, but it is as well an inherent feature of the work of all the greatest interpreters of life. Euripides saw the plumb-line as clearly as Amos did. He will not believe in the popular, capricious, immoral gods—"gods who do aught base are not gods at all." But he does believe, with all the virility of his great soul, in the moral purpose of that eternal nature of things,

"Whom veils enfold
Of light, of dark night flecked with gleams of gold.
Of star-hosts dancing round thee without end."

He—that unerring moral will—guides all things in accordance with truth and goodness.

Socrates is another prophet who knew, with clear insight, that the foundations of the universe rest upon immovable pillars of righteousness. A man can always swing boldly out and trust the moral nature of the universe. The only evil thing in the world, he thinks, is to do evil. To suffer injustice for a brief span is no great hardship, but to be attached by act of will to a course of injustice is the one thing that can have no happy outcome. "I know," he declares, and in most particulars he professed to know very little, "I know that injustice and disobedience to a better is always evil and dishonorable." "Think not of life and children first and of justice afterwards, but of justice first. If you go about returning evil for evil, and injury for injury, breaking covenants and agreements, wronging those whom you ought not to wrong, the laws of the invisible world will treat you as an enemy."

The Things By Which We Live

ONE of the most vivid pictures in the Old Testament is that which the prophet Amos gives us of the Lord standing in the midst of Israel and holding a plumb-line in his hand.

The popular idea of a prophet conceives him to be a strange-looking man, wild-eyed, highly wrought, given to fanciful visions and, in the main, a mysterious fore-teller of remote events. In real fact, he was strikingly unlike that crude sketch. The distinctive prophet as a person of rare sanity and balance, a man who could look straight at facts and with clairvoyant insight could see through them and discover what they involved. He could tell from the lines and curves of movements and events and motives how they would necessarily fulfil themselves as they unfolded with the process of time. In the proper sense of the word, he was not primarily a fore-teller, he was a revealer of the deeper meaning of present existing conditions. He possessed an unerring sense of the direction in which deeds were carrying on the doer of them, as unerring as the artist's sense of harmony or of beauty. It was this power of moral insight that made the prophets the statesmen of their epochs. They saw and proclaimed the trend and drift of policies. They looked on through and announced in advance where a given course would finally terminate. They were intense patriots, but their supreme loyalty and devotion was to the

The greatest of the poets bear witness to this fact of the plumb-line. Dante is not mainly concerned with a supernal world beyond the stars or with a dire region of doom under the earth. He is merely telling us of the inevitable recoil of deeds and choices. Every man is building the house which he is going to inhabit, and is now creating the climate and atmosphere that will inevitably bring him an environment of joy or woe.

Nobody can ever forget the scene in Hamlet, where Shakespeare gives us, as he so often does in this and other plays, his announcement of this law of the plumb-line. The wicked king is trying to pray—but he cannot find any form of prayer that can be efficacious until he changes his moral attitude and gets a new purpose of heart.

"What form of prayer
Can serve my turn? Forgive me my foul murder?
That cannot be; since I am still possessed
Of those effects for which I did the murder,
My crown, mine own ambition and my queen.
May one be pardoned, and retain th' offense?
In the corrupted currents of this world
Offense's gilded hand may shove by justice;
And oft 'tis seen the wicked prize itself
Buys out the law: but 'tis not so above;
There is no shuffling—there the action lies In its true nature."

Among our more modern prophets, Emerson has given as robust expression to the law of moral gravitation as any have given, especially in his great essay on "Compensation." His finest short statement of the truth is, however, to be found in his address on Abraham Lincoln, in which he says:

"There is a serene Providence which rules the fate of nations, which makes little account of time, little of one generation or race, makes no account of disasters, conquers alike by what is called defeat or by what is called victory, thrusts aside enemy and obstruction, crushes everything immoral as inhuman, and obtains the ultimate triumph of the best race by the sacrifice of everything that resists the moral laws of the world."

The question remains to be asked, whether this is merely a theory of certain idealists and dreamers, whom we name "prophets," or whether it is indeed so; i.e., a real truth of the eternal nature of things. Nobody ever can "prove" such a mighty assertion about our universe. It is impossible to demonstrate that every deed carries its inevitable nemesis in itself and that moral consequences are as unvarying as the law of gravitation or the swing of planetary orbits. But everything we know about habit and character tends to verify this law of the prophets. The man himself, as William James says, may not "count" his wrong deed, "and a kind heaven may not count it; but it is being counted none the less. Down among his nerve-cells and fibers the molecules are counting it, registering it and storing it up to be used against him when the next temptation comes." Apparent "success" and a seeming "efficiency" that brings coveted "results" are poor substitutes for a rightly fashioned life. The world, with its crasser judgments, may approve the men who seem to hit the desired goals, but the triumph is dearly bought if it has been won by the sacrifice of the growth of the soul itself.

Whether the moral law is cosmic, i.e., whether the entire universe in all its processes is working out a moral purpose, and every least movement of evolving matter is co-operant to a moral end, is too large a question for us to answer. There are certainly many facts which challenge such a faith. But it is hard to see how anything can be moving to no purpose, how any cosmos can come by accident; how, again, some things can be steered to intelligent purpose and others be only random happenings. It is certain that some regions of the universe reveal a moral law of gravitation, that in some areas the eternal plumb-line is set up and operates inevitably. It may be that it does everywhere. It is the safest guess. In his famous Romanes Lecture of 1893—"Evolution and Ethics"—Huxley comes face to face with the immense ground swell of ethical purpose and moral process in the world and he tries to discover its sources and origin. He thinks that it cannot be cosmic; it cannot belong to the nature of things. It must have come in afterwards; it must be superposed upon a non-moral "nature." But this conclusion of the perplexed naturalist will hardly do. The cosmic records need to be more closely and carefully searched again. It may be after all that the prophets are right, and that the plumb-line which Amos saw is fixed in the very cosmic nature of things.

Clerical Portraits

THE late Rev. Thomas G. Selby was a most suggestive preacher, and some of his volumes of sermons are treasured by discriminating readers. But it is questionable if he ever did better work for his vocation than is found in his Fernley Lecture upon The Theology of Modern Fiction. He speaks there of George Eliot as "a spoiled theologian," who distilled through her novels a vast amount of religious teaching. The trustworthiness of the moral instincts, the doctrines of responsibility and retribution, the demand for mediation in the forgiveness of sins, and the ripening of spiritual character, are themes that receive illuminating treatment from the pen of this wondrously gifted woman. Her viewpoint is indicated in the somewhat extensive gallery of her clerical portraits. She shared the distaste for the cleric which so many reformers of to-day feel. "If I want to believe in Jesus Christ, I must shut my eyes, lest I see a parson," is the comment of Felix Holt, the radical of the Early-Victorian period. Fred Vimey, a young man without serious convictions, and of sporting tendencies, is justly censured by Mary Garth for taking orders and entering the Church solely for the sake of a successful career. Four clergymen are delineated in Middlemarch, not one of whom was fit to be a sensible person's spiritual guide and counsellor. The Rev. Edward Causabon is a heartless, overbearing, self-opinionated pedant, concealing a cold and selfish nature under his mechanical proprieties. The Rev. Hugh Cadwallader is a Laodicean, tolerant, well fed, easy-going, given to angling and hunting, not particularly prone to the cure of souls. The Rev. Mr. Tyke, the Evangelical chaplain of a hospital hardby, suffers from narrow views and has to submit to the patronage of a canting scoundrel. Mr. Farebrother is a man on whom creeds sit lightly, a religious teacher with no special message who accepts his onerous calling with the helpless resignation of one upon whom no "necessity was laid to preach the gospel." The moderate minister, marked by an altruistic temper so long as his personal desires are materially interfered with, is drawn with rare skill and fidelity. As for that fox-hunting jovial creature, John Lignon, the Rector who can swear a round oath upon a suitable occasion, did he not go out when the Oxford Movement began?

The attitude of Thackeray toward the cloth depended upon the man who wore it. Where he found delicacy of moral sense, pure and lovely unworldliness, inflexible adherence to right, he gave them honorable embodiment. But his youthful experiences with evangelical clergymen of the extreme variety sickened him of pulpit orators and missionary advocates, who vehemently denounced the world while they partook with gusto of its good things. In The Newcomes he favors us with a noble presentation of religious devotion at its best, in the dear old Colonel of that name. As for the Rev. Charles Honeyman, he is all too typical of the clerics who make a certain eloquent sentimentalism do duty for manly principles, and who are never free from extravagance and indebtedness. Dickens was criticized for his unforgettable likeness of Chadband, Stiggins and others of their kidney. Unquestionably he magnified the vices and minified the virtues of sectarian zealots. But the sting of his caricatures lay in their truth, not in their exaggeration. They portrayed a species of pulpiter whom one can only hope has well-nigh disappeared.

Anthony Trollope excels in his chronicles of clergymen. Reading Hugh Walpole's strong and vital book, The Cathedral, stirs one's remembrance of Barchester Towers and the assembly of church dignitaries, high low, or middle, which crowds its pages. Archdeacon Grantley, the "high and dry" ecclesiastic, stately, imperious, impetuous domineering, yet loyal and lovable withal; his father-in-law, the saintly and sacrificing Mr. Harding, his brother-in-law, the learned and modest Dean Arabin, are men who still live and move freely in fiction with a recurrent fascination for those who esteem the period in which they flourished. Perhaps the best portrait of an erudite, eccentric, yet formidable minister, who, when aroused from his mingled melancholia and pride, was a dangerous antagonist, is given by Trollope in Mr. Crawley. Those who know this author will recall that Crawley was falsely accused of stealing a cheque for twenty pounds. Three volumes are required to narrate the consequence of the accusation, but the interest is sustained and the narrative is filled with apposite statements and convincing allusions. Commonplace Trollope may be and indeed, often is, but he is seldom dull. The petty gossip, the ridiculous rivalries, the female amenities of the society of a Cathedral Close and City are invested with an unsuspected magnetism. The interview of Crawley with Bishop Proudie and his unbearable lady is really dramatic in its intensity, "Peace, woman! . . . you better become the distaff!" exclaimed the poor and disgraced rector as he stood unsubdued in the awful presence of that Xantippe. Her rage and her thirst for vengeance upon him are nothing new in ministerial life. She deserves Archdeacon Granbley's tirades against her as a she-Beelzebub.

If one had to choose from the long list of clerical portraits in fiction the best and most masterly of them all, my selection would fall upon Savonarola in Romola. He appears in the book which drained George Eliot's life blood as "a providential reformer, entirely noble in the ethical part of his work, wise, clear-seeing, authoritative." But in seeking to direct the state he stumbles and falls. His high vocation as a prophet and ambassador of God is complicated by his obsession as a theocratic politician. The supernatural which he invoked in physical miracles did him disservice. Listen to this Shakespearean woman's words. "In Savonarola's preaching, there were strains that appealed to the very finest susceptibilities of men's nature, and there were elements that gratified low egoism, tickled curiosity and attracted timorous superstition. His need of personal predominance, his labyrinthine allegorical interpretation of the Scriptures, his enigmatic visions, and his false certitude about the divine intentions, never ceased in his own large soul to be ennobled by that fervid piety, that passionate sense of the infinite, that active sympathy, . . . which he had in common with the greatest of mankind." The tragedy of the Florentine prince of preachers is subtly analyzed. His reliance upon signs and wonders has its warning for men of his calling in every age. In the lurid scene of his last hours, a scene which seems to blend the sadness of disillusionment and despair with not a few of the elements of martyrdom, we are made to feel the searching force of the Apostles' declaration: "Whether there be prophecies, they shall fail." Every minister who studies these characterizations can find in them much indispensable material which many lectures on preaching do not have. Fiction is always to be kept in submission to one's judgment, since it has a license equal to that of poetry. Yet it dominates life to an unusual degree and when it is a comprehensive and vivid interpretation of life, it accounts for more public opinion than is commonly attributed to creations of the imaginative faculty. There are no contemporary sketches or portraits of clergymen which rival those I have mentioned. And if brief and fragmentary notice of them sends ministers and laymen back to the books of the Victorian masters, its end will have been gained.

A Prayer for Use in the Week Preceding Pentecost, May 13-20

[The Continuation Committee of the World Conference on Faith and Order suggests that Christians everywhere specially pray for Christian unity in the week preceding Pentecost.]

We beseech Thee, Almighty God, to put away from Thy Church all causes of discord. Accomplish in Thine own good time the unity of Christendom. Renew the zeal of the whole body, break down the barriers that divide it, restore whatsoever anywhere is wanting, that all being drawn together in unity of faith, unity of hope, and unity of charity, all the earth may know that there is but one God and Father of us all, and one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom and with whom, in the unity of the Holy Ghost, all honor and glory be unto Thee, O Father Almighty, world without end. Amen.

The library schools take their students when they are near graduation on tours of inspection to see the best libraries. Engineering students go about to see great waterpower plants or mines. Would it not be a good idea for theological seminaries to take their students on church tours when they are near the end of their course. They might visit successful city, village, suburban and country churches. How much the young man might learn from seeing Scott King's Church at Little Britain, New York, or the First Baptist Church of Syracuse, New York, with its Mizpah Hotel, or from the United Presbyterian Church at Walton, New York, with its unique financial system?

On Circuit Again

HERE I am on another circuit through the great Middle West. I have been visiting such cities as Kansas City, Topeka, Des Moines, Minneapolis, St. Paul and Duluth, speaking five times a day in churches, colleges, ministerial associations, business men's luncheons and young people's organizations. It has been an interesting experience. It has been new and strange in some places, one place in particular, where I found myself facing an audience of fifteen hundred high school pupils with hardly a foreign-looking face before me. I spoke to the principal about it and he said with few exceptions every name on his list was a name that went back several generations in America. Even those of Swedish and German descent were of the third generation in America. This is all very new to one used to facing in the States east of the Mississippi Valley audiences of school boys and girls half of whom bore Italian, Russian, Czechoslovakian and Jewish names. The absence of Jewish pupils was very apparent, too, and makes a great difference in the nature of the public exercises. I notice how distinctly Christian the hymns and prayers and addresses become the moment one gets into these middle western schools and colleges. There is no occasion for the speaker to tone down his utterances for fear of offending the sensitiveness of some listener. It gives one great freedom in public utterance when one can talk freely as a Christian in high schools, colleges, chambers of commerce and public mass meetings. In one great mass meeting the chairman, a local minister of outstanding ability, almost preached a gospel sermon in the process of introducing me. Afterwards I said, "There cannot be any Jews in this big audience." "Only two or three," he said, "and we never change our language for them."

These Western churches are thoroughly alive. It seemed to me that some sort of a drive was always on; but I was told they always got what they aimed at. The college presidents spend much time in the East raising money; but the Western people are generous givers, too. The colleges all have that atmosphere of life and activity that the churches have. The students, much more than in our Eastern colleges, have come up of their own accord, and not only work harder, but enter into the college life and activities with a little more vim than do the boys and girls in our Eastern colleges. The singing is hearty and much is being made of music. I was interested in noticing that the college glee clubs I heard were singing real music, and not the silly rag-time in which glee clubs formerly indulged.

(This change is taking place in all our colleges. The recent programs of the Harvard University Glee Club in New York were made up of the superbest classical music, such as one would hear from the male choirs of a German or Swedish university.) I was told that the banjo and mandolin were rapidly disappearing, and that the students were becoming interested in real music. I was much interested in Park College, Missouri, for here the unique ideas of Dr.

John A. McAfee have been on trial for fifty years. The students all perform from three to four hours of manual labor every day, and in that way not only help pay their tuition, but learn some useful trade. Many of the students here are naturally boys and girls who could not afford to go to other institutions. The college's record is good for turning out leaders in church and state.

Speaking of drives, I happened to reach Topeka on the day the eight days' drive for "The Charles M. Sheldon Community Center" opened. The city is raising $100,000 to build a beautiful building in connection with the Central Congregational Church, of which Dr. Sheldon has been pastor for so many years, as a memorial to him and his work. It was in this church that "In His Steps" was read at the evening service in February, 1897. This book has attained the remarkable circulation of twenty-two million copies and has been translated into eighteen languages. Dr. Sheldon was the first pastor of Central Church and has been with it for thirty years, with short absences for world-wide work. He is now the editor of "The Christian Herald," and this reaches a large weekly audience, while his many books are read throughout the world. The new memorial building will be devoted especially to Christian education, which has been the keynote of Dr. Sheldon's preaching.

I was much interested in visiting Dr. Aked's church in Kansas City. It is an interesting thing that one of the most popular preachers of both England and America and one of the most radical of thinkers should be located, not in New York or Chicago, but in the very heart of theological conservatism. The First Congregational Church is a superb stone structure, beautiful both without and within. To it flock the crowds from all over the city, and even from its suburbs, to hear this fearless prophet preach. The permanent congregation has been brought together, not purely on denominational lines, but is made up of those who share Dr. Aked's zeal for the truth, no matter where it leads, no matter what has to be cast off. Every so often Dr. Aked sends the shivers up and down the backs of his conservative brethren in the ministry and the fundamentalists, who are strong in this section, cross the street when they see him coming. Great crowds of young people flock to hear him, thrilled and inspired as they are by the thinking and the passionate delivery of this great preacher, and attracted also by his interpretation in terms of spirit of the great movements and books of the day. But even the conservative brethren have to admit that Dr. Aked fears nothing except the disapproval of his own conscience.

One sees much more of the conflict between the fundamentalists and liberals here in the Middle West. One sees practically nothing of it northeast of Philadelphia or east of the Hudson River. It is a real conflict here, and even divides the ministers of some cities into two opposing camps. It seemed to me where I happened to come in conflict with it, that, speaking in very general terms, the fundamentalists were the older men, the liberals the younger; the fundamentalists were southern trained, the liberals northern. Of course, one must not take this too exactly—there would be many exceptions; but it was an impression I got without investigating the matter in the least. I also hope I will not create any hard feelings when I say that again I got the impression that it was the liberals who were interested in the application of the Gospel to the social, industrial and international spheres of life, while it was difficult to get the fundamentalists' interest in any larger aspect of the Kingdom than the ministry to individual souls. I might make the distinction in this way: the fundamentalists were thinking parochially, the liberals in world-terms. The fundamentalists are interested in such things as the second coming of Christ; the liberals are more interested in infusing the whole social order now with the spirit and principle of Jesus Christ. Again, this is a very general statement and must not be pressed too hard; but it was the impression I got. I even found echoes of the Fosdick case in these mid-Western cities—Presbyterians divided over it, and in some places hard feeling caused—all of which is very silly and looks to some very much like butting into the affairs of a distant Presbytery that is perfectly capable of taking care of itself. One can hardly imagine the Presbytery of New York interfering with the local matters in Omaha, or Nashville, or Sioux City, or Seattle. Yet continually are attempts made to govern New York from the other ends of the earth. There is one thing at least to be said for our Episcopalian brethren in their heresy case—they have left Dr. Grant to be dealt with by his own bishop.

I will continue this letter about my Western trip in the next issue.

THE WEEKLY SERMON

The Comprehensive Creed of Presbyterians

By Rev. William Pierson Merrill, D.D.

Pastor of the Brick Presbyterian Church, New York

"Therefore let no man glory in men. For all things are yours: Whether Paul or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present or things to come; all are yours; And ye are Christ's; and Christ is God's."—I Corinthians 3:21-23.

IT is not often that those who worship in this church are asked to take an excursion into the theological field where doctrines grow or wither. Perhaps we leave that field too much neglected. The Presbyterian Church has always made much of theology, and beyond doubt some of its strength is due to that fact. Yet the sermon time seems all too brief and too infrequent for dealing with anything but the Gospel of Christ and its meaning in the grave conditions of our present time. Moreover, the Presbyterian Church has always minimized rather than exalted its peculiarities; that is one of its chief glories.

But it may be of some value just now to consider that system of doctrine on which our church is based. A good deal is being said about Presbyterian loyalty and disloyalty.

There is a somewhat general assumption that our church is distinguished by possessing a very severe, antiquated and consistent creed; that many of its ministers, elders and deacons subscribe to this creed reluctantly and perfunctorily; that the less we say about it the better; and especially that men of the modern, liberal or progressive type of thought are not, and cannot be, really and heartily loyal to the system of doctrine of the Presbyterian Church.

I received lately a letter from a minister in another denomination, in which he strongly condemned the doctrinal unsoundness of a sermon of mine recently published. His letter ended with an expression of amazement and sorrow that the preacher of such a sermon should be one who had subscribed to that splendid old document, the Westminster Confession. There are not a few who make the same assumption, that our Presbyterian creed is a document wholly out of sympathy with modern ways of thinking.

This is a question which concerns a good many people in our congregation. There are more than thirty men in our number (ministers, elders, deacons) who have solemnly said that they sincerely receive and adopt the Confession of Faith of this church as containing the system of doctrine taught in the Holy Scriptures. There are a number of others in our congregation, not officers in this church, but having taken similar vows in the past. And all Presbyterian Church members who are thoughtful, while they know that the creed puts no personal obligation upon them, that the one requirement for church membership is a simple and personal faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, yet rightly feel a certain measure of responsibility for that system of doctrine for which their church stands.

For several years past I have studied carefully, each year afresh, the Westminster Confession of Faith. As a result of that study, I find myself more enthusiastic and positive in my loyalty than ever before. I am frank to say that I am far from sure that it is wise to have any creed as a basis for church fellowship, or as a condition for good standing in the ministry. But if a denomination is to have any creed as its doctrinal basis, none can be found in the entire literature of the Church better adapted for such a use than this one of ours.

It was my privilege on a recent Sunday to speak especially on the first chapter of our Confession, bringing out its splendid catholic statements about the Bible. What about the rest of the document?

The more one studies it, the more clearly he sees that the fundamental fact about the Westminster Confession is that it is not consistent or partisan in its view of Christian truth. In most remarkable fashion, and to an extraordinary degree, it is made up of varying, even conflicting, views. It is an inclusive and not an exclusive document.

The student is profoundly interested to discover plain evidence of the existence of theological parties in the Assembly that formed it. He can tell from the document itself how their views diverged, and it is with keen satisfaction that he reads the history of that great Assembly, and finds that these very parties there came into conflict and worked their way to agreement. From its beginning the Presbyterian Church has held together strongly varying tendencies of thought. This has resulted in much theological controversy and many lamentable schisms. It was said of a certain Scotch family, noted for its unflinching orthodoxy, "Wherever you find a McLeod, you find a Presbyterian church; and wherever you find two McLeods, you find two Presbyterian churches." A good deal of our denominational history is pictured in that remark. Our Church in America has divided and reunited several times. The last reunion was largely brought about by men meeting in this church building and in the Church of the Covenant, a reunion happily typified by the present union of those two churches.

Carefully studying the Confession of Faith, we find clearly marked in it two strands or tendencies; the one is distinguished by its external and legal character, the other by its spiritual and vital character. Let us set each of them in an extreme form.

The one looks upon the Bible as a law book, infallible in its authority. It views God as far removed from His world and from men, coming into relation with mankind only on the basis of arbitrary action on God's part. It looks on sin as a violation of the law of God, for which one must give account to Him. Atonement it views as the satisfaction of a legal penalty; salvation means deliverance from punishment due, a restoration to good standing in the sight of the Judge. Christ is a mediator in the legal or forensic sense. His work is essentially a device whereby a certain exchange takes place, the guilt of the believer being assumed by Christ, and the righteousness of Christ being imputed to the believer. Those, and those only, are saved who have been chosen for such salvation by the sovereign will of God; "by the decree of God, for the manifestation of His glory, some men and angels are predestinated unto everlasting life, and others foreordained to everlasting death," and "their number is so certain and definite that it cannot be either increased or diminished." The rest of mankind are utterly helpless to do anything toward salvation. Especially is it true that no one who is outside the pale of Christian knowledge can be saved in any way whatsoever, and there is a strong tendency in this strand of the Confession to identify salvation with security in the life to come. "It pleased God in the beginning to create, or make of nothing, the world, and all things therein, in the space of six days." The sin of our first parents God permitted, "having purposed to order it to his own glory." "The guilt of this sin was imputed, and the death in corruption conveyed to all their posterity." The doctrine of election is carried so far that even individuals dying in infancy are saved or not, according to whether they do or do not belong to the number of the elect. Others, not elected, never truly come to Christ, and therefore cannot be saved. Faith means believing to be true whatsoever is revealed in the Word of God.

Out of these statements there clearly emerges a consistent system of thought, rigid, severe, mechanical, legalistic. And this is what many think of as "the theology of the Presbyterian Church" to which we promise to be loyal.

But the student of this old document finds all through it another and vastly different set of ideas and beliefs. It is immensely greater in quantity than the other. It is far more strongly stated, and it is quite cheerfully inconsistent with the extreme form of the system of thought just stated. It is less precise, just because it is spiritual; for the more religious a truth is, the more difficult it is to state it in precise terms.

This is what we find in the second set of ideas: Religious authority rests ultimately in the soul of man, as led and illumined by the spirit of God. "God hath endued the will of man with that natural liberty, that it is neither forced, nor, by any absolute necessity of nature, determined to good or evil." The Bible is not a law book, embodying God's past decisions. It is a living book, through which God now speaks, revealing His will and His love. Our assurance of the infallible authority of God's Word comes from the Spirit of God, speaking to us as we read the Scriptures. God is not far off; He is seen in His world, He is the Lord of all life, "the alone fountain of all being." Creation is His continuous, never-ending self-revelation. This world in which we live is nothing more nor less than the unfolding in fact of His gracious and holy purpose. Sin is alienation from God, a loss of vital connection with Him. Salvation is restoration to His fellowship through a renewal of the spiritual life. Christ is the mediator between God and man in a personal and vital sense, the Prophet, Priest, and King, through whom the grace of God enters and transforms the lives of men. The Christian experience is not a legal arrangement, but a personal matter; it is vital and warm, the life of a son in the home of a father. The Church is not primarily a visible organization, but rather an invisible fellowship, a body made up of all those who know the grace of God through Christ. No one can number or know the multitude of its members, nor can anyone limit the grace of the spirit of God, who will have all men to be saved, a spirit who worketh when and where and how He pleaseth. All who die in infancy are saved through the grace of God in Christ. God freely offers in the Gospel His grace to all men. "He desires not the death of any sinner, but has provided in Christ a salvation sufficient for all, adapted to all, and freely offered in the Gospel to all, and no man is condemned except on the ground of his sin." Christ's sacrifice is not the payment of a legal debt, but an offering of the love of God made through the eternal spirit. Faith is above all "accepting, receiving, and resting upon Christ alone for eternal life." Above all particular doctrines rises the great principle that "God alone is lord of the conscience, and hath left it free from the doctrines and commandments of men." The Lord Jesus Christ is the only head of the Church. The communion of the Church—its fellowship—is to be extended "unto all those who in every place call upon the name of the Lord Jesus." Creeds and all decisions of church bodies are to be received with reverent submission only if they are consonant with the Word of God. The spirit of God is "the source of all good thoughts, pure desires, and holy counsels in men." It is clearly understood that anyone who subscribes to this Confession, subscribes only to it as containing the system of doctrine taught in the Holy Scriptures.

There is a system of Christian truth to which almost any modern Christian can heartily subscribe. Here, then, in the one Confession of Faith we find these two widely divergent strains or tendencies. What are the implications of that fact? One of them certainly is very clear—that no one can hold, with equal heartiness, to the whole confession. If some one who holds to the first of these two forms of theology says to his brother who holds to the second, "You are disloyal because you do not emphasize this stricter part of the Confession," his brother may with even greater vigor reply, "And you are disloyal if you do not hold to this gracious, generous, catholic part of our creed." The fact is, that the truest, finest, highest loyalty which a Presbyterian can show is loyalty to that spirit which includes both elements in its creed, and so makes room for both parties in the Church. It is absolutely clear, from study of this Confession, that our Church, by its very nature, is based upon a compromise—a generous agreement between different schools. It is easy to see why always there have been two strong parties in the Presbyterian Church, the conservative party, concerned for the preservation of orthodoxy, interested in the formal elements of the Church's creed, and the liberal party, more concerned for the spiritual elements and eager for the new developments of truth. The conservative cares supremely for the preservation of doctrinal soundness; the liberal cares supremely for spiritual reality. It is an indispensable condition of a truly strong church to make room for both these elements, and our creed gives ample room for both.

Yet this is not, by any means, the whole story. We not only find in our Confession these two clearly defined theological points of view; but no doubt is left us as to which of them the Confession itself counts most essential. The creed itself declares that no creed must be made authoritative, that always the Bible must be the rule of faith and practice, and that the creed is accepted only in so far as it is true to our best understanding of the Bible. "The supreme judge must always be the Holy Spirit, speaking in the Scriptures."

When the Presbyterian Church in America formally adopted the Westminster Confession as its creed it drew up certain preliminary principles. It is well to keep in mind some of these; they are splendidly broad and strong: "That God alone is lord of the conscience, and therefore the rights of private judgment in all matters that respect religion are universal and unalienable"; "that truth is in order to goodness, and the great touchstone of truth its tendency to promote holiness, according to our Saviour's rule, 'By their fruits ye shall know them'"; "that while it is necessary to make effectual provision that all who are admitted to be teachers should be sound in the faith, we also believe that there are truths and forms with respect to which men of good characters and principles may differ, and in all these they think it the duty, both of private Christians and societies, to exercise mutual forbearance towards each other"; "that all church power is only ministerial and declarative, that is to say, that the Holy Scriptures are that only rule of faith and manners, and that all decisions of the Church should be founded upon the revealed will of God."

How can anyone question the fundamental position and policy of a church which makes such a preamble to its creed? That prince of early Presbyterians, Jonathan Dickinson, put the matter in a sentence when he said, "I have no worse opinion of the Assemblies Confession for the second article in the twentieth chapter, 'God alone is lord of the conscience, etc.,' and I must tell you that to subscribe this article and impose the rest appears to me the most glorious contradiction."

When the American Presbyterian Church was first organized as a united body in 1729 on the basis of this Confession of Faith a statement was unanimously adopted which shows the spirit which ought to rule throughout the Presbyterian Church always, and which does rule where men are loyal to the Presbyterian system. "And the Synod do solemnly agree that no one of us will traduce or use any opprobrious terms of those that differ with us in extra-essential and unnecessary points of doctrine, but treat them with the same friendship, kindness and brotherly love as if they did not differ with us in such sentiments."

If we of to-day, who love our Presbyterian heritage, want to be honestly and fully loyal to its best traditions and to its accepted principles, we must feel ourselves divinely called to maintain our denomination as a comprehensive body. We must always be ready to extend full rights to those men and groups that feel constrained to emphasize the narrower and stricter, more legal side of our Presbyterian creed; but we must demand exactly the same rights for the broader, modern, progressive elements in our church. It is a magnificent privilege to belong to an organization which squarely says, as a part of its creed, that we are bound to extend our Christian fellowship to all those who, in any place, call upon the name of the Lord Jesus. There is true catholicity in practice.

It happened that in 1784 a Scotch Presbyterian of the strictest sort described in a letter the Presbyterians of America, as he had come to see them. He writes, "They are composed of ministers and people from different countries; hence it is not surprising that they are not of one heart and one mind in the faith. However, it appears to be a received principle among them that whatever is disputed among the pious and learned ought not to be a term of communion in the Christian Church, and hence they live generally in peace with one another, notwithstanding their jarring sentiments; and ministers of the Episcopal, Independent and Baptist communions who have a glaring appearance of piety are admitted into their pulpits." The good man wrote that in a spirit of severe criticism. He was lamenting and ridiculing what he thought of as the laxness of the American Presbyterian Church; but what he wrote is high praise. It was true then, it is true now, it always will be true of loyal Presbyterians, that they get on well together, regardless of their varying views, because they believe that the church fellowship ought to be wide enough to admit all who love the Lord Jesus Christ; and that they admit into their pulpits freely and gladly men of other communions, realizing that above all denominations is the Church of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Does not the world in which we stand to-day need a church that can be at once firm, strong, positive, and yet generous and catholic? By inheritance and by fundamental principle, we have such a church. It is our high privilege to keep it such, and to give it the best loyalty of our hearts.

When the little band of Pilgrims were about to sail from Holland in 1620 their good and gifted leader, John Robinson, spoke words of wisdom to them, in which the very spirit of our Confession of Faith takes form:

"We are now ere long to part asunder, and the Lord knoweth whether I shall live to see your faces again. But whether the Lord hath appointed it or not, I charge you before God and His blessed angels to follow me no further than I have followed Christ; and if God should reveal anything to you by any other instrument of His, to be as ready to receive it as ever you were to receive any truth by my ministry; for I am very confident the Lord hath more truth and light yet to break forth out of His holy Word. I bewail the condition of the reformed churches who are come to a period in religion, and will go no further than the instruments of their reformation. The Lutherans cannot be drawn to go beyond what Luther saw; for whatever part of God's will has been imported and revealed to Calvin they will rather die than embrace it. And the Calvinists, as you see, stick where Calvin left them. This is a misery much to be lamented; for though Luther and Calvin were precious shining lights in their times, yet God did not reveal His whole will to them; and were they living now they would be as ready and willing to embrace further light as that which they had received. I beseech you to remember your church covenant, at least that part of it whereby you promise and covenant with God and with one another, to receive whatsoever light or truth shall be made known to you from the written Word of God."

We may well set beside these noble words a statement made by the very Assembly which formed the Westminster Confession. "It is presupposed that the minister of Christ is in some measure gifted for so weighty a service by his knowledge in the whole body of theology, but most of all in the Holy Scriptures, and by the illumination of the spirit of God and other gifts of edification which (together with reading and study of the Word) he ought still to seek by prayer and a humble heart—resolving to admit and receive any truth not yet attained, whenever God shall make it known unto him."

That is the spirit of our Church. It leads forward, not back. It is open to all truth; it eagerly welcomes all the light the spirit of God can give. Can we ask a better gift than that of loyalty to the true faith and the real spirit of our fathers, who would have our Church follow them only as they followed Christ?

Prodigal Daughters *

By Joseph Hocking

SYNOPSIS

Colonel Lester Trelawney arrives home in England after six years of military service in India and Mesopotamia to find his two daughters sadly beset by the flood of new morals, and ethics and dress of the "younger generation." Being warned by Mrs. Trelawney that Eleanor, aged twenty-one, and Peggy, not quite eighteen, were no longer susceptible to discipline, he decides to observe them for himself, while he finishes some very important work at the War Department. Eleanor, he soon discovers, is associating with young women of strange tendencies. Tamsin Cory, her most intimate friend, believes that girls should "have their fling like their brothers." Peggy has been "keeping company" with a young man of doubtful character. Both have been coming home at all hours of the night. The Colonel prepares for quick action. After an unsatisfactory interview with the girls, he meets the young man at the Army and Navy Club and forbids further acquaintance with Peggy.

INSTALLMENT VIII.

THE GIRLS TAKE FRENCH LEAVE.

THE Colonel was seated with his wife and John when the following letter arrived:

"DEAR MOTHER: You will have guessed from the fact that our things are gone that I have decided to leave Hampstead. The truth is, I object to being treated as a child, and to have my life interfered with as though I had no personality of my own. I don't suppose you will be greatly shocked or surprised, as I've told you pretty plainly what I meant to do. In a way, I'm sorry to leave you, but it will be a relief to get away from a place where the man who calls himself my father now rules. It was bad enough before he came; it is unbearable now. I hesitated some time before taking this step, and considered the advisability of staying at Hampstead and treating his petty and absurd restrictions with utter indifference.

"But I have decided differently. I should be bored to tears with constant bickerings and quarrels. Besides, his attitude is a continual irritation. Not only do I cordially detest him, but his evident belief that he has the right to interfere with my life, and to say whom I shall have for my friends, is a bit too much. That is why I am going to think my own thoughts, live my own life, and earn my own living. Colonel Trelawney may be able to command a number of slaves in a barrack yard, but his belief that he has the right to command me is too absurd for words.

"It will be no use your trying to find out where I am. Neither need you imagine that I shall come back like a prodigal child to ask forgiveness. I know how to take care of myself, and in any case I would rather die than be obedient to a petty tyrant whose ideas surely had their birth in the Ark. So don't expect to see me again. ELEANOR."

Mrs. Trelawney handed it to the Colonel, who read this epistle through very carefully, and then after looking very grave for some time went through it a second time.

"Read it, John," and he passed it to his son.

John read it through, but made no remark.

"What do you think of it, my boy?"

"There's not much to think about, is there?" remarked John. "I've heard her say all this dozens of times in different ways until I'm about tired of it."

"She's never said a word about Peggy," remarked the Colonel presently.

"No, but I've no doubt she knows where Peg is," said John.

"Why do you think so?"

"Of course, they've been hand-in-glove in this. Besides, didn't you notice the beginning of her letter? 'You will have guessed from the fact that our things are gone.' Of course, they went away together."

"Do you imagine they are together now?"

"Depends upon Barnes," replied John.

"Then you think if we can find out where Eleanor is we shall find Peg at the same time?"

"I don't say that. Still I'm sure she'll see to it that Barnes does the straight thing, insofar as such a fellow can do the straight thing."

"Perhaps you are right. Let's hope so anyhow. Will you ring for a taxi? We'll go and see the Barnes family again."

A few minutes later the Colonel and John were on their way to Camden Town, in order to interview the Barnes family.

"THIS is the place, dad."

The taxi drew up before a shabby house in a shabby street. In spite of the spring morning the place looked dirty and comfortless.

"Oh, it's you again, is it?" remarked the woman, looking at John.

"Yes, Mrs. Barnes," replied the boy. "This is my father."

"I hope you will excuse my calling so early, Mrs. Barnes," remarked the Colonel, "but I wanted to see your son. I thought if I came at this hour I might catch him before he went to business."

"My son isn't at home," replied Mrs. Barnes. "I haven't seen him since yesterday morning."

She seemed rather awed by the Colonel's presence, although there was a look of lurking antagonism in her eyes.

"I'm sorry for that," replied the Colonel, "but perhaps you can give me a few minutes of your time."

John noticed that the chatter of voices in the back room had ceased. Doubtless there were eager listeners to the conversation.

At that moment, however, two girls came into the passage from the back room and eagerly looked towards Mrs. Barnes.

"This is Colonel Trelawney, Edith, my dear. He's called to see Jim."

"Ask him into the drawing room, mother," replied Edith in her best manner. "Good-morning, Colonel Trelawney; this is indeed a pleasure."

"It's very kind of you to say so," replied the Colonel. "I am afraid I am taking an unpardonable liberty, but I wanted to see your brother particularly."

Edith was evidently dressed for her day's work. She was a rather well-formed girl, and knew the value of good clothes.

"You must excuse the disorder," remarked Miss Barnes as she opened the door of a stuffy apartment which she had designated the "drawing room." "But as mother told you, she, like everyone else, had servant difficulties, and I'm afraid everything is very untidy. Of course, you gentlemen don't understand; but no doubt Mrs. Trelawney would. Is she well?"

The Colonel took no apparent notice of Miss Barnes' question.

"And when will your brother be back?" asked the Colonel.

"There's no knowing," tittered Miss Barnes uneasily. "Jim is not one who does things by halves. He goes the whole hog, he does. Of course, he gets good money, and naturally at a time like this he'll make it fly. Weren't you awfully surprised?"

"I'm afraid I must ask you to explain," said the Colonel.

"About the wedding," simpered Miss Barnes. "At least we supposed it's this morning; but he hasn't told us anything definite. But I've seen it coming on for a long time. Peggy and Jim have been sweet on each other for months, and I suppose they've taken the bit between their teeth and gone off and done it this morning. After all, why shouldn't they? You can never be young but once. I dare say there was a romance in your marriage, Colonel?" and Miss Barnes looked into the Colonel's face with her most ingratiating smile.

"I'm still in the dark as to your meaning," said the Colonel. "Am I to understand that your brother is being married this morning?"

"To your Peggy. At least we suppose so. Yesterday morning Jim hinted that he expected to—to become attached to your family in twenty-four hours. We haven't seen him since, so we are sure of nothing. But Jim is such a hustler that we expect it's all over by this time. Jim never loses any time."

A minute later the girls were in the street, but the Colonel and John still remained in the drawing room. The drama was not played out yet.

"Remember there's such a thing as law," said John, "and my sister's not of age yet. Do you know it is a criminal act for a man to persuade a girl to leave her home?"

"Oh," Mrs. Barnes replied, "you are trying to come that dodge over me, are you? Well, go to law. Jim persuaded her to leave home, did he? Well, I'll warrant she didn't need much persuading. She was as sweet as honey on Jim, she was. And Jim wanted to do the straight thing, he did. Well, if he didn't, your hoity-toity family have only got yourselves to blame."

"My other sister will protect her" said John, still closely watching the woman's face. "Even if your son is a blackguard, my sister has friends."

"They that live longest will see most," retorted Mrs. Barnes. "And now out you go. You'll get nothing from me. And my son isn't a blackguard, either. He wanted to do the thing straight, but I don't blame him, whatever he does, after the way the Colonel treated him."

When the Trelawneys reached the street the Colonel's face was drawn and haggard. "John, my boy," he said, "you had a purpose in speaking to that woman as you did."

"I didn't like the looks on the girls' faces," remarked the boy.

"But surely you don't think—"

"No, sir, I don't," replied John after a silence. "But I'm sure the fellow's a rotter. I still have faith that she may be with Eleanor."

"But how can we find Eleanor?"

"I think we'd better clear the ground first."

"How?"

"By finding Barnes."

"How can we do that?"

"For one thing, we can go to the place where he works. You have the address, haven't you?"

"Yes. That was a good thought of yours, my boy. We'll go straight away. Ah, there's a taxi."

The Colonel did not speak a word during the drive from Camden Town to 8 Bywell Street. Ghastly thoughts haunted his mind, thoughts which made him look years older.

"Can I speak to the manager?" he asked of a clerk as they entered a rather shabby looking office.

"Certainly, sir," said a man stepping forward. "Of course you want a house or flat. They are difficult to get just now, but luckily we have a few on our books."

"No," replied the Colonel, "I am not in want of a house, thank you. I'm come on a rather personal matter. You employ a young man named Barnes, don't you?"

The man looked at the Colonel sharply. "Do you know him?" he asked.

"I know of him," replied the Colonel. "I want to speak to him. He works here, doesn't he?"

"He did," was the reply, "but he hasn't been here since Wednesday night. He'll get the rough side of my tongue when he does come back, and probably the sack."

"Then you don't know where he is?"

"I know he's greatly inconveniencing me. That's what I know. Fancy leaving me like this without a word of warning when he had one or two very promising prospects on hand. Some other firm will get them, I expect."

"Then you don't know when he'll be back?"

"I've had a hint that he'll be back to-morrow morning.

But I don't know. I was never treated in such a way before. Fancy leaving me like that."

Just as the Colonel was leaving a young man rushed to open the door. As he did so he slipped a piece of paper in his hand.

"I think I can tell you something you ought to know," the Colonel read. "I shall leave the office for lunch at twelve forty-five.

The Bible and Theology

THE MEANING OF THE OLD TESTAMENT: ACCORDING TO MODERN SCHOLARSHIP

By HUGH MARTIN, M. A. George H. Doran Company. $1.60.

This is a very helpful book of one hundred and seventy pages designed to help the student of the Bible in his approach to the various books. Careful study which the Biblical records have received during the last seventy-five years, has made the Bible a new and living Book. It has set the various books in their proper relation, both to the time and to progressive revelation of God to His people. Professor Martin after dealing with the general subject of the purpose of the Bible, takes up in order, Historical Books, The Law, The Prophets, The Book of Psalms, The Wisdom Literature and the Apocalyptic Books. There is also a valuable analysis of the contents of these books.

VISIONS OF THE END: A STUDY IN DANIEL AND REVELATION

By ADAM C. WELCH, D.D. Pilgrim Press. $1.25.

Dr. Welch, who is the Professor of Old Testament Exegesis in New College, Edinburgh, has rendered all students of the Bible a valuable service in this treatise on the two great Apocalyptic Books of the Bible. It comes as a fine antidote to the silly and fanciful interpretations of these books to which Christians so easily lend themselves. They are really great human documents, telling that fundamental and universal truth concerning the Kingdom of God. No two books have been so twisted out of their real shape by being taken as literary prophecy or history, instead of poetry of the highest spiritual order, as these two books. Dr. Welch says that they are not puzzling and remote, but that they throb with great human interests and throw much light on the Biblical idea of the Kingdom and on the aspirations of the whole Church. It is written for the plain reader as well as the scholar and the latter half of the book, telling of the revelation of St. John the Divine, is really a great help to devotion and enthusiastic service, as well as to understanding of the great poem.

THE NEW TESTAMENT: A NEW TRANSLATION

By JAMES MOFFATT, D. D. George H. Doran Company. Pp. XLIII+633. $2.50

This new edition of Dr. Moffatt's famous translation of the New Testament, contains two valuable features not found in previous editions of the translation. First, it prints the authorized version in parallel columns with Dr. Moffatt's translation. And second, it contains a very fine introduction to New Testament study. After reading the thirty-six pages of this introduction one marvels at the tremendous amount of scholarship Dr. Moffatt has packed into these closely written pages and at the simple and lucid style in which he has presented the salient features of New Testament study.

He begins with brief introductory remarks on the Higher Criticism of the various New Testament books. If his scholarly observations on the use of the word "gospel" were noted, much of the foolish controversy of these days would be impossible. He presents a diagram of the inter-relations of the synoptic gospels and also a parallel outline of them showing the variations in the Fourth Gospel.

The final pages of the introduction deal with the history of translation and make a fine plea for the value of vernacular translations.

"The New Testament was not deliberately written in a style above the common language of the day—why, then should it be translated so?"

And again: "No literary qualities quite make up for a defective text of the original." Of his own translation he says it is "not a revision of that version (1611) or of any other, but made directly from the Greek."

In conclusion he quotes the words of the preface of the translations of the 1611 version to its readers and declares that he is also moved by the same purposes in this new translation which he expresses in a sentence, "to stir and sustain present faith in a living God who spoke and speaks."

This volume is an invaluable tool in the study of every lover of the Bible.

OLD TESTAMENT LIFE AND LITERATURE

By PROFESSOR I. G. MATTHEWS. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

We cannot do better in mentioning this valuable book than to quote from the author's own preface. Here he gives the purpose of the book and the best word that the reviewer can say is that it is amply fulfilled. "Those most familiar with the Old Testament realize best that next to the New Testament, it is the most inspiring treasury of religious experience that the world possesses. Yet, it is well known that to many devout people, even among religious leaders, it is almost entirely a closed book. This is due, in part at least, to the great difficulty in gaining an adequate knowledge of the times and the conditions under which many of its messages were delivered. To meet this need, for those who are eager to follow the story of the Old Testament revelation, this book has been prepared. History and literature are here considered together. Indeed, all phases of human activity, economie, social, philosophic and religious, are but varying expressions of the unitary life of a people; the parts of one whole. So far as space has permitted, all those contacts, national and international, that influenced the Hebrews, have been presented as the background of the literature."

THE USE OF THE OLD TESTAMENT IN THE LIGHT OF MODERN KNOWLEDGE

By PROFESSOR JOHN EDGAR MACFADYEN, D. D. Pilgrim Press. pp. 255. $2.25.

Laymen have been, in general, woefully ignorant of the newer methods of Bible study, and in part hostile. The trouble is that for a generation these methods have been esoteric, and not made the common possession of our people. They have been hardly used at all in teaching the present generation of leaders in the church, nor are they yet being used in training the generation to come. These newer methods are not destructive criticism, but sane, reverent Bible study, which finds in the Bible the Word of God, but is not antagonistic to science. The Church has for a long time neglected to use these methods in teaching her children. Roger Babson has written of the blindness with which we have turned over this most important and delicate task to immature girls and untrained lads; and as a result the Church is in for a decade of division, with groups suspicious of science and research and knowledge.

This little book is one of the most valuable hand-books we have ever seen for the Sunday School teacher or public school teacher or minister who wants to find the great moral and spiritual teachings of difficult chapters of the Old Testament. Exactly the parts that trouble teachers and are hard to handle are what he makes clear. He takes from his special field, the Old Testament, only the troublesome parts, and he shows that the Bible is a book of religion and not of science. After reading some of the trash with which we often misinform our Sunday-school children, it will be a relief for many earnest hearts to turn to this book of sincere and humble scholarship. The name of Professor McFadyen is one to conjure with in religious circles wherever he has been. From Knox Divinity College in Toronto he made a profound impression on the religious life of Canada, so that when Glasgow's United Free College wanted a successor to Sir George Adam Smith they chose him.

Fifty-five chapters from the Old Testament are explained in from three to five pages each—the stories of Elisha's heavenly defenders, for example (of which he says, "There are other forces in the world than those we can see with our eyes"), the den of lions, and other incidents which, taken baldly and unspiritually, lead one into difficulty. About Genesis 1 and scientific accounts of creation he says, "Every student of science knows that between these two accounts of creation no real reconciliation is possible; but every student of the Bible should remember that no reconciliation is necessary, for the Bible is a book of religion, not of science. It does not present us with scientific facts, but with the fact of God. . . . The simple science underlying Gen. 1 is that of the ancient Hebrew world . . . ; but the religion is the same, yesterday, to-day and forever." For each chapter there is not only an explanation, but also a devotional thought. The book is one to consult frequently in one's teaching.

SYLLABUS FOR OLD TESTAMENT STUDY

By JOHN R. SAMPEY, D.D., LL.D. George H. Doran Company. $2.

Dr. Sampey is the Professor of Old Testament Interpretation in the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Kentucky, and those who knew his book on "The Heart of the Old Testament" need no further introduction. This Syllabus for Old Testament Study is one of the most thorough pieces of work that we have seen in a long time. For the preacher who wishes to get into the heart of the Old Testament or for the Bible class which wishes to thoroughly know the Scriptures, there could be no more valuable guide or aid. The fundamental purpose of the book is to interpret the message of the historians, the prophets, and the poets and sages of Israel in the light of modern research. Dr. Sampey does not go into the discussion of critical questions at any length, but accepts those findings which have been received by practically all scholars. The portion dealing with the prophets is exceedingly valuable, inasmuch as it analyzes with great care the messages of these great preachers, which have value for all time.

SPECIMENS OF BIBLICAL LITERATURE

By JAMES MUILENBURG, A.M. Thomas Y. Crowell Company. $2.50.

In this book Professor Muilenburg of the University of Nebraska has brought together the most striking passages from both the Old and the New Testament, which reveal the superb literary value of the Bible. Professor Muilenburg agrees with Ruskin, Matthew Arnold and many other of the greatest masters of English literature that the foundation for all great writing lies here in the Hebrew literature. Here history, poetry, prophecy and story reach their climax! The book indicates with great clearness the main literary types that are found in the Bible. We have three hundred pages of selections classified under all branches of literature with another hundred pages of most valuable notes. These notes are valuable not only for their comment on the text, but will hereafter be a "sine qua non" for all students of English literature, inasmuch as the author has indicated various poems of Britain and America which are based on Biblical subjects and many of these poems are quoted at length. The reader will be surprised to find how many of the greatest poems and stories and plays in the English language are based on Biblical incidents and text.

THE DEITY OF CHRIST

By ROBERT E. SPEER. Fleming H. Revell Company. pp. 64. 35 cents.

This is a reprint of book which was circulated among the men of the A. E. F. to the extent of fifty thousand copies. The appeal is practical as evidenced in these sentences: "I challenge you who believe that Jesus Christ was merely a man, to reconcile that belief with the fact that you are not a better character than he was." "Buddhism, Hinduism, Confucianism, Mohammedanism by their results have proved that their founders were not divine." "The deity of Christ is not a mere doctrine or proposition. It is a living theory of being, and the way you test it is not alone to go back and examine all these evidences which we have been running over in this hasty and inadequate way. The way you test it is to try Christ whether he is what he claims to be." The little essay is supplemented by three short notes on Christ's self assertion and loneliness; on the inadequacy of the Unitarian view; on Edward Everett Hale's experience when he came to the conclusion—"I do not see how God is readily thought of as a God of love, save as he is revealed to us as such by Jesus." This is a valuable little book written with the earnestness and conviction characteristic of this great secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions. Its perfection seems to me to be marred by the loose use, of the word "supernatural" and a reference to Christ's "absolute separateness from man."

Preaching and Addresses

THE GOSPEL IN THE TEN COMMANDMENTS

By J. C. MASSEE, D. D. Fleming H. Revell Company. $1.25.

Here is a series of ten sermons. Dr. Massee preached them before great congregations with a double purpose in mind. First of all the emphasizing of the great fundamental divine laws which underlie any permanent society, and the showing of their meaning for our particular time and generation. Dr. Massee is disturbed, as all Christians are, over the lawlessness in spirit and in deed prevailing throughout the nation—the world for that matter—and he does not believe that there is any possible maintenance of personal, social and political integrity apart from the profound belief in the reality of a living and holy God into whose presence men must inevitably come for judgment of their sins, who is in Himself the author of all law and order in the universe.

WOMEN AT THE WORLD'S CROSSROADS

By A. MAUDE ROYDEN. The Woman's Press, New York. pp. 139. 1922. $1.25.

This book is made up of the addresses delivered by Miss Royden to the National Convention of the Y. W. C. A. last year. Like all her work it bears the mark of high-minded, clear and distinguished utterance on the vital issues of the day.

There is a fine address on "Christian Patriotism," which points out that just as Christianity has transformed the idea of the home so must it transform our love of country. Miss Royden does not offer a vague ideal to replace a concrete one. She declares: "Love of country is a passion so deeply rooted in the heart of man that I cannot believe it is wrong or base." She points out several indications of Jesus' particular love for his own country, but says, further: "You see, our Lord, from the point of view of the Jews, was a bad Jew; He wanted the Jews to serve the world, and they wanted the Jews to rule the world. He conceived of patriotism as a spiritual service, and they thought of it as a magnificent earthly ambition."

She offers a plea, without political or economic suggestions, for the spiritual aid of the United States in European affairs. And she offers an interesting apology for European conditions: "I cannot help sympathizing deeply with the feeling that some of you have, that the old World is too rancorous, too vindictive, too cruel, too blood-thirsty for you to be able to help it. Yet I would like to convince you that, if we do not forgive one another in Europe to-day, it is not our hearts that refuse, nor is it our judgment; it is our nerves." This reminds one of Fred Smith's article on "The Nervous Prostration of Europe" in THE CHRISTIAN WORK a year or so ago.

"Woman's Service to the Race" is a tempered appeal to women to play the part which they are qualified to play in the making of a better humanity. With great strength she emphasizes the part that helplessness has had in the development of the human species.

"Woman's Service to Theology" is the most striking chapter in the book and is well worth careful consideration. Miss Royden makes the interesting statement: "I believe I am right in saying that in all the great religions of the world, there is special teaching about women as distinct from men, except in the religion of Christ." On what seems to me rather doubtful grounds she lays great stress on the part that some woman or some group of women had in the gospel of St. Luke. But her observations concerning women are of real value. Very rightly she asks: "Is it not true that the one change that we want to make in the hearts of men today is that change which shall enable them to cease thinking of the world as a battlefield and to begin thinking of it as a home?"

In the "Law of Life" she presses hard for the necessity of understanding the will of God and points out the folly of making an idol of not understanding. Her plea against being resigned to "the inscrutable will of God" is a much needed word for defending the honesty of religion. "If God made the world, the more you know about the world the more you know about God."

I am always impressed with Miss Royden's sincerity and clarity of thought and the deep convictions out of which she writes and speaks. Is there any other woman in Europe or America that is doing an equally fine service?

ALTARS OF EARTH: STUDIES IN OLD TESTAMENT HUMANISM

By HUBERT L. SIMPSON. The Pilgrim Press. $2.25.

This is a volume of twenty very original sermons by the brilliant pastor of Westbourne Church, Glasgow. They deal with the opening chapters of the Bible, and it is not saying too much to remark that they really throw new light on the Genesis stories. The author has very properly called these sermons, "Studies in Old Testament Humanism." Treating these opening chapters as poems dealing with great beginnings and vast cosmic subjects, Mr. Simpson brings out their universal and eternal meaning. We have not read so suggestive a volume on Genesis in a long time. Mr. Simpson is evidently steeped in English literature and uses it freely in the interpretation of these Genesis chapters.

THE HEBREW PROPHET AND THE MODERN PREACHER

By REV. HENRY J. PICKETT. George H. Doran Company. $2.50.

These are the lectures on preaching given under the Hartley Foundation in England by the new Principal of Hartley College, Manchester. They make a very interesting combination volume with the two series on practically the same subject given under the Lyman Beecher Foundation at Yale, by Sir George Adams Smith, and by Dean Charles R. Brown. Here we have then, three volumes on the prophets and preaching, but Dr. Pickett has approached the subject from a somewhat different point of view. Dr. Brown, in his series of lectures, dealt especially with the social ideals of the prophets; Dr. George Adams Smith dealt with the message of the prophets for their own day and also the permanent content of their words. Dr. Pickett tells more of the prophets as models for the preacher, and the latter third of the book leaves the Old Testament for a while and the lectures deal with such subjects as "The Place of the Preacher in Modern Life," "The Preacher's Equipment," "The Preacher and the Church" and "The Preacher's Joy and Crown." The one note running through this interesting book is the supreme need in our time of a truly prophetic ministry. He would like to see a race of preachers arise, who have not only the passion and the divine insight of the Hebrew prophets, but also their courage, their—one would not say, aloofness from their time—but their feeling that they must be true to the message which God has given them whether the world is ready to hear it or not.

POLITICAL CHRISTIANITY

By A. MAUDE ROYDEN. G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. pp. 143. $1.25.

These are not political addresses in the narrow sense of the word, but they are addresses concerning the application of Christianity to issues that are in the field of political action. Miss Royden with her usual clear and fearless thinking insists that the Church must not limit itself to issues which are apart from the domain of living concern. She begins by pointing out vigorously that the Old Testament prophets adopted no such attitude as some present-day churches in which "there seems to be no contact with the world outside." It is not possible, she insists, to speak effectively without hurting somebody's feelings, but this is no justification for a real prophet to confine himself or herself to dead issues. The meetings in the Guildhall in London, where the addresses were delivered were followed by "after-meetings" in which the hearers were invited to express their differing opinions and to correct the speaker where they could. This whole attitude is in entire keeping with Miss Royden's brave insistence on religion as a practicable force in the conduct of all sorts of affairs to-day. On this high basis she goes on to deal with various questions before the British. There is a fine presentation of "Justice: Human and Divine," in which she points out that "the entail of evil" can only be broken by the practise of forgiveness by the outraged parties. Clearly and inevitably she describes the futility of trying to hurt our enemies without damaging ourselves. Again she deals with unemployment on the certain basis of the sacredness of personality and declares: "I do not know any principle of our Lord's that has been so brutally neglected as the right as well as the duty of the individual to use the talents which he has got." She criticizes society as "organized in such a way that industries want a margin of unemployment. I say industries, because I do not consider that it is generally the fault, I mean the deliberate policy of the employer." From this same point of view she talks of the situation in Ireland and Russia, the world issue of disarmament, party politics and the care of the insane. There is a terrible sanity and a moral persuasiveness about all that this great Christian writes that makes it full of encouragement and suggestion to all earnest and sincere people.

Religious Education

WESTMINSTER TEXT-BOOKS OF RELIGIOUS EDUCATION

Edited by JOHN T. FARIS, D.D. The Westminster Press.

These books are the reaction of official Presbyterianism to the Week-Day Church School Movement. No church which prides itself on scholarship, as does the Presbyterian, could ignore the widespread feeling, stimulated by the week-day work at Gary, Indiana, that the Sunday-schools are not enough. The Presbyterian Church's Board, therefore, asked the Rev. W. A. Squires of Gary to head its week-day work. One of these books, for intermediates, is from him directly.

There are two tendencies in the week-day movement, one, represented by these courses, to emphasize information, the other, expressed in Henry F. Cope's excellent "Week-Day Religious Education" (not his earlier book, "The Week-Day Church School" of 1921), to emphasize motivation. This series, therefore, makes little provision for the initiative of the pupil, for projects, for handwork. The teacher is advised to have hand-work and dramatization and service projects, but very little help is given in telling how to do it. In fact, the teacher who took that advice seriously would rewrite the courses. The books say frankly, "The lesson prepared for the week-day will be chiefly instructional, almost always a Biblical story."

Two criticisms of the series are: (1) That they fail to use motivation; and (2) that they do not use the great events of the child's year—the opening of school, Thanksgiving, the Christmas holidays, the patriotic days, Easter, the spring.

Their strong point is their attempt to correlate week-day and Sunday church school work. The Sunday topics are a continuation of the topics used each preceding week-day.

And (a splendid point) in the Intermediate Lessons the usual Junior Christian Endeavor Society is drawn into the church, school and invited to make itself the "expressional" session of the church school. This splendid idea is not carried, unfortunately, into the new fields of "projects."

The primary course is by M. Florence Brown, and is the most important of the group. The stories do not have wings, and there are minor slips in accuracy, as where Agag is called a "Philistine," or where the slow trek of the children of Israel over the desert is called a "procession." Despite these slips this course is quite usable.

The junior course (second year), by Ethel W. Trout, begins with creation, and there is not a whisper about the process being long and slow; or about the six days being covered also by God's Other Word, the wonderful book of nature. The Rev. Dr. McFadyen of Glasgow says: "All the evidence from astronomy, geology, palaeontology, archaeology, is overwhelmingly opposed to such an account of the origin of things." Why teach what must be unlearned later?

The intermediate course is by Mr. Squires himself, and includes some great material, especially about missions, child labor and the race problem; and there are some really good lessons on the Bible, notably the one on "A Christian's Use of the Bible." With Mr. Squires as a teacher there is no doubt that good results would be secured. But would a lesson on "Woman's Place in the Program of the Kingdom" be of the slightest interest to a boy of scout age? Or a lesson on "A Soul's Recovery from Spiritual Tumbling?" The Bible lessons do not center on a single point, and are sometimes heavy-booted.

Of course it is not only the Presbyterians, who cling to the method of filling up the bottle, for the United Lutheran Publication House's "Hand-Book of Week-Day Religious Instruction" (1922, 58 pages), an outline of the courses in nine of their best church schools, also omits the newer process of getting the pupils to plan, execute, judge, and appreciate.

FOR AGE 7, GRADE II

A SECOND PRIMARY BOOK IN RELIGION

By ELIZABETH COLSON. Abingdon Press. 342 pages. $2.

Happy the child who can grow up with such a teacher as Miss Colson of Brooklyn. Through the printed pages a reverent, original, inspiring personality breathes. The teacher who does not catch from her something of the spirit of wonder at the mystery of God's presence and the beauty of His world, the teacher who is not stirred to think and dream with the seven-year-old, as he reads his book, had better seek some other calling. (1) It is remarkable because it supplies the element of wonder which is so often lacking not only in our traditional lesson courses, but also in our Sunday-schools, and (dare we say it?) in our Churches. "About some passages of Scripture," she writes, "there is little to say and much to be felt." "To help a child to wonder by giving him a beautiful thought, and time to think, is religious education, for wonder is a beautiful part of praise." "We need to remember that what we use in appealing to the eyes and ears of children is forming taste, so that nothing short of the best is good enough to set before them." (2) It is remarkable because it plans for the use of all outdoors as a classroom. A June program is on "worship through wonder," and a country road, or a garden, or a roof, or, if that is impossible, a room with some beautiful flowers, is suggested. (The lessons, it ought to be said, are planned for week-days, two sessions a week.) (3) It is remarkable for its use and understanding of the beautiful in lesson material, surroundings, dramatizations, hand-work and songs. Lichtenberger's "Mon Petit Trot" has supplied some of the most effective stories in this treasure-house of literary wealth. (4) It is remarkable for its comprehension of the mind of the seven-year-old child. It might be used as a text-book for the study of children of that age. They are forming habits, she says, through imitation, which is partly unconscious, partly "purposive," and in larger part through dramatic action. The book breathes love for them, and is keen in its quick use of short dramatizations.

The story material is used a little carelessly at times, as when Jerusalem children are represented as having played on the shore of far-away Lake Galilee, or when houses in Jerusalem are spoken of as of clay, which is used only, we think, on the plains or in the Jordan Valley, or when Easter is spoken of as the "Sabbath" of the children of Jesus' time. And in the mind of the reviewer children might well be taught to say, "The Lord," in learning verses from the Psalms, instead of "Jehovah," just as the Hebrew children said "Adonai" instead of "Yahweh."

FOR AGE 13, GRADE VIII

LIVING AT OUR BEST

By GRACE HASTINGS SHARP and MABEL HILL. Abingdon Press. $1.25.

A stimulating course for young people of thirteen or fourteen. They would work well in a class of business girls of a higher age. Eight lessons are on health, twelve on work and thrift, and others on happiness, service, patriotism, co-operation. Throughout, there is the most wholesome religious atmosphere. No young person could well come through this half year without a new sense of admiration for Christ, and at that age admiration means loyalty. There are thirty-two lessons, and they ought to be used in a half-year, beginning with the autumn. They are epigrammatic.

FOR AGE 14, GRADE IX

EARLY DAYS OF CHRISTIANITY

By FREDERICK C. GRANT. Abingdon Press.

By the rector of Trinity Church (Episcopalian) in Chicago, who wrote the earlier course, "The Life and Times of Jesus," one of the best of the series. Twenty-three of the thirty-two lessons are from the Acts, the last nine about the early martyrs. There is a great lesson on church worship and membership, which tells how the Apostles' Creed grew up about 150 A.D., how the Sursum Corda originated, and how the early church of Justin's time administered its charities. Another great chapter is about the catacombs. These lessons open a new field for many church schools to enter and win. They are stirring.

FOR AGE 16, GRADE XI

JESUS' IDEALS OF LIVING

By G. WALTER FISKE. Abingdon Press. $1.50.

Professor Fiske is in the Oberlin School of Theology, which is itself a recommendation for this course, and he has dedicated his work to Dr. Bosworth. He says that hosts of young people in their later teens are eager to know what it means to be a modern Christian. And, while most of the Bible was written for adults by adults, "in the life and teaching of Jesus we have a youthful religion which will always challenge successfully the loyalty of youth, because of its magnificent ideals." He aims to get Jesus' ideals actually into the boys' and girls' characters, and so uses the method of discussions of their own problems. We believe that to expect young people to study a serious course like this twice a week is real optimism. The work would be made easier if it were illustrated by more incidents from the life of our time.

HOME LESSONS IN RELIGION, VOLUME I

By SAMUEL W. and MARY BOYD STAGG. Abingdon Press. pp. 201. $1.

This is a manual for mothers of three-year-olds. It appeared slightly later than its companion volume for four-year-olds. It requires the use of Mrs. Betts' "Mother-Teacher of Religion." It offers suggestions for each day of fifty-two weeks. The three-year-old, the Staggs say, has little difficulty in carrying on a conversation with people he cannot see, and so naturally comes close to praying. The foundations of disposition are laid at this age, and the child learns to be cheerful, thoughtful, helpful. When a child comes and says, "I want to help mother," she must for his sake immediately drop all other obligations and respond. The authors see that religion in the home means not only Bible stories and prayer, but also correct habits and attitudes.

HOME LESSONS IN RELIGION, VOLUME II

By SAMUEL W. and MARY BOYD STAGG. Abingdon Press. pp. 171. $1.

A book to help mothers train their four-year-old or five-year-old children in religion. Volume 2 appears before Volume 1 "because of the demand," one of the hopeful signs of our times. It refers constantly to other books of the Abingdon Press' Week-Day series, of which one or two of the books for the pre-school age are essential if this is to be used. It is too complicated and too full for some parents, but will be valuable where a high standard is sought. The Staggs are of Pasadena, and the Rev. Robert Freeman has written the introduction.

THE LITTLE CHILD AND HIS CRAYON

By JESSIE ELEANOR MOORE. Abingdon Press. pp. 64. $1.

Miss Moore is a born teacher of little children, and those of pre-school age are her specialty. She has collected thousands of crayon drawings, made in church, school or home. Out of her collection she has chosen sixty to show teachers and parents how to use hand-work as part of the larger activity of learning. Surprisingly enough she keeps her perspective about her own hobby, and says that in the church school five minutes out of an hour is all that can be spared for drawing. "Many teachers have the children use the seats of their chairs as tables, kneeling before them to draw." One page is a crayon drawing by a six-year-old to illustrate one of Dr. Henry Coffin's sermons to the children of his church. She spent the whole forty-five minutes of the rest of the service making it. In this book sound educational theory is worked out in a practical way.

GRADED BIBLE STORIES

By WILLIAM JAMES MUTCH. George H. Doran Company. $1.25 per volume.

A standard series of teachers' texts by the professor of Bible at Ripon College in Wisconsin. The lessons are grouped in four two-year volumes, fifty-two lessons for each year, so that each volume contains 104 lessons. Grades one and two are together, three and four, five and six, seven and eight. A feature is the cumulative review, which adds each year to the stock of Bible knowledge, and at the same time keeps the things learned in previous years in memory. The scholarly attitude of the courses is shown by the fact that Professor Frank K. Sanders has written the introduction to Volume 2. Concrete, graded material, in story units, without homilies, with very brief explanations, are given in the books. Professor Mutch urges the schools to put a copy of the book in each home. Expressional work is provided for by directions to have a pupil called on to retell the story as soon as the teacher has finished, to have the class choose a name for the story, and to have each pupil keep a note-book. This is one of the best of all the series which aim at imparting information rather than developing attitudes or habits.

BOYS AND GIRLS FROM HEBREW HISTORY: A CHILDREN'S DAY PAGEANT

By ANNIE RUSSELL MARBLE. The Century Company, New York. 25 cents; twelve or more 20 cents, plus postage.

The revival of the religious drama is going on slowly. We are in the midst of it now, and day by day the pageant and other presentations gain favor. This pageant is excellent, and can easily be given by Sunday-schools of medium size or even by smaller schools that are well organized and have good leadership.

Sociological Studies

THE TREND OF THE RACES

By GEORGE E. HAYNES, Ph. D. The Missionary Education Movement, New York.

Dr. Haynes has prepared a very readable as well as an authoritative text-book on a vital problem that ought to interest every public-spirited American. The introduction is by Dr. Dillard, whose name is familiar as that of a Southerner who is doing constructive thinking upon a basis of broad experience. He states succinctly the central theme of the book a comparison of the two ways of settling racial conflicts, the common way of force and violence, the more difficult, but the only constructive way of conciliation and goodwill. All progressive thinkers are coming to realize that the way of peace among the races—white, black, yellow or whatever type—calls for a program of mutual understanding and co-operation rather than for attempts to force an artificial sameness of abilities, standards and education. Let each be its best self, and "let water find its level" should be a twofold slogan satisfactory to all.

Dr. Haynes' book is a thoroughly fair-minded and convincing attempt to further this admittedly necessary understanding between the colored and the white race. The principles laid down are sound enough to function in other cases, as well, for instance, in the much-vexed Asiatic question. The book is written without a trace of bitterness and in the scientific spirit which we have learned to expect of this author's work. While putting fairly and squarely the menace of the present situation, especially since the World War brought so swift an increase in race-consciousness to the Negro, the book is sufficiently optimistic in tone to be stimulating. Its philosophy is backed up by numbers of concrete and undeniably authenticated instances of the Negro's progress. Some of these will come with a positive shock of surprise to readers not familiar with the actual situation. An open-minded Virginian, of the finest birth and breeding, recently said to the writer, "I've seen a light. We Southerners do understand the traits and characteristics of the Negro oftentimes better than you of the North, but there is one thing we do not understand as well—his aspirations." No one who studies this book can fail to see a light on the value of the Negro's aspirations, and upon his determination to achieve them. We shall hope for a wide circulation of this work during the next year, feeling sure that it will contribute effectively to better inter-racial understanding.

NATIONALISM AND EDUCATION SINCE 1789: A POLITICAL AND SOCIAL HISTORY OF MODERN EDUCATION

By EDWARD H. REISNER, Ph. D., Associate Professor of Education, Teachers' College, Columbia University. The Macmillan Company, New York. $2.60.

This is a thorough and interesting treatise of education and nationalism in Prussia, France, England and the United States. As a work in education it merits much praise, because it is a fresh presentation of a highly important topic. But we propose to call attention here to its wider significance—the fact that it leaves no doubt as to the strength of the connecting links between nationalism and education. This gives it a more universal message than that of the average book on education. Dr. Reisner's narrative is, of course, altogether objective, and properly so, but he who reads it must be impressed with the fact that the links between nationalism and education have always resulted in triumphs of nationalism over education. And like the triumphs of nationalism over religion, its defeats of purposive, idealistic education—especially in times of stress—make up a sad story. But Dr. Reisner's narrative also gives us the signs of hope. We know that slowly, very slowly, educators may devote themselves more and more to truth seeking rather than to developing mere patriots and those who will yell "Hurrah for our side."

THE RETURN OF THE MIDDLE CLASS

By JOHN CORBIN. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $2.50.

Mr. Corbin pleads here for the middle class, the professional and salaried men, who must live from their own earnings and do not depend upon rents or other income from investments. He holds that the return of this middle class to greater prestige will be of great benefit to society. We are too prone to think of two classes in these latter days, those who have control of wealth and those who earn wages in trades and unskilled tasks. But this middle class, "The Forgotten Folk," "The New Poor," who make up the brain power of the country, now need the most earnest protection for the public interest. Here is an interesting case presented by a thinker and a stylist.

CONSUMERS' CO-OPERATIVE SOCIETIES

By CHARLES GIDE. Edited in the United States by CEDRIC LONG. Introductory chapter on co-operation in the United States by DR. J. P. WARBASSE. Alfred A. Knopf, New York. $3.

A thorough discussion of consumers' co-operation in France by the Professor of Political Economy in the Faculty of Laws, the University of Paris. Dr. Warbasse, president of the Co-operative League in America, calls him foremost spokesman of the movement in France. Dr. Warbasse's chapter on the movement in America has made the book of much more interest to students in this country who wish to study European co-operation.

Miscellaneous

LOOKING ON

By JIMMY HOWCROFT. Published by the author at Little Forest Cottage, Hants, England. pp. 30. 2s. 6d.

This little thirty-page pamphlet of poems was dictated to his nurse by an airman who was injured in the fall of his plane, and who will never be able to do anything more than think or speak. After five years in the London hospital he is now living in a cottage in the country where he is cared for by his mother and his nurse. The sale of this little book has enabled him to live in much greater comfort than could otherwise have been the case.

To turn from the active business of flying to the business of writing verses under such conditions is a change beyond the understanding of most of us. As John Oxenham says in his brief foreword, "Some of you may think you could write better verse. How many of us could write anything at all under such conditions?" Personally, despite their technical flaws, I have seldom read poems more brave and playful and sweet in spirit. Not a word of bitterness nor any indication of it. "The Children's Dream" is a delightful and fanciful voyage in the air, written in a way to charm a child or any one with a childlike spirit. The little poem on "Friendship" contains in simple words a profound and worthy truth. The quatrain on "Man's Mismanagement" is a fine challenge of the present age.

"Then are we sane, that we should order life
To chaos, turmoil, vast unending strife?
The world will change, and all be wondrous bright
When we look upwards and towards the light."

And the poem entitled "Quit Ye Like Men" is a noble declaration of genuine faith.

"Then what am I?
A stricken pawn in a mighty plan,
Yet striving still to be a man.
Though hopeless seems the race to be
Yet breast it bravely, thou shalt see,
Like mist before the sun,
Thy troubles die, and fade away,
And joy be at the close of day
If thou hast nobly run."

It will do any one good to read such poems as these, because it will make you feel a little ashamed of yourself and very much surer of spiritual realities.

(THE CHRISTIAN WORK has sent for a number of copies of this pamphlet and will be glad to supply them to our readers at fifty cents, postpaid. Address the Literary Editor.)

READINGS FROM GREAT AUTHORS

Edited by JOHN HAYNES HOLMES and others. The Dodd, Mead Company, New York. 75 cents

This is a new edition of the readings, with additional selections. It is a compilation of non-Biblical writings for use as responsive reading in public assemblies, but also full of inspiration for private reading. Though such a book must of necessity be confined to authors whose poetry or prose can be easily adapted to responsive reading, nevertheless the editors have brought together selections from a large number of writers including Seneca, Buddha, Marcus Aurelius, Emerson, Whitman, Lowell, Wordsworth, Browning, Mazzini, Wilson, Lincoln, Carlyle, Ruskin, Henry George, Tolstoi, Wells, Galsworthy Tagore. Churches which wish to use for responsive reading inspirational literature outside of the Psalms and other parts of the Bible will find this little book remarkably adapted to their needs.

THE CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE OF PEACE

By JAMES HASTINGS, D. D. Charles Scribner's Sons. $4.

This is the last volume from the pen of James Hastings in the series of "The Great Christian Doctrines." It was the last great work of Dr. Hastings. He had corrected the final proofs just before his death. It has been edited by his son Edward Hastings as a labor of love. It is very fitting that Dr. Hastings' last message should have been one on peace. This volume needs no recommendation for those who have been acquainted with the previous volumes in the series. It is a book that no preacher can afford to be without in these days when the problem of peace and war is the one great question before the churches. "One cannot look anywhere in the Bible, says Dr. Punshon, either in the Old Testament or into the New, without discovering that peace is, so to speak, the master-blessing, the grand issue both of the law and of the Gospel to mankind." The great Levitical benediction, our readers will remember, ends with the word, "Peace." The Saviour's coming is heralded with the prophetic song of the angels of "Peace on Earth." Dr. Hastings has examined the Old Testament and the New with that thoroughness which only one who knew them by heart as he could do, and has given us every aspect of the Biblical teaching as to what peace is, how it is to be secured, both in the human heart and among the nations. The titles of the chapters are indexed to the contents of the book, "The God of Peace," "The Peace of Christ," "The Search for Peace," "Peace with God."

Such subjects as these dealing with the personal aspects of the problem—then the latter half of the volume is exceedingly interesting as Dr. Hastings considers with considerable elaboration the whole question as to the teaching of the Bible on war and peace. As he points out, however, there is progression in the idea that peace among nations is the natural Christian status and that war must eventually give way to the practical adjustments of disputes. The prophets saw this, which to-day comes to its climax in the teachings of Jesus Christ. The volume is a very valuable contribution to the whole subject.

THE INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT OF CHINA

By SUN YAT-SEN. G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. pp. 265. $4.50.

The name of Sun Yat-sen upon the title page of a book at once gives it prominence. Opinions regarding him differ widely, some regarding him as one of the great constructive statesmen of the modern world, and others as the fanatically impossible De Valera of China. No one, however, can doubt the extraordinary qualities of a man who could rise to such eminence in a nation of over four hundred million people, who in 1911 was the chief factor in the overthrow of an ancient monarchy, who was elected the first President of the Chinese Republic, and who, though no longer at the head of that government, has a following so large that he must be taken into account in all questions affecting the development and stability of the largest nation in the world. Even his enemies admit the purity of his personal character and his patriotic devotion to what he believes to be for the welfare of his native land. In this book, he traces the forces and influence that have brought about the tremendous changes in China, and he sets forth the reasons which led him to set up a government in Canton in opposition to what he regarded as the corrupt, militaristic, and Japanese-controlled government in Peking. He says that his special object is to explain his conviction that, in order to solve the Chinese question, the vast resources of China should be developed internationally under a socialistic scheme, for the good of the world in general and the Chinese people in particular. It is his hope that as a result of this, the present spheres of foreign influence can be abolished; the international commercial war can be done away with; the internecine capitalistic competition can be got rid of; and last, but not least, the class struggle between capital and labor can be avoided. Thus, he thinks the root of war will be forever exterminated so far as China is concerned. This is rather an ambitious program. Sun Yat-sen has proved to be the most successful agitator of the age. Whether he will also prove to be the capable and wise administrator of the new order that he has done so much to inaugurate is not yet clear. At any rate his scheme as presented in his book deserves serious consideration. Appendices add interesting data, including letters from several foreigners, who express interest in his project.

NIGGER

This is rather short novel, very "sketchy," but always vivid and interesting. In four chapters it attempts to take a negro from his boyhood days before the civil war, with all of his descendants, to his death after the World War. Mr. Wood also weaves in a real message. Both directly and between the lines he indicts the white race, while he tells the story of a negro family, kept in ignorance, with its ideals opposed at nearly every turn.

CONSTANTINOPLE TO-DAY

By CLARENCE RICHARD JOHNSON; Foreword by CALEB F. GATES, President of Robert College. The Macmillan Company, New York. pp. 418. $5.

That great American Secretary of State, John Hay, said that the storm center of the world had shifted from Constantinople to China, and that whoever understands that mighty nation will understand the future of the world for several centuries. If John Hay were living to-day he would surely say that while Peking is undoubtedly a storm center of the world, Constantinople is as much a storm center as ever. Never before in all its checkered history has it been more tumultuous than it is now, and never before has it been more vitally related to the welfare not only of southeastern Europe, but of the world. The portents are ominous, and no one knows at what moment they may become actualized in a destructive fury which will involve many nations. One therefore opens with peculiar interest a book which bears the title: "Constantinople To-day." It does not profess to be an account of an interesting city. The real purpose is indicated by a sub-title, "The Pathfinder Survey of Constantinople, A Study in Oriental Social Life." Professor Johnson explains that he is the editor rather than the author. He selected a corps of workers, most of them serving with little or no compensation, but all admirably fitted for the tasks that he assigned them. Under his direction, and that of an advisory committee, headed by Dr. Caleb F. Gates, President of Robert College, and Dr. Mary Mills Patrick, President of Constantinople College for Women, a careful survey was made of present-day conditions. The book is therefore a series of reports rather than a connected narrative, but these reports are of great value. One finds within the pages of this volume an account of the historical setting of the city, its civic administration, its community organization, its industrial life, its refugees, orphanages, recreations, widowhood, adult delinquency, and native schools. The editor, who is professor of sociology in Robert College, possesses rare qualifications for the supervision of such a survey, and he has had the best of co-operation and counsel from others who have long resided in Constantinople and are intimately conversant with the problems that are discussed. We regret that there is no index to make the valuable material in the book readily available for consultation, but in addition to the chapter headings there are numerous sub-heads. The volume is handsomely printed, contains excellent illustrations, and includes a wealth of statistical information. It would be difficult to find elsewhere such a comprehensive and accurate account of Constantinople as it is to-day. It is a veritable mine of information for all who are interested in Turkish problems, and for students of sociology everywhere.

THE VISION OF DESIRE

By MARGARET PEDLER. George H. Doran Company. $2.

This is a sugar-coated love story of the old school. It is concerned mainly with the trials and tribulations of Ann Lovell, a sweet young English girl and her three troublesome suitors, to wit: Tony Brabazon, a childhood friend, the wayward nephew of a wealthy uncle; Brett Forrester, a magnetic cave man, who by some mistake lives on a yacht; and Eliot Coventry, a cynic, whose faith in all women was shattered by one of them that he refuses to fall in love with the heroine until he has rescued her twice from drowning. The main complication develops when Tony innocently compromises Ann, and the rejected and revengeful Forrester employs his knowledge of the occurrence to have Eliot break off his engagement with Ann. In due course, however, all is happily explained away and the story ends with two betrothals fully accomplished, and another hovering in the offing. Technically the book is a fairly good piece of work although a little more imagination and care in some minor matters would have improved the whole vastly. The author begins her story smartly and carries on with a briskness that insures attention although she is far too ready to take the easiest way at times, too quick to invoke the gods of coincidence. It is true she dominates her characters completely—but there is a reason. She is too much in love with them to let them go their own ways. She fails to make her villain even moderately hateful. And as to her virtuous ones! They sometimes come very near being tiresome—as tiresome as only the truly virtuous can be. It is the lesser actors in the story, Lady Susan, Sir Philip Brabazon and Cara Hilyard that furnishes the clearest and most human portraits.

The book on the whole is a pleasant story about pleasant people, well told and with a charm of its own that will probably appeal to a large number of feminine readers.

The Turk is still the old Turk. A recent cablegram from Mersina, the port of Adana, ancient Tarsus, runs: "Turkish police announced that refugees who do not leave Mersina within four days will be deported to the interior. Refugees now number 4,500. Make strong representations to Allies to prevent such deportation. If these people are deported to interior more than fifty per cent, will die. There are ships now in harbor that could take people off if anyone will receive them." And in the face of such things the world plans to strike hands with the Turk, American commercial interests want a treaty without delay, a treaty that shall accept the robbery and slaughter and deportation of the Armenians and demand no redress for them. Yes, America, this America of ours to which we like to ascribe the "moral leadership" of the world, is too heartless to open her own doors a little wider to the refugees, even when their own kin are already here.

It is the genius of foreign missions that it develops an indigenous Christian church. A church it is true that needs lots of brothering as it grows and develops, but a church nevertheless, modeled in accordance with the people's needs. A church in India shaped for India's needs and type of mind. A church in Japan that is Japanese in its psychology and polity. A church in China suited to the Chinese. And each with self-government and self-support as an objective. Not that self-support will come in our day. We have been too slow in sending out missionaries for that. But the day will arrive, when with native leadership and native consecration the churches of these nations will stand alone unaided so far as material help is concerned. This will be the missionary's glory.

Gentle Waifs

By William Willard Howard

TWO little girls, without hats or stockings, drifted in past the iron gates of the Y. W. C. A. building at the corner of a wide, imposing boulevard in a city over against the borders of Bolshevik Russia. They were thin little girls, with the pasty-white faces and threadbare garments of acute poverty.

They had not any real right to be in that big boulevard, with its park, its massive houses and its flags of foreign legations. They would not have been there at all had the police been looking. But they drifted in past the iron gates like two small shadows, probably hoping that in the cans and boxes at the back door there might be found some discarded trifle that could be eaten.

There was not anything edible at the back door; so, by a sequence of events not clearly understood, the little girls found themselves in a lofty room in the interior of the building. The room was almost bare of furniture, but contained about two score young girls, of various ages and sizes, upon whom a silence fell as the two little waifs appeared among them. One did not enter that place without stockings. It simply was not done.

It might have been an awkward moment for the two small intruders had not a pleasant-looking young woman stepped up to them and made them welcome.

"It is our recreation hour," said the young woman. "We play games and have a good time. We shall be glad to have you join us."

The two score stared. One's mamma would not be pleased to hear that one had played games with stockingless waifs from the streets; but one would not so much as think of opposing any suggestion of the American young woman. It simply was not done. When the soft voice with its undertone of authority advised you to do this or that you simply obeyed. The young woman had come thousands of miles to teach you good manners and calisthenics and basketball and English and French and other things without cost to you, and so you would be an ungrateful little animal if you refused to obey.

The games began. They probably went a bit stiffly at first, because the two little waifs from the fog and drizzle of the streets were diffident, and the two score did not know just how to manage with them. Two thin little girls, with pasty-white faces and only half enough clothing, really could not expect to mingle on terms of familiarity with native-born girls who had red-apple cheeks, sturdy waistlines and adequate clothing. There was not any formula for that sort of thing.

To make matters more embarrassing, the American young woman actually asked the two waifs if they could suggest any new games.

One waif looked at the other waif questioningly.

"Yes," said the elder waif, "we know some games, but it is a long time since we have played them."

"In Petrograd, perhaps?" said the soft voice of the American.

"Yes; but that was a long time ago, before—before we came here."

"Suppose you show us one of the games? I'm sure the girls will be glad to join in and play with you."

There was no help for it; the undertone of authority in that soft voice would not be denied.

So the two small specters of poverty began a game—slowly—diffidently. The sturdy, red-apple girls, representative of the best native families, joined in dutifully.

Then as the game went on, the two small waifs from the fogs of nowhere forgot that they were hungry, forgot that they were only half-clothed, forgot that they were strangers in an alien land. Years of hunger and cold and misery fell away from them—and they were back again in the big house in Petrograd, playing games in their own spacious nursery, with the little princess from next door and the little countess from across the boulevard for company, and the servants in livery waiting to serve cakes and chocolate when the romp should end.

The pasty-white faces flushed pink; the slim, bare legs flashed in and out; the big brown eyes sparkled with life and merriment. The sturdy, red-apple girls caught the thrill of a new, dominating leadership. They found themselves borne along on the wings of a strange enthusiasm as they obeyed without hesitation or conscious reluctance the directions of the two small leaders. Somehow it seemed to be natural and proper to obey these two waifs, as though the waifs had the right to expect obedience.

It was a glorious hour, dedicated to the inalienable rights of childhood. The cold, damp, foggy streets were far away; hunger was not; remained only joy and laughter and merry games. The half-starved waifs had come into their birth-right.

Then a bell rang somewhere. The games came to an end. The red-apple girls scampered off to lessons elsewhere. The big lofty room was empty of all save two thin little girls, without hats or stockings—two hungry little girls who fell from the rose-tinted clouds of joyous childhood to the cold, damp pavement of a foggy street.

Slowly, sadly, the two small specters of poverty drifted down the steps and out into the fog. That is all that there is to the story.

No; the two little waifs never went back to play games again. No one knows who they are or where they are.

Shall I say that no one cares? That is for you to say—you who read this. If you would like to know who they are and where they are I shall be glad to find them for you. I do not know who they are, but I have a theory. I did not see them. The story was told to me by the young woman with the soft voice underlaid with authority. If the little girls are alive I can find them. I know where to look for them.

My theory about the little girls is this: They lived in a big house in Petrograd. Their father was a member of the nobility of monarchist Russia. He was a general of the army or a high official. He was killed in the war or assassinated in the revolution. The big house was seized by revolutionists. The little girls were saved by their mother, who fled with them by night to the barren shelter of an alien land.

The little girls did not return to play games because their mother would not let them go. When the little girls returned to the miserable place that they call home and told their mother about their wonderful adventure they were forbidden to go to that place again—because half-clad girls are not supposed to go there. So they never went back.

If you desire that I shall find the two little girls you must not send me on my search empty-handed. It would not do any good simply to find the two waifs. I must have in my hands the means to give employment to the mother, so that she may earn enough money to buy food and shoes and stockings for her little girls. I must set the mother to work making those beautiful hand-embroidered, hand-sewn Russian Princess Blouses that I have written about in THE CHRISTIAN WORK during the past four weeks.

The necessary organization for giving employment to the mother of the little girls is in full working order. Anne Louise Howard, who accompanied me to Europe last November, is in that same far-away city of Eastern Europe giving employment, with our own private funds, to two hundred gentlewomen. She will add the mother of the two little girls to her working force if you desire that she do so. All that you need do is to send a contribution, in any amount, to the working fund.

Subscriptions should be sent to the Russian Refugee Fund, care THE CHRISTIAN WORK, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York City. An illustrated booklet giving twenty-five photo-engravings of Russian Princess Blouses, now ready for delivery, will be mailed to any address for the asking.

COUNTRY CHURCH DEPARTMENT

Conducted by Rev. Edmund de S. Brunner, Ph.D.

Rainy Mountain of the Kiowas

The American Indian responds just as keenly to a modern country church program as the pale face immigrants who have overrun his continent. The Kiowas at Mountain View, Oklahoma, have a community of 450 and a church membership of 238. The people all live in the open country. There are no other churches in the field, the few white people either going to town or having occasional school house preaching from the Indian pastor-missionary. Two decades ago the Indians were still living in tepees; to-day nearly every family has a house and lives in it. No longer do they shift from place to place; the population has become permanent and settled.

The program on Sunday is unique. The morning service occurs at eleven o'clock, after which the Indians go to the mess house, where all eat dinner, according to the time-honored custom. Early in the afternoon the young people gather, forty in number, for a meeting in the lecture room of the church, while the older people gather for a similar service in the auditorium. Later the entire church goes into the large room for the opening services of the Sunday-school. The singing here is in both English and Kiowa. The officers of the school are all Kiowa young people and two of the six classes are taught in the Indian language. The adult teacher is a young Kiowa man. An informal vesper service usually follows Sunday-school, after which they return to their homes.

These Indians have an $8,000 new brick church, for which they raised nearly all the money. They have not been in debt for any part of it. The old church is now used as the mess house and for socials and special community meetings. The Indians are very proud of their new building. The church owns eighty acres of land and provides a home for the missionary. In January the church holds a week of intensive Bible study, at which time the young people gather and live in tents on the church ground. An effort is now being made to start a Christian school and the first tentative steps are being taken along the lines of community service. The treasury report shows a budget of nearly $3,000 a year

A sense of humor is a helpful more often than a dangerous thing. One country church pastor writes that he has two debating organizations in his church. "The Women," included in the Ladies' Mite Society, and "The Men," otherwise known as trustees. One of the chief subjects for debate is, "Who Shall Clean the Church?" The result is that the church has not been swept out for a half year.

Once there was a wise man who built his church upon his young people and the church endured the loss of the saints by death and the loss of the tenant by removal. His work includes boys' and girls' clubs and his equipment a stereopticon, ping-pong tables, indoor croquet tables, a slide for the small children, swings, trapezes and other gymnasium equipment, together with a volley ball court with tennis soon to be added. A daily vacation Bible school was run during the last summer. The spiritual work is not neglected, as there is an Epworth League, junior and senior, missionary societies, a Queen Esther circle and other organizations. The club room in the basement is used two nights a week. The pastor has trained leadership in his own congregation, so that his progressive program of both religious education and recreation is under complete charge of a steward in each of these departments. His church is the Silver City, Iowa, Methodist.

How much of a program can be put on by a minister who has a circuit of seven churches? Rev. Paul Doran, down in Tennessee, is answering this question in a remarkable way. He gives each of the preaching points more time than the average church on a circuit of seven would have. He co-operates with the county agent and his own small farm has been the scene of many demonstration and agricultural meetings. His home is the depository for all government bulletins. In addition, it is practically a parish house, for one room is open to the community, and magazines and papers, along with some books, are accessible. The young people gather here and practically all of the social life centers around the parsonage. At another end of the parish there is a community house with a community worker, who pays the rent for the house out of her own very small salary. The minister's wife is the other community worker, and she serves without salary. Mr. Doran makes five hundred calls a year in homes and about as many more to the men as they work in the fields. The total membership of the parish, distributed among seven churches is over three hundred.

A seven-day-a-week program of which spiritual leadership is the corner stone is better than any narrowly conceived evangelistic meeting. This is the absolute conviction of Rev. V. H. Van Horn, who has seen his church grow from a membership of sixty to 175 within the last three years, with the Sunday-school making a nearly similar growth. In the same time the salary has been increased from $700 to $2,000; the benevolences from $250 to $1,400. This last year a $40,000 church was built, dedicated free of debt. This church includes an auditorium, modern Sunday-school rooms, gymnasium, showers and lockers and full equipment

---

Denominational psychology is a fearful and wonderful thing. Despite all our good intentions and our vows, inheritances from the old days of the circuit rider competition still creep into public attention. From a piece of literature from one of the most progressive denominations, and one which has fought hardest for co-operation and comity agreements, comes this delicious bit of denominational egotism: "The expanding program of the church has brought with it an enlarged sense of the obligation of the church to all members of the community. It has also brought especially to the ——— denomination, because of the system of organization under which it works, an obligation to plan for the care of all families not cared for by other denominations." Presumably, no other denomination but this one has such lofty ideals of service!

The Children's Bureau has just issued the first survey on "Nutrition and Care of Children in the Rural Area." The area selected happened to be a mountain county in Kentucky. The study followed other surveys of the bureau which covered the subject of maternity and infant care. The bulletin is written by Miss Lydia Roberts and is a most informing piece of work. It should by all means receive the attention of ministers and social workers even though the area covered is frankly exceptional. The bulletin is illustrated with some telling photographs. Additional copies may be had from the Superintendent of Public Documents, Washington, D. C., for ten cents, by ordering publication No. 110 of the Children's Bureau.

"CHURCH STREET," by Jean Carter Cochran. Westminster Press. $1.50. This is a little book of 227 pages which gives the better side of Main Street. The sketches, a number of which have been published in the "Outlook," "The Bookman" and other magazines, are written with an understanding of the wholesome values of American village life in which the church plays a very useful part through the long years. There is no blinking of the real facts, but the emphasis has been constructive. Apart from a slight tendency to become sentimental in places, this book is a very useful contribution to the literature of American village life.

Work Among Farm and Cannery Migrants

THE interdenominational service rendered to the migrant groups of women and children in canneries and on truck farms has now been conducted for three summers. Ten women's boards financially co-operated in last year's work, the Council of Women for Home Mission providing office space and supervisor. Committees in the local communities co-operate both in moral support and in providing supplies, and, in some cases, means of transportation for the children. Six stations were maintained last Summer averaging eight and a half weeks per station, a total of fifty-one weeks.

Twenty workers served at the stations, for the most part undergraduate college girls who were experienced along either day nursery, playground work, or domestic science. The transformations wrought by these girls were simply marvelous considering the short space of time the stations could be open—only the canning season. To bring a group of neglected children into a state of good discipline, to teach manners, morals, personal hygiene, games and handcraft, sewing, preparation of simple meals, songs, and chapters from the Bible in eight weeks is no small task. Those who visited the stations, who had had experience in similar work, said the finished product was almost unbelievable.

Museum of the American Indian

THE Museum of the American Indian, Heye Foundation, in New York City, is the only institution in the world devoted exclusively to the American Indian race. "Although centuries have elapsed since the discovery of America," stated Mr. George G. Heye, founder and director, "science has not positively determined the origin of the Indian tribes found throughout the Western Hemisphere. That mystery may be unveiled some day, but it will require the most intensive research to accomplish that result. There are notable collections of Indian subjects in other museums in this country, but in this one the manners and customs of the American Indians may be studied with thoroughness because every other factor has been eliminated."

A unique feature of the arrangement of the collection is the synoptic form in which some of the articles are placed, enabling the observer to follow the process of manufacture, step by step, in a way that can be done usually only by photographs. Pottery making is followed from the rolling of the clay into strips through the process of decorating; and embroidery and bead-making may be followed in a similar way. Manufacturers of textiles have received ideas from these exhibits which are of practical value. Many of the objects, centuries old, were dyed with vegetable colors, apparently as fresh now as when first applied.

The museum will be open to the public every day in the year, and it is expected that many students and scientists, as well as the general public, will avail themselves of the unusual opportunities it offers.—Southern Workman.

Elijah, the Brave Reformer

I KINGS 18:30-39.

"Choose you this day whom ye will serve."—Josh. 24:15.

IF Elijah was brave, it was because he lost all thought of himself in connection with the cause he served. There was no peace or comfort for him apart from the success of that cause. When he thought his work was a failure he prayed that he might die. However much he sinned in falling into the despair of that doubt, he showed himself so completely wrapt up in his work that he could look forward to no life save in its success. Such an attitude makes for bravery, not the considered courage of the man who forces himself to his task, but the inevitable heroism of one who is for the time the embodiment of the principle for which he contends. Wordsworth wrote of "The man, who . . .

Plays in the many games of life, that one
Where what he most doth value must be won;
Whom neither shape of danger can dismay,
Nor thought of tender happiness betray."

There can be no unhappier condition than that of half-hearted allegiance to a cause. For in such a situation one will be torn between consideration for his own safety and comfort, and the demands of the movement which has partly won his loyalty. Such a man's devotion will rise no higher than to serve when there is promise of success, and to withdraw to save himself whenever disaster threatens. And he will always miss the thrill of absorption in something outside of and bigger than himself. He will feel the call of duty without the inspiration that comes when the glory of a duty possesses one utterly. Horace Traubel wrote:

"I served the great cause, the great cause served me;
There were never any debts between us, the compact was without obligation;
I answered its cry, it answered my cry;
The seed in the ground hungered for light, the light pierced the earth with unerring love—
We met, ran together, appointed mates."

Elijah has been called the awakened conscience of Israel. It is a high tribute to him that sees nothing of self in his ministry. If anyone had talked of bravery to such a man he would have exclaimed, "Woe unto me, if I witness not for the truth."

Another thing that made for the flaming zeal of Elijah, and it has been true of all great reformers, he brushed by many details and minor aspects of the national problem and saw a single moral issue at the heart of it all. The political issue that confronted the prophet might be variously described according to the point of view. An alliance had been formed between Israel and Phoenicia, and had been cemented by the marriage between Ahab and Jezebel. Jezebel was no ordinary woman. She was determined to bring to her new country much of what she had been accustomed to in her native land. And Phoenicia was a great nation. Industrially it was far more developed than Israel. And from some points of view its culture was richer and more varied.

In fact, some writers have professed to see in what they have called the contest between Elijah and Jezebel merely the struggle between an old order and a new, between a simple and narrow régime and the inevitable complexities of a higher order of civilization, industrially so at least. Jezebel, it is said, was determined to bring many of the improvements of the Phœnician civilization to backward and provincial Israel. Of course, in doing so she was bound to bring a great many things not so good.

But such is always the argument for an advancing civilization. You cannot have the higher industrial development without the attendant evils. You cannot enjoy a richer culture without many inevitable social developments that are unfortunate. Elijah, say some of these modern commentators, was one of that group of narrow men who in all times would keep back the tide of advancing civilization in order to preserve the simple moral ideals and religious practices of the fathers.

There is no indication what Elijah may have thought about any particular industrial reforms or social developments introduced by this determined queen from a neighboring country. If the seizure of Naboth's vineyard was a new method of settling industrial disputes, he was against it with all the moral force of his being. But if Elijah did see anything in Jezebel's influence and work that promised a fuller development for Israel, he did believe that the price was too great for Israel to pay.

The prophet was a great patriot. That was true of all the prophets. They loved their nation, and they believed that whatever they condemned threatened the very life of the nation. Elijah did not want to keep Israel isolated and provincial. He wanted to keep Israel a going concern, and he believed with his whole heart that Israel's fortunes, her destiny, her very peace were tied up with her loyalty to Jehovah. He was not an enemy to a richer civilization. But he was in no hurry about advancing civilization. It must come in right ways if it was to endure. If it came about in wrong ways it would have to be torn down, and painfully and laboriously built up again.

History seems to be a record of peoples carried away by the glory of power and greatness. Men have made a god of development into richer and more varied political and social life. We talk about civilization as though it were a definite and inevitable goal toward which life must rush. There are "higher" civilizations and "lower" civilizations, the higher and the lower being measured generally in terms of wealth and power. And we grow hardened to the evils attendant upon our civilizations. They are somewhat compensated for by the extension of life, and the new opportunities for living opened up.

So, at the present time, there are many misgivings about our industrial development. There is no question about increased production, and our rapidly accumulating wealth, but the effect of the system upon the workers is not a matter of quite so much comfort and confidence. Great cities, centers of industry, are glorified, but what the inevitable living conditions are doing to the family, and home life, and to the popular moral standards in general is causing widespread concern if not dismay. Commercialism, often hailed as a great force leading the van in the spread of modern civilization, has involved, and threatens to further involve, the nations in so many dreadful difficulties that many prophets are now crying that the present industrial order is not Christian, and can never be Christianized.

In what we call progress there has been a lure in going on merely to bigger things. In the vast and rapidly moving procession religion has not been in the lead. Something in the way of a more material ambition, a more selfish interest, has been the compelling force. Religion, if it has been counted on at all as a help, has been reckoned as a sort of steadying force to keep the ship as nearly as possible on an even keel, or perhaps as a salvaging agency to follow on and save as much of the inevitable wreckage as possible.

If this was the situation in which Elijah found himself and his people, in the midst of a development accelerated by the ambition of an alien queen, we need not think of the prophet as merely opposed to progress. But he stood for something before progress, without which any advancement must be futile. It was more important for a people to be right than to go ahead. Any going ahead that was not on sound moral and spiritual lines would be but riding for a fall.

Israel should have learned that lesson by Elijah's time. Other alliances had been made that promised, and for a time afforded more wealth, a more varied culture, bigger territory and bigger armies. But so far as real progress was concerned it had been going one step forward and then several backward, with immense tragedies in addition to the loss of time.

And we are still doing it: building more rapidly than we know how to build, glorifying mere greatness and rushing on to our so-called destiny impatient at the suggestions that we follow everywhere and in all things the laws of God. So our Babels go up, and sooner or later topple over, destroying millions no more guilty or careless than the others who survive.

Lincoln came more and more to feel, during the days of the Civil War, that there was an underlying justice in that great tragedy. The people had developed on false lines, and such development entailed its heavy penalties. So he said in his second inaugural: "If we shall suppose that American slavery is one of those offenses which . . . must needs come but . . . which He now wills to remove, and that He gives to both North and South this terrible war as the woe due to those by whom the offense came, shall we discern therein any departure from those divine attributes which the believers in a living God always ascribe to him? Fondly do we hope, fervently do we pray, that this mighty scourge of war may speedily pass away.

Yet, if God wills that it continue until all the wealth piled by the bondman's two hundred years of unrequited toil shall be sunk, and every drop of blood drawn with the lash shall be paid by another drawn with the sword, as was said three thousand years ago, so it must still be said, 'The judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether.'"

The same words might be uttered at any time of judgment, when advancing civilization may be overtaken by its weaknesses. The lure of mere size, of wealth, of widening influence has been the undoing of many peoples.

Elijah, true prophet that he was, was but anticipating the judgments of Jehovah. There was no seeking first the kingdom of God and his righteousness in this policy of Jezebel and Ahab. They were going after the "other things" directly. The kingdom-of-God first plan was too slow, and so like all nations on the wrong track they adopted gods more congenial to their personal ambitions.

Elijah looms up as a greater man than a last lone prophet of Jehovah calling the people back to the old ways they had forsaken. He was as eager for national strength and greatness as any, but he knew what sort, alone, could endure. With the unerring instinct of a true seer, he saw that the issue was a moral one, just a question of right and wrong. Any policy of national expansion that harbored things unethical or immoral was not only bad religion, but it was bad statesmanship. If the juggernaut of industrial progress rides ruthlessly over the lives of little children, or the rights of backward people, it may carry far but it will not avail. The people who have so progressed will some day have to return to the point where they went wrong and pay for all the injustice done. All sound statesmanship must be first of all religious, all social development must be founded on the true and righteous judgments of God.

Very dramatic was Elijah's contest with the prophets of Baal, the recital of which forms the heart of the narrative concerning this brave reformer. He there singled out the one issue which it was his mission to emphasize. It was the one issue between Jezebel and himself, between the whole people and himself. Was their plan of development keeping them loyal to the one true God? In fact the issue had gone farther than that. Their way of life had made them seek more congenial gods, and the issue was as to who was on the side of the true God.

It is an interesting fact that these apostate Israelites believed more or less in these adopted gods of theirs. It is doubtful if the contest would have gone on if there had not been some expectation that Baal would prove himself alive and possessing power. People always believe in the gods of their own fashioning until some test proves the falsity of their conception. The German people believed in their "Got Mit Uns." "These things hast thou done, and I kept silence; thou thoughtest that I was altogether such a one as thyself." In these words the writer of the Fiftieth Psalm set forth a very common tendency in the ways of erring men.

It is not enough that men worship God. It is all important that they worship the true God. There is altogether too much generalizing about religion, and the religious tendency. Men have gone farther astray following supposedly religious impulses than in any other way. The gods of peoples' own imaginings have given their sanction to the worst of crimes. So long as men are content to follow their own selfish wills and use religion merely as a cloak of respectability there will be no testing of faith.

But faith must be tested. Fearlessly spoke Elijah. He had no prejudice in favor of names. "If Jehovah be God, follow Him; but if Baal, then follow him." But test it out somehow by tests that are real.

In your personal life there will be no opposing sacrifices to be consumed by miraculous fire. In our national life there will be no dramatic gatherings on some hillside with the adherents of different faiths, and of no faith at all, ranged over against each other. But there are tests which ought to be fearlessly applied. A real faith in the true God should give you the "untroubled heart," moral purpose, and freedom from all fear. Faith in the true God will cause mercy and truth to meet together, and righteousness and peace to kiss each other. Is the faith of America doing that? Do we dare test our religion along those lines?

Again that valiant prophet may come to us, and face us in the whirl of modern development, pointing out that all that is not true to God in our progress will be vain, and worse than vain; and ranging us before him challenge us, as he did Israel of old, to test out and seek a God who is a living God, who will show his power at the call of his people.

THE CHRISTIAN INVESTOR

A correspondent asks how she, a Christian woman and a holder in moderate amount of railroad securities, can express in the capacity of stockholder her loyalty to the social ideals of the churches. Referring to the proxies put in her hands she writes: "I don't want to empower any of these gentlemen to vote in my name for any policy that may seem advantageous to the stockholders without regard to labor conditions." She has asked one of the railroads in question concerning its labor policy and received a "polite but non-committal reply." We would welcome suggestions from persons similarly placed who may have had helpful experience.

The internal debt of France will be about 300,000,000,000 francs at the close of this year, says Alonzo E. Taylor in the March issue of "Our World." "The interest charges on this debt amount to about eighteen billion francs. This sum equals the present revenue of the State. The irreducible minimum of outlays (excluding pensions and improvements) is some eleven billion francs . . . at present prices. The overshadowing financial crisis of France is not fully appreciated in the United States."

"It is not a new problem in international relationship; it is wholly a question of accepting an established institution of high character, and making effective all the fine things which have been said by us in favor of such an agency of advanced civilization. Our deliberate public opinion of to-day is overwhelmingly in favor of our full participation and the attending obligations of maintenance and the furtherance of its prestige. . . . Such action would . . . remind the world anew that we are ready for our proper part in furthering peace and adding to stability in world affairs."—Sentences from President Harding's message. ### A CHURCH EXECUTIVE ON JEWISH SELF-CONSCIOUSNESS

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN WORK:

Your article on "The Revival of Anti-Semitism" is one of the sanest statements I have read upon this subject. In our conferences with Jewish rabbis it is pretty difficult to get them to see that there is anything on their side which needs to be modified. Their grievances are so many and their feelings so intense that they think only of wrongs which they have suffered. I appreciate this article and wish to say as much to you.

WEARINESS OF CONTROVERSY

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN WORK:

It's almost disheartening to read the persistent controversies about "beliefs," "freedom in the pulpit," and all the divisive questions that churches so much concern themselves about. I often ask myself, What would Christ himself think of it all? Christianity is a life, isn't it? It's not a philosophy, a system, a method; all these divide the children of God. If all of us lived in his spirit, what a world we should have—a veritable kingdom of heaven on earth!

A. W. LITTLEFIELD.

Gammon Seminary's motto was especially written by that poet of liberty, John Greenleaf Whittier:

"Light, Freedom, Truth, be ever these thine own;

Light to see Truth, Freedom to make it known;

Our work, God's work, our wills, His will alone."

The aim of the Seminary is to send throughout the South earnest, practical evangelical preachers who will render intelligent and loyal service for Christ and the Church.

THE EPISCOPAL POSITION AS AN EPISCOPALIAN SEES IT

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN WORK:

The utterances of THE CHRISTIAN WORK are usually so courteous and measured that one reads with surprise the comments on Episcopalians and unity in your issue of April 14. It may well be, as you say, that Episcopalians lack a sense of humor when discussing matters like unity, but even this is better than lightness or flippancy. Is it not rather, perhaps, that we Episcopalians have been taught to treat serious matters seriously and religious matters reverently, and that we place the subject of faith and order in both categories?

I cannot speak officially, but I think that the following represents the position which we, in common with the majority of Christendom, hold:

We believe that apostolic orders were ordained by Christ.

That these orders are the main channels of God's grace as conveyed through the sacraments of Christ's institution, especially the sacrament of holy communion.

That, therefore, this sacrament in particular owes its full validity and efficacy to a priesthood duly ordained by bishops in the apostolic succession.

That we have such valid orders insuring the full efficacy of the sacrament.

That all of this is according to the mind and purpose of Christ; that it is in conformity with the doctrine and practice of the universal Church for the first fifteen centuries of her existence; and that it expresses what the larger portion of the Church to-day considers as of the Church's essence.

That those communions which became separated from the great body of faith and order in the sixteenth century were thereby deprived of their major access to sacramental grace.

We recognize schism as a sin, and we confess with shame that we have, in the past, done much, very much, to force others into this sin. But we are now in dead earnest in our desire for Church unity, and we do not regard this matter as one which lends itself readily to humorous treatment.

We may not always act like gentlemen, but the attempt, on the part of a homedweller, to induce an absent member of the family, albeit a contented one, to return to the blessed shelter and opportunity of his proper home, is surely not an ungentlemanly course, or an act characteristic of a cad.

WILLIAM C. STURGIS.

Educational Secretary, Department of Missions, National Council of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

[Dr. Sturgis's deep concern with what seem very minor matters to most evangelical Christians is fairly illustrative of the weakness of his Church. It is hard to think that the Man who spoke the sermon on the mount was greatly exercised over sacraments and orders. We suspect that the average Christian outside the Episcopal flock feels no more like a prodigal than does the Episcopalian because he is outside the flock of Rome.]

The Legislative Committee of the National Board, Young Women's Christian Association, is deeply concerned over the activities of the National Women's Party to wipe out all protective legislation for women. Commenting upon the "Equal Rights" bills the committee expresses fear that such proposed amendments or changes will imperil all progress in this direction. To obtain the eight-hour day and a living wage without legislation would require 127 years, judging from the rate of progress to date, the committee says. Except in States where laws fix minimum standards for women, hours of labor are longer for women than men and wages fall far below standards of living. To ask for legal protection for women workers is not to ask for special privileges, but merely a specific kind of protection which may or may not be needed by men, it points out. Men ask for the kind of protection that is needed by them. Mrs. Harry D. Nims, of New York, is chairman of the Legislative Committee. Miss Margaret Hiller is executive secretary.

Is your church building flexible?

BY that we mean, is it equipped to properly care for its many interests—clubs, societies, etc? Is it economical in light and heat?

Since 1876 we have been co-operating with thousands of churches all over the country, helping them in their problems of proper housing. Right now we could probably do the same for you.

Without altering the structure in any way, Wilson's section-fold and rolling partitions will enable your present church to efficiently care for its many activities.

With them you can divide one room into many, or many into one.

The saving in light and heat alone often warrants their cost.

May we tell you why?

REASONS FOR OUR ENTERING THE WORLD COURT

The President's great point in his speech to the Associated Press was, of course, his support of our entry into the World Court. He made his declaration in regard to the League because he wants it clearly understood that the question of our entering the Court and of our entering the League are entirely separate. He went over again the ground covered in his message to Congress the week before its adjournment and in Secretary Hughes' letter on the court. He pointed out that we can resort to the court as it is now, but commented that it was more self-respecting to take our place in it frankly as one of the constituent states. What he argued in behalf of the Court would apply in the minds of many of us equally in behalf of the League. "We can," he said, "do vastly more to perfect it in the capacity of an adherent than in an aloofness in which we arrogate to ourselves a right to say to the world, 'We dictate, but never comply.' I would yield none of our rights; none of our nationality, but would gladly give of our influence and our co-operation to move forward and upward toward that world peace and that reign of justice which is infinitely more secure in the rule of national honor than in national or international force." Secretary Hughes later in the week also made an able speech in support of our entry into the World Court. From statements made by numerous Senators it would seem that the project to enter the World Court should pass in the Senate by a substantial majority. Practically all the Democrats favor it and only the more extreme of the Republican irreconcilables have declared themselves definitely against it. To turn back to the President's speech again, he closed it with a rather interesting argument in behalf of party loyalty. While he supports the direct primary, he considers that it has done much to break down party discipline. "Our drift to-day," he remarked, "is toward pure democracy, and no pure democracy ever long survived."

THE NEW CONFERENCE AT LAUSANNE

The Turks and the representatives of the Powers have returned to Lausanne to thresh out economic questions and questions concerning special rights of foreigners in Turkey. The main issues at present are whether the payment of interest on the Turkish debt to France shall be in French paper or in gold; what arrangements shall replace the capitulations; and what adjustments shall be made of the Ottoman debt between area formerly Turkish and the present state of Turkey. The question of the Chester concessions has constantly been in the minds of the delegates, although it has not yet been threshed out before the conference. The Turks had expected that they would receive the support of the American observers as part payment for these concessions. Thus far Minister Grew, who is the only one of the three American observers of the first conference who is present at the second, has taken a dignified position. He has expressed his belief in the policy of the Open Door, as did our observers at the earlier conference. He has not committed himself to the support of the Chester concessions through thick and thin, but on the contrary has made it fairly apparent that the United States will not back them unless they are legitimate. But our government should make it absolutely clear that we are far more concerned for justice to the deportees from Turkey and to all religious and racial minorities than we are for any commercial profits. Let Minister Grew stand for the rights of people over against the rights of dollars. Let him explode a bombshell at Lausanne this month. Let him tell the Turks that the United States will make no treaty with Turkey whatsoever until Turkey has made adequate provision for the Armenians. If America, through its spokesman, will do that, America will play the man and the world will recognize that for once "Anglo Saxon hypocrisy" is not a fact; that we are not to be bought off with the price of blood; that, at least, one nation besides Russia in this world cares for humanity. Moreover, it will be effective. Turkey is in a bad way economically. She has driven out the populations who had business and industrial ability. Her towns are without artisans or merchants. She may bluster for a while, but sooner or later she will yield. Even from the point of view of business, it will be profitable for America that we should play the decent Christian.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

THE JEW AND THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH

Some three million nine hundred thousand Jews live in America. The Jewish synagogues report a constituency of one million six hundred thousand. That means that the Jewish religious organizations themselves claim only about two-fifths of the people of their race. A large proportion of the race is really religiously adrift. In much of Europe pressure upon the Jews as a race and as a religious body has kept them together. Here the pressure is pretty well released. Wherever such is the case the Jew shows himself a remarkably open-minded man, ready to receive new ideas. Indeed, he is almost too ready for new ideas, the reason why he has been so prominent in the leadership of Soviet Russia. Next month at Princeton, New Jersey, in the buildings of the Theological Seminary, a special interdenominational conference will meet under the direction of the Department of Jewish Evangelization of the new Presbyterian Board of National Missions. Church and board workers in Jewish neighborhoods, colporteurs, pastors and others who are concerned for the spiritual welfare of the Jew will participate in the conference. Those who are interested should register with Dr. John Stewart Corning, superintendent of the Presbyterian Board's Department of Jewish Evangelization, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York City. If the conference is honest it will consider the question of how to free our churches from all anti-semitic feeling. We suspect that in New York a considerable proportion of the churches would not welcome a mass movement of Jews into them. We recall the experience of one pastor on the East Side of New York who has had to fight a genuine battle to get his few people to be willing that Jewish children should attend their prayer meeting. The pastor had started a stereopticon picture course for the children which met just before prayer meeting. The children as they grew older begged to stay to the meeting. On account of the attitude of his people the pastor has had to limit the number who may come each night. A number of Jews have joined his church, brought in by his own friendliness. If the so-called Christians of that particular organization had opened their hearts and their building cordially to the Jewish population about it, indications are that there would have been a very considerable influx of Jews into that particular church. We in America may be on the way to a real fusion of the Jews with the mass of the people, not only socially and racially, but religiously also.

THE UNFROCKING OF TIKHON

The Living Church, the ecclesiastical organization fostered by the Soviet Government, met in convention at Moscow last week and proceeded to unfrock the Patriarch Tikhon. Tikhon has been in prison for months, not under charge of treason, because of his courage in standing up for the rights of the Church. Apparently, the protest against the execution of Vicar General Butchkavitch has led the Soviet Government to feel that it would be most unwise to plan the execution of Tikhon, but the Council of the Living Church, after unfrocking the Patriarch, abolished his office altogether and decreed that the supreme authority in the Church lay in the Council. We have already commented on the attempt of the Soviet Government to split the Church by fostering the "Living Church" and other schismatic movements. The Soviet Government or the Living Church authorities invited the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America and the American Methodist Episcopal Church to send representatives to this so-called "All-Russian" Church conclave. The Federal Council was better advised than to consider the invitation, but the Methodists were so flattered that for a while they planned to accept it officially, and one of their bishops, Edgar Blake, attended the Moscow Council as a sort of "unofficial observer." His speech at the Council has created a very bad impression, not only on the Church at large, but on the American Methodists themselves. Apparently, the Bishop tried to curry favor with this politico-religious organization. "Revolutions and upheavals are not born of death," he said. "They just show new life and our hearts should be filled with gladness. . . . The Church cannot stop new movements, but must join them. What we pray for in America is that the Lord will give us a ministry that will accept and join new movements." Such sentiments may or may not be objectionable. It depends upon to what they refer and to whom they are addressed. Given out to an organization which is simply one means of anti-religious propaganda they are extremely ill-judged. As all the world knows, the Soviet Government is conducting a systematic movement against religion. It publishes a magazine entitled "Anti-God." A recent copy of that magazine on its cover bore a picture of a horse's head with the all-seeing eye of God, the whole crowned by the capitalist's hat and marked "Jehovah." On the cover of another issue of the same publication appeared a picture of Jesus embedded in a capitalist's head. The Methodist bishops of this country are better advised than their over-enthusiastic representative. The Board of Bishops passed a resolution at Wichita last week recalling the Methodist Episcopal delegation from Russia and refusing to accept responsibility for any of the reported remarks of Bishop Blake. We are glad to see that the Methodist Episcopal Church retains its senses.

SUNDAY SCHOOLS IN EUROPE

Dr. W. G. Landes, General Secretary of the World Sunday-School Association, and James Kelley, M. A. Secretary of the Scottish National Sunday-School Union, and also of the Convention Council which is in charge of plans for the Glasgow World's Sunday-School Convention, recently made a twelve weeks' tour to see the Sunday-schools of Europe at first-hand. The Sunday-school movement is growing among the Protestant churches of Europe. In Czechoslovakia, where the new national church should develop Sunday-schools in due time, the Sunday-school commissioners found one village school of seventy-five pupils with only five Bibles for the entire school. In Czechoslovakia, as in Hungary, the great need is for workers, literature, and especially Bibles. In Austria a good Sunday-school committee is planning to open a number of mission schools in Vienna. In Budapest the magistrates grant the use of classrooms in public schools free of cost for Sunday-school purposes. The classrooms are filled with children at every session. In Spain the Protestants have just organized a national Sunday-school Union, which will hold its first convention in Madrid this month. Altogether there are seventy Sunday-schools with one hundred forty-two officers and teachers and four thousand eight hundred and thirty scholars in Spain. Portugal, too, has recently organized a national Sunday-school committee, which has applied for recognition as a section of the World's Sunday-School Association. We may shortly expect a visit from the Secretary of the French Sunday-School Union, Pastor Jean Laroche. His organization has raised a fund to send him to England and America for a three months' period to study modern Sunday-school methods and literature.

THE PRESBYTERIAN BOARD OF NATIONAL MISSIONS

The treasurers of the local Presbyterian churches of this country will be very grateful for the merging of the boards and agencies of their denomination. As is familiar to most of our readers, the Presbyterians have reduced their seventeen boards and agencies to four. Their Board of National Missions, which is now organizing, includes their old Board of Home Missions, the Women's Board of Home Missions, the Board of Church Erection, the Freedmen's Board, the Missionary Department of their Board of Publication and Sabbath School Work, and their Committee on Evangelization and on Chaplains. The new Board has elected Dr. John A. Marquis its general secretary. Dr. Marquis is at present one of the secretaries of the Board of Home Missions, a man who commands the universal confidence of the Presbyterian Church. The clerk of the new Board is Rev. Hermann N. Morse, one of the younger men in the Board of Home Missions, and a man who has shown very great ability in helping to shape the budget of the Board in recent years. The president of the new Board is Dr. Joseph A. Vance, of Detroit. Dr. Vance combines administrative ability with a broad catholic spirit. His brother, James I. Vance, minister of the First Presbyterian Church of Nashville, Tennessee, is chairman of the Executive Committee of the Southern Presbyterians' Board of Foreign Missions. With two brothers occupying such positions of influence in their respective churches, there should be a very decided growth in mutual understanding between the Northern and Southern Presbyterian churches. Mrs. Fred S. Bennett, who has been president of the Women's Board of Foreign Missions, is the first vice-president of the Board of National Missions. Roy M. Hart, formerly a member of the Board of Church Erection, is its second vice-president. Among the other members of the Executive Committee are Maitland Alexander of Pittsburgh, Henry Sloan Coffin of New York, Herbert K. Twitchell, the New York banker, and Mrs. Eva Clark Waid. The Board will not completely organize until September. The present boards will probably continue to function until the end of the calendar year.

THE WOODROW WILSON FOUNDATION

The day of the Presidential election of 1920, Mrs. Charles E. Simonson remarked to her good friend, Mrs. Charles L. Tiffany, both ardent admirers of Mr. Wilson, "Cannot we do something for Mr. Wilson?" Mrs. Tiffany answered, "That's an awfully nice idea, but what can we do?" A few weeks later when the Nobel Peace Prize was awarded to Mr. Wilson, Mrs. Tiffany remarked to Mrs. Simonson, "That's the kind of thing that I wish we could do in honor of Mr. Wilson." So it is a permanent foundation for "that kind of thing" into which the gifts of thousands of people have gone in honor of the ex-President. The Woodrow Wilson Foundation will give prizes for displays of good citizenship as the Nobel Fund gives prizes for work in behalf of peace, for idealistic literature, chemical discovery, and so on. Hamilton Holt, freed from his more pressing duties as editor of "The Independent," became director general in raising the fund. On the day when subscriptions to the fund were opened, and an hour set apart especially for honoring the ex-President, in some States people actually waited on line to bring their gifts. The morning that the headquarters office was opened in New York those in charge found a man waiting at the door when they arrived. "I'm a poor man," he told them. "I managed to buy five one hundred dollar Liberty Bonds during the war. I felt that that was not money that I wanted to use for myself. I wanted to use it for something else. I gave one to the Red Cross, one to the Y. M. C. A., one to the Y. W. C. A. I have two left and I will give one to the Woodrow Wilson Fund." Money for the fund came in from every State, and it came in almost entirely in small amounts, fifty cents, one dollar, five dollars, ten dollars. Men of large means seemed to feel that the Woodrow Wilson Fund was to be a national memorial to Mr. Wilson and accordingly gave comparatively small sums toward it in order that it might be made up by the people as a whole. The woman in charge of the women's end of the campaign in one State had this experience: The chambermaid of the hotel where she was staying asked her if she might borrow her "New York Times." "The Times" at that time was publishing a series of articles on Woodrow Wilson. The maid explained that she liked to read everything she could about the ex-President. The other woman said, "We are raising a fund to honor him," and explained the scheme. The next day the chambermaid brought five dollars. "The milkman," she said, "gave me one, my landlady gave me one, my dressmaker gave me one, the bell boy gave me one, and I gave the other." The Foundation amounts to $800,000. Its present income is $28,000. Although there never has been a drive in behalf of the fund, the money is still coming in and there appears no doubt that it will come up to the one million dollar mark, which is its objective. Now that the fund is an established fact, a Board of Trustees has been elected. Their president is Ernest M. Hopkins, president of Dartmouth and a life-long Republican. The others on the Board are President Alderman of the University of Virginia; General Tasker H. Bliss; Cleveland H. Dodge, a classmate of ex-President Wilson and an intimate life-long friend; Samuel Gompers; Cyrus H. McCormick, eminent manufacturer; Dr. William J. Mayo, the great surgeon; ex-Ambassadors Henry Morgenthau and Roland S. Morris; Franklin D. Roosevelt, ex-Assistant Secretary of the Navy, and a man who honors the Roosevelt name; Mrs. Charles L. Tiffany, Mrs. Charles E. Simonson, Senator Walsh of Montana, William Allen White and President Mary E. Woolley of Mt. Holyoke College. In his speech at the inauguration of the trustees last week Cleveland Dodge made what was in effect a prophecy of the regard in which Mr. Wilson will be held in future generations. He described how, when he boarded the ship for his recent trip to Bermuda, Cass Gilbert's masterpiece, the lovely tower of the Woolworth Building, was more or less obscured by the buildings on West Street. As the boat went down the Narrows the great skyscraper of lower New York merged into one mass. The farther the boat drifted from New York, the lower the mass of the buildings grew, but Woolworth Tower grew higher and higher, until, when they were out at sea, it was all that was left of the great city.

ARE WE GIVING OUR STUDENTS THE RIGHT EDUCATION?

Not all our own students are perfectly satisfied with the type of education which they are receiving. "The Yale Saturday Evening Post" not long ago printed these words:

We believe—that Yale is preparing men not to live but to make a living; that the life of the average undergraduate is stupid, empty and meaningless; that athletics hold a more prominent place at Yale than education, which is endured as a necessary evil. . . .

Universities are enlarged not to encourage thought, but to ladle out information like soup in a cafeteria.

A new point of view, a thinking attitude, a philosophy of life is needed.

"La Critique" at Dartmouth, remarked recently:

We believe that Dartmouth is graduating each year about three hundred "Babbitts" to go forth and exploit others for the good of themselves alone, to become loyal Americans, and never think.

Our college alumni cannot be very intellectual of mind nor teachable of spirit when the average address before the alumni reunion is either a speech on athletics at the university or a piece of Bourbonism. What a low type of citizenship is betokened in the serving of liquor at class reunions in the face of the Constitution and the law! Yet we know personally of such lawless and unpatriotic performances. Truly, a considerable section of the "successful" men in America seem interested in new automobiles more than in the beautifying of life and the shaping of society to a kindlier mold.

THE REPEAL OF THE LUSK LAWS

One by one the un-American restrictions that came with our war hysteria are being done away. The latest to disappear are the notorious Lusk laws in New York State.

The two most objectionable features in these laws were the requirements of a test of loyalty on the part of every public school teacher and of the State's O. K. on the curriculum of every private school. Of course, it is not unreasonable that we should want teachers in both public and private schools to be men and women of character. The trouble with the Lusk Law was that it gave to very fallible officials the right to judge of a teacher's "loyalty." In the fifties of the last century such officials might have judged a teacher who was opposed to the Fugitive Slave Law as disloyal, and they might have refused to allow any teacher to exercise his profession if he wanted to see the Constitution changed so as to abolish slavery. Before the passage of the Eighteenth Amendment they might have said that the man was disloyal who believed in prohibition. To-day such officials might construe any Christian disloyal because he believes that we should want the good of other nations as much as we want that of America. We are glad to see the law cast into the limbo of discarded things. The other law was equally vicious. It is on a par with those silly propositions to prescribe how science shall or shall not be taught. It was medieval in conception. Five hundred years hence, when historians write about this period, they will cite the Lusk laws as sample legislation from one period of the Inquisition.

The American Home Bible Institute of Washington has worked out a series of lessons on various books of the Bible which should prove of real help in stimulating people to read with attention. The scheme provides for a succession of re-readings of the book, each time with a different thought in mind. In the course of two months, the student would read the book perhaps ten times. At the end of the required number of readings, the Institute submits to the student an examination in the shape of test questions. The Institute gives credit on its certificate to those who carry out the courses. The plan was first submitted at the annual banquet of the Religious Work Department of the Washington Young Women's Christian Association in June three years ago. The Y. W. C. A. has made profitable use of the courses. Up to the present time the Institute has issued suggestion sheets and test questions on Genesis, Ecclesiastes, Amos, the Gospel by John, Ephesians and Philippians. The first of June it will issue courses on a portion of the Psalms and on the Epistle to the Colossians. The suggestion sheets are quite free from expositions of any sort.

The Rules Committee of the lower house of the Ohio Legislature this spring killed a bill to make compulsory the reading of the Scriptures at the beginning of public school sessions. According to the National Reform Association, if the bill had been reported it would have passed in both houses. It is curious that we should ever have looked at the Bible as in any way a denominational book. The fact is that the great ethical ideas in the Bible are the principal foundation of our civilization. The child that grows up without being familiar with it is not fit to be a citizen of the United States. Let us divest our minds of doctrines and let us read the Bible for what it is.

sit in one of the chambers while refusing to enter into the others, it is not for the Democrats to say him nay. Thus far, then, the opposition has all come from within his own ranks, and, as we said, largely from the same men who opposed the League.

This latter situation reveals one fact which all lovers of world concord, all believers in the family of nations, all seekers after the community life among nations ought to realize and recognize much more than they have, namely, that there is a large group of very powerful men, several of them Senators, who have a great influence in this country, who do not believe that the United States should have anything to do with the rest of the world. They do not believe in the world family or any form of community of nations. They want the United States to live purely to itself and for itself. They use the words "isolation," "self-containedness," "self-sufficiency." One Senator gives the impression from his speeches that he would like to have the United States a little planet by itself, having its own sun, moon and stars if possible. One Senator is reported to have said, in his bitterness over the suggestion that the United States enter into relations with the World Court or the League, or any form of co-operation with the other nations, that so far as he was concerned brotherhood stopped at the Atlantic and Pacific shores. These men do not believe in international brotherhood or co-operation in any form. They believe in the nation living its own unassociated life, in its own way, acting as its own judge, leaving Europe to stew in its own pan. Of course, this is just the same doctrine that was preached at the beginning of civilization when some one first suggested that individuals abandon their extreme individualism and selfishness and merge into a society, a community for the common good. It was bitterly opposed by certain individuals who used the same words these opponents of the world community are using now. It reached its climax in the controversy between barbarism and Christianity. The barbarian stood for unhampered individualism; the Christian for the brotherhood, the Kingdom, the community. So it is only history repeating itself now, only it is nations we are considering instead of individuals. These men are going to oppose every endeavor of the Christian people of America to induce this government to recognize its place in the world family whether it be through a World Court, a League of Nations or an Arbitration Tribunal. They do not believe in brotherhood or the community life of nations and it is time the Christian people of America disposed of them for good. They are relics of a heathen age and have no part in a Christian civilization.

We have dwelt upon this because President Harding's plea for a World Court has brought them to the front again with the same arguments they used against the League. We sincerely hope that President Harding will not abandon his project because of this opposition in his own ranks. If he does abandon his course, after the strong assertions he has made as to his faith in the Court, it will be known at once that it is for the sake of harmony within the party, and that will give the Democrats, with their definite commitment to the World Court, a good handle. Already the number of Republicans is growing rapidly who are disappointed over the deceit that was practised upon them when the Thirty-One, over their signatures, promised entrance into the League if they would vote for Mr. Harding. Nothing came of it. Most of these Thirty-One Republicans have

The President and the World Court

PRESIDENT HARDING is before the nation with his recommendation that the United States become a signatory power to the World Court that has been set up by the League of Nations. He began his speaking campaign at New York on Tuesday noon, April 24th, at a luncheon of the Associated Press, and it is his intention to cross the country. Much to his surprise, we imagine, he is meeting with opposition just as President Wilson did when he put the entrance into the League before the nation—and largely from the same men who approved Mr. Wilson's recommendation. The chief difference is that the opposition to Mr. Wilson came from the opposite party, while the opposition to Mr. Harding is from within his own ranks—Senators Johnson, La Follette, Borah, and the others, those who opposed our entrance into the League. Thus far no Democrat of influence has come out against President Harding. It would be very difficult for them to do this, no matter how strongly urged by the party instinct to oppose anything, even though it be good, if advocated by the opposed party. The Democrats have all championed the League of Nations, and they cannot very well disown one of its chief organs. One of the fundamental stones in the structure of the League is the World Court, one of the front rooms in the majestic structure of this temple of peace. If President Harding chooses to utilize this organ of the League, and is willing to came out openly for the League, and thousands of Republicans have followed them. At a great Chamber of Commerce luncheon the other day hundreds of Republicans cheered wildly when Senator Pepper's remarks about his changed attitude to the League were read. Mr. Harding's espousal of the World Court, which has been set up by the League and which fulfils one of the chief purposes of the League, has for a moment mollified these disappointed Republicans and made them feel that something was being done to redeem the party pledges. Should he fail them now it will remain only for the Democrats to say, "You see you can put no faith in Republican pledges. They promised to put you into the League and failed you. Now they promised you a World Court, and again they have failed you. Your only hope is with us. We are really for international co-operation and our first work will be to fulfil the unredeemed Republican pledges."

Mr. Harding's chief difficulty is going to be to persuade the Republicans who bitterly oppose the League that the entrance into the World Court does not mean relationship to the League. He devoted much of his New York speech to elaboration and emphasis of this point. His argument is not very convincing, however, although we have no doubt that he sincerely believes it himself—and several of the most influential Senators, Borah, Watson, La Follette and many other Republicans, are hot with wrath over what they feel to be a first step into the League. Senator Borah says it is "downright political cowardice" to accept a Court from the League and then continue to fight the League. "Let us make the issue plain and clear," he says. "If the League of Nations has created a court which is worthy of our adherence, has given us a tribunal which the world ought to have, I say that it is simply downright political cowardice to gather the fruits of the League and still continue to fight the League. It is just such a position as the old Democratic and Whig parties took in 1852 upon the question of slavery. A political party cannot any more sacrifice its morality, its intellectual integrity and its moral being than an individual can. It has got to be honest. The Republican party, in asserting that it can go into the League Court and stay out of the League, is taking a position which will bring down the moral condemnation of everyone."

Senator Borah, in the same speech delivered at Washington on April 25th, goes further and implies that the whole scheme is a covert attempt to get us into the League. "Mr. Hughes and Mr. Hoover are both advocates of the League. This they have a perfect right to be. I should not for a moment criticize them because I must assume they believe in the League. They have both underwritten pledges to the American people to exert their powers to take us into the League. I congratulate both the gentlemen upon fulfilling both their obligation and their pledges. There is only one thing I refuse to do, and that is to be deceived by the operation. I know exactly what's happening. So do they."

The Senator insists that the Court and the League are practically one and the same thing, or at least that the Court belongs to the League. The League supports it, elects its judges, sends cases to it. In general, the Senator seems to feel that it has about the same relationship to the League that the Supreme Court has to the United States: "I can understand the man who believes in the League and wishes the United States to join, but I cannot understand those who insist we must not join the League, but must join everything the League creates and yet stay out of the League.

"It is conceded the sole source of existence and the sole power of maintenance of this particular Court is the League of Nations," the Senator declared. "It created the Court. It elects the judges. It fills the vacancies. It pays the expenses of the Court. It maintains and preserves the Court. There can be no Court unless the creating, electing, sustaining, maintaining power of the Court continues to exist. When the League falls, the Court falls. When the League breaks down, the Court disappears. If the Court is to be preserved, we must first preserve the League. When we become a member of the Court, if we are in good faith and believe in the Court and want to maintain it and build it up and make it effective, we must become vitally concerned in everything which will preserve the strength and maintain the League. How can we be indifferent or disregarding of the very foundation upon which the Court rests and without which it must perish. Every attack on the League will be an attack upon the Court. Every assailing of the League will be an assailing of our Court. Every soldier marched against the League will be marching against our Court. If we still want the Court and believe in the Court, shall we say to the League people, 'You fight it out, you make the sacrifice, we will have nothing to do with it, we are simply going to enjoy the fruits in case you succeed, to wit, the Court.'"

Many Senators and eminent Republicans share Mr. Borah's views, and they are right. All that Senator Borah says is true. THE CHRISTIAN WORK is going to support the League with all its heart and energy, but it is not going to camouflage the issue. Nothing is gained by it in the long run. Furthermore, we believe that if some great international lawyer could show the President that what Senator Borah says is true—as every student of international affairs knows it is—and the President would urge our entrance into the Court, frankly saying it is association with one function or one creation of the League, he would lose no adherents and would probably gain enough support from that great mass of people who believe in the League to offset the opposition of the irreconcilables.

Death as a Spiritual Fact

FEW of us care to talk about death as an abstract problem. It confronts us as an unsolved mystery, but our mind shies away from it, as the frightened colt shies away from the mysterious motor car, and we should not return and calmly face the problem again if only it would remain abstract and foreign. But it will not do that. It reappears in the particular and concrete. It pitches its tent in our neighborhood, in our very midst, and it dwells with us as a guest whom we must entertain, whether we will or not.

Our minds succeed in avoiding undesirable topics so long as they come to us only in general or universal aspects, but we cannot deal with them after the manner of the ostrich when they take on the warm and palpitating form of a living presence.

And just this is what death does. It ceases to be a problem in a book, a fact of speculation, an ancient racial mystery. It comes up close beside us as a real presence, we see it face to face and its vague, general mystery becomes changed into a definite, personal problem. We are not troubled much by the mystery of the sphinx. It stands for the universal mystery of nature—too large and general to concern us or to worry us. We agonize and quiver only when one clear particular mystery confronts and baffles us.

EDITORIAL

Just this, I say, is what happens to all of us at some moment when the problem of death shifts from the abstract to the concrete and our little, intimate circle is invaded and broken.

The questions we ask, are forced to ask, are, whether there is any rational meaning to be found in death and loss and separation. Does it further anything good? Does it advance anything spiritual? Does it add to the stature of anybody's soul? Can we reach a hand through time and "catch the far-off interest of tears"? Are we who stay and they who go better off because death works his work among us? Are we dealing here with a great enemy of the race, or with a gentle and kindly Providence who, like a wise gardener makes transplanted human worth "bloom to profit elsewhere"? Who knows? Who shall answer and give us certain knowledge?

There are of course two sides, two aspects, to death. On the one hand it is a straight out physical fact, to be dealt with as physical, and, on the other hand, it has spiritual meaning and it must receive spiritual interpretation. As a physical fact death is due to definite and explainable causes. As a natural event it is no more mysterious than a rain-storm or the path of a meteor. Certain conditions existed which occasioned the event. Disease germs invaded the body and interrupted the normal course of the life processes, or a collision destroyed a vital organ, or some form of disintegration broke up the organism at an essential point. This is a normal part of Nature's vast system of changes. Things break up at one place and reorganize at another.

Spring with its renewal of life and verdure is possible because of the disasters of autumn and winter. It is no doubt all charged with mystery, but the mystery is no greater here than it is anywhere else in the total frame and structure of the world. If we were satisfied to confine ourselves to the scientific aspect of things, then we should have little more to say. Death would be simply one fact to be explained as all facts in this field are explained by natural causes.

But we cannot stop here. It is not possible for beings like us to live in a universe that consists only of physical events, occasioned by physical causes. We ourselves are at the vital center of our being spiritual. We transcend the physical so completely that nobody can seriously propose to "reduce" us to mere physical mechanisms, moving through space like the raindrops or the meteor. It is no accident that men have always insisted upon the existence of divine and spiritual realities. Words for God are as old as words for smiling and weeping, as primitive as love and suffering are. As soon as we try to explain and interpret all the facts of life, we find ourselves forced to link our lives up with some spiritual realm that is kindred to the highest that we find in our own spiritual nature. We cannot stop with physical facts just because we always live beyond them. We are in a world that is crammed with beauty, and beauty is something spiritual.

We love not in order to derive benefit from loving, but because we partake of that spiritual quality of which love is an essential trait. We pursue truth and goodness, not because we can cash them in and get utilitarian results, but rather because we are kin to a diviner order of things to which truth and goodness belong. Our lives then, in their central significance belong to a deeper world than the one we see and touch and measure. If we can trust the testimony of our own spirit we can go farther and proclaim the reality of a spiritual world which completes and fulfills what this one lacks.

We can say with some assurance and confidence that everything which deeply affects and concerns our true life is significant and marked with meaning and purpose. All the gains and struggles of life are gathered up and saved, and there can be no lost good—"what is excellent, as God lives, is permanent."

If this is so, and it must be so if we can trust the testimony of the Spirit, then death is not loss but gain. Through it, the Spirit, which is the essential core of reality in us can come into closer union and co-operation with the Spirit who is through and through the life of our lives and the ground of our true being. Fellowship and love are the central facts of life in any world and they may very well be heightened and enhanced by death. Body is only one way of expressing spirit and in God's rich universe there may be a thousand other ways of expressing and maintaining it. "Let us," then, as Socrates said, "be of good cheer concerning death."

For those of us who are left when our dear ones go, the case is hard and difficult, but even so it is not impossible. The most important first step in the spiritual direction is the achievement of a faith that brings the conviction that the dear one lives with God as surely as he lived here, really lives and loves and serves and grows and moves forward toward the full realization of life. Then comes next the great triumph of maintaining love and fellowship between ourselves and one who has become invisible and can no longer be by our side as a tangible presence.

Few things heighten the spiritual life more than the preservation of love and friendship across this borderland between the visible and the invisible realms. It can be done and it should be done.

Then, finally, comes the great spiritual increase as one learns with divine help to go on without the dear visible presence and take up the tasks of life under the fresh inspiration that we, though only one, must now do the work for two and that henceforth we must try to carry on what he would have done.

I can only add my personal experience that much which I have done in these last twenty years has been done in the conviction that I was left here to finish what those dearer to me than life would have been doing if they had remained.

Meditation---What It Is and How to Do It

THE word meditation is slipping out of our vocabulary. It does not seem to fit into the scheme of our modern life. We still confess it is our duty to read the Bible, and to pray, to attend public worship and the Lord's Supper, but how many of us believe it is a duty to meditate? The word has a medieval sound. In the Middle Ages good people were in the habit of meditating. They could do it because they had an abundance of time. One of the patriarchs is recorded to have gone forth to meditate at eventide. He could do it because he had no evening engagements.

EDITORIAL

There are a few individuals even yet who may find it possible to meditate—such as poets and saints, but surely the average Christian can hardly be expected to meditate if he lives in an American city in the twentieth century.

What is it to meditate? To meditate is to think. But not all thinking is meditation. Meditation is a particular type of thinking. We meditate when we fix our thought upon a subject and hold it there. We turn the subject over and over again in our mind. We live with it and brood over it, and allow it to soak into our mind. To meditate is to think seriously and leisurely and with a high end in view. One cannot meditate in a crowd or in a hurry or in a frivolous or jocose mood. Meditation is serious business, and it prospers only in leisure and solitude. Religious meditation may be defined as the earnest protracted musing over the deep things of God.

Anyone can meditate if he will, but no one can meditate without effort. It is not possible to succeed without a strenuous forthputting of the will. One must decide once for all that meditation is desirable and rewarding, and that everyone can succeed in it who is willing to pay the price. The price is a high one. Let no one imagine that to meditate is easy. It is hard. Reading is easier; so also is conversation. Even praying is easier. Nothing is more difficult than meditation. But it brings great rewards. It enriches the heart. It deepens life. It gives the world of the spirit new reality and power.

Would you meditate, begin, and in spite of discouragements and disappointments go on. Do not become lazy. Do not loaf or play. Let the loins of your mind be girt, and let your intellectual lamp be burning. Only those who are eager and alert can hope to succeed. The mind will at first object and rebel. The mind does not like to work. The mind loves to toy with the ideas of other people. The intellect takes delight in reading and conversing. To skim a book or chat with a friend is a delightful and easy pastime. But one ought to meditate. One ought to think. One ought to think for himself. He ought to have a few thoughts which he can call his own. He ought by heroic effort to arrive at a few conclusions which he can feel he has fairly won.

What should one meditate about? About something which God is doing in nature, or something which He has brought to pass in your own experience, or something which Jesus Christ has said or done or suffered. It is by meditation that we come to know God. It is by thinking of the words and deeds and sufferings of Jesus that we come in contact with Him. Our life becomes rich only when His life passes into our personality.

Let us then make a practice of meditating. Let us do a little of it every week. Let us not attempt too much at the start. One cannot meditate an hour or a half hour at the beginning. Five minutes is long enough. It is amazing how long five minutes is when one is really trying to think. A baby in learning to walk is content to take short steps. The mind in learning to think must not expect either to jump or to run. Let the time be made brief until the mind has gained confidence and skill.

THE OBSERVER

Some Mid-Western Impressions

AS I said in last week's letter, I have been visiting several of the great cities of the Middle West on a speaking tour. I have been in both the Mississippi and the Missouri valleys. It has been a most interesting experience and I could not help making comparisons as I went along between the Eastern cities, churches and people, and the Western. If I jot a few of them down here they must not be taken too literally. They must be considered as generalizations to which there would be a great many individual exceptions. Also, another man might see things differently, especially if he had been brought up in the West instead of New England, which was my home.

To begin with one thing that struck me at once: The Western people have much more of the community instinct than have the Eastern people. Individualism is much less pronounced than in the Atlantic States. (I mean individualism as a habit of life.) If five men go into the Pullman smoking room from Boston to New York, the probability is that not one will speak to another on the whole trip. Each man will have a book or a paper, or sit thinking to himself. If there is any conversation it is formal and very general. If five men enter the Pullman smoker at St. Louis bound for Kansas City, the conversation becomes as personal in ten minutes as if the five had been bosom friends all their lives. I went into the smoking room of the Pullman when I left Kansas City for Des Moines. There were six men, all absolute strangers to one another, but in half an hour everybody knew everything about everybody else's wife, children, business and vacation hobbies. It was really charming, it was all done with such naturalness. To one reared in New England it was nothing short of amazing. I even got a rebuke on one train. I meet a great many people and sometimes I look forward to long train rides to escape talk, and generally I grasp the day as an opportunity to read a book I have been aching to get at. My friends had all been telling me of the wonder of Henry Sedgwick's new book, "Pro Vita Monastica," and I had been waiting for a whole uninterrupted day with Gilbert Murray's "Tradition and Progress" (with Professor Robinson's "The Mind in the Making," the three great books of last year). I went into the Pullman and opened up my books. I soon discovered I was something "queer." When I went out of the smoking room, back to my chair, I stopped outside the door just a minute to look out the window and I heard one man remark to the others, "That fellow does not seem to realize that this isn't his private car." That was a rebuke for not having participated in the general conversation on automobiles, fishing, etc. Perhaps it was deserved. Perhaps when one is in the West he should exhibit that same sense of belonging to the big community, that same affability, that same geniality that the Westerners practice. It was apparent everywhere. Even in the cars themselves a man would come down to your chair and start talking. Imagine a man doing that in a Pullman from New York to Boston! In a New York hotel if a stranger spoke to another man he would fall over dead or call for a policeman. In the West one would not be the least bit surprised. This cordiality, this sense of community lends much charm to the social life of all the cities. It does much, too, to encourage that esprit de corps which is such a powerful instrument for good and evil.

I suppose it also accounts for the clubable nature of the Westerner. In New England and the East in general there are clubs and lodges and societies of all sorts, but they really do not figure greatly and are not outstanding features of the Eastern life. In the West I found clubs everywhere, and always in session. One day I would be at a luncheon of the Rotary Club, the next day the Kiwanis Club, the next day the Lions Club, the next day the Co-operative Club, the next day the Chamber of Commerce. It seemed to me that no Western business man ever ate alone. At those clubs they laugh and sing, and generally have a speaker from outside. The Masons, the Elks, the Odd Fellows, the Mystic Shriners, and I know not how many other societies are in evidence everywhere.

The handsomest building I saw under construction was a Masonic Temple. Hardly anyone I happen to know intimately in New York or New England belongs to any lodge: everybody I met in the West seemed to be in one or more. The Eastern man lives much more to himself: the Western man lives much more with his fellow business men. It is seldom one ever hears a clergyman in New England or New York refer to lodges or clubs absorbing the interest of church members to such an extent as to hinder full activity of the church: I frequently heard this from Western pastors. On the other hand, this clubable disposition of the Westerner makes it easier to get the laymen interested in church work than it is in the East. The Western churchman generally takes hold of his church work with all his heart and soul.

The Westerner seemed to me to be infinitely more interested in his city than is the Eastern man. When I lunch with the Chamber of Commerce or the Rotary Club at Worcester, or Hartford, or New Haven, or Springfield, or Stamford, or Poughkeepsie, or Burlington—any Eastern city—I seldom hear the city referred to, except in some casual way. Not so in Kansas City, Omaha, Sioux Falls, Topeka, Des Moines, Duluth, Minneapolis, St. Paul, Indianapolis—any Western city. Here one is almost sure to hear a wonderful booming of the city at any luncheon. It seems to me I heard it in all the towns mentioned above. I must confess I rather liked it, especially where it betrayed a deep interest in the moral welfare of the city, and the beautifying of its streets as well as in its bigness and commercial growth. I should say—I may be mistaken—that there is more local patriotism, so to speak, enthusiasm for his city and devotion to it, in the Westerner's soul than in the Easterner's.

Of course, I visited many churches. I preached generally four times every Sunday and generally three week evenings. My contact with the people was not intimate enough to make my impressions of much value, but of course I kept my eyes open and asked many questions. The churches I visited were big and prosperous and evidently perfect hives of industry. The services were well attended and I heard little about the decline of church-going. In many cities there is a large Roman Catholic population. Protestants sometimes forget that this is a good thing for the church-going habit. Roman Catholics go to church. Christ is there in a truer sense than elsewhere, and they go there to meet Him, see Him, feed upon Him. This helps preserve the church-going habit. It seems pretty strong yet in most of the cities I visited. The Western Christians have let Sunday slip out of their hands much more than the East has. Theaters, baseball, etc., are all under way on Sunday in many Western cities. But so far as I could see the attendance at church is still as general as ever. The difference in the services is one that naturally follows from the difference in temperament noted at the beginning. The Western service is much more sociable, free, and family like. It is more like a big prayer meeting, or a meeting for song. The extemporaneous prayers had little of the liturgical element in them—there were exceptions—and I almost found myself shocked once or twice by the off-hand, familiar way in which the preacher talked with God. God might have been his neighbor whom he called by his first name. One often missed the deep note of reverence, the sense of awe, the prostration of one's self before the Almighty and Pure God, which one comes to associate with the House of God: the singing of choirs—with exceptions again—seemed rather to the people than as voicing the feelings of hearts aspiring to reach the Lord on wings of song. In the East I should say that the worshipful side of the service was more pronounced, that the mystical side of religion received more emphasis, that the church building was more widely felt to be a consecrated, holy place where one thought more of meeting God than of meeting His people. But perhaps it is right there that the Easterners fall short of our Western brethren: in not realizing that God is in the hearts of our brethren as much as on or above the altar. (I should imagine, by the way, that a stranger entering a Western church would be put in the best pew, have his hands shaken by half the congregation at close of service, urged to come again, and probably invited to dinner by some member of the congregation: in Hartford, New Haven, New York—perhaps—not.)

As to the ministers—it is difficult to group them by locality. I met very many at the ministerial conferences. In Des Moines, for instance, to name only one city, a hundred turned out to meet me, and we had a good time together. On the international situation the ministers are much more alert than any other group in the community. They are the readers, not only in theology, but on all questions. Here is an interesting theme for someone to write on—The Value of the Ministry to a City as Preserving in Its Midst the Cultural and Scholarly Tradition. If I mentioned any new book in the Ministers' Association, on literature, politics, internationalism, industry, art—any subject, some had read it, most of them knew to what I referred. If I mentioned it in the Chamber of Commerce or Rotary Club in the same city it is doubtful if any had read it, and most of the men would never have heard of it. One thing, too, which I think I can say without exaggeration—ninety-five out of the hundred of the ministers would be in favor of America's participation in world affairs, and if I can judge rightly the response both Mr. Colby—Senator Everett Colby was with me part of the time—and I got when we mentioned the League of Nations, most of the ministers are for American participation in it. The percentage would not be so large among the business men, but of one thing I am certain, it is much larger than it was a year ago, and especially among Republicans.

Lord Robert Cecil's visit and Senator Pepper's conversion to the League has had great influence both in setting people thinking and even in changing the minds of many. I gathered that the Fundamentalist Movement is much stronger in the West than in the East, but naturally I did not meet many of this group, since they, as a general thing, are not concerned with the application of the Gospel to the world at large. The social gospel, with some notable exceptions, finds its exponents among the theologically more liberal group.

THE WEEKLY SERMON

Christianity Against Jewish Legalism and Scriptural Literalism

By Professor Robert Hastings Nichols, D.D.

Professor of Church History in Auburn Seminary

Preached Before Auburn Theological Seminary, April 25, 1923

"When Cephas came to Antioch, I resisted him to the face."—Galatians 2:11.

WE have here a bit of autobiography from a man who is in many ways our model of the Christian and the Christian minister, who said with reason that he had the mind of Christ, and who constantly acted it out. The first point that I would make is one about which there can be no doubt, that this man engaged in religious controversy. He did it intentionally. Indeed, he began it. This is probably horrifying to some minds, particularly to a certain sort of clerical minds. Something in ministerial experience develops some men into what President Roosevelt called mollycoddles, men who flee the strife and desire naught but what is soft and sweet and amiable. Perhaps this development begins in the seminaries. Perhaps a process is already begun which will in due time produce a proportion of mollycoddles. Let us hope not. But whatever anybody may think about it, certainly here is Paul deliberately entering a controversy about religion.

Even more horrifying is this second fact, that Paul engaged in controversy with a fellow Christian; furthermore, with a fellow leader of the Christian Church, a man of high authority among the brethren. Paul brought controversy into the Church. What Peter expected when he came to the church at Antioch we are not told, but what he got was that his views about the religion of Jesus were openly and vigorously opposed by Paul. To have one's views openly and vigorously opposed by Paul would be an experience not to be forgotten. I have lately been in considerable correspondence with some influential ministers of a great Church concerning questions of religious truth now urged in the Church. A few of them—only a few—have sounded a note which we all have heard, to wit, Christians ought to avoid disputes about questions of truth; there ought not to be differences of opinion among brethren; theological controversy is always bad for the Church. Whatever support may be found for these ideas, it is certain that those who hold them cannot say that Paul was of their mind. "When Cephas came to Antioch, I resisted him to the face;" and this whole epistle to the Galatians is the record of his controversy in the Church and against fellow Christians, stoutly and unyieldingly maintained.

The reason why Paul was not of this mind is that he was interested with his whole soul in something far greater than agreement among Christians, that is, in giving Christianity to men. His controversy was for the sake of giving Christianity to men. This is the third fact that I would bring to your attention. Paul was resisting a teaching which would have shut up Christianity to those who conformed to the Jewish ceremonial law. Peter's interpretation of the religion of Jesus would have prevented it from ever being a world religion. He had refused to eat with certain Christians, because they, being Greeks, did not do as Jews did. In effect, he had said to them, "You are not Christians, because you do not keep the law of the Jews." On the principle of his action, the Gospel could never have been preached to all men as the way of life. It would have been useless to offer to the Gentile world a religion complicated with petty and senseless and filthy Jewish rites. But more than this, the religion itself would have been hopelessly confused and corrupted. According to Peter's thought, Jesus would not really be the Saviour of the world. His gospel would not be life for all men. "There cannot be Greek and Jew, circumcision and uncircumcision, barbarian, Scythian, bondman, freeman, but Christ is all, and in all"—on Peter's principle that could never have been said. Not for an opinion was Paul contending, not for abstract truth, but for human life, for the salvation of many from evil and sorrow. Here was the compelling motive of his dispute; this made his resistance to Peter not only justifiable but also obligatory. It was his duty to enter into controversy. If he had not done it he would have betrayed his Lord and his fellow men.

Another characteristic of Paul's controversy let us note, that it was partly negative and destructive. I say partly; anybody who knows anything about Paul knows that his weight always fell on the positive and constructive. But now, it is profitable to observe that his controversy had, and had to have, its elements of denial and destruction. Paul's argument against Peter is elaborated in this Galatian epistle. Against Judaizing teachers who sought to enslave his Gentile converts to the dead law of the Jews, he maintained the cause for which he had resisted Peter to the face. We see in the epistle how his contention ran. He was introducing a new idea; he was bringing into the Church an interpretation of Christianity radically different from that held by "those of the circumcision." He was engaged in making it clear that Christianity was a religion for all men on equal terms, a true world religion. Here was a new idea which many Christians of that day rejected. In order to prevail, Paul had to deny some things and destroy some things. There were Jewish Christians who had inherited the Jewish belief that salvation was by the law of Moses, and insisted that all believers in Jesus must go this way. Some were selfish, malicious partisans, caring most for the victory of their ideas. Some were good pious folk, going on in the good old way. Whatever they were, their confidence in the law had to be broken down. Their Jewish exclusiveness had to be destroyed.

Paul's Jewish fellow Christians had to hear him say, "By the works of the law shall no flesh be justified," and "If righteousness is through the law, then Christ died for nought," and "As many as are of the works of the law are under a curse." They had to hear him say to Gentiles, "If ye receive circumcision, Christ will profit you nothing." Now this is denial and destruction, if those words mean anything. These Jewish Christians had to hear this, and what is more they had to agree to it, in order to see that Jesus was the Saviour of the world. Doubtless many good pious folk were terribly unsettled. It had to be. They had to give up things precious to them, if they were to see the full truth of Christianity. Therefore Paul denied and destroyed. As I said, nobody supposes that this was all or the larger part of his work. But it was a necessary part of it.

A parallel situation came in the Protestant Reformation. Everybody in Europe had been trained to believe that the Church was the ark of salvation, that to be in its communion was assurance of eternal life. Thousands of good people, as good as the world had, believed this and grounded their lives on its truth. Then there came a better teaching concerning the way of salvation, original Christian truth revived. If people were to hold the better teaching, they had to throw over their old ideas; for the two things were incompatible. That the new and better might prevail, the old and worse had to be smashed. Smashed it was; well for us that there were great leaders of Christianity who did plenty of denying and destroying. Anybody who supposes that Luther and Calvin confined their teaching to the positive and constructive has never read either. Certainly, the Reformation would never have been what it was by force of criticism and negation only. Its power was a great tide of new religious life. But it had, and had to have, its elements of denial and destruction. Many good Christians were terribly unsettled. And their unsettlement did religious harm and moral harm; there can be no doubt of this. But it had to be, for the emancipation of Christian truth.

To return to Paul, he was in the position of the Reformation leaders, under the necessity of negative controversy. He was confronted with a teaching which would have imprisoned Christianity away from men who needed it. To set it free, for the sake of these men, this teaching had to be destroyed.

Let us note also the result of Paul's controversy. It was that Christianity became in fact what it always was in principle—a universal religion. "He tore the gospel from the Jewish soil," says Harnack, "and rooted it in the soil of humanity." Here was a gain, a progress beyond valuing. It was won by controversy, and could not otherwise have been won. You will hear people solemnly assert that no good end is served by religious disputes. In reality, all the great advances in Christian truth have been achieved in part by controversy. Run over the history of Christianity in your memory and see if this is not the case. Progress has been made through the eternal conflict of truth and error, and it has taken the conflict to make the truth shine out. Incidentally, it might truly be said that most of the great preachers of the Gospel, from Paul on, have maintained controversies. They have had definite messages to give to men, clear ideas, vision of truth. Human nature being what it is, this work cannot be done without encountering opposition. And the great preachers have not been afraid to meet it; they have stood up for their truth and attacked falsehood. They have cared more for their truth and what it could do for men than for sleepy agreement in the Church.

Now I have said all this about Paul's controversy against the Judaizers because there is a striking parallel between his situation and ours. In his time there was an attempt to imprison Christianity in Jewish legalism. We behold a formidable attempt to enslave Christianity by Scripture literalism. The words of the Bible, literally interpreted, must be the measure of Christian truth. Nothing is Christian which conflicts with words found in the Bible. If scientific research honestly and laboriously prosecuted leads men who believe in God to think that He followed a certain method in the creation of the world and the words of the Bible present another account of His method, Christians must reject the teaching of science. If historical scholarship has reached one conclusion, and certain words in the Bible contain another, Christians must eschew historical scholarship. Of all the varied discussion that is going on to-day, one thing is at the bottom, that is, the idea that the words of the Bible contain no error. Whether evolution or the virgin birth or pre-millennarianism or anything else is the apparent issue, the real issue is Scriptural literalism. And steadily it is asserted that those who do not accept this are not Christian.

Now this is doing in our day what Jewish legalism was doing in Paul's day; it is keeping Christianity from men who need it. Educated and thinking men and women by hundreds and thousands have been turned away from Christianity, from Jesus Christ their Saviour, by this interpretation of Christianity. They are being so turned away all the time. They hear representatives of Christianity asserting that if they think as their knowledge and their reasons compel them to think, they cannot be Christians. They hear the evolutionary principal, integral to our intellectual world, denounced as un-Christian by men who manifestly do not know what they are talking about, amid applause from church people. They hear science derided as hostile to Christianity—think of it, if you have ever known a real scientific man, and seen how religion is the very vital air of his thoughts. They are told that if they do not believe everything in the Bible there is no place for them in the Christian Church. And they are being turned away from Christianity. They need it, and the world needs that they have it, and it is being kept from them by Scriptural literalism.

Last year I had a conversation with a girl in the second year of the high school of an industrial city. "We girls have been talking about evolution at lunch," she said. "I say that you can believe in evolution and in God, but all the other girls say that you can't do that. We know that evolution is true; we learn it in school. And the other girls say that what is in the Bible is different, so you can't believe in evolution and in God."

"What do you hear about it in church?" I asked.

"Oh, in church they say that you mustn't believe in evolution, because it contradicts the Bible."

There is the beginning of it, in the second year of the high school. There is a case of that widening breach between our religion and our culture which is ruinous to both. We see this ruin in our academic faculties, whose members hold in their hands the lives of our best young men and women. Not for a hundred years has there been among these teachers so little sympathy with Christianity. Many of them have been driven away from Christianity by the obscurantism of ministers and church people.

The root trouble, I say again, is Scriptural literalism. It is the duty of Christian ministers to resist this to the face. It is their duty to say out loud, "Not everything in the Bible is literally true; and a man can believe in Jesus Christ without thinking that everything in the Bible is literally true." The bondage of literalism must be broken, that Christianity may be given to men. This will have to be done in opposition to other Christians. It will disturb the Church. It will unsettle good Christians. For these reasons some will never do it. There are preachers who aspire to the reputation of never having said a word that would disturb an old woman's faith—I have heard them say that. But how about the young woman's faith? What about those high school girls? If we must choose, they are far more important than old people, for they will grow up, and wield influence, and have children, and mould the future. For their sakes, and the sakes of many like them, in the interest of all who breathe the intellectual air of the modern world, the Christian minister is called upon to remove the barrier between them and the Gospel of their Saviour. As it was Paul's duty, so it is the duty of the Christian minister of to-day to break the power of what is keeping Christianity from men.

Only let him remember that the man who said, "When Cephas came to Antioch, I resisted him to the face," said in the same chapter, "I live, yet not I: Christ liveth in me." If the Christian minister goes into controversy under the power of Jesus, not for the joy of battle, but for the sake of those for whom Jesus died, he will be saved from its dangers and have power for the truth.

Evening Services for Young People

How One Church Draws All Ages to Evening Worship

By Rev. Richard K. Morton

Pastor, Phillips Congregational Church, South Boston, Mass.

"I CANNOT hold two Sunday services in my church!" sincerely declared a devout minister to me. "People will not come!"

Secretly hoping that this preacher's message was not generally true, I resolved to make a definite investigation. The minister whom I have quoted admitted that he could draw out in the evening "the usual old faithfuls." The problem which I intended to investigate was, then, concerned with the matter of drawing the young people. Could this be done?

Another preacher to whom I put a query concerning his evening service brightened at the mention of it.

"Why, yes, I maintain quite a large evening service!" he exclaimed. "You see, last year we used to get about fifty people, but this year we have inaugurated an "evening forum," dispensing with the evening preaching service, to allow for general discussions. Our average audience consists of about one hundred and fifty."

This is, in my opinion, only another way of admitting inability to conduct an evening service. It is following something like the method of a Lynn (Mass.) preacher, who recently advertised his next evening's sermon thus: "Come and hear all about the K. K. K." People came by the hundreds, but for only once and with no religious motive. This avoidance method recalls to me an amusing yet intensely pertinent episode, often quoted, in which Dr. Horace Greeley and one of his editorial correspondents were the chief parties. The writer had requested the noted editor to suggest to her some new method for increasing church interest, and she marshaled a long list of schemes of which she had already conceived. The editor's reply was succinct and eminently pertinent, "Try religion!"

In spite of these adverse opinions to which I have referred, I am prepared to take a stand against them. My position is supported by actual success in evening service work. I have seen young people, and adults, too, attracted by the church service on a Sunday evening when the weather was inclement.

What I shall here describe to you are facts and experiences, all of which transpired in Phillips Congregational Church, South Boston, Massachusetts. This church will, this next December, celebrate its one hundredth birthday.

Here are the preliminary tools for starting good evening services. One must have new hymn books, in which there are many popular, devotional and attractive songs. Then get a capable song leader, preferably a hired man not a member of your church. If your church has special music funds or a large endowment fund, use some of the money for this purpose. Next build up a large choir, to whatever extent your choir loft permits. Appeal to the young people to join the choir and be trained in church singing. Hold special practices each week and plan definitely arranged Sunday evening programs. If you can fill your choir loft, you will find much easier the sometimes discouraging task of filling your auditorium. I should suggest the formation of a Choir Guild (as Phillips Church did), with regular meeting times and places, funds for music, special singers, programs, and with competent officers. This organization, then, takes the lead Sunday evening, inspires the audience, enhances the singing effect, and arranges some exquisite programs.

There are a few more Sunday evening accessories, of which most any church would do well to avail itself. One needs, above all, the best kind of fundamental, simple, compelling gospel preaching. If the sermon is right, the service is right. If God is revealed, the church is revealed. If one speaks informally, directly, explicitly, intelligently, the audience will be present more frequently.

In Phillips Church the evening service is almost informal, with a sermon in which there is God, but little theology and lexicographical words. When the minister starts to reveal God to those waiting young people before him he forgets his learnedness and his own conceit and powers. He is merely a human instrument carrying and broadcasting a divine message. And because the young people hear something awesomely new, well said, intriguing, they come. These young people would make at least half true the statement, that if the audience is uninspired, not they, but the minister, ought to undergo considerable observation.

But these are not all yet of the religious tools for Sunday evening. The church needs to advertise, on its own bulletin boards, printed calendars, local newspapers, and through each of its sincere members. Any church which is intolerant of advertising, or of the stereopticon or moving picture used intelligently, is five hundred years behind the times. Its members would be as blind and as bigoted as those of the Middle Ages. By opposing these forces people are not being pious and orthodox, but deliberately narrow and fanatic. The Sunday evening service should be announced during the Sunday-school hour, in Christian Endeavor meetings, and at weekly gatherings. Young people should visit these organizations with the object of speaking before them, especially in the interests of the Sunday evening service.

A church which wants a lively evening service should help the pastor by delegating some competent young man, preferably one preparing for religious work, to give evening announcements and to read the Scripture lesson. This young man reduces the labors of the tired pastor, and he adds more to the co-operative spirit of Christian optimism and goodwill, which always should exist between pastor and people.

Some churches might further strengthen their chances for using this method to good advantage by making out, a month in advance, an evening program. For special services one might include inviting to the evening service such organizations as the Boy Scouts, the Masons, and such speakers as the Governor of the State in which the church is. Or, one might specially invite a neighboring post of the American Legion, or different religious societies or schools.

The evening service is best when specially dedicated to young people, with a young people's message, evangelistic, appealing, commanding. Make the young people thrill with your message of real truth, put in words all can understand. Emphasizing Biblical history, retelling Bible narratives, interpreting Jewish lives and events, and describing the inner significance of Jesus' life and work, are effective topics.

I think, and experience verifies my opinion, that in the Sunday evening service the young people should be put to some practical use. They want to come to hear the Christian message, but let them put their enthusiasm into concrete form in these ways. They may first make up the body of church ushers, and then may take up the evening collection. One may act as the pastor's assistant. Another may have charge of church flowers and decorations. More may serve the pastor in reporting illness and needy cases each week to the pastor. Others may perhaps represent the Sunday-school and the Christian Endeavor at the service, and they must bend their efforts to drawing all members of both groups to this service. During the week, through secular organizations, through conversations, with a church radio, autos, and written notices, they may help augment the value of the evening service.

Use the young people, for they can do much for the church, for God, for you, and for themselves. Let them conduct, after the C. E. and Sunday-school meetings, special moments of prayer for the Sunday evening service. Let them inspire and lead on the older people in whom the fires of enthusiasm have somewhat dimmed. Let them question the pastor, suggest possible sermon subjects to him. If, through questions and talks, they reveal to him just what they then need and long for, he can more intelligently endeavor to bring before them an interesting message. Let young people take the evening attendance, report absentees, get notices for the church calendar, and plan special mid-week meetings.

But, more particularly, how can one be sure that this scheme for evening services will work out? One cannot be certain until one creates a Christian spirit; people must want to come, feel drawn to the church. Success depends on the attitude church members have for the evening service, on the evening's subject, on the program announced, on the advertising, on the vividness and timeliness of the message, and on the general spirit in which the service is held.

The evening service should be evangelistic, and it should present clearly old Biblical thoughts presented in a striking phrase and from an unusual point of view. The minister should have a sufficient grasp upon the contents of the Bible, so that he can keep the people guessing as to what new thoughts he can find to emphasize.

The song service preceding the service proper should be sufficiently long and well directed so that an auspicious psychological moment is reached for beginning the regular ritual.

The service should begin on time, not be blurred by countless preliminaries, and should show no "seams" between the different items on the program. "He who hesitates in the pulpit has lost the young people."

I shall also set down here certain other factors in Sunday evening success, believing that what occurred, and is occurring, in the church of which I am a member is not in any way unusual and may be used by any enterprising church.

The first is a pastor's training class, meeting during the week to discuss Christian fundamentals and to teach the young people those matters essential to a proper religious grounding. The Bible, lesson commentaries and general religious principles may also be introduced. The effect of this class is startlingly great on the Sunday evening service. Closely allied to this is another plan of having a pre-service meeting of all from the church and from the various church organizations meet for prayer. The officers of these bodies should be present, especially.

The second point is a large, active mid-week prayer meeting. This is another meeting which many ministers allege they cannot maintain. But the church whose people are intelligent and willing to go half way, and whose pastor knows and can interpret the Bible, can have a thriving prayer meeting. And, of course, the effect this meeting will have upon Sunday evening is perfectly obvious.

The third point is, having many mid-week affairs for church people. Let the church sponsor socials and seasonal entertainments. Provide an active program of events for the young people, and help them in their daily work, and the church will mean something to them.

The church which elaborates intelligently upon these plans will, I feel sure, glean much benefit from them. As they have all actually been worked out in practice, some elements at least will hit some faults in every church. The church with the young people, we are all agreed, is the church of to-morrow. The church which really teaches religion is the church which is really doing good for to-morrow. If the church, moreover, thoroughly steeps its young people in Christian ways many current problems will never arise in the future.

Every church must work to get its reputation in the community. It must tolerate no petty prejudices. Its people must think of the church before the hypocrisy of other people, or of the faults of the minister. The church must be co-operative. The church must also be progressive and tolerant. It must use every Christian means available to compete with modern interests for the supreme control of the individual.

Each church has, of course, its own peculiar people and policies. There are, however, certain fundamental principles which apply to all of them, and I think the above plans are, in the main, adaptable to radically different circumstances. If the church people are unusually critical, like to quarrel, are ultra-conservative, or are independent people to whom co-operation is a foreign word, the plan to bring about best results in that church is so much the more complex. But it is a glorious task we have set before us. I hope that what I have said may help others to win more victories for Christ and His Church.

International Co-operation—III.

By Lord Robert Cecil

[NOTE.—We have published in two instalments the report of Lord Robert Cecil's notable address of April 2. At the close of the speech the questions were allowed from the audience. The first question came from S. K. Radcliffe of "The Manchester Guardian" and other questions followed from the floor. The questions and answers appear below. They throw great light on the whole matter of the League of Nations.—THE EDITORS.]

“MR. RADCLIFFE, who is a fellow-Britisher of Lord Robert, has put the first question, which is this, if I may rephrase it in my Hoosier dialect. An amendment was proposed to the address from the throne in the opening of the new Parliament. The amendment, as I understand, was proposed by the British Government and immediately urged or required the reference of the Ruhr dispute to the League of Nations, and Lord Robert, as I understood it, voted and spoke against that immediate, that single resolution. The question is, will he explain that vote and that expression of opinion.

Lord Robert—I am very glad to explain, and I am glad particularly, that my action in the House of Commons excites so much interest here. An amendment to the address, in our English procedure, amounts to a vote of want of confidence in the Government of the day, and, therefore, it was essential for the Government, whatever they thought about the motion itself, to vote against it. The question I had to resolve was whether I should vote with them or vote against them. I had no doubt at all, and I stated that I had no doubt that it was desirable that this dispute should be referred to the League of Nations at the earliest possible moment, but I thought, and I think that when it comes to a great and critical exercise of the executive action of any country, it must be left to the executive government of the day to decide the moment and the method by which that action may most usefully be taken. I said, therefore, that while I was in favor of the policy recommended, I could not be a party putting the House of Commons, without the knowledge which a Government necessarily has, into the place of the executive. I regretted, I still regret, that an attempt was made, as it seems to me, to utilize the League of Nations for party purposes. I have no desire that it should ever be used for party purposes on one side or the other, and in these circumstances, I thought it was better, I thought it was my duty as a member of Parliament to give the vote I did, and I am glad to remember also that in a subsequent debate, the leader of the Liberal Party, the party that proposed the amendment expressed the view that the action I had taken was from my point of view perfectly right and legitimate.

Mr. Wheeler—I have one question to ask. It is this. Lord Robert will remember that when the Versailles Treaty, including the Covenant of the League of Nations, was sent to our American Senate for ratification, a majority of the Senate, not two-thirds, but a majority of the Senate proposed certain reservations. They failed to receive a two-thirds vote, and the treaty consequently was not ratified. My question is this: In your opinion, Lord Robert, if the treaty had been ratified with those reservations, would the nations of Europe, parties to the League, have acquiesced in them?

Lord Robert—Well, I am in a little of a difficulty, because I remember those reservations were very numerous, and I don't remember in detail everything that was in them, and therefore I hesitate to reply with a plain affirmative or negative as I like to do to questions that are asked me. All I can say is this: that I am satisfied that the nations of the world would not display any pettifoggery or hotstringing spirit in dealing with any effort of co-operation that might come from America; that they would not look too closely at the terms of their daughter; that those of us who are really and sincerely anxious to obtain world co-operation for a worthy object, would be ready to accept that co-operation—I will not say in any form it was offered, but in any form that was at all consistent with the main object for which the co-operation was asked.

Mr. Desmond—If the League of Nations is potent to the settlement of international disputes, as Lord Robert says, why is it that the dispute between the Irish irregulars and the Free State has not been referred to it?

Lord Robert—Well, the warfare in Ireland is—I have not been there, but if I may trust the reports in the papers, it is in the nature of a civil war. It is a warfare carried on unhappily by Irishmen against Irishmen. It is a matter for the deepest regret that it should go on and continue. But the League of Nations exists necessarily not to deal with internal affairs, however deplorable, however dangerous they may be. It has enough to do if it settles the affairs between the nations of the world without attempting to deal with affairs which are of a domestic and internal character. At the same time—for I want to give as full an answer as I can—at the same time if there were any assurances given to the League of Nations that its decisions would be acceptable to the parties—I mean this very seriously—I am quite sure that the League would be ready to do whatever it could to put an end to the struggles and to the incidents which all lovers of Ireland and humanity most profoundly deplore.

Mr. Hossain (from box)—Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask Lord Robert Cecil if, in order to achieve the disarmament of which he has spoken, he is prepared to advocate the scrapping of European imperialism in the East and more specifically the scrapping of British imperialism in Egypt, India, Mesopotamia and elsewhere where British rule rests upon force and not upon the moral consent of the governed?

The Chairman—I think it only fair that Lord Robert should have the privilege of refusing to answer a question if it should meet with the disapproval of the meeting. The question put by Mr. Hossain is, is Lord Robert prepared to advocate what Mr. Hossain calls the doing away with imperialism in Egypt, the Near East and India, where Mr. Hossain says the British rule rests on force and not on consent.

Lord Robert—I am prepared to advocate the scrapping of any policy which I should describe as imperialistic, whether it was the policy of my own country or of any other. But I would not advocate in the case of my own country or any other the abandonment of any trust undertaken by that country on behalf of weak and struggling peoples. And I would not advocate any policy which would hand over the populations of great districts to disorder, bloodshed and slaughter, because plausible arguments were suggested for that course by those who it may be would not suffer from the result of the policy they recommend.

The Chairman—I wonder if Lord Robert might come back to an American question which has been handed to me. It says: Lord Robert, you were frank enough to say the other day that you admitted there were serious faults in the Covenant and in the structure of the League. Would you care to tell us what you consider some of its defects. You are aware, of course, that these faults and others played a very great part in the rejection of the treaty by our Senate. You cannot, however, be aware that one reason for American position toward the League is the widespread belief that despite the machinery created by the Covenant for the amendment of the Covenant, it is practically impossible, since any change would call for an unanimous vote by the Council of the League. It would, I am sure, tend to clarify the situation in this country if you left that you could give us your opinion both as to the possibility of amendment and whether, if it is possible, there is, in your judgment, a likelihood of there being an earnest effort to rebuild the structure of the League along more democratic lines within the next five years.

Lord Robert—I am asked really two substantial questions: One is a question of procedure and one is a question of substance. As to the question of procedure, I am of opinion that there is no insuperable difficulty in obtaining amendments to the covenant. I think in a great international instrument amendments ought only be carried out with caution and with reserve. I think, therefore, it is right that they should only be carried out with the assent of those who are the principal members of the League, principal either because of their situation in the world, or because they have been elected by their fellows to represent them on the Council of the League. But my experience is that if there is a real genuine opinion in the Assembly that a particular change ought to be made, the Council has never shown themselves reactionary or obstructive in accepting that intimation of opinion, and I believe that any amendments which can be supported by solid reasons would have a very good chance of being adopted and carried through under the constitution of the League.

Now, as to the question of substance, I am asked whether I would like to see changes made in the Covenant, and particularly changes in the direction of making it more democratic. I say that I would like to see changes, some changes, made in the covenant, but I am not quite sure what is meant by democratic changes. The Assembly and Council at present consist of those who have been nominated to attend its meetings by the citizens of the respective countries which have been entrusted under democratic constitutions with the principal direction of the affairs of those countries. I do not myself see how, from a purely democratic point of view, you could greatly improve that constitution, but if there is any particular proposal that it is desired to put forward in that direction, I am quite sure it would receive ample consideration.

As to the changes in the structure of the covenant, when I first said I thought there were defects in the Covenant, I think I was mainly considering two. One was that I think it would be very desirable to include in the Covenant some quite express and definite declaration in favor of the abolition of war, and secondly, I would like to see the membership of the League expanded so as to include all important nations who are at present outside it.

The Chairman—Let's compromise between his willingness to answer questions all evening and our own sense of regard for his welfare, and the fact that we have promised him to a great many audiences by permitting him to answer one more question and then we will say good night.

Mr. Zimmer—Could not Lord Robert tell us what progress has been made up to date with the League's disarmament scheme? I think it would be of great interest to this body.

Lord Robert—The progress in the direction of disarmament has been manifold. The League has agreed to summon a conference of all the powers to extend the principles of the Washington treaty to all those powers that were not represented and were not bound by the Washington treaty. I hope that that conference will take place very shortly. The League has further agreed on the general principles that disarmament to be effective must be general, and that in order to secure anything like general disarmament you must provide some security to enable those nations that at present rely on their armaments to rely on the efforts of all their neighbors to protect them.

And it is instructed and committed to draw up a definite scheme in the form of a treaty to carry out those general principles. The committee has met several times. It has now before it a draft treaty to carry out those objects. It has discussed that draft treaty not unfavorably, and it is to pass upon it definitely at its meeting summoned for June 4 next. If, as I hope, it accepts that draft in some such form as it now stands, that treaty will come before the Assembly in September next, and if it is adopted there it will go to the various governments for ratification, for approval and ratification, during the course of the following year.

Prodigal Daughters*

By Joseph Hocking

SYNOPSIS

Colonel Lester Trelawney arrives home in England after six years of military service in India and Mesopotamia to find his two daughters sadly beset by the flood of new morals, and ethics and dress of the "younger generation." Eleanor, he soon discovers, is associating with young women of strange tendencies. Tamsin Cory, her most intimate friend, believes that girls should "have their ding like their brothers." Peggy has been "keeping company" with a young man of doubtful character. Both have been coming home at all hours of the night. After an unsatisfactory interview with the girls, he meets the young man and forbids further acquaintance with Peggy. Called away for a few days to visit his eldest son, he receives a message from John, the younger, that both girls have left home.

INSTALMENT IX.

THE SEARCH FOR THE RUNAWAYS.

"HAVE you any idea as to the meaning of this?" and the Colonel passed the slip of paper to John.

"I expect the fellow is a friend of Barnes," replied John. "At any rate, it will be wise for us to be here early."

"I think so, too. Meanwhile we'll try to find Eleanor."

"How'll you start about it, sir?"

"Like you, I can't help connecting her with that woman Cory. I feel that she aided and abetted her. At any rate, we'll go to the club you visited last night."

"Do you think she had any money?" inquired John.

"I asked your mother about that. She doesn't know. She says that Eleanor earned a good salary during the war and for some time after, but she's no idea whether she spent it all or not. It seems, however, that she had her quarter's dress money about a month ago, and your mother is not aware of her spending any considerable amount since. Probably she has a few pounds with her. Why do you ask?"

"As I told you dad, I have little fear of Eleanor. I feel sure she can take care of herself. She can earn her own living, too. I say, dad, I'm awfully sorry for you."

"Thank you, my boy. I do feel this badly. Even yet I can't realize that those girls have left home, and that Peg is in danger of ruining herself for life. It's simply horrible to think of. We are so much in the dark, too, and it may be that even now that child may be at some registry office getting married to that cad. Just think of it! The son of that woman! The brother of those girls! And that may not be the worst of it. I don't like the way those women talked, my boy."

They were seated in a taxicab as they spoke, and were on their way to Tamsin Cory's club.

"We're just there, dad. This is the place."

"No," replied the girl who was seated at a desk in a kind of office, "we don't know where Miss Cory is." This in reply to the Colonel's inquiry.

"Will she be here to lunch, do you think?"

"I don't think so. She is seldom here to lunch. As a matter of fact, we have very little accommodation for that kind of thing."

"Then, perhaps, you could tell me where she lives?"

"No," replied the girl, "we never do that sort of thing. It's against the rules of the club to give any member's address. But if you'd like to write her a letter, it'll be sent on to her immediately."

"I'm afraid that wouldn't be of any use," replied the Colonel. "You see, I want to see her at once on a very important matter. If you could strain a point and give me her address—"

"Impossible; besides, it would be no good," interrupted the girl. "She's never at home during the day. She's nearly always at her work."

"Let me see," and the Colonel spoke like one trying to recall something, "I've forgotten where her place of business is."

"Is she a friend of yours?"

"She was at my house last Sunday night."

"Then you should know she's a journalist. She's the 'Counselor of New Women,' on The Women of To-morrow. She's 'Aunt Mary' on The Butterfly, and she acts as secretary for Liberty, Equality and Fraternity."

"A busy woman," remarked the Colonel.

"Yes, she is, and she's almost sure to be at the office of one of those papers. Of course, I'm not sure. I hear that Dulotsky, the great Russian Bolshevik, is in London. She may be interviewing him. She's often used for that kind of job. Anyhow, I can't give you the address of her flat, although I can send on letters. Here's one I'm sending on now. I've just addressed it."

John's quick eyes caught the address at a glance, 259 Black Inn Mansions.

"It's a nice stamp," remarked John. "I must ask Miss Cory to give it to me."

"She's often here of a night," replied the girl, "but this week I'm not here after five o'clock."

"Then I shall not come," was John's reply.

"You seem to have some experience in getting on with girls," remarked the Colonel when they got outside.

"She was making eyes at me all the time you were talking," replied the boy; "that's why I butted in. Anyhow, we've got the address. Perhaps Eleanor's there."

"Let's go and see," cried the Colonel eagerly.

But he was doomed to disappointment. When they arrived at Black Inn Mansions, a large block of buildings, made up of innumerable small, cheaply furnished rooms, he discovered that Miss Tamsin Cory's apartments were vacant. He discovered that she shared certain rooms with two other women, and that the three had lived together some time. Neither of these women, moreover, appeared to correspond in the slightest degree with either Eleanor or Peggy, neither could they discover that the girls had been there.

"What now?" asked the Colonel with a sigh, when at length they had left Black Inn Mansions.

"The office of Liberty, Equality and Fraternity," replied the boy. "But I don't think you'd better appear."

"Why?"

"Because it's a revolutionary paper, and you are a colonel in the army. You stand for law and order, and that paper stands for the opposite."

The quest was in vain, however. When John inquired if Miss Cory was there he was informed that she was away doing work for the paper, and beyond that he could get no information. Neither could they get any news of her at the offices of The Women of To-morrow or The Butterfly. At each place it was a matter of "No Thoroughfare." Miss Tamsin Cory's movements seemed to be unknown. For that matter, the editor of The Butterfly told the Colonel that Miss Cory was seldom there. It was true she wrote a column every week over the signature of "Aunt Mary," but that this column did not necessitate her presence at the office.

"It's mainly answers to correspondence," he was informed, "and is especially written for young ladies. Miss Cory is a good writer," added the editor, "but she's rather given to discussing politics, and that's no good for our readers."

"And now we'd better go to Bywell Street," said the Colonel when they failed to find Miss Cory.

"All right, dad, we can about manage to get there by a quarter to one."

True to his promise, the young man who had spoken to them appeared at the door of the house agents at the time he had mentioned.

"Colonel Trelawney, sir?"

"Yes, I'm Colonel Trelawney," was the reply.

"My name's Wilkins, sir, Herbert Wilkins. I was in the Kent Buffs, and I work at the same place as Barnes."

"The house agent's place?"

"Yes, sir."

"And you know where he is now?" The Colonel's voice was eager.

"I don't say that quite, sir, but I think I do in a way."

"You are a friend of Barnes?"

"No, sir, not a friend. You see, Barnes got a commission during the war and wears a large-sized hat as a consequence. I dare say I might have had a commission, too, if I'd played up for it, but I didn't. Anyhow, Barnes tries to play at being a swell, which he isn't. Anyone can see that."

"But where is he now?"

"I'm coming to that. I was in the office last Wednesday when a letter came for Barnes. I took it to him and saw that it had the War Office stamp on it. Barnes is a bit of a boaster and he told me it was from you, sir. He said you'd invited him to the Army and Navy Club to dinner. He told me, too, that he was going to marry your daughter, and that he was going to settle things with you over a bottle of champagne."

"Indeed!" remarked the Colonel dryly, while John gave vent to some unparliamentary language.

"I remembered, too, sir, that I'd seen your son in France, Capt. Trevor Trelawney, sir."

"Yes, that's my son."

"Well, sir, remembering the kind of gentleman he was, and reading of the kind of gentleman you were, I couldn't believe you'd be willing to let your daughter marry Barnes. And then I got to thinking of the look on his face as he left the club, and I was sure he'd heard nothing that pleased him there. After that I had a feeling that something was wrong. I've got a bit of Sherlock Holmes in my nature, sir. So I went to Barnes' house that same night."

"Yes, yes," interrupted the Colonel eagerly.

"They didn't seem pleased to see me, sir, which was a bit strange, for at other times they, especially Barnes' sisters, have been very sweet on me. Before I'd been there long I could see that something important was on, and presently it leaked out that you had insulted him and as good as had him thrown out of the club.

"I don't know how it was, sir, but the spirit of mischief seemed to possess me, so I said with a laugh, 'That's how the Colonel invited you to dinner, is it? That's how you settled everything over a bottle of fizz, Barnes? What about our ten pound bet?'

"This made him in a worse temper than ever, and he seemed to lose all control over himself. 'Don't you make any mistake, Wilkins,' he said. 'I'll drag the whole lot of 'em into the mud. I'll not be insulted for nothing. I've got my plans all made.'

"'She'll not marry you against her father's will,' I says. 'Won't she?' and he laughed. 'Why, she's fair gone on me. She'll do anything I ask her—anything. See?'

"'I don't believe it,' I says. 'The Colonel's a gentleman, and you can't make me believe that a family of that sort is going to get mixed up in that sort of thing.'

"'A lot you know, Wilkins,' and there was an ugly look on his face as he spoke. 'Why, both the girls is leavin' home, anyhow. They can't stand the old man, and Eleanor has took a flat not a thousand miles from the Holborn Town Hall. Now then? And I know of a little crib where I can take Peggy. I've only to hold up my finger and she'll come.'

Wilkins stopped in his recital at this juncture, as though he found it difficult to proceed.

"I hardly like telling you what followed, sir," he stammered.

"Tell me, tell me everything," cried the Colonel.

"Well, I told him straight I didn't believe it. That it was all buncombe that a family like yours, sir, would get mixed up with people like them. At this the girls flared up. 'They said that the Barneses were as good as the Trelawneys.'

"And then?" asked the Colonel.

"Well, I laughed jeeringly, as you may say, and told them I'd cut my wisdom teeth years before. 'Think of it,' I says, 'think of the Colonel owning you as a son-in-law! It won't do, Barnes!'

"'He'll be glad to,' he shouted, almost white with passion. You see, sir, he'd been drinking a bit, and Barnes is always free with his tongue at those times.

"'Glad to? Tell that to the marines,' I jeered.

"'You don't believe it?' he says.

"'No, I don't.'

"'Look here, Wilkins,' he says, 'suppose I takes her away with me for a few days. Then suppose I go to the Colonel and say I'm prepared to marry her if he'll do the thing handsome, but if not—then he looked at me like that'—and Wilkins assumed a defiant look.

The Colonel did not speak, but his face had become blanched as if with great terror. John, however, who had been listening intently to every word, caught Wilkins by the arm.

"This was on Wednesday night, wasn't it?"

"Yes, Wednesday night."

"Then why didn't you come to our house and tell us?"

"Wait a bit," replied Wilkins. "I haven't finished yet. When he said this I laughed again. 'It's all moonshine,' I said.

"'Why?' he asked.

"'Because you haven't got the pluck to do it,' I replied.

"'Haven't I?' he asked, and then he seemed to think he'd said too much, for after that he couldn't say a word. The girls kept on talking about it, however, and seemed to be as good as sure that the wedding would take place soon.

"That's all," Wilkins concluded. "I came away soon after and went to my diggings. This young gentleman has asked me why I didn't go to your house and tell you about it. I did think of it, but it was no business of mine. Besides, how could I go to your house late at night and tell such a story? What would you have said? And that wasn't all. After I'd thought it over a bit I didn't believe it. I've heard Barnes and his family talk before. He was always on with some girl or other, and talked continually about rich girls who wanted to marry him."

Saving Men from Suicide

By Rev. Henry S. Huntington

SEVENTEEN years ago the 25th of next November, Dr. Harry Marsh Warren was speaking at the old Fifth Avenue Hotel, at the corner of Twenty-third Street, New York. The day before a woman had committed suicide in one of the city hostels. Warren referred to the case. "How sad it was," he said. "One of the main reasons that that woman committed suicide, according to the accounts in the paper, was that she was lonely. If only she could have had a friend, she would not have died. I should have been glad to have been a friend to her. You would have been. You women here have pleasant lives with little to do. The next time you see some woman looking lonely and sad out there in the park opposite us, why don't you make it natural in some way to speak to her? Perhaps even then she might be thinking of destroying herself. You men, if you see some young man sitting over there on a park bench in dejection, think what it might mean for him if you sat down beside him and got into conversation with him and found out what was wrong. I wish that everyone in this city who was thinking of committing suicide would come and talk with me about it before he did such a thing."

The next morning's papers "played up" Dr. Warren's invitation to would-be suicides. That day six people who had suicide in mind called on him to talk over their troubles. One of them had picked up the paper that morning in the park, whither he had gone tending to destroy himself.

Dr. Warren's life story lay behind that hotel service. Back in the nineties, after a few years as assistant to Dr. Faunce at the Fifth Avenue Baptist Church (where Warren founded the men's class which is now taught by John D. Rockefeller, Jr.), he became pastor of the Central Park Baptist Church of New York. Joseph Richardson, builder of the famous spite house at the corner of Eighty-second Street and Lexington Avenue, although nominally an Episcopalian, fell into the way of going to the little Baptist church. He became very fond of Dr. Warren. He assured him that the church need not worry about its $20,000 mortgage. Richardson was immensely wealthy. When he died he left enough money to the church to wipe out the debt and in addition gave Dr. Warren a legacy of $50,000.

There followed a strange experience for Dr. Warren. Practically every man in the church who was in need of a little money came to him for a loan—for $50,000 twenty-seven years ago looked like a great fortune. One man would want to start a news stand, another to try his hand at a hotel, a third to pay off a mortgage, and so it went. All but one of the officials of the church became debtors to their pastor. Things appeared outwardly peaceful, but it was an impossible situation. If you lend a man money he no longer is your friend. He will cross the street in order not to meet you. And if you don't lend a man money, the situation is even worse. At least, such was Dr. Warren's experience.

So he resigned the pastorate of the Central Park Baptist Church and became the pastor of the "Parish of All Strangers." "The Parish of All Strangers" (undenominational) was what its name implied. Its pastor carried on his heart the sojourners in the city. He held services in the hotels and was ready to answer the calls of all homeless people. A committee, made up of many of the strongest men among the pastors and laymen of New York, stood behind the work. Dr. Warren also ran a Hospital League. But from the time that he gave his invitation to people contemplating suicide the life-saving part of his work overshadowed everything else.

From 1906 to 1916 his work in saving people who contemplated suicide went on informally, but in 1916 he organized a society for the purpose, the Save-a-Life League. On the committee behind the league are such men as Dr. Merrill, Dr. Jefferson, Dr. Hillis and Dr. Parkhurst, and such physicians as Thomas W. Salmon, the medical director of the National Committee for Mental Hygiene; Walter Eyre Lambert, one of the great eye specialists; Menas S. Gregory, head of the psychopathic department at Bellevue, and George O'Hanlon, superintendent of Bellevue and its allied hospitals. Dr. Warren is president of the League. His wife, his son and his daughter make up the active workers of the headquarters at 309 West Fifty-seventh street, New York. There, day by day, resort discouraged people, sometimes one or two, sometimes five or six in a day, and letters have come from practically every State in the Union. Last year 730 would-be suicides called on Dr. Warren and as many letters went out to others who contemplated self-destruction. In addition, 417 persons came in to tell about some relative or dear friend who was despondent or was talking of doing away with himself. Altogether last year, Dr. Warren reckons that there were twelve thousand suicides in our country. If his work had not succeeded in saving from self-destruction most of those who applied to him, the number of suicides would have been increased more than twelve per cent.

Here are the callers of one day: A man in fear of cancer; a middle-aged man with no home, no place to which to go, hungry too, and with no place to get food (hunger is a contributing element in many suicides); (Dr. Warren supplied him with means for a meal); a man whose wife and baby had been burned to death (Dr. Warren gave him money to enable him to go to see a relative); a young college woman, who told him that she was not thinking at all of suicide, but who very clearly needed new strength with which to face life (very few people who come to Dr. Warren admit that they entertain the thought of suicide). But when one goes to a lawyer, he wants the advice that a lawyer can give; if he goes to a banker, he wants to get the banker's counsel on what the banker knows, and so time and again it comes out when Dr. Warren talks with people that they have been entertaining a thought of suicide. Dr. Warren always accepts people's statements at their face value. "I am glad," he says, "that so bright a person as you could not think of such a terrible thing." That takes people back. It was so with this young woman; a young Sunday-school superintendent whose firm had crashed; an aging nurse who felt that people no longer wanted her and thought that all around it might be better if she went out of life.

Here are typical stories: A woman of fifty, unmarried, felt that she was not wanted in her home, which she made with her sister and the latter's husband. She had begun by telling Dr. Warren that she had never thought of doing away with herself, that she was a Christian woman, and of course would not do that. After she had talked a half an hour with him, however, she said, making it so vivid that he could see the whole picture: "There's a lake just opposite our house. My sister and her husband sleep in the room at the back of the house and my room is just over the lake. Sometimes I get so wrought up at night when I am in bed I feel as though I could put on my clothes and go downstairs so quietly, turn the key—no one could hear—and I would go out across the road and drop into the lake so easily." She had had some property, but it had been badly managed. Payments due had been made too late and practically the whole property had frittered away. Dr. Warren sent her to an excellent lawyer of his acquaintance. She came back in a month a different person and said: "I'm going to get my property back." The lawyer had told her what to do about the mismanagement.

Not very long ago a young manager of a bank of one of our great cities came to Dr. Warren. He was a college graduate and was taking extension courses in the local university, a member of a Presbyterian church, with a wife and children. One of his friends in the bank asked him to go out with him one night and the man got into a trap. He began to gamble and to spend money on fast women and had taken money from the bank. "I know," he said, as he told the story to Dr. Warren, "that the bank examiner is coming. I can feel it in the air, and when he comes I'll be found out. It will mean a term in prison and I'd rather die than face that." Dr. Warren interrupted himself as he told the story, "Nobody wants to die," he commented, "any more than we want to drink a cup of scalding water. It's the only way out that they know. They're in a dark room and they don't know how to turn on the light. They come to us. We may be able to touch the electric button." He went back to the story of the bank man. "Your children," he said to the man, "will always have a stigma on them. You say that you have only partly paid for your house. Your wife will probably lose the home and she may have to go to work. Your brothers"—he had four younger than himself; he was the oldest child—"will always be disgraced by what you have done. And think of your father, too. There is another way out. What does your father have?"

It proved that his father was earning a salary of $4,000 a year and owned his own house clear of debt. Dr. Warren understands human nature. "There is something about the first child that no other child can have," he commented to me.

"He has been looked forward to as the other children are not. Because he is the first, he occupies a special place in the heart of a father." "Your father," he told the young banker, "will mortgage his house. I do not know what kind of man he is. When you tell him this he may swear at you, but he won't mean it. He will mortgage his house for you, I know he will. And you can replace the money without the bank's knowing about it, or you can go with your father or with me to your employers and tell them that you have borrowed it. They will think all the better of you for coming and telling them. Perhaps they will advance you. They will trust you after that. Tell them that now you will return the money."

"Father wouldn't do it," the young man answered.

"He will do it," assured Dr. Warren. "I'm a father and I know."

His father did do it. The son went and told him about what he had done. The father mortgaged his house just as Dr. Warren had said. Then he went with his son and told the bank what the young man had done. The bank kept him—likes him all the better now. The young man is paying back to his father what he owes and his wife has never known. It is a wonderful thing to be able to tell somebody something that shall save his life.

A man in Iowa, another banker, wrote Dr. Warren that he had taken money and that there was no way out of it for him except suicide. There was nobody who would loan him the money. Dr. Warren answered: "Don't think that there is nobody who will loan you the money. They will. Isn't there some good motherly woman in your church?"—the man was a church member. "Go and tell her you were over-tempted, that you don't know why you did it, that you will give her a mortgage on your house or anything you have for security." And sure enough, the man got the money from some kind-hearted woman who was a member of the same church. As Dr. Warren recalled, the whole thing was accomplished without the bank's knowing about it.

Some time ago a young man who had been married a year or two came to Dr. Warren. He was much in love with his wife, but she was a degenerate. About twice a year she would go off with a longshoreman who worked by the river. She would be gone three or four days, or even two or three weeks. Her husband forgave her and took her back the first time and the second time. Then she did it a third time. Her husband lost hope. He was gentle, kind, forgiving, but he was crushed. He went to Dr. Warren and told the story. Suddenly, as he finished it, there came over him a new spirit as if he were another person. Instead of being crushed, he was filled with the devil. He threw up his head. "I know what I'll do," he said, putting his hand behind him as if to pull out a pistol, although he had no pistol there. "I'll go over to M—, and I'll find him and I'll shoot him—dead," and he straightened himself. "And then I'll find her and I'll shoot her—dead," and he flung himself back as he had the first time that he said the word.

"Then what will you do," asked Dr. Warren.

"I'll shoot myself."

"You won't do anything of the kind," said Dr. Warren. "I don't want to berate your wife. I don't know her, but you know that she isn't worthy of you. Your mother is in heaven, but I think she will know what you do and she will be sad when she knows. Your father is an old, superannuated minister on the other side. This will put him in his grave. Lots of people do what you plan to do. They kill the others, but they don't succeed in killing themselves. You will be taken to the hospital and a policeman will watch over you night and day, and when you are recovered you will be taken to court and will be tried and sentenced to Sing Sing.

and a thousand times you will say to yourself, 'Would to God I hadn't done it.' I will tell you what you will do. You will let this woman go out of your life and you will marry a fine woman and have the kind of life God meant for you." Dr. Warren got on his knees with the man and prayed with him, as he does in nineteen cases out of twenty. The next day he received a most marvelous letter. The young man said he was going to live a new life, and that he was going to help others who were going through such experiences as his own, helping them "as you have taught me." Dr. Warren never heard from the man again. He wrote a letter to him at his old address, but the letter came back.

Some people come back to Dr. Warren time after time. "One woman comes to see me about six times a year. She lives in a perfect hell. She hates her husband. Her children have to watch her lest she kill him (probably she ought to be in an asylum). She says she has sinned away her day of grace and thinks that she is going to hell, and each time she comes I tell her 'no such thing.'" In her case, as in many cases, problems involving sex figure very largely.

One story more, or perhaps two stories twining into each other. The father of a little girl in St. Louis had died, and the mother, unable to care for both her children, sent the girl to live with her uncle and aunt. The uncle and aunt were good to the child, but her cousins were very mean to her. Now at fifteen she wanted a new dress. It was the great thing in her life. No doubt she did need it. "I have nothing to live for," she wrote to Dr. Warren, describing her unhappiness. "I have often a mind to take my life." Then came one of those strange coincidences that seem only explicable as a genuine Providence. In New York Dr. Warren called on a physician. While he was waiting to see the doctor he fell to talking with the office woman. She told her life story, how she had been married to a man who became a major in the World War. The man had divorced her and married a girl in her teens—the office woman was perhaps thirty-five. She and her husband had lived in St. Louis. She came to New York in order to get away from everything that had to do with her former happiness. She felt that life had nothing more in it for her. When she had finished her story, Dr. Warren asked her, "Are you willing to help me?" He told her about the sixteen-year-old child in St. Louis and how perhaps her life depended on her getting a dress. The secretary forgot about her own troubles. Yes, she knew lots of people who had all sorts of dresses that they didn't need. So a girl in St. Louis got her dress and the woman in New York got something to live for.

Dr. Warren says that a much greater work than he is doing now might be done. He has found that people who are thinking of destroying themselves are eager to come and talk things over, if they can feel that it is safe to say what they want to, and that the person to whom they talk is both sympathetic and wise. He believes that the Roman Catholic confessional has in it the elements of a very great blessing. In that connection it is an interesting fact that probably not more than one suicide in ten is a Roman Catholic. Seven of the ten may be Protestants and two may be Jews. People need such simple things sometimes. Five dollars that will take a man to his home may save his life, or a visit to the right kind of doctor. Dr. Warren always tries to get these people in touch with the Church. What they need is something to which they can hold always, an anchor such as they may find in religion. If people honestly believe in the Providence of God they can endure the difficulties and trials of life. That is Dr. Warren's belief as the result of what he has seen. And, as he himself says, it is a great thing to save a life.

Fourteen Fish Profiteers Go to Jail

Fourteen men found guilty four years ago of conspiring to keep the price of fish at high levels in war-time have been sentenced to jail at hard labor. F. Monroe Dyer, of New York and Boston, a banker, who was the organizer of the Bay State Fishing Company, described in the protracted court proceedings as the "Fish Trust," and four of the biggest dealers who were officers of the company received sentences of ten months in jail and fines of one thousand dollars each. Nine other dealers, members of the company, were sentenced to pay fines of $500 each. William F. McKeown, a member of the latter group, was not sentenced because of poor health. Simeon Atwood, Jr., still another member of that group, has been serving a similar sentence at the House of Correction at Deer Island since February 17, having abandoned his rights under the motions for appeal and delay. Atwood will be joined in the island institution by his associates who were sentenced recently. They spent a night in Charles Street jail. None had made provision for immediate sentence, although it appeared that the last of the steps which had served to stay execution since they were originally sentenced on July 9, 1919, had failed. Counsel revived the request for delay, asking Judge Sanderson to postpone sentence again, so that the case might be taken to the United States Supreme Court on a constitutional question. But the Supreme Court of Massachusetts having held that there were no apparent grounds for a writ or error, the court proceeded to impose sentence. Those sentenced with Dyer to ten months at hard labor and a one thousand dollar fine were Joshua Paine, Joseph A. Rich, Ernest A. James and John Burns, Jr. Those sentenced to five months and a five hundred dollar fine were Frederick G. Phillips, Willard R. Cox, Albert E. Watts, Ephraim M. Cook, Winfield S. Kendrick, Herbert F. Phillips, William E. Curran, Alvin G. Baker and Louis B. Goodspeed. Originally the first group was sentenced to serve a full year and the second group to serve six months, with the same fines, but one of the several appeals brought a ruling from the Supreme Court on which two of the counts in the indictment on which they were convicted were thrown out. It was held that the court had failed properly to instruct the jury on the application of these counts, based on the common law. Dyer and others of the defendants were in tears as they pleaded for further delay, but they were dry-eyed as they took the sentences meted out. Rich, who had been defaulted, arrived from California an hour or two before the proceedings.—From the New York Times.

In Separation Justice

"The Negro does not object to separation, but he does object, and rightly so, to the degradation and inferiority which segregation sometimes carries with it." With this declaration of Dr. Moton, superintendent of Turkegee Institute, we believe that white men of the better sort can and do, in principle, agree. No honest man wishes that the Negro shall receive for his dollar less than a white man receives for it, and no decent man wishes a Negro subjected to injustice because he is a Negro.—Columbia State.

Interdenominational Co-operation

By Paul L. Vogt, Ph.D.

Director, Rural Work, the Board of Home Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church

THE Methodist Episcopal Church seems to be getting the reputation for unwillingness to cooperate with other denominations in the adjustment of relationships for larger community service.

In the "Congregationalist" for August 3, 1922, appears the following statement:

Workers in home mission fields have complained during the last few years that the Methodists are the most sectarian of all denominations. Their district superintendents and pastors are accused of acting as if no community is adequately churched until it has a Methodist organization, and there seems to be a good deal of evidence to support this accusation. The Methodist organization is so great and has such aggressive leadership that it is not surprising to find some of the workers on the field over-emphasizing an attitude which is perfectly proper in the officials at the top.

Apparently many promises were made to various fields over the country that the Methodist organizations working in them would profit from the Centenary Fund. The result was that Methodist churches in these situations felt able to carry on their work along and would have nothing to do with a co-operative movement. No one could foresee that this would be the result, but there is abundant testimony that it was.

It would seem a statement such as this appearing in a journal representing another denomination should have been more adequately supported with specific illustrations of the cases wherein the Methodist Episcopal churches have refused to co-operate with other agencies. The problems of interdenominational competition present themselves most patently in our smaller communities. On the surface it would appear that adjustment of relationships would be a very simple matter, but more extended experience demonstrates that the solution of problems of interdenominational competition is one of the most difficult in the whole program of religious work.

The Methodist Episcopal Church has some real difficulties to be overcome in any interdenominational adjustment it might be called upon to make. In the first place, there are a number of Protestant religious organizations whose policy is such as to make it impossible for the Methodist Episcopal Church to adjust relationships with them or to allocate territory by swapping membership. To be specific, a very large majority of the Baptist organizations in this country still refuse to accept members from other denominations unless they have been immersed. In other words, they will not accept members of the Methodist Episcopal Church by letter unless such members have conformed in every respect to the ritual of the Baptist organization. The reverse is not true, for Baptists are accepted into the ranks of the Methodist Episcopal Church on the basis of their previous membership in a recognized Baptist organization.

The same difficulty presents itself in adjustment of relationships with the Disciples of Christ, another very large rural organization. It is also practically impossible to adjust relationship with Episcopalians because of their attitude toward apostolic succession. So far as Presbyterians and Congregationalists are concerned, there is practically no difficulty in adjusting relationships on the score of the lack of mutual recognition of quality. In most sections of the United States the impression received by representatives of the Methodist Episcopal Church is that Lutheran bodies have little inclination to adjust relationships with other Protestant organizations.

So far as other rural religious organizations, such as the Nazarenes, the Christians, the Friends, the Church of the Brethren and similar organizations, are concerned, their principles are relatively similar, but because of size the problems of adjustment with them are less important as compared with the Baptist, Disciples of Christ, Presbyterian and Congregationalist.

From another point of view, the Methodist Episcopal Church has difficulty in making adjustments. In that organization there is a form of polity which makes possible agreement with reference to Methodist activity in a given local community. In organizations having a congregational polity there is little or no possibility of a district or national agency having the power of determining whether or not a branch of the religious organization shall exist in a given community. Consequently, in cases of allocation or responsibility between denominations there is less assurance that the congregational types of religious organizations will adhere to their agreements with reference to any given community.

Many Methodist Episcopal administrators, while sincerely desirous of adjusting relationships with other denominations, have discovered that in certain sections of the country there were few churches of other denominations sufficiently strong in given communities to make possible a trading off of leadership or responsibility for different fields.

The confidence of the rank and file of Methodist laymen in the Methodist Episcopal organization and program also makes adjustment of relationships very difficult. It has been found that there are comparatively few members of the organization who willingly give up their membership of the Methodist Episcopal Church for membership in some other organization. This is a factor with which administrators must reckon and which administrators cannot control.

The experience of recent years indicates that much remains yet to be learned about the solution of problems of interdenominational competition. Other denominations should, however, recognize that the apparent recrudescence of sectarianism in the Methodist Episcopal Church, and in other denominations as well, is not so much a manifestation of the spirit of antagonism to other denominations as an intensifying of interest in the vastly increased program of the churches. The various denominations have found themselves so busy working out the great tasks that have come to them, and for which they have undoubted responsibility, that they have had little time to devote to problems arising out of relationships of other groups.

Why Europe Hates Us

By William Willard Howard

LET us set aside for a moment the ghastly plight of the Russian refugees in Eastern Europe. Let us consider, briefly, the plight of Europe itself.

On my return home from Europe recently the daily press published an interview in which I said, in part:

"Europe is a dreary expanse of hunger, hatred and suspicion. Each country hates some other country—usually its next-door neighbor. All hate the United States. The hatred felt toward us is the hatred of the debtor for the creditor.

"During the war and immediately afterward Uncle Sam was unbelievably lavish in his financial assistance to impoverished Europe. Naturally, he was looked upon as a credulous and open-handed relative who could be expected to shovel out money in carload lots indefinitely. He was a never-failing source of easy income.

"When Uncle Sam stopped shoveling and suggested some arrangement looking toward repayment Europe was shocked to discover that Uncle Sam really was a hard-hearted callous, selfish, mercenary money-lender, who actually believed that he should have his money back. So Europe hates us with a debtor's hatred.

"Europe does not want us in her conferences; does not want us to give advice; does not want us to help or direct in any way. All that Europe wants is our money. My own belief is that we should keep out of a place where we are not wanted—and keep our money out. If we take a hand in Europe's mess we shall regret the action with much bitterness of spirit.

"Men in Europe told me that they blame Woodrow Wilson for the present condition of the continent. Wilson promised Europe fourteen kinds of millennium, and then failed to produce even the semblance of a millennium when put to the test.

"France went into the Ruhr not to obtain coal, but to get a strangle-hold on Germany. She has it. If France and England do not strangle Germany, they will be strangled by Germany. Even in her present crippled condition Germany is driving English commerce from the seven seas. Foreign trade is England's life-blood. Without it England cannot live. Yet to-day Germany is selling textile goods in Manchester in open competition with Manchester-made goods. That tells the whole story.

"If Germany once gets on her feet she will cut John Bull to ribbons. One would suppose that John Bull would realize his peril, yet he actually is selling to Germany the coal that will enable German factories to drive English goods out of the world's markets.

"If present trade and tariff conditions continue Germany will close every factory and workshop in the United States. Official statistics just published in Germany show that the average wage in twenty staple industries is four and one-half cents an hour. Can we make shoes or anything else in competition with that scale of wages?

"When I left New York last November longshoremen were getting sixty-five cents an hour. When I landed at Hamburg I found longshoremen working for five cents an hour. Can American ships compete with German ships on that basis?

"I sailed from New York grumbling at the exactions of the Fordney-McCumber tariff. I thought the tariff wall too high. I returned prepared to urge that the wall be built still higher. We cannot compete with Germany.

"In Germany the laboring classes are better off than ever they were. The big industrialists, such as Stinnes, Thyssen and Wolff are making colossal fortunes. The middle class folk between the lower and upper millstones are ground to dust. They have not enough to eat. I could see hunger in their faces. I have seen starvation often enough to know it when I see it.

"A solution of the troubles of Germany is far off. I cannot even predict it. But, in reality, Germany is better off than England. In Germany everyone is at work. In England a million and a half are idle. Hunger marchers go through London streets. Taxes in England are higher than in any other country in the world. Brave old John Bull, with his back to the wall, is fighting what seems to be his last fight. Economic conditions are against him. In a few years England will cease to exist as a world power. Germany will control the trade of the whole earth—unless France succeeds in strangling her life out.

"Poland is in a chronic state of unrest. She has an army of eight hundred thousand men strung along her eastern frontier, prepared to resist an invasion of the Bolsheviks of Russia. It is a case of nightmare. The Bolsheviks are not prepared to fight anybody outside of their own country. They could not, even if they wanted to.

"Russia is just drifting along. She is governed by economic conditions over which her leaders have no control. Communism has disappeared from Russia. It exists now only in the imagination of parlor Bolsheviks in the United States. Communism as a political issue is buried as deep as though the Berkshire hills stood over it. We may forget it as a dream of yesterday. Lenin, Trotzky, Radek, Kameniev, Tchicherin, Kalenin, and the rest will go down in history as public benefactors inasmuch as they have shown the failure of Communism as a working form of human government.

"Germany is said to be making airplanes, tanks, cannon and other war material in Russia. I do not know; I did not see it. If Germany were at all able to fight she would be at war with France at this moment over the Ruhr. German hatred of France is indescribable. Even the waiters in the hotels in Hamburg and Stettin told me that Germany would have to fight France again.

"But the saddest thing in all Europe is the plight of the Russian refugees—the members of the nobility, landed gentry and intelligentsia who fled from their ancestral lands and homes to escape death, or worse, at the hands of revolutionists. About a million of them have died of hunger and broken hearts. The survivors are existing miserably in a condition of unthinkable poverty in Eastern Europe—dying.

one by one, without murmur or complaint: the brains, education, creative ability and administrative experience of a nation of a hundred and fifty millions of inhabitants. They gave their all to the Allied cause, and having given, made the supreme sacrifice in alien lands—passed by on the other side, forgotten. We gave scores of millions in food and money to the peasants of Bolshevik Russia, while the educated, cultured gentlefolk died miserably in exile.

"Anne Louise Howard, who accompanied me to Europe, remains in Eastern Europe to give her personal attention to a relief work that she put into operation for the benefit of Russia gentlewomen—a lonely and heroic figure grappling single-handed with a relief problem of colossal magnitude and tragic urgency."

The printing ink on this interview was not yet dry when a traveling secretary of the International Y. M. C. A. arose at a banquet in a New England city and, taking my words as a text, paid a glowing tribute to the love which Europe feels toward the United States. In particular, the traveling secretary denied my assertion of Europe's hatred toward us, saying, "I do not find it so."

Naturally, a traveling secretary of the International Y. M. C. A. would not find it so. If you go to Europe bearing gifts of gymnasiums, running tracks, swimming pools, recreation rooms, libraries, social halls, and free instruction in various lines of study you will not see any openly expressed hatred—unless you happen to have eyes in the back of your head. If you walk forth upon the face of nature with your eyes fixed upon the rose-tinted clouds of sunrise you will not see the creeping, crawling, slinking things at your feet. Yet they are there, hiding under the leaves or peering at you with furtive eyes from the grass.

I went to Europe with a mind as receptive to impressions as a photographic dryplate. I did not go bearing gifts. I went to Europe seeking cargoes for my ships. I talked with all sorts and conditions of men and women—longshoremen on the wharves; masters, mates and stewards of ships; waiters in restaurants, porters, managers of hotels, clerks and salesmen in stores, shipping agents, sailors, brokers, fur dealers, lumber merchants, foreign consuls, farmers, shopkeepers, school teachers, bankers, street sweepers, government officials, and the president of at least one republic.

I transacted business with some of these persons. If there is any better way of getting at a man's inner thoughts than by doing business with him I have not found it in travels in thirty-two foreign countries and thirty-eight States of my own country.

I described what I found existing in Europe; not what I thought should exist. Europe hates us for our altruism; for the moral example of our unselfish devotion to the cause of humanity; for our refusal to keep their mercenary diplomacy in countenance by grabbing German colonies and reparations for ourselves; for the higher moral level of our public life; for our conspicuous generosity to suffering humanity; for our prosperity, and for our commanding position in the affairs of the world.

These are the foundations upon which rest Europe's hatred of the United States. The causes mentioned in the press interview are of lesser consequence, but more apparent on the surface.

The remedy for the conditions of Europe is not in sight. The clamor that the United States do something is futile. Loans of money would make matters worse instead of better. If a thousand American ministers, led and directed by the Church Peace Union and World Alliance for International Friendship could be sent to Europe as missionaries of the Golden Rule something might be done. What Europe needs is a change of heart.

Meanwhile the Russian Refugee Fund, of 70 Fifth Avenue, New York City, is asking for help for the starving Russian gentlewomen of Eastern Europe. An illustrated booklet containing photo-engravings of hand-embroidered hand-sewn Russian Princess Blouses made in the relief industry now in operation under the direction of Anne Louise Howard, will be sent postage prepaid to any address for the asking.

Are the Colleges "Short-Changing" the Churches

THE president of a leading state university is reported recently to have said they are. What he meant, perhaps, was that the colleges are not making an adequate return to the churches in consecrated manhood and womanhood for the millions the churches are contributing to their support. This speaker has frequently said that our State universities are sectarian, because while they teach the religions of antiquity and the religions of alien peoples, they do not teach the religions of America and the Christian religion in particular. Such criticism of the church colleges from such a source is worthy of careful and prayerful consideration.

The Council of Church Boards of Education is an inter-board agency of Christian education. The boards which compose it are more or less directly related to a majority of the colleges of the country, and besides are assisting to carry on more or less extensive religious work in many of the others.

At the same time "Christian Education" is not a magazine of propaganda. It strives to publish such facts as it is able to discover and verify. It understands that propaganda based on ignorance or misstatements of fact damages rather than helps any cause. It attempts to present the picture with its beauties and its blemishes. It believes in the goodness of its cause and the reconstructive power of this goodness. It does not claim one hundred per cent. efficiency for the Christian work, either in the colleges or the universities.

It is hoped a partial answer may be found in this issue to the question whether the colleges are "short-changing" the churches. We hope a more adequate answer can be given later.—Editorial in "Christian Education" for March, 1923.

"Come, Spring!"

Come, Thou! O Spring and with Thy warmer sun, Swell the hard buds! Bid the green grasses start!
Call to Thy feathered folk! And one by one,
Break Thou the frozen places of my heart.

O, let me live anew, to rise and grow
More lovely, as this daily path I tread!
Break Thou my selfishness, and let me know
True brotherhood! In Love, lift Thou my head.

Colombia

COLOMBIA has a special interest for the people of the United States. Commercially, Colombia is the South American country nearest to the United States. From its chief port, Puerto Colombia, it is only three hundred miles to the Panama Canal; to New Orleans it is but thirteen hundred miles. It is a shorter distance from Puerto Colombia and Cartegena to the oil refineries on the eastern coast of the United States than it is from Tampico to the same. Colombia is the third largest country in population in South America, being outranked only by Brazil and Argentina. It is the only country in South America that has a coast line on both the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans. Ships can steam from Buenaventura, its chief Pacific port, through the canal to Puerto Colombia, on the Atlantic side, in four days. This coast line extends for 4665 miles on the Pacific side and 650 miles on the Atlantic.

From the standpoint of the Church, Colombia is of unique interest, whether considered from the Catholic or the Protestant angle. Colombia has its Concordat, which gives the Roman Catholic Church complete ecclesiastical freedom and a guarantee of governmental protection as the state church. Later legislation, in accordance with the Concordat, gives the Church the power of annulling civil marriages contracted by civil laws by a marriage ceremony conducted in conformity with the rites of the Roman Catholic Church. This Church has been more tenacious perhaps in its hold upon national and civil life than in any other Latin American country. But there is also a liberal element in Colombia, and the constitution, despite the Concordat, provides for tolerance of religious worship, and liberal leaders are increasing in number and influence.

From the standpoint of the Protestant churches, the work in Colombia has a special appeal. Missionary work was started in 1856 at the express request of a group of individuals in Bogota, who were convinced that the Word of God as much as the sword of Bolivar was needed in Colombia to bring in true justice and freedom. It is the oldest Presbyterian work in South America, antedating by four years our first work in Brazil.

Aside from two missionaries of the Gospel Missionary Union of Kansas City in Cali, our Church is the only Protestant Church represented, and we are wholly responsible for the spread of evangelical truth. With the possible exception of Venezuela, our youngest Latin American mission, it is the most needy field of our Church. Dr. Robert E. Speer visited Colombia in 1909 and after his return pointed out that for over thirty years there was but one station, with only two men, rarely a third, who came to begin work just as one of his predecessors was leaving. In 1909 there were eight missionaries in the whole field. To-day there are thirty, but these thirty are trying to meet the needs of the six million people in a country whose area is as great as that of Germany, France, Holland and Belgium combined, or as great as the area of all the Atlantic States of our own country, from Maine to Florida, with Ohio and West Virginia thrown in. Imagine thirty Protestants, two-thirds of whom are women, trying to serve the needs of such an area, and consider that in this total area there are less than eight hundred miles of railroad and practically no roads. The ratio of missionaries to a parish is as one to two hundred thousand; even China and India cannot show such a comparative need.

Here is a field which will call for all the courage and patience of any volunteer. Our Church has been long in the field, but the work is not yet done. Dr. Speer, in his report in 1909, wrote further: "We have put our hand to this plow. We put it there fifty-three years ago. The furrow is not run yet. We shall not turn back. Others have come and gone, but the work that is to be done is laid at our door. It is a needy work. There is none needier. . . . I am writing these words on the Magdalena River. We are just passing by a collection of hovels on the river bank. Children are playing before the door. The father has come down to hold off his canoe to save it from damage from the afterwash of the boat. The mother is looking out from the main hovel, which is her home. There is no school. There is no church. For scores and scores of miles up and down the river are hundreds of such homes. Back in the mountains they are gathered in villages and towns and cities. The people are of flesh and blood like ourselves. They are a warm-hearted, loving, responsive people. The Gospel is in our hands for them, and if we abandon them, who will give it to them? The Roman Catholic Church has been with them for three centuries, and it has not given it to them. Who will, if we do not?"

As I remembered those early adventurers, who had braved the Colombian wilderness, and as I thought of our little group of Americans who are facing almost as great odds, and as I read of the needs of which Dr. Speer wrote thirteen years ago, which are multiplied to-day, I thought that here indeed was a challenge to the bravest and best of the young men and women of our Church, and in the carrying out of this high adventure they would have a greater right than the soldiers of Cortes or Quesada to the watchword that was emblazoned on one of their ancient standards:

"Friends, let us follow the Cross, and under this sign, if we have faith, we shall conquer."

Isaiah, the Statesman-Prophet

2 KINGS 18:13—20:19; ISAIAH 1:1; 6:1-13.

"Hear am I; send me."—Isaiah 6:8.

ISAIAH was a contemporary of Micah, and doubtless had before him the prophecies of Hosea and Amos, all of whom evidently influenced him strongly. Yet his marked originality in thought, and especially, in literary form, came out of his own personal experience. In contrast with Amos, who was a peasant, and many other prophets, Isaiah was of high social position, even possibly of princely rank. He had direct access to the throne and to political leaders, and thus could speak with larger influence because of his recognized position.

The sixth chapter of his prophecy in its spiritual relation to the whole should be first, for it gives briefly, but with profound significance, the explanation of his power. It begins, "In the year that King Uzziah died." This is far more than a historical date; it marks a revolutionary change in the man himself. The sad death of King Uzziah, who may have been a relative or personal friend, stirred him profoundly and shifted completely his spiritual center of gravity. In that year he had a remarkable vision, which is given in this sixth chapter. When human power has been proved feeble; when human glory has sunk in eclipse; when human success is shown to be failure, he is turned from the human to the divine. He "saw the Lord . . . high and lifted up." How true this experience is to the normal processes of soul development! How often it is only when men have found reliance on physical strength, material resources, or individual initiative inadequate either to satisfy their deeper longings or to equip them for life, that they gain a true perspective, and see their deep need of divine help! It has been well said that "God puts men on their backs that they may look up."

In this vision Isaiah gains a new conception of the divine holiness. Its first effect is to produce in him a deep sense of sin: "Woe is me! for I am undone." Thus was it with Peter when the Master's glory was revealed through the draught of fishes—"Depart from me; for I am a sinful man, O Lord." Thus is it ever. "In thy light shall we see light," cried the psalmist, and in the light of the divine excellence man sees more clearly his own sin and need. And the particular sin mentioned is significant: "I am a man of unclean lips, and I dwell in the midst of a people of unclean lips." That is, as a prophet, Isaiah was called to speak the truth from God, without fear of man; and God's people were also called to be His fearless revealers to the world. But God is seen not only to be infinitely high, but also infinitely near; not only Holiness which rebukes, but Love that forgives and cleanses. By the angel's hand a live coal from off the altar touched the unclean lips and purified them, and then they were ready to speak God's truth. And immediately with the sense of sin forgiven came the impulse for service: "Who will go for me, and whom shall I send?" "Here am I; send me." It was a hard and hopeless task to which he was summoned, to predict coming disaster to a people who would wilfully continue blind and deaf; to warn men of the divine retributions, yet know it was in vain; to invite them to repentance, conscious that they would continue in their heedless way towards destruction. What a test of the prophet's sincerity and endurance, and how magnificently he met it is disclosed in the various public utterances which form the substance of this book.

The most important personal application of the great prophet's experience and service is to be found in the relation of the tasks of life to its visions. Many men in spiritual histories have been content with the contemplation of religious mysteries and revelations, and have considered that such protracted contemplation was religion. But the vision of Isaiah rebukes such a self-centered ideal. The value of the vision was to awaken the passion for service. In vain had he "seen the Lord, high and lifted up," unless, when the word came, "Whom shall I send?" he had promptly answered, "Here am I; send me." In vain are all our exalted moods and hours of spiritual communion if we come not from them with greater zest to do the will of God. Empty are our mountaintops of transfiguration if from them we descend not into the valley to "cast out devils." As Phillips Brooks has said: "It is a terrible thing to have seen the vision, and be so wrapped up in its contemplation as not to hear the knock of needy hands upon our doors. But there is no greater happiness in all the world than for a man to love Christ for the mercy Christ has shown his soul, and then to open his whole heart outward and help to save his brethren's souls with the same salvation in which he rejoices for himself." The world to-day is God's own anguished voice calling to Christians everywhere. "Whom shall I send, and who will go for me?" May the Christian Church in all its membership, with increasing unity of devotion and purpose, answer, "Here am I; send me."

Under this caption, each week, we shall direct attention to some striking book, such as no Minister or those interested in religious thought and action can afford to remain unacquainted with

Life of Christ*

THE third decade of the twentieth century sees the figure of Christ rising higher than ever toward the zenith of the world's thought. He is still the goal of all human progress, the solution of all earth's problems, the Saviour and King of men. Men differ widely about doctrines concerning Christ, but with remarkable unanimity they recognize the perfection of His character and the vital relation of His teaching to the welfare of humanity. Even those who are hostile to the organized church profess reverence for Christ and insist that if the churches were only like their Master they would gladly join them. In a world torn and tortured by fear and suspicion and prejudice and hate, men everywhere admit that if the principles and spirit of Jesus were universally to prevail the long dreamed of era of peace and good-will would dawn. No other phenomenon in all history is comparable to this Nazarene, who was born in a manger in a carpenter's family, and who after a ministry of only three years was crucified with common criminals at the age of thirty-three. Yet that life, which was unheard of by the statesmen and generals and scholars of the Roman Empire, has become the mightiest force in the world.

A Life of Christ from a fresh viewpoint is therefore a notable event. It is true that scores of biographies have already been written and that the literature of the subject is so enormous that no library could hold it; but the subject is of such perennial and transcendent interest that the demand never ceases. But who could have imagined that a Life of Christ that would be eagerly hailed by Protestants throughout Europe and America would come from an Italian Roman Catholic layman, who, although of high literary repute in his native land, was until this book appeared unknown outside of it, save in a limited circle, and one, too, who, as Henry James Forman says, was a hater rather than a lover of his kind, a master of invective, anarchist, atheist, nihilist. And now he has written a book that is already translated, or being translated, into a dozen languages, a book that turns its back upon all criticism or analysis, that has for its one aim and goal the calling back of the human race to the religion of love.

But Papini is not an atheist now. He says of his own recent spiritual experience: "I was induced to take up the Gospels once more after having re-read Tolstoy and Dostoevsky and under the influence of the war. In 1917-18 I studied the history of all the races of the earth and became convinced that the sole solution of the evil of the world is the transformation of human souls, that this cannot be brought about except by means of religion, and that the most perfect and suitable is that taught by Christ. In 1919 I began upon a sudden to write my book, and in writing it I became more persuaded than ever of the truth of the Gospels and of the divinity of Christ. In 1920 Christ led me to the Church."

His book is unconventional to a degree. He is not concerned with speculations about Christ or about criticisms of the Gospel narratives. He is neither a theologian nor a philosopher. He is distinctively an impressionist. He views Christ objectively. He writes picturesquely, vividly, and at times emotionally, although his emotionalism never sinks into sentimentality. He vents his scorn upon other accounts of Christ. We think that he could wisely have spared some of his epithets. His vocabulary contains an abundance of them and he has poured them out with prodigal freedom. He speaks of "presumptuous donkeys mistaking libraries for their stables top-heavy brains pretending to explore the highest heavens in philosophy's drifting balloon, professors poisoned by the fatal strong drink of philology and metaphysics." He terms "Free Masons, Spiritualists, Theosophists, Occultists, Scientists, such mixtures of moldy superstition and worm-eaten necromancy, such a hash of musty rationalism and science gone bad, of simian symbolism and humanitarianism turned sour, such unskilful rearrangements of Buddhism, manufactured-for-export, and of betrayed Christianity, contented some thousands of leisure-class women, of condensers of the void." There is a good deal of this kind of writing.

But the reader's attention is dominated by the marvelously vivid portraiture of the Man of Galilee. There are no doubts in the author's mind regarding that miraculous life and the miraculous events that characterized it. Jesus is divine, God manifest in the flesh, entering into the joys and sorrows of humanity, guiding the perplexed, casting out demons, healing the sick, comforting the sorrowing, and making plain to all men the loving purpose of the Heavenly Father. In these pages one sees anew the figure of the Son of man traversing the hills and valleys of Judea, hungry, weary, persecuted, struggling with bleeding feet along the stony pavements of Jerusalem, dying upon the cruel cross; but always calm, powerful, majestic. Papini's description of the closing scenes of the life of Christ is the most moving that we have ever read. The pathos and tragedy and yet the sublimity of the death of Christ have never been more graphically pictured.

We do not mean to give the impression that the book is free from faults, or that the reader will agree with every opinion that the author expresses. He is evidently a man of rather vehement temperament and the type of religious experience out of which this book has sprung differs in some respects from that of British and American Protestantism. But taking the book as a whole, it is a valuable contribution to the religious books of the world. We do not wonder that it has been said that "not since Savonarola has such a voice come from Italy," and that "it is such books as these that open the prison door and let Jesus out into His world."

"BIBLE HEALING"

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN WORK:

Your readers may be interested to know that the New York Presbytery on April 9 appointed an official Committee on Bible Healing to carefully investigate this ministry and bring in a report at the fall meeting of the Presbytery.

I have also been holding a number of localized campaigns with tremendously gratifying results, if we may believe the ministers with whom I have worked and the persons who have been treated. A large variety of ailments have come under my supervision, both at Chelsea Presbyterian Church, New York, Rev. W. N. Ross pastor, and at Northminster Church, Rev. Seth Craig; and also in the balmy climate of Miami, Florida, where I have just held a Bible healing mission in a big outdoor tent, announced by Mr. Bryan and attended by him. The joy as well as the sincerity of the testimonies is indeed quite remarkable. "The Miami Daily Metropolis" of March 28 published the following testimony of Mr. Manual Haley, of 151 N.E. Nineteenth street, that city, superintendent of the First Congregational Sunday school: "I have suffered for seven years with deafness in my left ear. The hearing was quite impaired and has given me much distress. I have also had rheumatism in the back and shoulders for over a year so badly that it greatly handicapped me in my work as carpenter and builder. The pain was great and I had no free use of my arms. I was in the Bible healing service conducted by Dr. Benson last night, and when prayed for I was actually and instantaneously healed of God. My hearing was so restored that even when I stopped up my good ear, the right, I could hear a watch tick at some little distance, a thing I have not been able to do for years. Also, after one prayer I could raise both my arms, though still with some pain. After a season of prayer the rheumatism was completely gone, and I freely raised both arms again and again in the presence of the audience without the slightest hint of pain, a thing I could not do in many months. I praise the Lord, as I can now work at my occupation and earn my living with comfort."

But to come closer home, Dr. Ross, pastor of Chelsea Presbyterian Church, New York, stated in Presbytery that many people had been healed during the several weeks' campaign in his church under my ministrations. Among them a Sunday school teacher, who had suffered with nervous indigestion of many years' duration, was completely cured. She has so testified repeatedly.

Rev. Seth Craig, of Northminster Church, 115th street, was another who testified in Presbytery to the bodily healings in his church, as well as to the far-reaching spiritual benefits. Both pastors are enthusiastic. Through the kindness of a friend, who has been impressed with the aims and accomplishments of the movement, an actual headquarters, in fact a Bible Healing Institute, has been opened in the Presbyterian Building, 156 Fifth avenue, where consecrated crusaders are to be trained, where the ailing are to come for healing, and from which the promotional propaganda will all be issued.

WHAT ARE THE FUNDAMENTALS?

EDITOR CHRISTIAN WORK:

A most lame and impotent conclusion was my first thought on reading your recent editorial, "What Are the Fundamentals?" Perhaps this was emphasized by my expectation of finding something interesting and instructive as I have nearly always found in the writings of Frederick Lynch. But here I find the same conclusion as among the ultra-fundamentalists, viz., "here are six fundamentals which, if a man believe not, he shall no doubt perish everlastingly."

In the primrose path you have so thoughtfully provided for the perplexed and puzzled pilgrim, to the fundamentals there is a touch of modernism; but get there you must, if you expect to avoid that "lake of fire and brimstone, prepared for the devil and his angels." You say there are "six." Our biggest U.P. preacher here says there are "eight." It is vital that none be overlooked, as the omission of an even one might wreck millions. We have in our midst this very hour a one hundred per cent. fundamentalist, one of the

"Orthodox, Orthodox,
Who believe in John Knox."

His name is Gordon Watt. Just what title or titles he wears I know not; no doubt several D.D.'s. By the way, I have never fully determined in my mind whether the title of doctor of divinity was blasphemous, or simply ridiculous, my opinion leaning to the latter. This man is a recent importation (duty free) from the land in which "fundamentalism" is indigenous, and mind, he is not a common Scotch fundamentalist, but a registered thoroughbred, with a pedigree that reaches at least as far back as the said Knox aforementioned. He is said to have credentials from the Court of Heaven accrediting him as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to earth to proclaim "the day of the vengeance of our God" against all heretics and non-fundamentalists. In his initial address he said, as reported, "Every man who denies the 'virgin birth' is a liar," and you know what the Scriptures say about the fate of liars. I presume this man considers this a "fundamental," and the opinion of so distinguished a fundamentalist is not to be lightly esteemed. For the life of me I can see no difference between you and those of whom you complain, as you both, or all of you, make man's eternal destiny depend on certain things to be believed, and one man's "ipse dixit" seems to me as good as another's, especially when they are talking about something of which they are ignorant.

What did Jesus say about fundamentals? When asked the direct question about what was necessary, he said not a word about a single fundamental that you mention, nor in the parable of the "last judgment." Is it conceivable that he would omit the "one thing needful," or a fundamental that was necessary? When asked what was the greatest commandment, he quoted that real fundamental, written by an unknown Unitarian more than two thousand five hundred years ago, "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord. Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might." And long after one with a broader outlook said, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." He said, "There is no greater commandment; on these two hang all the law and the prophets; . . . this do and ye shall live." And in the parable of the "Last Judgment," not a word about any of your fundamentals. If you say that selling all as he advised the rich young man be a fundamental, I will say that it is not one of yours.

It is extremely doubtful whether Jesus ever made man's eternal destiny depend on the belief in any fundamental except these. He recognized that there were good men who needed no repentance, saying, "I came not to call the righteous but sinners to repentance"; "the whole need not a physician"; "ninety and nine who need no repentance," and so on.

In order to correct the impression you might get from my criticism of your article that I am an enemy of the Church let me state my position: I believe the Church to be God's appointed institution for making a good world, the bulwark of civilization, worthy the support of every man who believes in the higher things that fit him for a future life, regardless of the fact that its theology is distasteful to him, and some of its methods seem to him foolish. For more than seventy years I have been a weekly attendant of the Presbyterian Church; have given of my time and substance; have rejoiced in its growth and prosperity; have defended it against the false accusations of its critics, who are usually people who never go and who are too ignorant of its work and teachings to be fault-finders. I was born into the Church which is now the U.P. But my mother went to the Presbyterian church, which was nearby, when I was five years old. In these churches at that day it was not the custom to admit to membership boys or girls under sixteen or eighteen years. Now by that time I had ceased to believe the things necessary for membership. My father was about of my belief and was not a member, but was taught to go to church with the same regularity as we fed the stock and milked the cows, and my children and my children's children have been trained the same way. They always treated me just as though I believed as they, and I was honored with all the offices that a non-member could hold, being treasurer for many years and chorister for more than thirty. Now I never concealed my beliefs, but was always ready to give a reason for them when asked, and the preacher was always my good friend despite our difference of opinion about most things theological, and this has continued to this day through the twenty years since we came to the city. I am still playing in the Sunday school orchestra. I believe all churches are good—Catholic, Protestant, and I would not exclude the Mormon. I honor any religion, Jewish, Christian, or so-called pagan, that honors God and teaches human brotherhood.

My relation to the Church and the Bible are such that criticizing them is much like criticizing one's mother. Of course I was greatly perplexed in my early days by my utter inability to believe what practically everybody else believed, for the man who did not believe that the world was less than six thousand years old, made out of nothing in six days of twenty-four hours, and that Hell was a place of real fire and brimstone, was called an "infidel." The term infidel was a more comprehensive word than in this day; it embraced every phase, from atheism to the least liberalism. Later when they said, "Well, Hell is not a place of actual fire," they consoled us by saying, "No, but something much worse."

I have lived in the greatest seventy-seven years of recorded history. I am but slightly younger than the electric telegraph and the photograph, and older than the wonderful inventions that take the place of human hands and the wonderful achievements in transportation and communication. But, above all these, I have lived to see the Bible a new book, and a revelation that transcends all others—a revelation that promises final good to everyone of his children; a revelation that relieves the Grand Architect from the infamous charges that the Jewish, Mohammedan and Christian Churches have maintained against him; of having made a world and pronounced it good, and immediately cursed it with thorns and thistles; of having begotten man "in his own image," and next day sent the Tempter to lure him to a disobedience that ruined him and his whole posterity; who sent his dissolute sons to debauch the "fair daughters" of men, and breed a race that made him sorry that he had ever created man at all, and determined him to destroy the whole race, except one family; who, for four thousand years, provided no salvation for fallen man, and then contrived a plan that defied the first principles of justice by causing the innocent to suffer for the guilty, perpetuating the savage rite of bloody sacrifice so scathingly denounced by the prophets of the eighth century, providing such meager facilities for its propagation that after twenty centuries less than one-third of the human race has even heard of this plan, and not one-third of these have complied with the terms. I will not insult your intelligence by even intimating that you do not know what happens to the "scheme" of salvation if this last revelation be true. That it is true all scholarship outside the Church, and much of the best in the Church, believe, and the proofs thereof are added to almost daily. The Church acknowledges that all the scientific so-called revelation of the Bible has been shown to be no revelation at all, but simply the opinions of men, and this new revelation puts most Bible theology in the same class. The old argument about the Bible not being made to teach science but theology would be a very cogent argument if it were not for the fact that most of its theology is rather worse than its science. Modern Bible criticism has made it a new book, more valuable than ever if intelligently explained. The extravagant claims made by its over-zealous friends has made it a well-nigh unknown book outside the Church and Sunday school. The idiotic claim of "all true or all false" has caused most of the world to take those who make the claim at their word, for they know it is not all true. In my seventy years of church attendance I have never heard one intelligent sermon on the Bible. There has been a conspiracy of silence about the Bible, which has worked untold harm to this most valuable book, valuable more for what it has done than for what it is now.

The Church has some sad shortcomings, among which is the supreme idiocy of the Protestant churches in dividing their forces into a couple of hundred divisions, and that over things that nearly all admit to be non-essentials. And the spectacle of a church North and a church South, more than fifty years after the men who stood up and shot at each other have shaken hands and forgotten the past, is not a spectacle to inspire confidence in their professions of brotherly love. But, 'with all its faults it is the supreme and only organized means of making a better world. As I have said before, all churches are good, and if I still say that Presbyterians are the best people on earth, I mean no disrespect to the others. It is because I know them better. I well remember when the Methodist preacher boasted of his ignorance and turned up his nose at the "edicated" Presbyterian. He boasted that "no unholy hands had been laid on his unholy head to consecrate him to the ministry." The burden of sermons in my youth was "doctrine," and the cry, "Flee from the wrath to come." Nothing was said about "good works," for the Confession declared that "good works," unless done by a believer, were actually sinful, as the Thirty-nine Articles declare that "they no doubt partake of the nature of sin." This "Irish Bull" has been left out of the present Confession. There were no good works done in that day, except a few dollars to send missionaries to the heathen to tell them that their ancestors were all in Hell and they were on the way. If sermons were the same as in that day, and no more good works done, the Church would have been dead a generation ago. Good works is the prop that supports the Church to-day. But I did not intend to preach when I began. I hope you will not construe anything I have said as any disrespect to you, and if I have inadvertently wounded you, remember that a wise man said, "Faithful are the wounds of a friend."

156 Fifth Avenue is the national headquarters for the Bible Healing Movement. According to Dr. Benson's recent vow, he now never speaks for profit, nor takes a penny of the money received personally, simply accounting himself as a steward of the Lord and appropriating it as scholarship money to help in educating poor but con-

SCRUPULOUS

A young woman went into a book store and asked for a good book for reading on a journey. The clerk suggested "A Kentucky Cardinal." (This was some years ago.) The young woman said she wasn't interested in any theological discussion. "But," said the clerk, "this cardinal was a bird." She waved it aside. "I am not interested in his private life," she said.

A HELPFUL MOVEMENT IN BULGARIA

The recent opening of the Young Men's Christian Association Vocational School in Sofia, Bulgaria, was made the occasion of a remarkable gathering, in which clergy of the Bulgarian and Russian Orthodox Churches joined with representatives of the Bulgarian government, and with American and English residents, in exercises recognizing the importance of a new enterprise in trade instruction for refugees.

REACHING THE WORLD'S BOYS

"The most remarkable generation of boys this world has ever known is the one coming forward right before our eyes in these momentous years," says Dr. John R. Mott. "Great issues await these boys. Great responsibility will come on this particular generation, and it is going to be subject to very special dangers."

The truth of this is recognized by the leaders in our churches. By what Christian agencies can our boys be fitted to meet their responsibilities as citizens and nation builders? In all countries this is a living question, made especially urgent by the conditions born of the World War.

Of special interest, therefore, is the fact that the "Second World Conference of Young Men's Christian Association Workers with Boys" will be held at Portschach, on the beautiful Worthersee in the Austrian Alps, May 30 to June 10 of this year. The first conference was held at Oxford, England, just before the outbreak of the great war. This will be the first gathering of the world movement since that disruption of former ties.

"The Place of Boyhood in the Nations of the World," and the relations of the Association thereto, will be the subject of discussion by 900 delegates from nearly fifty countries, with a full quota of 100 from America.

The Ninth International Quadrennial Student Volunteer Convention will meet in Indianapolis, December 28, 1923, to January 1, 1924. Included on the committee of arrangements is a group of foreign students, made up of one native African, one Japanese, two Chinese, one Mexican, and one Indian (Hindu). Their presence on the committee is a mark of the growing influence of the non-Aryan in missionary work.

China and the Bible~

China, after centuries, has awakened out of her slumber to take her place as a Republic in the family of nations. She seeks a sure foundation on which to build her new culture and her new spiritual aspirations. She has turned to the Bible as the great foundation of truth.

In 25 languages and dialects and in the new phonetic script the scriptures have been made available. Over 2,362,000 volumes were distributed here in one year by the American Bible Society alone. Who is competent to measure the value of this service to China?

give to the Sunday-school teacher inspiring and practical insight into the essential spiritual messages of the International Uniform Lessons. The book consists of a series of short expository sermons on the lessons by such leading American preachers as Francis E. Clark, W. E. Barton, Charles Reynolds Brown, William Elliot Griffis, Cornelius H. Patton, John E. Tuttle, and others.

Dr. Frederick Lynch, editor of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, says in a recent letter:

"The other day The Monday Club Sermons for 1923 happened to come to my hand, and I was very much impressed both by the list of contributors, and by the unusually fine standard of the execution."

Dr. Lynch has arranged with us to run The Monday Club Sermons serially in THE CHRISTIAN WORK, beginning with the January 27th issue. But many Sunday-school teachers, pastors and superintendents will wish to own the whole series, so as to have it at all times conveniently at hand. ### The World of To-day

THE BANDITS IN CHINA

Those who are familiar with the Far East have referred frequently to the disordered condition of China. That disorder was made familiar to us all last week by the capture of thirty foreigners by bandits. The foreigners were taken off a train in Shantung in the early morning and driven off into the hills in their scanty night clothing. Half of the thirty were Americans. Among them were two American officers and their wives and children. Half of the captives escaped or have been released, but the bandits, at this writing, are holding the rest for ransom. The Peking Government has agreed to take the bandits into its army in order to secure the prisoners' release. The fact is that neither the central government nor the provincial governors in China have been able to pay their soldiers, so that the latter have often organized themselves into marauding bands. The condition is much as it was in Europe in the Middle Ages, when companies of mercenaries swarmed across the continent living off the land, slaying and burning. Jackson Hines, who recently returned from China, tells of seeing a Chinese of the lower order spit deliberately in the dust as President Li passed by in Peking. A policeman standing in the road saw him, but instead of arresting him the two hobnobbed for some time, evidently discussing the President and the republic, condemning everything connected with both. That policeman had not been paid in four months. How he lived nobody would be able to say. He was a likely recruit for any bandit leader who came along. The presence of the bandits paralyzes industry in certain districts. Villages which fear attack supply themselves with forts consisting of clay walls near the top of some especially steep hill. Within the enclosure are dozens of burrows, dirty, low caves, the best of which are hardly as good as the poorest cave homes or clay-arch houses of the villages. When bandits are in the neighborhood the terrified folk of the villages resort to their forts, taking their donkeys, pigs and chickens, the very doors from their houses and the huge iron pots from their stoves. Their crops may rot in the fields while the bandits are in the region. The men do not dare go out to work. Famine, or at least severe want, threatens such villages if the paralysis continues long. It is a real question whether China can pull herself together or not.

THE WORK OF THE AMERICAN BOARD IN TURKEY

Dr. Barton, senior secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, has made his attitude toward mission work in Turkey clear in what we have printed in THE CHRISTIAN WORK. While greatly grieved that the first Lausanne Conference did not insist on justice for the

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

Armenians, he would, nevertheless, accept the status quo and set the missionaries to work in behalf of the Turks. We have made clear that we heartily disagree with Dr. Barton's counsel to accept the decisions made at Lausanne. But that is no reason for opposing the American Board's undertaking work in behalf of the Moslems of Turkey. "The Gotchnag," the leading Armenian Protestant paper of America, declares in a recent issue, "The truth of the matter is that the Turks do not become Christians and they will not." We all have the deepest sympathy with the Armenians to-day. They have been betrayed by so-called Christendom. Every one of us who believes in justice and in common decency ought to let our administration and our State Department know directly that we cannot endure that we should make a treaty with Turkey until Turkey shall have done some sort of justice to these people, and made them some sort of restitution. Nevertheless, nothing is gained by misrepresenting the facts, and it is for Christians to be Christians toward all—toward Turks as well as toward Armenians. A noble Armenian refugee from Adana, as we recall, wrote back from his exile, "I look forward to the time when there will be Badvelli (that is, Pastor) Mohammed and Badvelli Abdul and Badvelli Rechad (all Mohammedan names). My only fear," he went on, "is that the Armenians will be pauperized. We must come back to stand on our own feet." The fact is that already some Turks have become real and earnest Christians. There are such Turks living to-day in India. Years ago there were two hundred evangelists among the converts from Mohammedanism in Java and Sumatra. Tens of thousands of Mohammedans have become Christians in the East Indies. That it is possible to establish a church among the Turks is proved by the church which was regularly organized in Marash during the brief period of its liberation from Turkish control. Its eleven members were all converted Turks. Its pastor was an Armenian Christian. Some Armenians, too, have charged that Turkish graduates of the American colleges in Turkey are more fanatical in their Mohammedanism than others. They instance Halide Hanum, the well-known Constantinople College graduate, as an example. Although Halide is a strong Turk, there is nothing to indicate that she is more ardent as a Moslem than if she had not been to an American college. The good friends who have counselled that the American Board should not work in behalf of Mohammedans in Turkey lack faith. How is this world to become the Kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ unless those peoples who have small sense of brotherhood are stimulated to a new point of view? How can we believe that society will ultimately grow toward kindness and neighborhood and refuse to try to bring that spirit to all people, no matter what their past?

THE DEVELOPMENT OF RELIGIOUS EDUCATION

The last annual report of the Presbyterian Board of Publication and Sabbath School Work gives what we may suppose is a pretty fair view of the present status of religious education in this country. The Sunday schools are growing in enrolment. At the same time, there are twelve million children in this country between the ages of six and eighteen who now have no religious instruction. Daily Vacation Bible Schools are gaining rapidly. They have multiplied twenty-fold in six years. Last summer there were 1,054 such schools in the Presbyterian denomination, with an enrolment of one hundred and twenty-one thousand children. The week-day church school is growing rapidly also. There are now twenty times as many such schools as there were four years ago. Fortunately, a large proportion of them are interdenominational. Such schools exist in three hundred communities. In addition there is developing a three-hour-a-week church school. The first of these schools, with a program of worship, instruction and expression for children from six to fourteen, was started in Oak Lane Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia in January a year ago. There are now at least twenty-two of them. As the report suggests, it is apparent that there is a distinct revival of interest in the church's mission of teaching Christianity to the teachable, the children and youth. The Board is issuing a series of valuable pamphlets on various phases of religious education. It has especially emphasized the need of adopting for the educational unit the natural unit of society, the family. "Christian education of the family's children is the family's first and unescapable responsibility." The Board is bringing out a new type of quarterly, in both a uniform lesson edition and the departmental graded edition, especially prepared for young people. It will contain several pages devoted to the problems of young people and young people's work, including distinctively missionary material and with suggestions as to bringing the work of the Sunday-school into touch with the young people's society. This development is very promising.

THE PRESBYTERIAN BOARD OF EDUCATION

With this year the Presbyterian General Board of Education passes out of existence as a separate entity. The present Board has a history of only four years, being a merger of two former similar Boards in the Presbyterian Church. Except for the Methodists, the Presbyterians have more students in our undenominational colleges than any other communion. More of them in proportion go to college than of any other church except the Congregationalists, and they have a larger representation on the faculty than any other except the Congregationalists and Unitarians. The Presbyterian Board last year aided 602 men and seventy-six women with loans that totalled $109,858.50, an average of a little less than $150 for each student helped. The Board allows $400 for mission students in medical colleges, $150 for college seniors, and for seminary and other graduate students, and smaller amounts for other students. All this aid goes to men and women who are looking forward to rendering Christian service in such special vocations as the ministry or missions. The Board has also a Rotary Loan Fund by which "any worthy person ready for college, needing aid and promising Christian usefulness" is eligible to benefits. The fund aided 157 students last year, about two-thirds of them men and one-third women. The average aid was $132. Since the fund started in 1910, 385 students have borrowed from it. The Board has helped the college in a number of endowment campaigns. Whereas for the seven years before the present Board began its work, the increase in college endowment and plant of Presbyterian institutions amounted to nine and three-quarter millions of dollars, the first two years of the present Board's work resulted in an increase toward eleven million dollars in such funds. In West Virginia and Kentucky the Northern and Southern Presbyterian Churches have united in working in behalf of their colleges. In Utah the other churches are preparing to help in the support of the Presbyterian Westminster College, which should become a truly interdenominational institution.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

OUR STUDENT VISITORS FROM EUROPE

When the American colleges held their conference in behalf of World Disarmament at Chicago at the time of the Washington Conference the students withdrew from the main body and formed an organization of their own under the name of the National Students' Committee for the Limitation of Armaments. This committee later amalgamated with the Intercollegiate Liberal League, in which John Rothschild and George D. Pratt, Jr., were leading spirits. Rothschild and Pratt as students at Harvard had founded the Students' Liberal Club there. The Student Forum determined to bring a party of European students representing the "Youth Movement" on a tour of our American colleges, in order to further international acquaintance and to stimulate those of our students who are interested in worth-while things and dream of a more reasonable world. Rothschild and Pratt on a trip through Europe last year selected six men as the European visitors. One of them, a Norwegian, was theoretically a Communist. The Forum recognized this fact and secured the student's faithful promise not to run counter to the law in America in any way. Probably the student never would have dreamed of advocating violence anywhere, but our government forbade the young man's entry into the United States. (Are we so childlike of mind that our own government—which we always supposed consisted of ourselves—cannot trust ourselves to listen to people who hold new opinions?) The six men who came, an Englishman, a Dane, a Hollander, two Germans and a Czechoslovak, reached America four months ago and have spent their time in a tour of the colleges. At a farewell dinner to them last week they reported their impressions. They were very frank. Our colleges they found tended to suppress individuality. Our fraternities and sororities were especially guilty in that respect. One man said that only at Antioch College, Ohio, and Reed University, Oregon, had he found real individuals. They discovered very few students interested in worth-while things. As the Dutchman remarked, our students had ideals and their devotion to those ideals was tremendous. Everyone cared about sports, whereas in Europe millions of students cared not a whit for them. The trouble with our students is not that they lack ideals, but that the ideals are not the right ones. One German told with wonder how in the University of Michigan, when on the same afternoon there was a football game and a symphony concert, every one of the students went to the football game with one exception. When the men returned and found that one man had gone to the symphony they did not know what to make of it. They described him as "crazy," "a Bolshevik," they did not know what. (Perhaps Mr. Tiesler was a little too hard on Ann Arbor. The fact that the man did not go to the football game may have seemed a mark of disloyalty to the university. We suspect that any man in a German corps who was absent from a duel to attend a symphony would be regarded as a poor corps member.) They found our women students more responsive to the fine things of life than our young men. William G. Robson, who is a student at the London School of Economics, thought that our colleges are taking too many students. "Your American idea is that you must have college life thrown open to all if you are to have a thoroughly democratic nation. My idea is that you should allow every man, woman and child to develop his potentialities to the highest possibility." In his opinion, as in the opinion of President Pritchett of the Carnegie Foundation and of not a few American college executives, we are taking into the colleges great numbers of men and women who have not the capability for an education. To quote Mr. Robson again, "You have got to have a class which shall produce genius. You have got to cultivate the exceptional if you will maintain that very small but very important group from which come leaders." The verdict of the young Europeans should receive wide attention on the part of our own students.

THE HEALTHIER SENTIMENT IN THE SOUTH

Frequently in these columns it has been our pleasure to record the expression of Southern white people in behalf of better relations between the white and the colored races. At its annual meeting in Mobile, Ala., April 4-11, the delegates of the Woman's Missionary Council of the M. E. Church, South, representing about 250,000 of the South's most influential women, expressed in most vigorous terms their condemnation of lynching, and adopted plans for active efforts to abolish it. They asked each local society of the Council to undertake a study of lynching and undertake to do what they can to secure in each State such legislation as may be needed. They called for vigilance to prevent mob violence, for active co-operation with officials in bringing the members of mobs to justice, and "for a sustained effort to develop in each community a spirit of good-will that will make such crimes impossible." In pursuance of these ends the Council and its constituent societies will "seek the co-operation of all other religious and civic groups." The Code Commission of the Legislature of Alabama has recently suggested the following law: "Any number of persons assembled for any unlawful purpose and intending to injure any person by violence and without authority of law shall be regarded as a mob; and any act of violence exercised by such mob upon the body of any person shall, when such act results in the death of the injured person, constitute the crime of lynching. And any person who participates in or actively aids or abets such lynching shall, on conviction, suffer death or be imprisoned in the penitentiary for life." Here is a law with teeth in it. The Southern churches can develop such a sentiment that public sentiment will compel the enforcement of such a law. The leading white women of Louisiana have recently taken action similar to that which has been taken earlier by prominent Southern women of other States. In regard to lynching, the Woman's Committee of the Louisiana State Committee on Interracial State Co-operation said: "We register herewith our protest against the barbaric custom of lynching, which arouses violent and un-Christian passions, brings law into disrepute, is inhuman and brutal, and unknown outside of our own land of America. We hold that no circumstances can ever justify such violent disregard of law, and that in no instance is it an exhibition of chivalric consideration and honor of womanhood." We should remember such developments when we read of the growth of the Ku Klux Klan. The newspaper prominence of that organization must not make us forget the growth of this strong, sane sentiment for justice and for law enforcement.

FOSDICK AND THE PHILADELPHIA PRESBYTERY

A minority of the Presbytery of Philadelphia earnestly disagrees with that Presbytery's action in overturning the General Assembly in objecting to Harry Emerson Fosdick's preaching in the First Presbyterian Church of New York. On May 3, eight elders who were the members of the Presbytery at the meeting at which the action was taken twenty-three ministers signed an able and vigorous protest against the action of the Presbytery. The matter is of such general interest that we print their statement in full:

PHILADELPHIA, Pa., May 3, 1923.

We the members of the Presbytery of Philadelphia, some of whom are on record in the minutes of the Presbytery as having formally protested against the overture sent by the Presbytery to the General Assembly concerning the preaching of the Rev. Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick, in the First Presbyterian Church of New York City, desire to set forth our reasons for our objection to this proceeding. It seems both fair to the Church and just to ourselves that the facts governing our action and the convictions determining us in such solemn protest should be communicated to the Church at large.

1. The method prescribed by Jesus Christ was not adopted, as an attack was initiated upon a fellow minister and upon another Presbytery without any communication with him or with that Presbytery, or any intimation that such action was to be taken.

2. Dr. Fosdick expressed in a personal letter read before the Presbytery of Philadelphia while action on the aforesaid overture was pending, his belief in the deity and Saviourhood of Jesus Christ in the following language:

"I believe in the deity of our Lord. I conceive that belief to be the very center of the Gospel. He is the place where I find God and where God finds me, and when I think of the mystery of his Person, no language seems so adequate as the opening words of the Fourth Gospel, 'In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God.' You may be sure that if ever I should come to doubt our Lord's deity, which I could not do without uprooting my whole Christian experience and thought, I should at once leave the evangelical pulpit as under the circumstances I ought to do. . . . Jesus Christ to me is in himself the Divine Love taking on himself the sins of the world that he might save us."

He also spoke of the Bible in the following words:

"The Bible exercises over my thinking, and by God's grace, somewhat over my life, a paramount authority. . . . The Bible is to me the Book of God."

It is our conviction that these statements are adequate to define his loyalty to the evangelical faith, hence we could not vote to restrain him from preaching in a Presbyterian pulpit.

3. In his sermon, "Shall the Fundamentalists Win?" which was the only documentary evidence presented as the ground for the Presbytery's overture, we do not find that Doctor Fosdick has denied the virgin birth of Christ, but he has given only the views of others upon that subject. The whole sermon is free from dogmatic teaching, and is throughout a plea for tolerance and Christian liberty. In the letter above referred to he said, "I therefore took pains to put over against each in brief and sketchy outline extreme conservative positions and extreme liberal positions, in order that I might say that even when people are as far apart as these two positions represent, we must still strive to keep them within the fellowship of Christ, loyal to him and devoted to his work until the fuller truth comes to light."

4. We believe that to seek to control opinion by force does more harm than good in that such a method invariably repudiates the Holy Spirit and thus creastes the worst form of heresy. Only in the case of serious defection from faith or character should resort be made to the church courts, and then only after all such methods prescribed by our Master have been exhausted, which as we have said above, was not done in this case.

5. It is our conviction that the Presbytery of New York, with its long roll of faithful and able presbyters, is sufficiently wise and careful to be trusted with the care of its own pulpits. Moreover, we realize that until the Church in Philadelphia is much more effective in meeting its primary responsibilities than it is at present, it is not becoming in our Presbytery to call attention to the defects of a neighboring Presbytery.

6. We believe that in the face of the grave perils confronting organized religion and the world's growing need for a great forward spiritual movement by all those loyal to Jesus Christ, every effort should be made to keep the divisive spirit with its antagonisms and suspicions out of the Church. We are persuaded that the overture of the Presbytery of Philadelphia violates the spirit of our Lord's intercessory prayer, "that they all may be one; as Thou, Father, art in me, that they also may be one in us; that the world may believe that Thou hast sent me."

Gilbert Chesterton once said—we do not guarantee the perfect accuracy of the quotation—"It is not so much that Christianity has been tried and found difficult, but that it has been found difficult and not tried."

The movement toward democratic control is striking the theological seminaries as well as industry! The Auburn Alumni last year asked the Board of Directors for official alumni representation on the Board; and now, at the forthcoming commencement, we expect to hear that the directors have yielded to "modern democratic tendencies."

How different eggs are from diamonds! The more eggs a hen lays, the more each one is worth. But if diamonds get too plentiful, we all know they would be of no more value than prisms. Lady Jewell, an aristocratic leghorn hen, laid three hundred and fifteen eggs in one year. Because her eggs were so plentiful, twenty of them sold for five hundred dollars a few months ago.

Ernest M. Hopkins, of Dartmouth, in the course of his speech accepting the presidency of the Board of Trustees of the Woodrow Wilson Foundation, the other day quoted a tale told by his ministerial father from Spurgeon. Spurgeon had preached a great missionary sermon. One of his auditors asked him whether the heathen in Africa would go to hell if the London churches did not send missionaries to them. Spurgeon answered, "I do not know about the African native, but the London churches will."

The Transportation Committee of the World's Sunday-school Association, which holds its convention in June of next year in Glasgow, has set an example that might well be followed. The Committee voted, "Whereas the United States Government has enforced the Eighteenth Amendment on steamships sailing under the American Flag, we believe that the Committee should arrange for passage only on vessels sailing from United States ports under these conditions" "Wherever possible such steamships will be used as the official Convention steamers. The Committee is so much in earnest that if it has to charter non-American vessels, it will make arrangements that at least on the Sunday-school voyage the vessels will observe the Eighteenth Amendment."

The One Thing Lacking

THERE are some things wherein the Protestant churches are far ahead of the Roman Catholic. Thus the preaching in the Protestant pulpits greatly surpasses in intellectual vigor, breadth of vision and comprehensiveness. This is perhaps accounted for by the difference in theory of preaching held by the two groups. The Catholic uses the pulpit largely for instruction in the doctrines held by the Church. The attendants at the Catholic service are all already members of the Church and the office of the preacher is not to convert, but to instruct and to establish the hearers in the faith. The Protestant preacher is also supposed to instruct and to establish in the faith, but primarily he is a preacher of a gospel, a herald of good news, an ambassador of Jesus Christ trying to persuade men to accept Him as their Lord and King. Therefore, the scope of his preaching is much wider and the prophetic note, that of speaking for God, is much more prevalent in it. He also, because of this, deals with a much wider field of thought and subject, and is generally a much more widely read and cultured man. We do not think that anyone familiar with both Protestant and Roman Catholic preaching will dispute the fact that the preaching in the Protestant communion is much more intellectually virile and much more inclusive of human interests.

It is only to repeat a commonplace to say that in the knowledge of the Bible the Protestant Church is far ahead of the Roman Catholic communion. Ever since the Reformation the Protestant Church has put the Bible into the hands of all the people. During the last one hundred years it has made one of its chief objects the teaching of the Scriptures to every child in the parish. The Sunday-school is as prominent a part of the Protestant equipment as is the church. As much stress is laid upon the teaching of the Bible to the child as upon the preaching of the gospel to the people, and much of the Protestant preaching has the exposition of the Scriptures. The Protestant peoples are a thousand times more familiar with this greatest literature the world has ever produced than are the Catholic peoples.

The Protestant Church is far ahead of the Roman Catholic Church in its application of the Christian principle to all the affairs of life, to all human interests and to all social relationships. To be sure, the Roman Catholic Church in America has established a Social Welfare Council, and it has secured some excellent recommendations and statements, some of them surprisingly radical; it has held one or two conferences in Europe on social and industrial questions, generally called by the younger and more radical Catholics and not always eyed with favor by the hierarchy; and the Pope occasionally demands that the nations order their ways by the Christian ideal. The last Encyclical was brave and prophetic, but in general the Catholic Church has confined the application of the gospel to the individual's relation to God and the individual's relation to his fellow-man. It has had no vision of the redemption of the social order comparable to that which has become common to almost all Protestant communions. It makes practically no attempt in its preaching to apply the gospel to the community, to the state, to the nation, to international relations, to industry, to the larger human welfare. It was only a few years ago that a group of men from a prominent organization waited upon an archbishop of the Roman Catholic Church and asked the aid of the Catholic Church in remedying a great evil. The archbishop said that personally, as a citizen, he would help, but that the Church confined itself purely to the dealing with sin in the individual life. Our readers will remember that the priest in Mrs. Ward's novel, "Helbeck of Bannisdale," says that the Catholic Church concerns itself with: "Death, Judgment, Heaven and Hell." The Catholic Church, on the whole, has not got far away from the individualistic interpretation of the gospel. Our Protestant churches are everywhere applying the gospel to every human relationship, to all spheres of human activity, and trying to persuade the nations to establish their relationships upon the Christian principle. Most of the great reforms, such as prohibition, the improvement of labor conditions for women and children, the suppression of vice, the movement to substitute arbitration, world courts and world parliaments for war in the settlement of international disputes have been put over by the Protestant churches with very little help from the Roman Catholic Church.

On the other hand, the Roman Catholic Church is far and away ahead of the Protestant Church in the matter of religious instruction. In most Protestant churches—although there is improvement in this regard—the religious instruction is very spasmodic outside of the Sunday-school, and the Sunday-school makes no attempt to instruct in the great doctrines of the Church. Most Protestant teaching is confined to the Bible. The Catholic Church, on the other hand, begins as soon as the child has capacity to comprehend, and almost before, to teach him the great doctrines of the faith.

It keeps this up through all the years, the pulpit being devoted largely to religious instruction. The Catholic Church instructs its people in the history and nature of the Church, so that the average Catholic takes the Church much more seriously than does the average Protestant and is much more devoted to it. Here our Protestantism is weak. The average Protestant knows nothing about its history, its glory, its wonder or its achievements. He cares practically nothing about it as an authority, never thinking of it in that light, although Christ gave it authority to speak in His name.

But the one thing which is lacking in the Protestant Church and which one finds in the Roman Catholic Church everywhere is reverence. There is nothing quite so moving in the whole realm of religion as to see a great congregation suddenly throw itself upon its knees before Almighty God—and it is the one thing lacking in our Protestant churches. Many of our services are almost like a social or an afternoon tea. The minister is as familiar toward God as he is with his next-door neighbor. We heard a Protestant minister praying a few weeks ago, and he might have called God by His first name, so to speak. It was this that awakened the thought of this editorial. The element of worship, of reverence is seriously lacking in much of our Protestantism. A former Protestant preacher who came over to Protestantism from the Roman Catholic communion commented on this once. He said he found the absence of reverence, adoration and awe in the presence of God so lacking in the Protestant churches that it shocked him. He had been accustomed to the prostration of the soul before its Maker, the hushed awe of the soul in the presence of its God. He did not go so far as the Roman Catholic who remarked, after attending a Protestant church: "The Protestants give me the impression that they think they are as good as God; they do not even kneel before Him; some did not even bow." This is irony, of course, but it is true that most of our services do not give the impression that the attendant has come to worship God. With some exceptions, the average Protestant service is not a worshipful service: it does not make one feel that God is in His holy temple, and that all the earth should keep silence before Him. The Roman Catholic the moment he enters the church falls down upon his knees. He is in the presence of God. There is no talking, no whispering, no laughing—only praying. God is there, and what can a guilty soul do but fall upon its face when it stands in His presence! Now the Protestants do not, of course, believe that God is present in the elements upon the altar as does the Catholic, but we do believe He is in His temple, and we do go to the church to worship Him, and it would be infinitely better for most of us Protestants if we did reverence something; did feel our own littleness and unworthiness before God; did feel a little conviction of sin and its seriousness once in a while and feel a little afraid before God; did acknowledge our finiteness, and did feel that there was something in the world greater than ourselves; did feel awe in the presence of the Almighty and Eternal God. And we wonder, too, if it would not have a good effect on the youth in our churches if they felt more of an atmosphere of awe, reverence and adoration in our churches, saw their elders really worshipping God. ## "God, My Exceeding Joy"

THE psalmist prayed to be led by light and truth unto the Holy Hill into the realized presence of God. There he would go to the altar, and in the act of giving his life to God he would find God to be a joy exceeding every other. We are afraid that not many religious people to-day could frankly say that God was their "exceeding joy." This joy means something deeper than happiness, a real soul-satisfaction rooted in a great confidence, a deep-lying assurance of the essential goodness of things, a persuasion that love is at the core and center of the universe, and, arising out of this, a hopeful outlook upon the future. This is a joy that exceeds all the things in life that cause trouble, and also exceeds all the things that give us joy. When we are rightly related to God, God is not only a joy, but an exceeding joy, a joy that exceeds both trouble and all other joy. The idea God as "exceeding joy" is a great one. There are many things in life that give joy. The return of spring, e.g., is a great joy which makes a universal appeal. Yet we do not mourn and lament when spring passes into summer, nor even when summer passes into winter. We know that the life of Nature is not lost or destroyed—that out of which all the loveliness of the spring and the summer came exists all the time. The thought of that continuous life is a joy exceeding the joy of spring and the joy of summer; it is inclusive of them and greater than they. That continuous life is the life of God, who is therefore the exceeding joy of spring and summer. Again, children are a great joy to us in life; we can renew our youth with them any time if we live with and take delight in them. But children grow up. They may be a great joy to us in adult life. But that relation also is transient. One needs the thought of something behind it, some eternal out of which it comes, and in which it abides, even in passing. Behind the little child and its charms is God its home, from whom it comes "trailing clouds of glory." Behind the love of the grown child and the devotion of the companion is the eternal fidelity out of which all these qualities spring. Children are a joy, companionship is a joy, but God is the exceeding joy even of these. He is the eternal beauty out of which the glories of earth and sky are constantly renewed; He is the eternal goodness out of whose life flow all the streams of human goodness; He is the everlasting love at whose central fire all the flames of human love are lit, and by which they are sustained. They pass, yet they remain forever, because He remains. We lose our loved ones, and yet God giveth to love to keep its own eternally. In this way He is the joy that exceeds all our joys.

Yet perhaps it is not a common thing for men to realize God in this way. And here we must remember that such realization is the climax of a life of devotion, and this is why none of us get it to the full—our devotion is not complete. It is at the altar of God we can find God as an exceeding joy. The altar is the place of self-surrender. It is in the act of self-giving that we find God as the exceeding joy. The principle is illustrated for us on every hand. We cannot even get the joy of spring without self-giving. Go into the heart of a forest and occupy your mind on some commercial scheme for making money, and the forest will give you no joy. You must give your mind and heart up to Nature, or Nature will not give you of her inner spirit. We once heard a man say he did not care very much for going to church because when he went he always found himself measuring up the building and calculating how many looms he could put into it if it were his factory. Well, how could he care for going to church? How could he get any good out of it? He gave nothing, he got nothing—that is the law. We can never secure the higher values without surrendering the lower. So it is best to begin as the psalmist did—pray for light and truth to lead us, and to bring us to the Holy Hill into the realized presence of God. If there we are willing to dedicate our life to Him, we shall find that according to our dedication will be our discovery of God as joy; if the dedication becomes complete, then God will become our exceeding joy. Wordsworth went to the altar a dedicated spirit, and he found in Nature not valleys and mountains, trees and flowers and stars, merely, but the Presence that disturbed him with the joy of elevated thoughts. What is this but finding God to be his exceeding joy, his joy of soul exceeding all the joys of sense? It was in Nature that Wordsworth found the altar at which he could dedicate himself. Other men will find it in other places and other things. But it must be found somewhere if we want to discover God as our exceeding joy.

Joy is not a prominent feature in religion just now, and the finding of God as the exceeding joy is not a common Christian experience. The reason for this is evident enough. When the war broke out the churches generally ceased to speak as the representatives of the Christian religion; for the most part they became the propagandists of nationalism. Many now feel that they are in the troughs of reaction, that lassitude and enervation and fatigue have overtaken them. What they need for the recovery of joy is to set their hand earnestly to some constructive work that needs to be done, and to give their minds and hearts to it in a whole-hearted devotion. Choose your altar, and let it be a worthy one. Then go to it, and let your life flow out in self-givingness, and you shall not fail to discover sources of joy, yea, exceeding joy. The river of life has not run dry; the treasure houses of God are not exhausted; the bliss of a genuine human service is still glorious. Many people complain of joyless lives; many religious people do. They think that the days of rapture in religion have gone. If they had lived in some other age it might have been different, they think. And yet only one thing is needed to give us the sense of God as exceeding joy, and that is the spirit of dedication to some worthy task. Unselfish dedication to what is felt to be worthy is the great secret of a satisfying life. The selfish heart makes no melody; we sing when we serve. This old world of ours, which has had its stock of pure and genuine joys greatly reduced, and which is trusting so much to the lighter vanities to relieve its gloom, needs to be set once more on a new way, the way of a new life, a new doing, a new activity that will engage its powers and energy in self-denying and fruitful service, and so bring it back to the only true springs of joyful existence. If only men would first of all seek divine light and divine truth to lead them, they would find life rising before them as a Holy Hill, and this world would be not merely man's world, but also the dwelling-place of God. It would grow to have a sacred character that would put our sins and our vanities to shame, and then we should hear a call from the very heart of life for a dedication of our soul to high things, the engagement of our hands in worthy service, and at that altar we should find

God our exceeding joy. Jesus was under the shadow of Calvary when He spoke of His joy. It was the joy of having given Himself, whole and undivided, to His great task on earth, the joy of having loved and of loving to the end, the joy of not allowing the hardships of the way to break His heart for service, and not allowing pain or persecution to dilute the wholeness or the purity of His self-giving. Those who feel that religious faith has become difficult, and that religion is not yielding much in the way of joy, had better throw themselves heartily into the service of humanity at some point or other, and if theirs becomes a self-giving life, in some way or other the wealth of God will stream into it.

Massachusetts Official Endorsement of a World Government

WORKERS for a warless world in the State of Massachusetts are making a fulcrum of the remarkable resolutions adopted by its Senate and House of Representatives in February, 1915. In the kaleidoscopic changes of public opinion during the last seven years they have been forgotten even by those who noted them at the time. Leaders of the Foreign Policy Association have said. "We can hardly believe our eyes."

The resolutions were introduced by Mr. Raymond L. Bridgman, a statehouse reporter and author of several books on a world state. Vice-President Coolidge was then President of the Senate and Governor Channing H. Cox Speaker of the House. When the former hesitated for party consideration, Mr. Bridgman wrote to Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, who replied: "If the General Court sees fit to pass the resolution, I will take pleasure in presenting it to the Senate of the United States." It was so presented and is officially filed at Washington; but action in the direction requested has, of course, not been taken.

The resolution requested the Congress of the United States "to make a declaration in substance as follows:

"The United States of America affirms the political unity of all mankind.

"It affirms the supremacy of world sovereignty over national sovereignty.

"It promises loyal obedience to that sovereignty.

"It believes that the time has come for the organization of the world government, with legislative, judicial, and executive departments.

"It invites all nations to join with it in the formal establishment of that government."

No dread then of a "super-state"! No fear of entangling alliances! No assumption that to be loyal Americans we must suspect and accuse all the rest of the world! At no time since, probably, could such a resolve have been passed. How can we explain its adoption?

Unless we insult the legislators of one of the most conservative commonwealths by alleging that they unanimously and deliberately adopted a meaningless resolution, it is an official recognition that a world government, however great be the difficulties and delays in establishing it, is the true ideal and ultimate goal of humanity. The explanation given by Prof. Woodman Bradbury, D.D., of Newton Theological Seminary, chairman of the Committee on International Relations of the Massachusetts Federation of Churches, is that it was an utterance of that period of clarity of vision while we were watching the horrors and iniquities of the World War and before our own passions were aroused by our entrance into it. Every sane man who stops to think must admit that the only way in which all boundaries can be made safe, all peoples assured tranquillity, is precisely that which makes the invasion of the Bay State by the powerful Empire State on its western border unthinkable! Our Federal Government leaves each commonwealth sovereign in its own sphere, but unites forty-eight States in a continental nation which stands the foremost power of the world. Sooner or later there must be a United States of the World, and the sooner the better.

Was it only a pious recognition of the ideal by our General Court? An ideal officially defined is not easily denied.

Admitted that such a resolution could not be passed to-day, who would dare to rescind it? The effect may be similar to that of the so-called "Social Creed of the Churches," adopted by the Federal Council. Few who voted for it realized its significance and implications. It logically led the Federal Council to issue and stand by the Steel Strike Report in the face of denunciation and attempted financial boycott. Yet the "Sixteen Principles" have been steadily reaffirmed. It is thus that nations as well as denominations are providentially being led to higher moral standards. Their recognition of ideals in "periods of clarity" hasn't restrained them when storms of passion and selfishness threaten to sweep all before them. Reason is not wholly drowned. Sooner or later its voice is heard demanding consistency and righteousness!

Will not other friends of peace also find a new argument in being able to say: At least one of the American commonwealths stands officially on record as demanding the immediate establishment of a world government? E. T. R.

A Far-Flung Corner of the British Empire

IN the distant seas, close by the Antarctic south of Australia, lies the island of Tasmania. It has the form of a shield. The southern end of it projects, a rocky wedge, out into the tossing waters of the Southern Ocean. Its coasts are stern and rock-bound. Against them beat the thundering rollers with the momentum acquired from a long journey out of the southwest. Tasmania is nearly half the size of Pennsylvania. Its population is about 210,000.

The voyage from Melbourne, Australia, to Launceston, Tasmania, is an uncertain, often disagreeable, trip. At its commencement there sat upon the deck close beside us a calm-faced old lady busily knitting. For the second time in her life she had been away from her native land visiting her children in Australia. She loved them much, but Tasmania more. She said, "They want me to go to Australia to live, but I tell them I like Tassie—Tassie is cooler." In truth, "Tassie" is cool all times of the fickle year. I did not enjoy its ever-changing weather. Yet it is a delightful country where simplicity and quietude reign. It is far removed from the hub-bub and thrills of a sadly upset world. It hardly understands its own self-contained poise, its material felicity.

Hobart is the capital of Tasmania. It boasts about fifty thousand people. It nestles close by the beautiful Derwent River, out into which extend docks alongside of which are sixty feet of water at low tide. Just behind the city towers Wellington Mountain, over four thousand feet above the sea. In its environs are small and pretty homes, embedded in the gayest shrubbery and bloom. Hedges, walls, flowers remind us of the sea-girt mother-land on the other side of the globe. The streets are of the sort found in cities of the same size in the British Empire. The House of Parliament—for this little, far-away country has its own very weighty legislature—is close by the water front. The Town Hall is a pleasing sample of municipal architecture. There is a museum and art gallery, a botanic garden and a big park. The postoffice boasts a chime—you shut your eyes and listen and imagine yourself in England!

The city railway service is excellent, considering the small constituency it serves. Some of the tram cars are double-deckers, a la ancient London Town. You pay from one penny up, according to the distance you ride. You are given a ticket as receipt for the money you pay to the conductor. The reverse of the ticket has printed upon it instructions so that unsophisticated visitors from larger cities will know how to behave when visiting the Tasmanian metropolis. These instructions read:

"PLEASE

Have correct fare ready; it saves time.

Tell the conductor where you want to get off.

Move along and make room for others.

Do not stand on top of stairway.

Wait till the car stops before alighting.

Do not leave your ticket on the car, but tear it up as you get off."

Convicts from England were sent to this remote corner of the world as late as the year 1853. The treatment they received was bad and calculated to harden them. Many escaped and fled to the bush and their atrocious deeds of revenge constitute a bitter story. In a museum are relics of those early days, heavy irons and chains, instruments of woe. The original offenses were often very light in proportion to the cruel punishment. Among other papers on exhibition is the "Transportation Order" of James Townsend, dated "January 3, 1849." It recites that he was transported for stealing "Four yards of printed cotton of the value of two shillings of the goods and chattels of one John Burke," and was sent across the seas "for the term of seven years."

The streets of a little city that has bravely planted herself at the end of things are not thronged. Hobart's street traffic does not demand dodging of vehicles. But the methods of much larger communities are carefully observed. There are at least two traffic policemen in Hobart. It is an inspiring spectacle to see one of these guardians of the public weal standing at the middle of the intersection of Elizabeth and Liverpool streets—the business center—and solemnly attending to his duties. His eagle eye will detect a boy on a bicycle coming his way; with impressive gesture the youngster is signalled that all is well and ventures towards the corner. Again there will appear a horse and cart, ploughing their heavy way in another direction and, although the likelihood of a collision is remarkably remote, the driver is invited forward with all the dignity and crooked fingers of a Bobby in the crowded streets of London. But when a motor car quietly meanders down the highway—ah, then the Hobart traffic officer gets very, very busy!

The people of Tasmania are rightly proud of their beautiful little country. The island has two lovely rivers, the Tamar in the north and the Derwent in the south, both richly endowed with pretty bays and tree-edged waters with backgrounds of verdant hillsides and misty mountains. During the height of the summer season, near the first of the year, tourists come over from Australia, provided strikes do not interfere with their anticipated vacations.

Strikes are the proper thing in Tasmania. The labor unions are very strong. It would seem as if labor is so fully unionized that ordinary people, who constitute the vast majority, have small rights to be respected. Thus in the hotels the hours for meals are so adjusted that there is little elasticity of time afforded to the guests. This is often exceedingly inconvenient. "Eat within the hours or do without your food" seem to be the terms laid down by unionism to those who cannot always accommodate their activities to union hours. In Tasmania we were upon one occasion, with many gestures and agonized countenances and voices, "shooed" out of the dining room of the hotel by the proprietor and his porter because we had ventured into it three minutes before the hour for dinner. No doubt labor trouble was invited by our indiscretion and we were compelled—as often was the case—to be satisfied with a hurried nibble and run to our engagement, whereas if the union hours had permitted us to commence even fifteen minutes earlier we could have secured the semblance of a meal.

The toy railway system of Tasmania is mighty interesting. It comprises 650 miles. It is narrow gauged and wriggles and twists round the rugged countryside from one level to another. The miniature engines, when starting or plunging into tunnels, squeal and squeak as do their mightier cousins in England. The carriages did not seem comfortable with their straight-up seats and chilly, draughty compartments. When wedged between portly citizens and jammed among interminable masses of handbags and boxes you can only patiently abide the ordeal until reaching your destination. The railways are state-owned. The officials are well remunerated. The employees, according to the official report, are paid per day as follows: Engine drivers, sixteen to nineteen shillings; guards, fifteen to seventeen shillings and sixpence; firemen, fourteen shillings and sixpence to sixteen shillings; carpenters, sixteen to seventeen shillings, mostly the former; repairers, thirteen shillings and sixpence; clerks, fourteen to sixteen shillings. From the above it will be seen that wages are generally less than in America, whilst in America the cost of living is lower than in Tasmania.

Kind friends invited us to spend four days on their farm a few miles out of Hobart. There three brothers farm seven hundred acres of broad fields and fruitful orchards, mingled with woodland, rocks and beach, close by the salty sea. Their homes are set in the midst of many flowers and strange trees. It cannot be claimed that in all respects they and their families are typical of farm life. One brother specializes in the fauna and flora of distant lands; he is an artist and has won a prize for work in oil; his walls have been lovingly decorated and hung with the delightful work of his gifted hands. Not only is a regulation greenhouse attached to the dwelling, but a larger one is not far away. It is filled with greenery of many kinds, including fine tree ferns twelve or fifteen feet high. The other brother is equally gifted. One of his fads is shells. He is reputed to be the second authority in conchology in his part of the world and his large collection includes over one thousand selections of Tasmanian shells. These brothers keep up the detail of their farming in a thoroughly business fashion. Their families were a joy. Daily a period of simple family devotion is practised in the good old way that has helped to develop the material progress and spiritual achievement in the countries where Christ is named and honored.

Tasmania is a small community remote from the rest of the world. It is made up of a generous-hearted people who know little regarding the actual facts associated with the outside world. Yet there are two good newspapers in Hobart. The last week I was in the city I was able to perform a little service on behalf of internationalism. In connection therewith a meeting with preachers was held. There was a good attendance, much interest and sympathy was manifested and it was decided to send a message of fraternal greeting to the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America. An organization of leading business men, the Commonwealth Club, invited me to luncheon with the object of addressing them. The leading local newspaper, "The Mercury," was so good as to materially assist. So in this little corner of the English-speaking world there was opportunity—as there ever is—to speak for humanity and Christ.

Contented Isolation?

THE average Louisiana farmer gets up early, at the alarm of a Connecticut clock, buttons his Chicago suspenders to Detroit overalls, puts on a pair of cowhide shoes made in Ohio, washes in a Pittsburgh tin basin, using Cincinnati soap, and dries on a cotton towel made in New Hampshire; sits down to a Grand Rapids table, eats hot biscuits made with Minneapolis flour, Kansas City bacon, and Indiana grits fried in Omaha lard, cooked in a St. Louis stove; buys Irish potatoes grown in Michigan, and canned fruit put up in California, seasoned with Rhode Island spices, claps on his old wool hat made in Philadelphia, puts New York harness on his Missouri mule, fed on Iowa corn, and ploughs his farm covered by a Massachusetts mortgage, with an Indiana plough.

At night he crawls under a New Jersey blanket, and is kept awake by a Louisiana dog, the only home product on the place.

America's Twelve Greatest Women

[This page is devoted to a weekly letter recording the significant events and movements of the day from the Christian point of view.]

EVERYONE must have been interested in reading the list of names announced in the papers of May 6th as the result of the votes cast by a special committee of the League of Women Voters to determine who, in the judgment of these members, were the twelve greatest women in America. The results were as follows: Jane Addams, philanthropist; Cecilia Beaux, painter; Carrie Chapman Catt, politics; Anna Jump Cannon, astronomy; Anna Botsford Comstock, natural history; Minnie Maddern Fiske, stage; Louise Homer, music; Julia Lathrop, child welfare; Florence Rena Sabin, anatomy; M. Carey Thomas, education; Martha Van Renssalaer, home economics; Edith Wharton, literature.

This is certainly a most interesting list, and one which will probably arouse much discussion. Already many dissenting voices have been heard, although if the basis of choice is considered perhaps little criticism could be made of the fairness of the judges and the results arrived at. It would seem as though the aim was not to name the twelve most eminent women in the nation, but to choose twelve women each of whom was greatest in her particular calling. Twelve callings were enumerated and then the most outstanding woman in the profession named. This accounts for the fact that there are five or six names in the list which very few of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN WORK will recognize. I must confess that I had never heard of Anna Jump Cannon, or Anna Botsford Comstock, or Florence Rena Sabin, and Cecilia Beaux and Martha Van Renssalaer were but names to me. But I find that Miss Beaux is considered by the art critics as by all odds the greatest painter among American women; that Mrs. Comstock has written many learned books on bees and butterflies and is the foremost authority on natural history among American women; that Miss Sabin is a professor in Johns Hopkins University and has published a wonderfully original "Atlas of the Brain"; that Mrs. Cannon has discovered over two hundred stars through her telescope and has made a catalogue of two hundred and twenty thousand stellar spectra; and that Mrs. Van Renssalaer has written a long list of books on home economics.

This explains how it is that several names of women known to everyone in America are not in the list—novelists, poets (there is no poet named, by the way), dramatists, singers, actresses, educators, are not in the list, while their less widely known sisters are there. Were a list of the twelve really greatest women to be made, regardless of "proportionate representation," even this special committee would have given us quite a different list. Upon such names as the others—Jane Addams, Carrie Chapman Catt, Minnie Maddern Fiske, Louise Homer, Julia Lathrop, M. Carey Thomas and Edith Wharton—practically everybody will be agreed. All of them have really made great contributions either to art or human welfare. All of them are noble women, too, having not only high ideals of their callings, but of womanhood.

I have been fortunate enough to meet all of these seven women with one exception, and to know two or three of them well. With Jane Addams it has been especially delightful to work and to have her friendship has been a happy experience. The quiet but remarkable work that she has done for years in Hull House, Chicago, has been lost sight of somewhat in these recent years because of the great part she has played in the international sphere. But Hull House has been a pioneer and a model for settlement houses all over the world. It was when Miss Addams began to assume leadership in the international movement that I met her. I think the first time I saw her was at the great National Peace Conference in New York in 1907. The main session was in Carnegie Hall, but there were overflow meetings in the big Calvary Baptist Church. I had Miss Addams put in my charge that evening, and it was there our friendship began. Since then I have been associated with her in all sorts of organizations for promoting good-will among the peoples of the earth. My readers will remember the background from which Miss Addams approaches the whole problem in her very original and striking book, "Newer Ideals of Peace." She tells how thousands from every nation of Europe had been living around Hull House in peace for years.

If occasional troubles arose they were easily composed by friendly conferences in Hull House, gradually nationality sunk away and there was intermarriage—in general there was peace. This was a revelation and prophecy for Miss Addams. There was no reason why the peoples of Europe could not learn to live together in the same happy way. They probably could were it not for the politicians and commercial exploiters with the militarist group behind them. The people do not make the wars. The rulers and capitalists and army and navy officers make them and use the people as pawns. If the people of the world were left to themselves they would probably live as happily together as they do about Hull House. Miss Addams has taken a very prominent part in the international congresses of women that have been held since the war, presiding at the great meeting which was held in Vienna. There are many in America who think she should be the next recipient of the Nobel Prize.

Miss Lathrop has been close to Miss Addams, having spent much time in the Hull House Settlement. She, too, has been interested in international matters, but her life has been devoted to children, their proper care and education, and especially the helping of the backward or mentally deficient child. She has led a life of very beautiful devotion to the children of the land and at the same time has become an expert on mental hygiene and insanity. Much of the development of the Juvenile Court ideas has come from her ideals and endeavors. She has been chief of the Children's Bureau of the Department of Labor in Washington and has written many books on child welfare and the care of the mentally backward child.

Mrs. Catt I have often heard speak and have frequently met. She is a rare combination of the forcefulness and determination which achieves its ends and the gentleness and charm of a very gracious woman. For years she has not only been an advocate of suffrage, but has been a leader for the bettering of women's conditions and for good-will among the nations.

Louise Homer has not only been a glorious singer, but a lovely wife and mother. For twenty years she has interpreted the great Wagnerian operas to the people and sung the great songs of all time in concerts in America and Europe. Her husband writes good songs and these also she has interpreted. Her daughter has a voice of much promise, already very beautiful, and one of the most delightful events of last year was a recital where mother and daughter sang together. Mrs. Homer is a very shining example of how a great actress and singer can be a sane and lovely woman, not necessarily made up of all those aberrations and tempers commonly attributed to genius. As a matter of fact, the more I watch great artists, the more convinced I am that the exhibitions which are attributed to artistic temperament do not come from temperament at all, but from pampered selfishness. The really greatest artists, both in acting and singing, are quiet, calm, gentle people, self-controlled and considerate of others—men like Paderewski—women like Louise Homer.

THE WEEKLY SERMON

Enthronement Address of His Holiness The Metropolitan of Athens Chrysostome Papadopoulos

Delivered in the Metropolitan Cathedral of Athens on March 10, 1923

[Mr. G. Sarantides, a Greek now resident in the United States and well acquainted with religious conditions in Greece, tells us the following about the new Metropolitan: He was born in the little city of Madytos, of classical lore, on the Hellespont, in 1870. Here he received his elementary education, his father serving there as a priest. Soon afterwards, manifesting an inclination for the paternal field, he entered the then well-known Joachimian Seminary of Xyloporta. Thence he entered the Eastern Orthodox Theological School of Jerusalem and after completing his work there he continued his studies in the Theological Academy of Petrograd. He was graduated from here as a doctor of divinity in 1895, when, returning to Jerusalem, he was appointed to a professorship in his alma mater. After the closing of this school in 1909 he was for some time afforded the hospitality of his colleagues in Constantinople and Alexandria, until July, 1911, when he was called to Athens to direct the affairs of the Athenian Seminary. He held this position until his election as Metropolitan. He accompanied the most Rev. Melatiss on his trip to the United States in 1918, and is expected to continue to work for closer co-operation between the Greek and the Protestant Episcopal Church.]

"The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ and the love of God the Father and the communion of the Holy Spirit be with you all."—(2 CORINTHIANS 13, 13.)

THIS apostolic greeting we address to you, dear ones, on this our first appearance from the throne where the Holy Grace has led us through the vote of the Holy Synod of the Church of Greece, approved by the Government and by our most pious King. The unanimous favor of all of you has moved us deeply and has specially persuaded us to accept the office of Archbishop, an office which we had up to this studiously avoided. We have really been conquered by your love, and glorifying the holy name of our foremost shepherd Christ, who has called us to the service of this diocese, we accept the service in full and deep appreciation of its greatest and heaviest responsibilities before God and men.

We know well that we are called not to a human profession but to a holy mission, whose greatness and brightness when we view we feel the inefficiency of our powers. But confident in the all-powerful divine help we come offering to the Church alongside our full and complete devotion, our decision not to fail, as far as it is humanly possible for us, in the honest and faithful accomplishment of our most holy obligations.

These obligations have ever been difficult, but they have become most difficult in these hard times owing to the present condition in which the Church of Greece is found. And undoubtedly one of the most important reasons of this condition is the administrative system which governs the Church.

The Constitution of our country, which puts the Church under the supervision of the State, recognizes its independence, which is based on the holy laws of the Church, as a spiritual organization or divine and everlasting institution, lying above the transient and continually changing political affairs. As an institution of such a character the Church cannot concern itself with politics without deviating from its mission and without harming irreparably its prestige.

Unfortunately, in spite of these constitutional laws by which the administrative independence of the Church is safeguarded, owing to the insufficiency of the political legislation of the subject, the Church has been deprived of any "upholder" aside from the State, and the latter has been seeking to make of the Church a tool of the political party in power at the time. Indeed, on numerous occasions it was well proclaimed, just as lately it was done from the official platform of Parliament, that if there are any laws contrary to the Constitution these are the laws regarding the Church. The extreme concentrative system which characterizes generally our political legislation has been applied to a great extent in the laws regarding the Church, not only in the regulation of the supervision of the State over the Church, but even in the details of its administration, and have thus submitted the Church completely to the State, a submission which is contrary to the holy laws of the Church. e

Late and previous regrettable events have demonstrated this exceedingly harmful system now prevailing, harmful not only to the Church but also to the State. Therefore, let the pious political men of Greece, as well as those who wish for the regeneration and love and honor the Church, not refuse it the right of administrative reorganization and restoration.

But certainly for the restoration of the Church only its administrative reorganization is not enough. It is necessary, primarily, that the clergy have purity and strength of character, zeal and holy enthusiasm, enlightened religious consciousness, and refrain from any political participation while devoting themselves fully and undistractedly to the holy mission of the Church.

There is also a specific need that every attention and care should be paid towards the education and elevation and dignified subsistence of the clergy. And one may make the statement that for the Greek Church and the Greek community there is no question of equal seriousness and importance as the question of the Greek clergy, from the solution of which depends largely the real restoration of our Church.

We consider it unnecessary at this time to enter into the details of this subject, but it is apparent that only through a clergy that is worthy of the Church's mission as a foremost spiritual and moral factor in human society that this can be accomplished. Similarly, we have to take great measures regarding the monastic life which presents a disagreeable spectacle.

The principal field for the activity of the Church is certainly the church building and its first and principal pulpit the holy pulpit. But as long as Christianity is not only a truth in theory but also is life, the Church cannot be only a communion for worship, a simple ritualistic system, nor must the Church limit itself within the church building. The Church must make of the church building its holy starting point in comprising all the phases of the life of the individual as well as of society as a whole, thus opening to the Church a most wide field for action for sanctification and teaching and guidance, while at the same time the Church would stand in the first rank of every movement, not only religious, but also in general of any moral or philanthropic movement.

The activity of the Church must be modernized with the life of the community, from which the Church to-day seems to have been kept away, because modern life presents some most vital and most serious problems which the Church must not ignore but rather regulate on the basis of the Christian principle, transfusing these principles into the life (of the community). Towards such a modernization of its activities the Church will be obliged to revise its methods of procedure and its religious life in general, according to the words of Apostle Paul (Cor. 1, 20:22), "And unto the Jews I became as a Jew, that I might gain the Jews; to them that were under the law, as under the law, that I might gain them that were under the law; to them that are without law, as without law . . . that I might gain them that are without law. To the weak became I as weak, that I might gain the weak; I am made all things to all men, that I might by all means save some."

Every Greek clergyman and spiritual shepherd must have these words and the example of the sublime apostle, whose magnificent teaching rung once in Athens and throughout Greece, as the most exact and safest standard, and must do his utmost in order to meet the real spiritual needs of modern life and harmonize it with the principles of the Christian religion.

From all aspects the warm defense of almost the whole of Christendom for the Oecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople is most consoling. It was natural that the voice of the Orthodox world in defense of the Patriarchate was warmer. But we sense the need to pursue a closer confederation and co-operation of all the independent Orthodox Churches in the general question which cannot be solved one-sidedly by this or that Church, and there exists to-day a great many such problems whose solution is dependent upon our regular Synodic Conventions in which all the Orthodox Churches should be represented. And while seeking the communion of the Orthodox Church with the other churches and Christian communities, we should first pursue a real unity and constant communion and harmony of all the (Orthodox) Independent Churches which are bound in a confederation and should strengthen their energies under the spiritual leadership always of the Oecumenical Patriarchate. We should also establish a new basis of our relations to the churches and Christian communities of other denominations.

It makes us feel very sad to see the existing divisions among the Christian world at a time when Mohammedanism united is rising against it. But aside from Mohammedanism there are other enemy forces that are being now moved against Christianity, seeking to overturn the foundations of Christian community and to abolish civilization. And the repulsion of these enemy forces is not possible without the united co-operation and solidarity of all the churches, without any exception.

Towards such a co-operation and independence the unfortunately difficult dogmatic union is not an indispensable pre-supposition, because a union of Christian love is sufficient which will pave the way towards a fuller union in harmony with the spirit of Christianity.

The aspect of the world would have been totally different if the true and genuine spirit of Christianity was prevailing in it, and to speak more particularly the present condition of the Greek community would have been different if the divine and salutary principles of Christianity were dominant in it. For no other spiritual power except that of Christianity can save and restore society and the whole world.

Therefore it is the duty of every clergyman to transmit and apply in every way the Christian principles; to educate according to Christ and to develop the life of the community through a reign of faith, of love, of peace, of altruism, and of philanthropy. Only by these principles can life become Christian and holy. Thus can the individual and the family be raised morally, and thus can again bloom faith, the great virtues which adorn and bring progress to a Christian community.

Honorable Hierarchs (Bishops) of the Church of Greece! Dear "co-shepherds"!

To you, and to the Greek clergy in general, who are the ministers and servants "of the Lord of Love and Peace" (2 Cor. 13, 12), do the pious people of Greece have their eyes turned to you in agony, for from you they expect the restoration of the unfortunately lost internal peace of the Church, the kindling of the religious zeal, the moral sanitation of society, and the meeting of the thousands of their spiritual needs, according to the apostle's command, "As much as in you lieth, be at peace with all men," and "among yourselves" (Rom. 12, 18, also 1 Thess. 5, 13). "So, then, let us follow after things which make for peace and things whereby we may edify one another" (Rom. 14, 19). All our works, as works of a purely and exclusively religious nature, done "by the grace of God and before God" must always bear the seal of holiness in whatsoever way they are expressed and in whatsoever detail of life they are referred.

Let us elevate ourselves to the spiritual and moral height to which the Founder of the Church has destined the Church and let us (all) help to restore the esteem of the people towards the clergy, and let us help in making the clergy not only worthy but also strong in facing, through a spiritual and moral activity, the great religious and moral crisis which the world is now undergoing.

Let us pray that God may guide and strengthen us all.

The Philippine Question

By Sherwood Eddy

UPON revisiting the countries of the Far East we found a new Japan with the rise of a liberal movement; a new Korea in its insurgent demand for freedom; a "New Thought" or renaissance movement in China, although its government is threatened with disaster and downfall. Here we have found a new Philippines also, with a seemingly almost universal clamor for independence.

As we contrast the Islands to-day with a visit of ten years ago, which sub-divided our two decades of American rule, one gains the impression that the first period was remarkable for its material and educational advance in the efficient, paternal American administration; while the last decade has been remarkable in spiritual advance, in the new idealism and aspirations of the Filipino people, and in their practical gain in the slow discipline of self-government. The Filipinos occupy seven of the nine posts on the Council of State, more than nine-tenths of the administrative and judicial posts in the Islands, and elect their own Senate and House of Representatives by popular vote. Almost no country in the world has achieved such a large measure of self-government as quickly as the Philippine Islands where conditions were most favorable to such an advance.

The Philippine Islands constitute almost the richest archipelago in the world. They have an area of 114,000 square miles, or nearly as great as that of Japan or of the British Isles. They contain twice the area of the New England States, three times that of Cuba, and seventeen times that of the Hawaiian Islands. They have a population of 10,350,730, which was divided as follows by the census of 1918: 9,495,272 Christians and 855,368 non-Christians, who represent but 8.2 per cent. of the total population.

The one burning issue in the Islands to-day is that of independence. Without speaking for any organization, or even venturing upon a personal opinion, we may state four typical views of the four parties concerned: 1. The young Filipino majority embracing all the politicians, most of the educated leaders and the great bulk of the educated Filipino people who demand immediate, unconditional independence. 2. The older conservative minority of the Filipino people who dread independence as a fatal catastrophe, and who maintain that many of those who have much to lose in property, influence and position secretly fear the artificially stimulated agitation for immediate independence. 3. The resident American majority who believe with the Filipino minority that not for several decades will the Philippines be ready for the fulfillment of our promise of independence. 4. A small American minority who are in favor of "qualified independence," maintaining an American protectorate of the Islands. We shall then examine the findings of the Wood-Forbes report, which states the reasons why, in its judgment, the Philippines are not ready for immediate independence. The statement of each position represents a composite of a number of interviews and not the views of the writer.

1. The young Filipino party, including nearly all of the young officials, politicians, students and educated leaders throughout the Islands, demand immediate, unconditional independence. Most of them desire this under the protection of the United States. They point out the fact that nine-tenths of the population are Christian, prepared by nearly four centuries of Spanish rule; that they have assimilated Western culture and civilization; that over a million pupils, or one-tenth of the population, are registered in schools, and that 672,122 voters took part in the last elections; that there is an almost universal aspiration for independence, which was clearly promised by the American people. They remind us that President Wilson well said, "We regard ourselves as trustees for the benefit of the people of the Philippine Islands," and in his last message to Congress in December, 1920, thus recommended independence for the Philippines: "Allow me to call your attention to the fact that the people of the Philippine Islands have succeeded in maintaining a stable government since the last action of the Congress in their behalf, and have thus fulfilled the condition set by the Congress as precedent to a consideration of granting independence to the Islands. I respectfully submit that this condition precedent having been fulfilled, it is now our liberty and our duty to keep our promise to the people of those Islands by granting them the independence which they so honorably covet."

The young Filipinos point out that for the last eight years their government has been practically autonomous, and that ultimate independence is thus definitely promised in the Jones Act of 1916: "Whereas, it is, as it has always been, the purpose of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to recognize their independence as soon as a stable government can be established," etc. Governor Harrison stated that "the Philippines are now ready for independence." He maintains that if the United States continues a forcible control over the Philippines it will be in opposition to our own American Constitution, which is based on the "consent of the governed," and that good government is no substitute for self-government. The young Filipinos say, "We regard America as our best friend. We are duly grateful to the United States for all that has been done for us, but the one thing we want now is our independence. Our civilization is Occidental and our religion is Christian. Yet our race is distinct and cannot be absorbed into the people of the United States. The platform of every political party in the Islands is for independence. Resolutions of municipalities, chambers of commerce and all other organizations of the Filipino people are for independence.

"You ask concerning the failure of our Philippine National Bank under Filipino management. It is true and it was unfortunate; the graft and mismanagement of the bank are indefensible, but we maintain that we are ready for immediate independence. The essays and orations of the Filipino people, old and young, proclaim our aspirations and our readiness. Americans in the Islands say that we have had but little preparation or experience, but we are entitled to learn by our own mistakes. They say that Japan will be a menace and may take over the Islands. We do not think so. In any case, we are ready to assume that responsibility. We would rather face the menace of seizure by Japan than to continue under the paternal government of America. We are more united and have a stronger desire for independence than the American people had in 1776. If this fulfillment is deferred our people will probably become impatient, and delay will result in growing bitterness, strained relations and hostility. We therefore ask for immediate, unconditional independence."

2. The conservative minority of the older Filipinos state their case as follows: "Nine-tenths of the older, substantial Filipinos who have most to lose in the way of property and position do not desire but rather dread immediate independence as a disaster. We are not now ready. We are untrained and undisciplined. We have no economic basis for independence. Nearly all of our business, wholesale and retail, import and export, is in the hands of foreigners, especially the Chinese. We cannot successfully compete with them. If we cannot run our own business, how can we run our government? We would be unable to maintain an army and navy to protect ourselves. Both are now paid for by the United States. Our representatives in the Senate and House are great orators, but they are like boys when it comes to managing business enterprises. During the last two months they have accomplished practically nothing in legislation. If America withdrew, if we may judge by our past history, we would at once begin to fight each other.

"If we were granted independence it would not be President Quezon of the Senate, nor Mr. Osmena, nor our politicians that would rule the country. General Aguinaldo or other militarists would at once take possession and clear out the political ring. We have not as yet a sufficiently intelligent body of public opinion. The masses do not read. They are easily led. The total circulation of all our newspapers is less than 140,000, or only one to every seventy-five persons out of a population of over ten millions. The number of representatives in the Legislature who are absolutely honest, disinterested, independent in their thought and working solely for the welfare of the people is few. Under the present administration, with the close supervision of a few American officials, the chance for bribery is small. The practice of bribery and corruption under the Spanish régime, however, was almost universal both by the Spaniards and the Filipinos, and the same practice would probably recur if America withdrew to-morrow. The present agitation would die out if it were not artificially stimulated. At present the contact and co-operation of the two races is helpful and highly beneficial for the preparation and discipline of our people.

"The disastrous failure of the Philippine National Bank, with a loss of millions of capital, was almost our first independent act in finance. Governor-General Harrison appointed General Concepcion to take charge of the bank. He was a man of crooked record under the Spanish government. He lent money recklessly to politicians, friends and relatives; men without credit or financial standing. Now he is serving a term in prison and criminal charges have been preferred against the managers of each of the four branches in which the investigation has been completed. The loss of the bank has seriously involved the Philippine government. This is typical of what would happen economically and politically if we had immediate independence. If we cannot even run a bank, how can we run a government?

"If America withdrew we fear that Japan would come in at once, first by peaceful financial penetration, and then she would foreclose by taking, to begin with, let us say, the large island of Mindanao, and finally our independence would be lost. Governor-General Wood has won the confidence and affection both of the Filipinos and Americans. His predecessor, Governor Harrison, let us do exactly as we pleased, and hence he was popular. He did much to bring the two races together and to establish better relations between us. He had truly democratic ideas and really desired the welfare of our people. He was a man of refinement and culture who might have been a great leader. Unfortunately, his moral life was shameless. He was a polished libertine. He had a most unfortunate influence upon our own politicians, who are all too weak in this regard. If you break down moral standards in matters of purity you cannot expect our people to maintain them when our imperative need is the strengthening of moral character and honest discipline.

"In conclusion, we older and more conservative Filipinos would favor the continuance of our present relation to America. Later, when we are ready, let the matter be submitted to a plebiscite and let us vote upon whether we would have complete independence or local autonomy, or some form of government under America. Privately and confidentially, this is our honest opinion. No man dares say this in public, however, or he would lose his political head."

3. The opinion of the American majority seems to be as follows: "We Americans who have been in the Islands during the last two decades are not ashamed of the record we have made. We love the Filipino people and are proud of the remarkable advance they have made in so short a time. They are a peaceful people, law-abiding, loyal, obedient, home-loving, temperate, hospitable, generous, courteous, cleanly and refined in their habits. They are intelligent, quick to learn, with strong vitality and a rapidly multiplying population. They are gentle and kind, they have a thirst for education and a restless desire for progress. They are artistic, lovers of art, music and the drama. They are also capable of great bravery and heroism.

"Their deficiencies are the result of their past environment. They will compare favorably with any other Asiatic people and must be judged by this standard. As yet they lack initiative, a developed sense of personal responsibility and economic experience. They have not yet learned perseverance, independent judgment, unvarying honesty and moral purity. They are as yet lacking in ability for hard work in agriculture, and in business enterprise, where for four centuries they have never been able to compete with the Chinese. Although precocious, they are in the adolescent stage with the mentality of a youth of twelve or thirteen. Even our American soldiers in the war, examined under scientific tests, showed only an average mental age of fourteen. Immediate independence would mean economic ruin for the Philippines. This is the richest archipelago in the world; richer than Cuba or Java. It is rich in rice, coconuts, oil, hemp, sugar, timber and minerals. The gold mines here are already paying over a million dollars a year, while coal, iron, zinc, copper and petroleum abound. Continual agitation for independence has driven away foreign capital and hindered the economic development of the Islands.

"It took the American Anglo-Saxons from the time of the Magna Charta in 1215 to 1776, over five centuries, to achieve and work out our independence. The Filipinos have the natural ambition of all adolescence. This is normal, natural, hopeful and human. But at present they are somewhat like the Populist, 'A man who does not know just what he wants, but wants it mighty badly,' and who can brook no opposition to what he thinks he wants. The time is still far distant when the Islands can be separated from the United States with honor to ourselves or with justice to the Philippines. Stable government is one capable of protecting the life, liberty and property of its own citizens and of foreign inhabitants, and which, unaided, will assure the development of the material and spiritual resources of the country. Sound currency and banking systems are absolutely essential to the existence of such a stable government. The pathetic inefficiency of some of the recent attempts in self-government, the dishonesty and corruption on the part of men entrusted with the management of public funds, show that the Filipinos are not ready for immediate independence.

"The first and most disastrous of the government experiments in business was the Philippine National Bank, involving a loss of most of the capital, or a total, according to the Insular Auditor, of $22,500,000. This disaster was due not only to mismanagement and dishonesty, but to the direction of the bank's policy by the government for political rather than economic purposes. They proposed to launch eight great commercial enterprises involving capital stock of some $72,250,000. Money was lent recklessly. For instance, the Binalbagan Estate, Inc., with a paid up capital of only $1,250, was permitted to borrow $4,125,000 from this bank. This was typical of other reckless and almost criminal financial dealings.

"The Filipinos have not yet reached an economic, educational or political standard capable of successful independence. Since the establishment of our public schools in the Islands only some 100,000 pupils have been graduated from the intermediate schools, and some 10,000 from the high schools. That is only about one per cent. of the population. The Filipinos who head the executive departments are not the products of our own schools. They have the language and the traditions of the Spanish rule.

"We recognize that we are our brothers' keeper. Here is our stake in the Orient. We have laid great foundations in education, sanitation, roads, railways, harbors, buildings and legislation for the physical, mental and moral welfare of the Filipino people. Some of us would favor the appointment of a commission by the President of the United States, including men like Governor-General Wood, former Governor W. Cameron Forbes, President David P. Barrows of the University of California, of long experience in the Philippines, with representative Filipinos who will recommend a definite plan for a settlement of this unsettling question. This would avoid the continual artificial stimulation of propaganda with its resultant restlessness which prevents the steady economic and political development of the Islands.

"Such a commission should state certain standards to be acquired in general education and the proportion of inhabitants who should be literate. It should state the number who should fulfil the requirements of the franchise, and a standard of economic independence and financial stability as necessary prerequisites for independence. Such a standard might be fulfilled in a generation. When this standard is reached a plebiscite could be held and the people given a chance to vote for complete independence or a territorial form of government under the United States like the Hawaiian Islands. We would gladly let the Islands go to-day if we thought it was for the good of the people themselves. But they could not maintain political independence while they have no economic independence.

"Apart from many true patriots and theorists, there is a selfish element both among the Americans and the Filipinos that desires independence. Some Filipino politicians wish to monopolize the privilege of money and of power. Some selfish Americans at home would like to shirk the burden of responsibility and drop the Philippines at once if they were not a big financial asset. But we are our brothers' keeper. We have set our hand to this plow and we cannot turn back. We must make good or fail in our work here in the Orient. If our adolescent son of twelve or thirteen wished to go to sea or run away from home, or start in business for himself, or to get married prematurely, we could not while he is a minor permit him to do so. It would not only ruin his own future, but drag our own name in the mire. We are responsible for fulfilling our promise to the Philippines for ultimate independence. To give this prematurely would be their ruin."

4. A small group of Americans advocate "qualified independence." They regard the preamble of the Jones Bill as a definite promise. They urge that we grant the Philippines immediate independence, allowing the United States to take charge of their foreign relations and to appoint an American Resident to advise with them regarding proposed legislation. An appeal could be made from the Supreme Court in the Philippines to the Supreme Court in the United States to interpret the constitutional limitations which should be embodied in the constitution of the Philippines. Adequate territory should be given the United States for military, naval and commercial purposes similar to that in the Canal Zone. They are as earnestly opposed to immediate unqualified independence as the majority who feel this would be the death-knell of the existence of the Philippines. America has created an artificial American and European civilization here which is out of touch with that of Asia. The people could not be happy under the domination of Japanese. Yet they would not be able to exclude them. We cannot go on as at present under this constantly stimulated agitation. Now is the time to settle the Philippine question while we have a Governor-General like General Wood, who has the full confidence of Americans and Filipinos alike.

5. Finally, the report of the Wood-Forbes Commission, after an exhaustive survey of the Philippine Islands for four months in 1921, comes to the following conclusions: "We find the people happy, peaceful and in the main prosperous and keenly appreciative of the benefits of American rule. We find everywhere among the Christian Filipinos the desire for independence, generally under the protection of the United States. The non-Christians and Americans are for continuance of American control. We find a general failure to appreciate the fact that independence under the protection of another nation is not true independence. We find that a reasonable proportion of officials and employees are men of good character and ability and reasonably faithful to the trust imposed upon them; but that the efficiency of the public services has fallen off, and that they are now relatively inefficient, due to lack of inspection and to the too rapid transfer of control to officials who have not had the necessary time or proper training. We find that the people are not organized economically or from the standpoint of national defense to maintain an independent government.

"We feel that with all their many excellent qualities, the experience of the past eight years, during which they have had practical autonomy, has not been such as to justify the people of the United States relinquishing supervision of the government of the Philippine Islands, withdrawing their army and navy, and leaving the Islands a prey to any powerful nation coveting their rich soil and potential commercial advantages. In conclusion, we are convinced that it would be a betrayal of the Philippine people, a misfortune to the American people, a distinct step backward in the path of progress, and a discreditable neglect of our national duty, were we to withdraw from the Islands and terminate our relationship there without giving the Filipinos the best chance possible to have an orderly and permanently stable government.

"We recommend that the present general status of the Philippine Islands continue until the people have had time to absorb and thoroughly master the powers already in their hands. We recommend that under no circumstances should the American Government permit to be established in the Philippine Islands a situation which would leave the United States in a position of responsibility without authority."

Strategic Colleges

By Sherwood Eddy

I WAS immensely impressed last year by a brief visit to Berea College where my old friend, Dr. William J. Hutchins, Yale '92, is the president. Here I find a wonderful institution up in the mountains of Kentucky, giving a liberal education to more than twenty-five hundred students, the largest number so far as I know in any institution in the South. The cost per student is only $146, the lowest that I find in any college in this country. With ninety buildings and an "effective worth" of $3,500,000, the school has made extraordinary progress.

High up here in the mountains, where a million children of school age, in remote districts can have no adequate higher education, it stands as a beacon light and a growing educational center in the Southern Highlands. I have just come from the great auditorium packed with these students. Here in front are perhaps five hundred students in the Foundation School, some of them mature men and women, who are fighting hard for a chance of an education. To the sides are three hundred students of the Vocational School, the girls learning nursing and home-making; the boys studying business and agriculture. Up in the gallery are more than four hundred young teachers in the Normal School, who are going back to the mountain regions to carry the spirit of Berea far and wide; with five hundred in the High School, and more than two hundred and ninety in the College Department, practically all of them working their way through school. Every student works not less than ten hours a week.

No tuition is charged. Fees range from fifteen dollars to twenty-one dollars a year. It is the most economical education that I know of in America. Much instruction is given in model country homes. They are raising the standard of life in this and the neighboring States. About forty per cent. of the students are entirely self-supporting, fifty-seven per cent. are partially so. Out of a total budget of $250,000 only $150,000 is in sight, so that $100,000 a year must be raised from private subscriptions and donations.

Over eighty-five per cent. of these students are drawn from the heart of the mountains, and these young people—descendants of the early American settlers—isolated in the highlands have, apart from this college, no adequate chance of an education. The school draws eighteen hundred students from all the mountain counties of Kentucky, one hundred and twenty-five from North Carolina, fifteen from South Carolina, one hundred and twenty-seven from Tennessee, one hundred and eleven from Virginia, ninety from West Virginia, one hundred and fifty-four from other States, and fourteen from foreign countries, making a total of 2,584.

I found here one of the three best college libraries of the State. I thought the college in many respects distinctly in advance of some State universities I have recently visited. There are higher moral standards, better training in character building, a better spirit, a finer response from the student body, and better results than I found in some of these other more favored institutions. It is a great sight to see these hundreds of students so hungry for education, drinking in every word and laying a foundation for lives of service that will mean much to the future of America.

I spent my time last year going through more than one hundred colleges, and the year before I covered the colleges of the country from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from Canada to the Gulf. I have been more impressed with Berea as worthy of help, as in real need, and as producing a better output for investment than any college I have visited in recent months—five hundred students a year being turned away for lack of room.

To show what the college means let me give you an illustration: Here is a boy twenty-six years old, a widower, with a child, working in the eighth grade; here is a girl twenty years old in the fifth grade. For ten years she has been the homemaker in her father's cabin. Here is a boy, who walked eighty miles to Berea, took his turn with the heavy artillery in France, and is now in the academy. Here is an able college professor, who as a boy lived in a two-room cabin, with a stick and clay chimney, who took his education from the ground up in Berea. Here is a man, now a major in the United States Army, who as a boy walked ninety miles to Berea, leading his cow, to serve him as a peripatetic bank. He came to get "larning" and got it.

Unsectarian, with no aid from State or Federal funds, the college offers an opportunity for investment in humanity at compound interest. I know of none better.

The Outlook of Germany

Interview with Dr. Adolf Deissmann of Berlin

[The following interview with Dr. Adolf Deissmann of Berlin which recently appeared in "The Christian World" of London, and which has been called to our attention by a friend, is so interesting that we are sharing it with the readers of THE CHRISTIAN WORK. Dr. Deissmann has been invited to England to lecture in the universities and he is meeting with a very cordial reception. Even if our readers do not agree with everything in this article, it is very interesting to get the point of view of one of the most eminent German scholars and citizens.—THE EDITORS.]

"A H," he said, with a quiver of emotion in his voice, "you may imagine the feeling of a German who finds himself here once again among English friends, after all that has happened; how thankful I am for the many proofs of your friendship and good-will!"

His table was littered with the papers and notes which go to the process of making the lectures he has to give during his stay in England. For, as a speaker, he lives on the inspiration of his hour. While he gives to his audiences, he also receives somewhat from them. His hearers unconsciously react upon him; the impulses they impart at a first lecture set him a-swing for the second, and so on. He confided to me that he had also come to England to learn.

"Contact and co-operation between the Christians of the two lands has been broken," he explained, "and I want to see them restored. This severance does harm in many ways and in theological studies; for instance, I hear a reference to a British religious book and I find I do not know it, and if I quote a German book I find you do not know it."

Dr. Deissmann, of course, specializes in New Testament studies. One might write at length of his interests in the philology of the New Testament, his habit of getting ever so closely into the origins, the value of the words used and those primary and elemental ideas which lie at the beginnings of Christianity. Needless to say there is a thoroughness and a scientific exactness in his mental makeup and methods of work which are immensely interesting to serious students of theology. He is a D.Theol. of Marburg and also a D.D. of three British universities—Aberdeen, St. Andrews and Manchester.

His classes in Berlin University, and in the seminary with which he is connected, are attended by all types of German Protestant students—United Church or Lutheran and Free Church, Methodist, Baptist, and the like. There are a number of American students of all denominations; sometimes a learned Jesuit or other Roman Catholics, all of whom find common ground in the serious study of the New Testament. Presently I asked Dr. Deissmann as to the alleged poverty of the German religious students.

"Most of them," he answered, "are driven from sheer necessity to the expedient of working during the vacations at secular callings in order to provide themselves with food and clothing during the terms, and even then many are very badly provided for. If you visited the average pastor's home—I mean a working pastor, a well-educated man in charge of a church—you would find he and his family cannot afford to buy milk. At meal times they have no eggs, no butter, no meat—except, perhaps, a very small portion on Sundays. And in the cold weather they have no coal. There is plenty of coal in Germany, but it is beyond reach."

The depreciation of the German mark, I observed, was too complex a subject to be talked of; but Dr. Deissmann, I found, had a simple and definite theory of explanation.

"The downward career of the mark," he explained, "synchronizes with the repeated failure of the successive conferences. In 1921 I imagined we had seen the worst, and that our national finances would show steady recovery year by year. At that time the American dollar was worth about 60 marks. The decision in regard to Upper Silesia, by which the Polish peoples secured rich coal and iron districts in the east, was adverse to us, and the dollar bought three hundred marks. Month by month the situation got worse, and, as I say, as the result of the various conferences, until after this last conference and the Ruhr occupation the dollar was worth forty thousand marks. Money has largely ceased to be of value to us. Middle-class people, specially those with fixed incomes, are absolutely ruined. Sections of the population are unquestionably suffering greater privations than they experienced in the gloomiest days of the war."

When I came to mention the Ruhr occupation and the Treaty of Versailles I found Dr. Deissmann, in attempting to explain the apparently bad temper of the German nation, was inclined to go much farther back into post-war history. The Ruhr policy, of course, he disliked—there could be no gains in the disorganization of the most important industrial district in Europe, he said. He was pleased to note the growth of sentiment in favor of a revision of the Treaty of Versailles, which, he complained, had saddled Germany with a vast undefined liability.

"Most Germans were inclined at one time to say, 'We have lost the war; we must make what amends we can to the French and the Belgians,' and our burdens, though heavy, were not thought to be a serious obstacle to our national progress. No one imagined that later demands would be made which would involve our utter economic ruin. As time went on we found that our payments, given ostensibly for reparations in devastated lands, were being used for armies of occupation and the rest, and that is where some of the bitterness comes in."

Dr. Deissmann halted a good deal in saying this much; but, not content with that, I pressed him further to speak what I knew was at the back of his mind.

"It was thought by the Germans that ex-President Wilson's 'Fourteen Points' would be adhered to. Before the Armistice we had circulated in Germany the official note of State Secretary Lansing—dated, I think, November 5, 1918—to the effect that the Allied governments declared their willingness to make peace on the terms laid down in the 'Fourteen Points.' When the Armistice was signed we in Germany regarded these points as the firm basis of the Peace Treaty. Our nation disarmed on that understanding. As you are aware," he added, solemnly, "these points were not kept, and this action is regarded as a breach of faith. That, I firmly believe, is the final reason for the bitterness and enmity which exasperates the present political situation."

For a moment or two, as one may guess, I argued with Dr. Deissmann, saying surely there was a misunderstanding somewhere; for his repeatedly strong insistence on this aspect of the case surprised as it deeply impressed me. Not lingering upon it, however, we passed on.

"The result of the last events," he continued, "has been to develop in Germany a very real patriotism as distinct from an artificial or manufactured patriotism. All classes now feel that they have to unite to make a real struggle for national existence and liberty. What will be the final outcome, who can say? It is obvious to anyone that the situation is full of peril. But there is a strong feeling among us that the confrontation of physical violence with moral force being now exercised for the first time in history on a grand scale will not end in a triumph for violence."

The room in which we were at that moment was flooded with the most brilliant sunshine; but there we sat, as it were, in shadow.

"What would you say was the result of the war on the religious life of Germany?" I said, trying to lift the depression.

"Not in the mass of the people, but in the case of a few, in all the churches there has been a deepening of spiritual life. This applies specially to younger people, many of whom are seeking after New Testament idealism and desire to share the ideas and experiences of such a great Christian as St. Paul."

Dr. Deissmann is a great believer in the worth of the press for the purposes of religious propaganda. During the war he edited a Protestant Weekly Letter which circulated beyond the frontiers of his own country. The collecting of specimens of the evangelical publications of the different countries amounts almost to a hobby with him. The German religious newspapers are necessarily very small and poor at the present time, and this he considers a distinct disadvantage to the life of the nation.

Playfully and in the spirit of banter, I ventured to use the term "German theology," with that peculiar inflection in common use among orthodox sections of religious folk in this country.

"The British and the German represent two distinct types of Biblical study and interpretation. Why need they be regarded as opposed? Why not regard them as supplementary to each other?" he said.

"Some old-fashioned English people," I returned, smiling. "say you Germans dearly love to exploit something new—something that nobody else has ever heard of before."

"You are too conservative; we are too critical," he retorted. "If you wish me to put it good-humoredly, you may say you are too phlegmatic; we are too acrobatic."

We both laughed at this suggestion of theological acrobatics.

"But seriously, Dr. Deissmann, hasn't there been a somewhat new 'orientation' of German theology since the war?" I said, bluntly.

"Yes," he replied, with equal frankness. "We are less dogmatic, less destructive, I think. We have a better understanding of the mystical element in religion. You see, Ritsehl was against mysticism, and I think I may safely say German Protestantism is developing a new appreciation of religious mysticism. Attention is being also given to certain neglected sociological problems in the light of the New Testament and the necessity for the Christianizing of political life. This latter," he said to me as I left him, "is, in my judgment, vastly important from the point of view of our international relationships."

Which One Suffers the Most?

By William Willard Howard

A HIGHLY esteemed contributor to the Russian Refugee Fund has asked this question: Does a woman accustomed to a life of ease and affluence suffer more when reduced to acute poverty than a woman suffers who fights poverty all her life?

The woman who could answer that question authoritatively does not exist, because no one individual could have the necessary two-fold experience; but, to a limited extent, I may throw some light on the problem.

I once went three days without food while lost in pathless mountains. At another time, while crossing an arid region, I was for two days without water. Years afterward, while assisting Armenian refugees to escape from Eastern Turkey, I was for eight weeks on such short rations that I lost twenty pounds in weight.

From my own sensations during these experiences I am disposed to believe that the sufferings of a rich woman suddenly reduced to extreme poverty are more acute than the sufferings of one long acquainted with privation. During the eight weeks in which I was hungry enough to gnaw bark from the trees and moss from the rocks I grew accustomed to attending circumstances. It was only when I came out of the mountains of Ararat and at a ten-course dinner that I realized how much I had suffered. It may be that the wind is tempered to the shorn lamb.

But the hunger of women and children, whether of short or long duration, is something that I cannot look upon without a shock. The pain of it never dulls.

Yet I met a man on the borders of Bolshevist Russia a short time ago who looked upon the sufferings of Russian gentlewomen and children with an open expression of personal satisfaction. I had told this man that I had been investigating the condition of the members of the nobility, landed gentry and intelligentsia who had fled from their ancestral lands and homes in monarchist Russia to escape death at the hands of revolutionists. I told him that the condition of the refugees, especially of the women and children, was beyond all imagination, shocking—the most ghastly distress in all Europe.

"It's a good thing," said the man. "It shows 'em how others have to live."

No, the man was not an anarchist. He was not even a Bolshevik. Strange as it may seem, he was an American. Still more strange, he was a member of the Y. M. C. A. Strangest of all, he was a traveling inspector of the International Y. M. C. A.

I do not think that I am called upon to make any comment upon this man's expression of opinion. I am content to give the fact as it stands. But if this sentiment is spread over the face of Europe by Americans who are supposed to represent the Christian spirit of the United States, the work of the Church Peace Union and World Alliance for International Friendship to bring about good-will among the nations will be hampered where it should be helped.

Among the many Americans and British whom I met in Europe not one had any definite information concerning the condition of the Russian refugees. Not one had even so much as tried to dig the Russian gentlefolk out of the obscure holes into which they had crawled for shelter. They expressed a proper measure of sympathy when I told them what my investigations had disclosed.

My criticism of these amiable folk is not for what they did, but for what they did not do. They should have told us how the Russian gentlefolk were suffering, so that we might have helped sooner. Only slightly less culpable in this respect are the scores of thousands of American tourists who went to Europe last summer. Not one returned with a word of the dire need of the refugees. There was plenty of talk about reparations, the future of Germany, the instability of the mark, the stabilization of currencies, and such things, but not a word about the starvation of Russian gentlewomen.

The tourist has some measure of defense. He did not actually see any hunger and distress. He saw only the routine things that show on the surface.

The starving Russian gentlefolk do not show on the surface. They hide away in cellars and garrets and other obscure places. They suffer in silence, turning a brave face to the curious world. Even Vera Trenukhin shrank timidly from the thought of having her story made public.

A generous contributor living in Philadelphia has asked me if Vera Trenukhin, whose mode of life was described in "The College Girl and the Wolf," published in THE CHRISTIAN WORK three weeks ago, was an actual individual or merely a composite picture intended to give a general outline of conditions among the refugees. I regret to say that Vera Trenukhin is an actual individual, and that "The College Girl and the Wolf" was as clear a literary photograph of her daily life on stormy winter days as I could make it. The story of Vera Trenukhin is the absolute, literal truth.

I do not need to draw upon my imagination for anything that I may write about the Russian refugees. The reality is so much worse than anything that I could imagine or invent that all I need do is to select at random a page from my notebooks.

I have not published anything in these pages for which I could not bring legal proof if called upon to do so. It would be folly to print anything except the naked truth.

But there is at least one person in the United States who takes a wrong view of these matters. That person has sent anonymously to THE CHRISTIAN WORK a newspaper clipping announcing that the famine in Russia is over and that the American Relief Administration will be withdrawn from Russia on July 1. At least one part of that announcement is true. The American Relief Administration will retire from Russia on July 1. But that fact is not news. It was known to me as long ago as last February that the Russian relief work would close in July. Whether or not the famine is over depends on one's point of view. The British and the Quakers do not seem to think that it is over.

Whatever the situation in Bolshevik Russia may or may not be, it has not anything to do with the relief work that Anne Louise Howard is doing for the Russian refugees in Eastern Europe. The refugees are in Europe—not in Bolshevik Russia. They are not affected, one way or the other, with economic conditions in Russia. They are in the uncertain shelter of the independent countries bordering on Bolshevik Russia. I use the word uncertain advisedly, because the refugees walk daily in the fear that they will be gathered up and deported to Russia. That there is some basis for this fear is shown by the fact that, as the steamship on which I sailed for home was leaving Danzig, I received word that an entire trainload of Russian refugees had been rounded up in Poland and literally dumped upon the soil of Bolshevik Russia.

The refugees in the border states have not any means for escaping into Central or Western Europe. In addition to the costs of travel there is the uncertainty of passports, the difficulty of visas and frontiers. Even if the refugees could escape into Germany they would not be any better off, for refugees who have wandered through Germany seeking work have told me that they could not find employment sufficient to buy so much as one bowl of soup a day. Employment at living wages in Germany is for Germans exclusively. Until economic conditions in Central Europe improve materially the refugees will be compelled to remain where they are, trusting to the United States to protest vigorously against any measures looking toward their deportation to Bolshevik Russia. We must help them where they are.

I ask this week that each one of you who read this send to me the names and addresses of ladies of your acquaintance who might like to buy one or more of the beautiful hand-embroidered, hand-sewn Russian Princess Blouses that two hundred destitute Russian gentlewomen are making under the personal direction of Anne Louise Howard. I will mail to each address a forty-page booklet giving photo-engravings of twenty-five representative blouses. Contributions to the working fund, to make possible the employment of many destitute gentlewomen now begging for a share in the work, may be sent to the Russian Refugee Fund, care THE CHRISTIAN WORK, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

Why is amnesty withheld from the political prisoners? They are almost universally recognized to be innocent of any crime deserving of severe and prolonged punishment. Can it be that pardon is withheld from them because of political reasons? Is it possible that the President, whom we all had taken to be a man of high Christian principles, is being influenced by the opposition of some members of the American Legion who are bitterly opposed to the release of the prisoners? Can it be because of fear of their opposition in the next presidential campaign? Has he forgotten that splendid declaration of Mr. Clay's that he "would rather be right than be President"? For their standards of statesmanship the men who are at the head of governments need to go to the teachings of Jesus. There is a word in the twenty-fifth chapter of Matthew that our President and our Department of Justice ought to turn to, a word concerning those least of the brethren who were in prison.

Post-War Germany

By Rev. Francis E. Clark, D.D., LL.D.

President of the United Society of Christian Endeavor

[The following article is based on impressions formed by Dr. Clark during six months recently spent in Germany and the surrounding nations. In his letter accompanying the manuscript Dr. Clark writes, "I see no hope for Europe except along the line which the thirteenth chapter of First Corinthians works out."]

A MAP of Europe in these days is indeed stranger than a Chinese puzzle. Cut out such a map on the line of the borders of the many countries of Europe, and you will have a children's puzzle map which it would be difficult for any grown person to put together.

Take the map of Germany, for instance, and her immediate neighbors. There is, on the map I have before me, a great sprawling creature, painted a pinkish red. One leg sticks down into Poland almost to the ancient capital of Cracow; the head touches Denmark on the north; another foot rests on Switzerland on the south, while an arm stretches up into the Baltic Sea as though reaching out for East Prussia, a part of Germany wholly separated from the rest of her by yellow Poland.

The old geography class which in my boyhood days had to "bound" the different countries without looking on the map would have a "stunt" indeed to bound modern Germany, for she is hemmed in on all sides by twelve countries and two seas—by Holland, Belgium, Luxemburg, France, on the west; Switzerland and Austria on the south; Czechoslovakia and Poland on the east; Denmark, Lithuania, Memel and Danzig, the North Sea and the Baltic Sea on the north.

Off on the northeast is a big pink spot called East Prussia, which is part of Germany and yet does not touch her, but is separated by yellow Poland and by a yellow spot with pink polka dots, representing the free city of Danzig and the surrounding country, which is "international territory under guarantee of the League of Nations."

"The Statesman's Year Book" tells us that Germany has lost about twenty-eight thousand square miles of her former territory; about one-fifth of this to France, more than three-fifths to Poland, while the other fifth has been divided between Denmark, Belgium, Danzig and Memel.

Until recently, who ever head of Memel? Well, it is a little anomalous country that looks on the map like a small section of the rind of a melon, the melon being Lithuania. It was ceded by Germany to the "Allied and Associated Powers," but what they are going to do with it is more than can be found out. Since the United States was the "Associated Power," I suppose we still have a finger in that little pie, though we have refused, as yet, to lend a helping hand to pull the rest of Europe out of the "Slough of Despond" in which she is wallowing.

After all these loppings and prunings, it might seem that there was little left of old Germany. Such is not the case, however, for she is still a great, substantial, vigorous nation lying in the very heart of Europe, with great potential resources, though somewhat curtailed. She has the largest and best educated population in Europe—at least the largest west of Russia (poor Russia, which in these days doesn't count in any such summary as this).

Oh, if Germany had not yielded to the advice of her junkers and militarists! She seemed to have everything that a nation's heart could wish—population growing rapidly in numbers, in intelligence, in world-wide influence, in wealth, in commerce, in scientific leadership. The future was hers, intellectually, commercially, in almost every line that makes a nation great. If she had but known the things that belonged unto her peace!

But there was a rotten speck in the apple—the militaristic spirit which contaminated the whole, the little leaven of unrighteousness which seemed for a time to leaven the whole lump.

But, thank God, all were not contaminated! The common people were never junkers or jingoistic at heart, though for a little while many were swept off their feet by being led to believe that they were surrounded by enemies on all sides, and that unless they fought their liberties and their country's life was in danger.

Such lying propaganda existed in all lands. No people knew the truth during those four long years of deliberately broadcasted falsehood. The German people especially were made to believe a lie by the father of lies as indeed we all were, to a greater or less extent. What a joyous time the devil must have had during those four years of national and international lying, deceiving, cheating and killing!

But now Germany and all the rest of us are reaping the whirlwind, since we sowed the scorching wind of hate, rivalry and jealousy.

But is Germany permanently down and out? I do not believe it. Nations, like individuals, as the Salvation Army would say, may be down but are never out, especially nations with a virile, vigorous, rapidly increasing population like Germany. France seems to take it as an offense, that while her death rate is greater than her birth rate, Germany's birth rate keeps her population ahead of the Grim Reaper; and so France must arm to the teeth to withstand the menace of Germany's increasing population.

But how and why is the birth rate of the one country kept down? Has birth-control gained such control of the parents of one nation that few or no children are desired? If so, who is to blame for the decrease? Must the peoples go to war again to preserve the birth rate and death rate balance between the two countries? However, I am taking sides with no one country in my article, but simply striving to state without prejudice the facts as they are, or at least as they have appeared to me on the spot.

To be sure, Germany, as I have said, has lost nearly twenty-eight thousand square miles of her territory, but she has 183,381 square miles left, and that, except for East Prussia, is a compact territory, fertile, well-watered, dotted with great manufacturing cities and with plenty of sea room on the north.

She had nearly sixty-five millions of people in 1914, and now only sixty-one millions, but these sixty-one millions are intelligent, well-disciplined, patriotic and work-loving. In some of these characteristics no other large nation in either hemisphere can equal her. If her spirit is not crushed out and her territory further ravaged, as of course it may be, she will soon again be a world leader along intellectual and industrial, but never again, I believe, unless forced into war, along military lines. Indeed, this predominance, intellectual, industrial and commercial, is what some of her neighbors on both sides fear, and so they would hamstring her if possible.

Time will tell how far they can keep her down. Any such policy seems to me short-sighted. Nations, like individuals, prosper or fall together. No lasting prosperity is built on the failure or degradation of any part of the earth's surface. The wise Bible proverb is as true of nations as of individuals, "Whether one member suffers, all the members suffer with it." It is as true of nations as of the different parts of one body, "The eye cannot say unto the hand, I have no need of thee, nor again the head to the feet, I have no need of you."

France cannot say to Germany, I have no need of you, nor Germany to France, nor either of them to Great Britain. Neither can America say this to Europe, as she seems inclined to do in these days. Even the little countries of Europe formed out of the old dynasties have something to contribute to the world's welfare. Esthonia, Latvia, Lithuania, The Ukraine, even little Memel perhaps—any country that has a right to exist, which has racial characteristics of its own, in customs, literature and inherited virtues, has something to contribute to the rest of the world.

We in America are less prosperous than we should be were it not for the collapse of Germany. We have higher taxes and less food and more workless people because of the low estate of Poland and Austria, Hungary and Russia. In our proud and mighty isolation, with three thousand miles of salt seas rolling between us and Europe, we cannot afford to grow self-conceited and self-sufficient, holding aloof from the rest of the world. Even regard for our material prosperity alone should dictate a more generous policy. Let us remember once more, "Whether one member suffers, all the members suffer with it."

Three things I learned about Germany during a recent visit, which involved a stay of three months in different large cities.

First, that Germany suffered much more in the late war and since the war than most Americans believe. They compare the dreadful desolation in sections of Northern France where whole villages were wiped out and no habitable house remained, and then tell us that Germany suffered nothing in comparison. To be sure, the war was fought on French soil, while no part of Germany was a battlefield. Yet this last war was fought partly from the air, and a bomb carries desolation far from the army front. The university city of Freiburg, where I stayed for two months while doing some literary work, was bombed over and over again during the war. The great medical school of the university was destroyed, a large theater also, and there were hundreds of fatalities. Karlsruhe, another populous city, was bombed every other day for two years. One bomb fell (by accident, let us believe) on a company of little school children out for a holiday and thirty-two of them were killed. A multitude of such casualties occurred of which we in America heard little.

But the greatest sufferings came to Germany after the Armistice. The blockade, after peace was declared, starved and stunted hundreds of thousands of children who will never reach their full stature. Millions of cows and horses and tens of thousands of automobiles and trucks were sent to France and other countries in reparations payments. Until the occupation of the Ruhr every ten minutes, day and night for years, a long trainload of coal has gone from the mines of Germany to France, Poland and other countries by way of reparations.

Every day at ten o'clock for nearly two years all the underweight children in Germany, Poland and Austria received a bowl of rich soup and a big bun supplied by American generosity. "Quaker Speise," they called it, because of the beloved Friends who distributed it. Otherwise millions more in these countries would have died of slow starvation. For months, while living in good hotels, we tasted no fresh milk, no real butter, and we had only the tiniest crumbs of sugar, and we fared far better than the average "native," for we had American money.

Surely, these are signs of suffering which we cannot rejoice in, with whatever hatred we still regard our former enemies. I am not talking of deserts or non-deserts, but only stating facts. War has brought its hideous rewards to every family, high and low, in the land of the deposed Hohenzollerns.

But there is something more hopeful. The common people have learned to hate war with a deadly loathing. Nowhere else have I seen Mars, the God of War, so utterly discredited. And well he may be, for he has brought nothing but dismay and humiliation, famine, distress and suffering untold. If this feeling persists, Germany will never tolerate, much less provoke, another war. Her military passivity during the French occupation of the Ruhr shows her utter helplessness.

I do not mean to say that there are no reactionary jingoes and militarists left in Germany. Doubtless there are, as there are in every land. But I venture to say that before the most recent occupation occurred there were more of them in America than among our late enemies.

Another hopeful sign is that in Germany I found that everybody was at work. It is work or starve, and naturally the people prefer the former alternative. Only by buckling to with a will, as the people realize, can a semblance of national life be preserved. I heard of few strikes. They are doubtless reserved for prosperous times.

But best of all, a spirit of deep religious consecration exists among a large section of the people, and an intense longing for Christian fellowship. This last visit was one of many, but never have I seen such throngs at religious meetings or felt such a spirit of whole-hearted devotion to the Master's service. The Christian Endeavor societies have nearly trebled since the war began, and their activities multiplied in like measure. The same is true, doubtless, of other evangelical and evangelistic organizations.

Another surprise—I have heard it said since returning to America that Americans were hated and despised in Germany, and that a German would "spit at an American shadow." Nothing could be more untrue. No people are so well liked there as Americans, unless it be the Britons. Our soldiers in the occupied territory on the Rhine were held in great esteem by the inhabitants. The soldiers behaved like gentlemen; have not demanded their pound of flesh, and their late enemies have become their present friends.

The last meeting I attended in Coblenz was a joint meeting of an Endeavor society in the American Army of Occupation and the German Endeavorers of Coblenz, and the last song I heard at that meeting was,

"Blest be the tie that binds
Our hearts in Christian love."

It was sung in the two languages and with equal heartiness.

But, mind you, it was "Christian love." There was no disloyalty to America, no condoning of any wrong of Germany, no mere mushy sentimentality, but simply an expression of Christian amity—the spirit that alone will heal the deep wounds of the present war and prevent another.

Arms have failed, bombs and submarines never have, and never can, conquer the spirit of war. Councils and conferences seem equally helpless. Civilization has failed, but Christianity has not failed. Let us vote to give it a trial, readers of CHRISTIAN WORK, and in our own hearts dismiss enmities, envies and jealousies, public and private, and let us do our little part to bring about the glad return of the Prince of Peace.

Motion Pictures for Religious Services

THE following list was prepared by the National Committee for Better Films, affiliated with the National Board of Review, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York. We present it here for what value it may be to ministers and lay leaders who are using moving pictures in church work:

Prodigal Daughters*

By Joseph Hocking

SYNOPSIS

Colonel Lester Trelawney arrives home in England after six years of military service in India and Mesopotamia to find his two daughters sady beset by the flood of new morals, and ethics and dress of the "younger generation." Eleanor, he soon discovers, is associating with young women of strange tendencies. Tamsin Corys, her most intimate friend, believes that girls should "have their fling like their brothers." Peggy has been "keeping company" with a young man of doubtful character. Both have been coming home at all hours of the night. After an unsatisfactory interview with the girls, he meets the young man and forbids further acquaintance with Peggy. Called away for a few days to visit his eldest son, he receives a message from John, the younger son that both girls have left home. He and John at once commence search for the missing girls.

INSTALLMENT X.

"Have you finished?" asked the Colonel.

"Very nearly, sir. As I said, I laughed at the whole thing after I'd left the Barnes' house, but when I got to business yesterday morning and found that Barnes didn't turn up I began to wonder. Especially was this so when our Mr. Bristowe came to me and asked me if I knew where he was. Of course, I didn't say anything about what I heard, but when this morning came and he didn't turn up I began to think there was more truth in it than I had admitted. Then you came into the office, sir, and I thought I recognized you. I'd seen your photograph in the papers, and I felt sure you were Colonel Trelawney. You looked pale and worried, too, if you'll forgive my saying so, and then when you asked for Barnes I said to myself, 'The blighter was serious after all.' Then I scribbled that note, sir, for I felt you ought to know what I have told you."

"And that's all?"

"That's all, sir. I'm afraid it won't help you much, and I'm more sorry than I can tell that I didn't try to find out where you lived on Wednesday night and told you all I had to tell then. But really, sir, I didn't think it was serious. Even now I have my doubts whether there is anything in it."

"I'm very much obliged to you, anyhow," said the Colonel. "Perhaps you wouldn't mind giving me your home address."

A few minutes later father and son entered the Army and Navy Club together.

JIM BARNES TAKES A LICKING.

FOUR days later Colonel Trelawney sat with his son John in the old playroom at Hampstead. Both were evidently tired and anxious. The Colonel looked ten years older than when he had arrived in England two weeks before. His face was ashy pale. Deep creases were around his eyes, and lines which indicated suffering marked his face. It was now late at night and the house was in silence.

"We seem to be beaten, my boy," said the Colonel sadly.

John noted the look on his father's face and sighed.

"Yes, dad. we have made no headway," he admitted.

"And as far as I can see, there is nothing more we can do."

"No, unless we put the whole thing in the hands of a private detective."

"I cannot do that," said the Colonel, starting to his feet and striding round the room. "I simply can't, John. It would mean that the whole business would get into the newspapers, and that I could not bear. Besides, think of telling one's family affairs to one of those fellows."

"Yes. it's a bit sickening. I admit, but they are up to all sorts of dodges that we should never think about."

"Well," sighed the Colonel, after a long silence, "the girls have defied us, and so far they have beaten us. You see, we have hardly had any data upon which to go. It is like searching for the proverbial needle in a haystack. How can one find two girls amongst seven million people?"

"Hark! What's that?"

"I see nobody. Yet I am sure I heard a footstep."

"Yes," said John eagerly, "so did I. Ah, here's a note lying on the white marble."

He picked it up and handed it to his father.

Colonel Trelawney noted the writing on the envelope and moved quickly back to the room where they had been sitting.

"It's from him," he said as he tore open the envelope.

"Dear Colonel Trelawney," the note read, "of course you have been wondering what has become of your daughter Peggy. Doubtless, too, bearing in mind our interview in the Army and Navy Club, you will have connected her disappearance with me. Although we parted on rather unfriendly terms, I am willing to discuss the situation with you either at your own house or at any other place or time you may care to mention. If you are reasonable we can no doubt come to an amicable settlement. But for Peggy's sake, as well as your own. I should advise you to fall in with the idea of an interview. If you do not you will only have yourself to blame if matters turn out unpleasantly and your family pride is badly hurt. It is largely a matter of indifference to me, but I thought I would give you this opportunity of coming to terms. Yours sincerely,

"JAMES BARNES.

"P. S.—Any letter addressed to 8 Bywell Street will find me."

"What do you think of it?" asked the Colonel.

John did not reply for a few seconds, but his father noted the quivering nostrils and the flash of his usually quiet gray eyes.

"Dad!" cried John. "I wish you would let me deal with him."

"Why?" asked the Colonel.

"He's too dirty, too mean, too contemptible for you to touch. Your hands must not be soiled by thrashing him. Leave him to me."

Even although the Colonel's mind was torn with anxiety, he could not help smiling at the way his son spoke. Never had he seen so deeply into his nature as then. There was such a healthy scorn for meanness, such a manifestation of a clean mind, such anger and contempt for what was base.

"We'll not talk about that now, my son. The question at present is, What shall we do?"

For more than an hour the two discussed the situation, and when at length they parted at the Colonel's bedroom door, their plans were fully made as to their future proceedings.

Evidently Barnes was regarded as a good business man.

for although angry words passed between him and his employer, he found himself installed in his old place, even although he had taken several days' leave of absence without the consent of his firm.

About eleven o'clock on the morning following the evening on which Colonel Trelawney and his son had discussed the situation a letter was brought to him. Barnes opened it almost feverishly and read as follows:

"Colonel Trelawney will be in Room 394 at the Cosmopolitan Hotel to-night at seven o'clock, when he will give Mr. Barnes the interview he suggests. Will Mr. Barnes please send a line by bearer confirming this arrangement?"

Soon after six o'clock that evening Colonel Trelawney made his way to the Cosmopolitan Hotel. For more than a quarter of an hour the Colonel sat alone. The room was very quiet and was situated in a part of the hotel not much in public use. Presently he heard a quick step outside and John entered. The clock had scarcely struck seven when they heard the sound of voices in the passage outside, followed by a knock at the door. A moment later one of the hotel servants ushered in two men. Barnes and another. John moved his chair close to that of his father and sat quietly watching; his gray eyes looked hard and determined. The Colonel appeared perfectly calm, but his compressed lips and steady gaze showed that he was in no holiday mood.

"Good-evening, Colonel," said Barnes airily. "I got your letter this morning, and am here to the tick, as you see."

The Colonel nodded, but did not speak.

"This is my friend, Mr. Jenkins," he went on. "I thought it best to have a third party present. You see, I did not expect you to bring your son. Jenkins, this is Colonel Trelawney. Colonel Trelawney, this is Mr. Wilfred Jenkins. I hope you gentlemen will become better acquainted in the future." Jenkins stepped forward and held out his hand.

"Proud to meet you, Colonel," he said, but the Colonel did not appear to notice the hand. He simply nodded.

"Where is Peggy now?" asked the Colonel, who had difficulty in speaking calmly.

"We'll come to that presently," replied the other. "I'll tell you this, though; she has been living with me for three days in a little flat I have taken."

"Well," said the Colonel, "what then?"

"What then? You're mighty cool about it; but I have got this to say to you, you must not blame me for what I have done. I offered you straight to marry her. You refused, and now you must take the consequences."

"Do you mean to say you are not married?" John again rose from his chair as he spoke.

"Ah, I have touched you on the quick at last, have I?" and Barnes laughed loudly. "You did not think when you sneered at me and called me a bounder, and a low-bred swine, that I would pay you out."

"Do you mean to say you are not married?" and John repeated the words again with a quivering voice.

"There was no need for that," laughed Barnes; "she was willing to come with me on any terms."

"You are a liar," said the boy.

For a moment there was a silence. Barnes, in spite of his loud protestations, looked uncomfortable, while Jenkins, who had been eagerly watching, first the Colonel and then John, seemed to be in doubt as to his own standing there.

"Liar, am I?" said Barnes. "Why, what's the use of talking? You saw yourself how sweet she was on me. Besides, I made up my mind to pay the Colonel out for insulting me. He thought I was dirt under his feet, didn't he?"

"Have you brought your witness with you in order to say this to me?" remarked the Colonel.

you should know how things are. Besides, I want to do the straight thing, even now."

For a moment the Colonel almost lost control over himself. "Straight thing," he repeated. "You do the straight thing."

"Yes," replied Barnes, "and that's why I brought my friend Jenkins here with me; he's a gentleman, and will not let on."

"Well, what do you regard as the straight thing?" asked the Colonel.

"Look here, Colonel," said Barnes, adopting a more friendly air, "of course I know you are a bit cut up—naturally you are, and naturally, too, since Peg and I have been living together, I have thought a good deal about your feelings, and this is what I have got to say, here in the presence of a witness: If you'll be reasonable in spite of the fact that I've got the whip hand of you, I'll do the honorable thing and make her an honest woman, there."

"What do you mean by being reasonable?" asked John.

"Do you wish me to answer him, Colonel? Mind, I wanted this matter to be kept strictly between ourselves, but if you want me to talk freely in his presence I will."

"Yes, answer him."

"Well, then, I mean this: no one need know anything about what's taken place. You'll receive me as a son-in-law in a proper way, and Peg shall be Mrs. Barnes. There, now."

"What do you mean by receiving you as a son-in-law in the proper way?" asked the Colonel.

"You know what I mean well enough—receive me as you did up at your place that Sunday night. Do the thing handsome, help us towards getting a little home, and—and, there you are. I need not say any more."

"And if I won't?" asked the Colonel.

"If you won't," and Barnes laughed again. "then don't blame me. I have offered to do the honorable thing. I might get tired of her, and then—well, perhaps we had better say no more about it. But I don't threaten. Come now, Colonel, what do you say? I am no fool. I mean to get on in my business, and I'll make her a good husband."

"No," said the Colonel, "I will never receive you into my house."

"What do you mean? You say you'll—you'll—"

"I mean to say," and the Colonel spoke in low, clear tones, "that I will never admit such a low, contemptible creature as you into my house as a relation of mine."

"Then you'll let your daughter be spoken of as a—"

"Stop!" cried John, starting to his feet. "Dad, I must have a word here. Look here, Barnes, I know why you brought this fellow here with you. You were afraid to meet my father alone. You came here to blackmail him; you came here with a trumped-up story which you thought would deceive him."

"I have come with no trumped-up story," replied the other, "and don't blame me if I drag your sister in the mire."

"I am not going to bandy words," said John, pulling the table to the side of the room; "one could not, with a thing like you—but I am going to give you the best licking you have ever had in your life. But before I do it I am going to tell you something. I said just now that you were a liar; you are, and the worst kind of a liar. You said you were not married to my sister. You are. There's not much to congratulate her on that, but do you think we are fools? I have been to Somerset House to-day; I have been to the Registry Office where you were married; I have seen the books; I have seen her signature and yours. It's a ghastly business, and I would rather see her dead than married to you, but still there it is. There's something else, however. You insulted my sister; you said you had no need to persuade her to live with you without marrying her. I am going to make you pay for that."

"John, my boy!" cried the Colonel, "is that true?" It was the first time his father had lost complete control over himself.

"Yes. I have not been to the works to-day. I felt sure after I read his letter last night that he had something like this in his mind. I knew that Peg would not do what he said; I knew, too, that Eleanor would see to that, but I wanted to make sure, and I gave up the day to it. Now, then, Mr. Barnes, strip. Oh, no, I'm not going to take any mean advantage of you; you have got your friend here to see fair play."

"I'm not a baby killer," sniggered Barnes uneasily.

"You insulted my sister," replied the boy. "I know my father is longing to give you a thrashing, but I will not let him dirty his hands by touching you. Now strip. You shall have fair play," and John threw off his coat as he spoke and rolled up his shirt sleeves.

Barnes looked first at the Colonel, then at Jenkins.

"What the young gentleman says is quite fair, Barnes," replied Jenkins, who was altogether thrown off his balance by the course things had taken. "Besides, you can give him more than fourteen pounds in weight, and you can't back out, man! I'll see you get fair play."

"You need not fear, Barnes," laughed John, who went to the door and locked it. "As it happens, my father is a sportsman and a gentleman, and he will see fair play, while you on your side, have your friend with you."

"But I don't want this," cried Barnes. "I didn't mean what I said, and—and—I apologize—there!"

"I don't accept your apology, and I am going to give you a licking for insulting my sister."

"You thrash me? Don't blame me if you are in bed for the next week."

"I won't," replied John. "Now then, Mr. Barnes."

It was a quite unequal contest. John had been in the boxing finals at Rugby only a year or so before, while Barnes was utterly ignorant of the science of boxing. Besides, although he was nine years older than John, and perhaps a score of pounds heavier, he was in bad condition. He carried too much flesh, his muscles were soft and flabby, and added to this he had been drinking. He never once reached his opponent, while again and again he fell heavily on the floor before the vigorous and well-aimed onslaughts of the boy.

"Have you had enough?" cried John at length.

Barnes was lying on the floor, and did not reply. He was stunned, bleeding, and with the last particle of courage knocked out of him.

"I have not finished with you yet," cried John.

His father had wondered what the parcel John had brought to the hotel contained. He was enlightened now, however, for quick as a thought John produced a fairly heavy horsewhip and while Jenkins was too astonished to protest, he prevented Barnes from rising to his feet.

"Now, Mr. Barnes," said John, "I have about finished with you, but before I kick you out of the room you will tell me where my sister is at this moment."

"I won't," said Barnes with an oath.

"Won't you?" cried the boy. "We'll see, and the whip fell heavily on his prostrate body."

"Help! Jenkins, help!" cried Barnes.

Jeremiah, the Prophet of Courage

JEREMIAH 35:5-14, 18, 19

"Watch ye, stand fast in the faith, quit you like men, be strong."—I Corinthians 16:13.

JEREMIAH is a conspicuous example of the fearlessness which has characterized the prophetic spirit in every age. Called when but a young man, he sought for forty long, eventful years to ward off the doom that threatened Judah by summoning his people to repentance. His task was a most unpleasant one. He suffered many things at the hands of a perverse generation. Nevertheless, he manifested such a sublime fearlessness in the faithful performance of his duty that he becomes for all time a living epistle of courage.

Such a life teaches many lessons. In particular, it indicates the several spheres wherein courage is most needed. It also suggests some of the compensations of courage. And finally, Jeremiah's fearless ministry points out the way to the true source and ground of courage, even God.

Consider the various ways in which Jeremiah's courage manifested itself. Let us begin with his own personal life. By nature this fearless prophet was sensitive and shrinking. He never aspired to stand in the limelight. Ofttimes he bewailed his lot and wished that he had never been born. The words of another tortured soul might well have fallen from the lips of Jeremiah:

"The time is out of joint: O cursed spite,
That ever I was born to set it right."

Yet the Old Testament leader achieved a greater victory over his trembling body than did the irresolute Prince of Denmark. He put a cheerful courage on and blew the trumpet with no uncertain sound. It would have been much easier to stand aloof from the struggle as a sarcastic and cynical observer, rather than to plunge into the fray as an active participant. Yet Jeremiah deliberately linked up his life with that of his people in a heroic attempt to purify the nation. And this took courage of a high order. In an admirable chapter in "The Prophetic Ministry for To-day," Bishop Williams remarks, "Something like this Jeremiah was longing for—to be a social critic, a problem novelist rather than a prophet of God. Then he could unburden his heart and be at ease. Then he could hurl his denunciations with a kind of grim satisfaction and even joy. But as a prophet of God he belonged to the people and they belonged to him. He was one with them in an indissoluble spiritual solidarity." Jeremiah's victory over self is a challenge to the individual to meet his personal problems in a like spirit of joyous courage.

The prophet also exhibited a fearless spirit in his attack upon the corrupt religious customs of his day. The reform movement inaugurated by King Josiah upon the finding of the law book by Hilkiah proved to be very unpopular among Jeremiah's own kin at Anathoth. Yet he came out boldly for the proposed reform, thereby narrowly escaping with his life. Like the Master, the prophet came unto his own and his own received him not. When it became apparent that Josiah's reform had not gone to the root of the matter, Jeremiah took his stand in the gate of the Lord's house. In no uncertain tones he denounced the worship there as a hollow mockery, an offense to God. Unless the people amended their ways the temple would be destroyed. "Is this house, which is called by my name, become a den of robbers in your eyes? Behold, even I have seen it, saith the Lord. But go ye now unto my place which was in Shiloh, where I set my name at the first, and see what I did to it for the wickedness of my people Israel." Such speech was as blasphemy in the minds of the infuriated Jews and once again the prophet stood face to face with death. Undaunted, however, by this reception of his message, Jeremiah sought yet another means of bringing home the truth. He addressed a series of prophetic warnings to King Jehoiakim, which that guilty monarch promptly threw in the fire. Equally promptly the servant of God dictated a second book of woes to the faithful Baruch, "and there were added unto them many like words."

But it was as a prophet to the nation in matters of foreign policy that Jeremiah had to face his severest trial. In this sphere also he revealed his sublimest courage. Because of the wickedness of the people, God was prepared to deliver them over to Nebuchadnezzar. Their only hope lay in repenting of their sins and in meekly accepting their merited chastisement at the hands of God's chosen agent. What a popular message to deliver to a proud and sensitive nation! Yet even in the matter of patriotism Jeremiah hesitated not a single moment. He advised the people to yield to Nebuchadnezzar; he urged them to bow their necks to the foreign yoke. The outraged leaders called him a traitor, flung him into the prison on a false charge of deserting to the enemy, and finally carried him off to Egypt and stoned him to death.

Patriotism is a delicate subject. The hired prophet and the unthinking patriot shout, "My country, right or wrong." The true prophet to a nation follows in the footsteps of Jeremiah. He defends his country when she is in the right, but holds it to be the function of the higher patriotism to condemn her when she is in the wrong. For as Lord Bryce has pointed out, "Patriotism consists not in waving a flag, but in striving that our country shall be righteous as well as strong." America has had ample evidence during the past few years of the reproach that is heaped upon the heads of certain conscientious patriots. But the story of Jeremiah serves to strengthen the wills of those who seek to lead our nation out into larger fields of international service and brotherhood.

Jeremiah's life also suggests some of those compensations which come to those who manifest moral courage. The prophet's reward was not material. His success was not measured by the yardstick of earthly glory. In many ways his work was a failure. His own people rejected him. Religious worship was not purified. The nation disregarded

Unity and Rome*

ROBERT LYND, in one of his gripping essays entitled "Books and Authors," says regarding Mr. Max Beer-bohm: "His work has the perfection of a starched shirt front, which if it is not perfect is nothing. Mr. Beer-bohm takes what may be called an evening-dress view of life."

With genuine respect for the author of "Unity and Rome," his purpose, his chivalry and his brave attitudes, the book insists somehow in reminding one of the evening-dress view of its mighty and compelling theme: in a way faultless, but in no way feverish with the temperature of a great passion.

There is the clean-cut statement that "Unity is the biggest issue in the Christian world to-day;" that "to-day the call is to mutual understanding, and that this can come about only through fair and fearless discussion;" but as we follow the engaging page the exclamation will not down, "Bring on your discussion!" The book moves in the areas of the environment of a specific branch of the Church, is oracular in its announcement, declarative in its judgments, positive in its conclusions.

The author's church is "the church of comprehensiveness," not, to be sure, without some "freckle of the flesh upon its shining cheek," but still having the opportunity of a Via Media, from which the inference could be fairly drawn that the Denominations of the Via dolorosa and the Catholic Church the Via lucis!

For both these last-named churches there is "frank and fearless" and wholesome advice, but for neither the foundation of argumentative discussion on which to establish the kindly and well-intentioned admonitions.

This book is an excellent illustration of the exceeding difficulty of seeing clearly and seeing whole the point of view at a more or less wide remove from our own; for the Denominations would surely question the proportions of his perspective regarding some of their overdone principles of insistence, and one may risk a guess that the Catholic Church would do the same.

One sentence should be quoted, however, as evidencing the sincerity of the purpose of adequate inclusions: "The proponents of the World Conference on Faith and Order have certainly 'started something,' and it is likely to prove a very heart-searching affair—working both ways;" to which a growing company would respond with a loud Amen!

The basic question is, "What is the essence of the Church?" Is it material or spiritual? Is it an institution or an inspiration? In its expression, has the Holy Spirit left Himself without a witness except through fixed and definite historical or apostolical succession? Is authority a superior spiritual asset to fellowship? Is "returning and acknowledging the authority of the Apostolic See" the only possible approach to the inclusion of the unity of the Church? Is Peter or Christ the absolute Master of the situation?

Since it is admitted that "the genius of Christianity and the general tendency of human aspirations are away from imperialism and very much towards enlightened democracy," is it beyond hope that in the presence of the growing appreciation of the comprehensiveness of the presence and work of the Holy Spirit in the "unhappy differences" of the Church, the "imperial fixities" of yesterday, may adjust themselves under the influence of that same timeless Spirit to the requirement and the vision of "enlightened democracy?"

This is a book which will well repay a second reading. The first will be a delight to those who share the author's standpoint: it will be a discipline, a very healthy one, to those otherwise environed; the second will reveal an earnest spirit, sincerely concerned over the sin of schism in the body of Christ, and eagerly looking for the panacea.

There are many who believe it will be found neither in antiquity nor in authority, but in aspiration; that the way back is the way up; that it is the heights, not the history, which reveal the widening horizons, and that new pulsings of the spiritual fellowship between Christ and all His followers will give new significance and sovereignty to the old confession.

"Where Christ is, there is the Church."

Prodigal Daughters

"Now then," laughed John, lifting the whip again, "tell me before I give you a few more."

Barnes muttered the name of the street and the number.

"You have got that down, dad, haven't you? Now then, what's my sister Eleanor's address? Quick!"

Again Barnes spoke. All courage and fight had gone out of him.

"Good," said the boy. "You can get up now."

Barnes slowly rose to his feet, aching in every limb, half blind, his body stinging with pain.

"It has not been an altogether successful interview for you, has it?" laughed John. "Now then, I want to say this to you before I kick you out of the room. I shall have my eye upon you, and if you are unkind to Peg, or if you are up to any of the dirty tricks of which I know you are capable, I will not let you off as lightly as this. Now go."

A minute later the Colonel and his son were alone.

What greater compensation can come to any man than this?

Moreover, he rejoiced in the knowledge that he was serving a noble cause, the salvation of his people. The noble souls of earth who have espoused unpopular causes have meat to eat that others know not of. Whittier was a timid soul like Jeremiah. Surveying the curse of slavery he courageously cast in his lot with the forces of abolition and became a leader. By voice and pen and public service he steadfastly championed the rights of the oppressed.

Such a course cost him political preferment. When he accompanied George Thompson, the English abolitionist, to Concord, New Hampshire, they were stoned and shot at by a mob. In Philadelphia the hall where he published The Pennsylvania Freeman was burned. Yet late in life when giving advice to a fifteen-year-old boy, he said, "My lad, if thou wouldst win success, join thyself to some unpopular but noble cause." The satisfactions that attend a life spent in behalf of righteousness far outweigh the sorrows that must be borne.

It is recorded of the Lord Jesus that he endured the cross for the joy that was set before him.

But the chief blessing that God bestowed upon the suffering Jeremiah was that new sense of religion as a personal communion with the Infinite which came to him as he trod the wine-press alone.

Suffering is ever a source of religious insight. The fearless prophet was driven to the arms of his heavenly Father, and as a result of that fellowship there was given to the world the gospel of the new covenant. "After those days, saith the Lord, I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts." To no other prophet in the Old Testament, Hosea included, was such a spiritual conception of religion revealed as it was to the lonely man of Anathoth. He has well been called the poet of the heart.

RURAL WISDOM

An honest farmer—at least the whole circumstance suggests that he was honest—was pleading with the village banker for a loan on his place. The banker was obdurate. No, he would not consider it. He didn't care anything about the security that the farmer could offer and he had no intention of helping him out. But the farmer continued to plead his cause. Finally the banker, in order to get rid of him, said, "I have one glass eye. If you can tell me which is the glass eye, I will make you the loan." The farmer picked the right eye, which was correct. "How did you know," said the banker. "I picked the one that looked the least unsympathetic."

THE OREGON SCHOOL LAW

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN WORK:

I have taken your paper for many years and have read it with much pleasure and profit. It is seldom that I find anything to criticize in its editorial columns. However, upon opening your number of March 31 my eyes fell upon your editorial entitled "Who Owns the Child, the Parents or the State?" I must confess that I read it with astonishment.

What struck me with peculiar force was the implication of the caption of the editorial and its false assumption. As a matter of civil and moral law, neither the parent or the State owns the child. Neither to-day recognizes or predicates ownership of any human being. The relation is that of trust and duty. The civil law, in this country at least, is to the effect that the highest and best interests of the child is the paramount consideration to determine its right to custody and control when the question comes in controversy. True it is that the law recognizes the reciprocal rights and obligations arising out of the relation of parent and child, but the State may take the child from the parent when he fails to fulfil the obligations arising out of it or forfeits them by misconduct. The very first statement in this editorial is an error

Oregon has most emphatically not decided that the State owns the child. It might as well be said that because the State compels the child's attendance upon the public school at all it asserts ownership of the child.

In the first place, the law was sponsored by the Supreme Council of the Scottish Rite Masons and was promulgated and furthered by the Oregon branch of the order. The Ku Klux Klan did not originate or promulgate it, but that order did support it strongly, and for this the order is entitled to the gratitude of every American citizen who has the welfare of the nation at heart.

The main feature of the former law was that the parent, guardian or other person having the control or charge of a child between the ages of nine and fifteen years must send it to some school for a term or period not less or more than the number of months of public school held annually in the district in which the parent, guardian or other person lived. There were some exceptions to this general provision, but they are not vital to the present question. By the law just passed the person having the custody and control of the child between the ages of eight and sixteen must send it to the public school for the term or period of the public school in the district where the person lives. The important amendments, therefore, are the requirements that it must attend the public school and the change as to the ages included. The most vital change will thus be seen to be the requirement of the child's attendance upon the public school, and was the moving purpose of the amendment.

It is a question that will not down, and it behooves every person having his country's welfare at heart to put himself in line with those who are friends of measures that will foster American principles of freedom of thought and freedom of conscience.

ON DR. J. T. SUNDERLAND'S LETTER

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN WORK:

I was much interested in J. T. Sunderland's exposition of Unitarianism, and particularly in his interpretation of certain passages from the New Testament in support of his contention that Jesus was God incarnate only in the same sense as all other men are. There should be no dispute to-day over the fact that the letters of the New Testament were written to those whom Paul would have said were "in Christ Jesus," and are therefore somewhat exclusive. There is a sense in which all men may be spoken of as "sons of God," but the emphasis of the gospels and epistles is that sonship is an ethical not a natural relationship. "As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God," says Paul. To certain who were claiming sonship by inheritance Jesus said, "Ye are of your father the devil." John 8:38-42 is a good illustration of the way in which Jesus thought of sonship to God. He said to them, "Ye do the works of your father." They replied, "God is our Father." Then Jesus said, "If God were your Father, ye would love me." There are four marks of sonship which Jesus gives: 1. Children love their father. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God." 2. Children obey their father. "He who belongs to God hears my word." "Whosoever does the will of my heavenly Father the same is my brother and sister." "Not everyone that saith Lord, Lord, but he that doeth the will of my Father." 3. Children trust the heavenly Father. "Take no anxious thought . . . father knows you have need." 4. Children, try to be like the heavenly Father. "Love your enemies, and pray for those that persecute you that ye may be the sons of your Father."

It will be clear from these and many other passages that sonship with God is an ethical relation, and we are sons of God only when we are filial. God is our Father because He acts towards us in a fatherly way, and we are His sons when we act in a sonly way. To those is given "the right to become sons of God."

When Peter speaks of persons being "partakers of the divine nature" he was not speaking about all men, but merely those Christians to whom he wrote as the context will clearly show. When John says, "Now are we the sons of God," he was not speaking about all mankind, as Mr. Sunderland assumes, but about his fellow disciples of Jesus. When he mentions others he says, "The whole world lieth in wickedness." A very rapid reading of the letter in which this passage occurs will convince any candid reader that John had in mind only those who were "born from above." When Jesus said, "My Father and your Father, my God and your God," he was speaking to the inner circle who were doing the will of God. The whole seventeenth chapter of John, from which many quotations are made by Mr. Sunderland, was spoken to God and had to do with "those whom thou hast given me" and with "those who should believe on me through give to the Sunday-school teacher inspiring and practical insight into the essential spiritual messages of the International Uniform Lessons. The book consists of a series of short expository sermons on the lessons by such leading American preachers as Francis E. Clark, W. E. Barton, Charles Reynolds Brown, William Elliot Griffis, Cornelius H. Patton, John E. Tuttle, and others.

Dr. Frederick Lynch, editor of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, says in a recent letter:

"The other day The Monday Club Sermons for 1923 happened to come to my hand, and I was very much impressed both by the list of contributors, and by the unusually fine standard of the execution."

Dr. Lynch has arranged with us to run The Monday Club Sermons serially in THE CHRISTIAN WORK, beginning with the January 27th issue. their word." He specifically says that he is not praying for the world (humanity), but for those given him "out of the world." I think it must be said in all candor that one cannot accept the Gospel according to John, and quote from it in support of any creed, without seeing that according to it Jesus does differ himself from humanity. He does, there claim to be the Son of God in a unique sense, and "no man can come to the Father except through him." The fifth and sixth, not to speak of the third chapter of that gospel, can mean nothing else. If one is trying to equal Jesus with all humanity in his divineness, and prove it from the New Testament, it would be well to rule out all writings ascribed to John, which is the course taken by those who make out a plausible case.

RELIGION AND THE NATION

The force of religion on a nation's destiny was emphasized by Calvin Coolidge, Vice-President of the United States, in an address in April before the New York State Convention of the Young Men's Christian Association. The strength of America, the strength of all civilized society, he asserted, was in its religious convictions.

"They are not a power which is diminishing," he said, "but a power which is increasing. The standard of conduct which they require was never before so universally recognized and accepted. It sanctifies every place of worship, it is revealed in every institution of learning, it supports every activity of government, it sustains every economic structure. In domestic affairs, in international affairs, it is more and more the reliance of mankind. The evidences of it are increasing, the results of it are accumulating. More and more the people are living under the conviction that it is righteousness alone which exalteth the nation.

VIGOROUS RELIGION

In his vigorous speech before the Inter-denominational Ministers Meeting in New York, April 30, Dr. Cadman told of an Irishman who had been attending Billy Sunday's recent meetings in the South. Someone protested to him, "You ought not to go to those meetings. You're a Roman Catholic."

"I like them," answered the son of Erin. "That's why I go. I don't like Billy's preaching, but I like one of the songs they sing. They sing it every night—'Fight in the Corner Where You Are.'"

GOOD-WILL IN JERUSALEM

"No other city on the far-flung line of the Young Men's Christian Association could stage such an affair," writes a representative of the International Committee, Young Men's Christian Association, who attended the annual "At Home" of the Jerusalem Young Men's Christian Association this spring. "It was," he states, "a unique demonstration of the international, inter-racial and interdenominational work of our brotherhood, and, withal, a glowing tribute to the extraordinary genius and skill of Dr. A. C. Harte, the American secretary of the Jerusalem Association."

THE RUHR SITUATION

The situation in the Ruhr becomes more of a menace as each day goes by and so far little seems to have been accomplished. The interesting thing is that a very decided sentiment is rapidly growing throughout the world that the only possible way of ever coming to a successful and permanent settlement of the difficulty lies in transferring the whole dispute to the League of Nations or some impartial commission to be chosen by the French and Germans. It is interesting to note that various bodies throughout the world are passing resolutions to this effect. The World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches, which met at Zurich in April, where there were many eminent leaders of the churches present, including those from France and Germany, passed a very strong resolution to this effect which was carried to the headquarters of the League at Geneva personally by a delegation from Zurich. One American was in this delegation, Prof. William Adams Brown of Union Theological Seminary, New York. Almost at the same time the Congregational Council of England and Wales passed a similar strong resolution. The Labor party in England has already passed such resolutions, and as we write, in one of the letters which Lord Robert Cecil is writing to the "New York Times" on his impressions of America, he earnestly urges this same course. There is little doubt that Lord Robert Cecil fairly reflects England's sentiments in this matter.

THE GERMAN REPARATIONS OFFER

The London agreement fixed the amount which Germany should pay for reparations at one hundred and thirty-two billion gold marks. Germany accepted that decision, and then began to try to run away from it. Her failure to keep up the promised payments led to the seizure of the Ruhr by France and Belgium, acting under the Treaty of Versailles. The German Government ordered a passive resistance in the occupied districts. Last week, the German Chancellor, Cuno, made a nominal offer of thirty-two billion gold marks for reparations, but as Cuno himself remarked, the sum was more or less "elastic." Cuno's scheme provided for foreign loans. If foreign nations were unwilling to supply the money the total reparations would fall short by so much. Later in the week Lord Curzon in the course of a speech which was understood to represent the opinion of the British Government, urged that all the great allies join in the reply to Cuno's proposal. But the French and Belgians were eager to make a very prompt answer, and they did not want to imply that Cuno's offer should be regarded as even discuss-able. Accordingly, they did not wait until Italy and Great Britain would unite in the note to the German Government, but at the beginning of this week, sent to the Germans a very decided negative. When one compares the French behavior in 1871, when the peasants went down into their own pockets and loaned the Government five billion francs for the indemnity to Germany, which had to be assured before the Germans would leave the soil of France—when one compares the action of France fifty years ago with the action of Germany to-day, he is driven to feel that the French are very considerably justified in the action they are taking. The Germans are still trying to wriggle out of making the sacrifices which they ought to make in simple justice. Would that men like the best type of German Socialists, such as Eduard Bernstein, were in power in Germany.

AMERICA AND THE WORLD COURT

The present status of the agitation to have America participate in the World Court is about as follows: The President has made his opening address in New York City, a statesmanlike presentation of the whole thing. He is following this up by various public statements and letters in which he intimates his purpose to stand unyielding for the program he has advocated. He is to present the World Court in the transcontinental tour which he is to make. There has been an unexpected antagonism to it, mostly proceeding from those within his own party. Senator Borah opposes it because, to his mind, it does not go far enough and is not a real court; Senator Johnson opposes it because he opposes any relationship to Europe whatever; other Senators and publicists are opposing it on the ground that it is a part of the League of Nations. So far as can be determined from the daily press and from the correspondence in this office the opposition is largely confined to these men. People at large seem receptive to the President's suggestions. When all is said, it is difficult to realize how anybody can object to it, it is such a harmless scheme. Our relation to it is simply that we assist in selecting judges and pay our share of the expense. It does not commit us to participation in European affairs in the slightest way; although it does mean not only recognition of the League of Nations, but participation in its assembly so far as the election of judges is concerned. It is hard to see how this can hurt us.

THE CAMPAIGN FOR INTERNATIONAL CO-OPERATION

The Joint Campaign for International Co-operation came to a successful close last week, to be resumed early in the fall. Senator Everett Colby of New Jersey and Dr. Frederick Lynch visited the churches, ministerial associations, chambers of commerce, business men's clubs, women's clubs and other organizations from Kansas City to Duluth. They spoke in an average of five times a day and everywhere met with very cordial response. Both Senator Colby and Dr. Lynch could not help feeling that there was a decidedly awakening interest in America's co-operation with the other nations of the world in restoring order out of chaos and setting the European nations upon their feet, and above all, establishing a more Christian world order on the ruins of the old. In almost all of these meetings questions were asked and answered. Our readers will be interested in hearing that most of the questions referred to the attitude of the United States toward the League of Nations, showing that through the great Middle West interest in America's participation in the League is still very much alive. On the matter of the World Court there seemed to be no division of opinion whatever.

LORD ROBERT CECIL ON HIS VISIT TO AMERICA

Since his return to England, Lord Robert Cecil has written a series of articles on his impressions of America's attitude toward international questions and particularly toward the League of Nations. He found that the tendency in America to-day is away from isolation in world affairs. As he pungently put it, "The truth is that isolation, whether desirable or undesirable, is quite impracticable, and that is recognized by almost every serious person in the United States." Not only by virtue of our experience in 1917, but on account of our interest in commercial developments everywhere and by our humanitarian feeling, we are as a people convinced that we are concerned in what goes on in all the world. Lord Robert found that our agricultural and cotton interests recognize that the price of their products depends largely on external markets and such markets depend on the economic condition of foreign nations. Very many of our own "irreconcilables" are beginning to doubt gravely, as Lord Robert comments, "Whether an attitude of Olympian observation, coupled with the offer of advice and occasional interference in the affairs of other nations, is really a very good way in which to exert American influence in foreign affairs. They feel that it leads or may lead to the greatest amount of international friction with the least advantage to international peace of any course that they can adopt." The love of peace both in abstract and as an object of national policy, he finds, at least as strong in this country as in any other country in the world. "Americans, he comments, have no belief that you can promote peace by force, and any suggestion of a return to the old system of group alliances, balance of power and competitive armaments is altogether repellant to their mode of thought." Lord Robert, of course, was pleased by Senator Pepper's conversion to support of the League, due to Lord Robert's presentation of its work. As for the Senator's suggestion that the League be definitely deprived of all powers to enforce its decision by military means, Lord Robert would be perfectly ready to drop Article X from the League Covenant, which does not, as he understands it, in effect involve the use of force, but he would retain Article XVI. Article XVI provides for the use of the blockade against a recalcitrant country. If the United States would recognize the legality of such a blockade, it would be effective even though this country took no part in enforcing it.

LORD ROBERT'S CONCLUSIONS

"I came away from America," says Lord Robert Cecil, "as convinced as I was before I went that sooner or later the United States would join the League in some form or other." If the French Government were ready to submit its difficulties with Germany to the League, the organization would be immensely strengthened. That failure is the only thing which is holding the League back seriously now, to Lord Robert's mind. "But in any case, the League," he prophesies, "will become the sole international authority in Europe and the world. All countries desiring to take part in international affairs will have to use the League machinery for that purpose, for there will be no other of importance." It is, therefore certain that sooner or later, the United States will join the League. The only question is when. The sooner, the better, to his mind, for he considers that the ideas of America on international affairs are broadly speaking sound and perhaps, sounder than those of any other country. "She looks at them with greater impartiality, less hampered by bad traditions, more genuinely convinced that war is a senseless method of settling international disputes." But while he has no doubt of our sooner or later entering the League, he counsels the rest of the world "not to be diverted from the main task of building up the League to be a great instrument of international peace and progress while perpetually looking over their shoulders to see what America is doing."

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

THE TWENTIETH CENTURY GOOD SAMARITAN

On Sunday, May 20, there gathered together in the City of Washington several thousand men and women who came from every State in the Union, from large cities and from country districts, people who are working to make their communities better, cleaner, happier, and more wholesome places to live in. There were among them ministers, doctors, teachers, nurses, judges and court officers, city and State officials; editors, employers, labor leaders, settlement and home service workers, and many others whose business it is to stand by "when a fellow needs a friend." The occasion of their coming together is the annual meeting of the organization to which they belong—the National Conference of Social Work. What is "social work" and what has it to do with the Church or the Sunday-school? Let us recall a very old story: A certain man went down from Jerusalem and Jericho and fell among thieves, which stripped him of his raiment and wounded him and departed leaving him half dead. And by chance there came down a certain priest that way; and when he saw him he passed by on the other side. And likewise a Levite when he was at the place came and looked on him and passed by the other side. But a certain Samaritan as he journeyed came where he was; and when he saw him he had compassion of him and went to him and bound up his wounds, pouring in oil and wine, and set him on his own beast and brought him to an inn and took care of him. And on the morrow when he departed he took out two pence and gave them to the host and said to him, "Take care of him and whatsoever thou spendest more when I come again I will repay thee." The hero of this narrative might be called the first "social worker" whose story has been preserved to us. But, of course, he was acting all alone—he had no organization to help him. Then, too, what this good neighbor did was very meager from the modern point of view. He had to pour oil and wine on the sick man's wounds; antiseptics were unknown and drugs were rare. He had to take his patient to an inn; there was no hospital. He had to go warily forward on his road as thieves were still abroad on the dangerous highways about Jerusalem. Unorganized industrial conditions, shocking standards of living with lack of all public safety regulations made thieves and desperadoes even of decent men in those days. The good neighbor acted single-handed; to-day we are able to act together for the common good in service founded on knowledge and tested by experience. Social work means playing the "good neighbor," but in a much greater variety of ways than were known two thousand years ago. The fact that it is often done in great hospitals and schools and laboratories and parish houses does not make it any less personal or religious. The great size of our cities and the multitude of our problems simply increase the opportunities for neighborliness and fellowship. Cannot young people who have been studying fields of Christian service in church and Sunday-school bring to the social tasks of our day a touch of personal devotion which grows out of the spirit and fellowship of the Christian Church? But the social work to-day has added something very important to what the Good Samaritan did. He handled the unfortunate man whom thieves had set upon, in the only way he could—as an "ambulance case." The harm was done and the thieves were gone; the good neighbor could only care for the victim. Nowadays, social workers do not rest content without an effort at prevention and reconstruction. In the language of the parable they are just as anxious to clear out the thieves of the Jericho road as to rescue the victim after the harm is done. This is why we hear so much about health education, the prevention of vice, better factory conditions and better relations between labor and capital. Social work aims not merely at helping individuals, important as that is, but also through individuals and groups, at making our cities and towns the kind of places where health triumphs over disease, comfort over poverty, virtue over vice, and good-will over strife.

MEMORIAL DAY UNION SERVICES IN THE CHURCHES

September last a commission consisting of Rev. Chauncey W. Goodrich, Rev. Charles S. Macfarland (Reserve Chaplain) and Rev. Charles E. Jefferson, chairman, representing the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, visited the American cemeteries in France. In rendering their report to the Administrative Committee of the Federal Council this commission made recommendations for the completion of plans for these cemeteries; the association of chaplains in the permanent care of these cemeteries as representing the churches and the nation; that "Memorial Day services under the auspices of the Council in behalf of the American churches and people be held in all these cemeteries"; and that "the churches at home join in this special remembrance on each Memorial Day under the direction, where possible, of the Reserve and National Guard chaplains as union services." The General Committee in Army and Navy Chaplains has been in conference with representatives in Europe arranging for the observance of Memorial Day in the American cemeteries of France and Belgium. It is earnestly desired that in our own country, wherever possible, union Memorial Day services be held in the churches to definitely pay tribute to our sons whose bodies rest in these cemeteries across the seas. It is eminently appropriate that these services be in charge of chaplains of the Army or Navy, either Regular, Reserve or National Guard, or at least that some chaplain have place on the program. There will be formal parades, visits to cemeteries and varied civic and military recognition of the day in communities throughout the nation, but place can and should be made for a union service in some church in every community, thus definitely relating the church to this sacred memorial and giving it the atmosphere of religion. We urge that this be done. The General Committee on Army and Navy Chaplains, through its office, 937 Woodward Building, Washington, D. C., will be glad to render all possible aid in such a program. If in any community preparing a program it is desired to have name and addresses of chaplains who are or may be available the General Committee on Army and Navy Chaplains will be pleased to send such to anyone applying. "Dulce et decorum est pro patria mori." Cherishing the memory of all those who have given their lives in patriotic service we would make this Memorial Day memorable in its contribution to religion and patriotism.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

THE EPISCOPAL BISHOPS AN AMNESTY

Appeals for amnesty for the political prisoners have gone to the President from fifty-four Protestant Episcopal bishops in every section of the country—from Maine, Massachusetts and Connecticut, from North and South Carolina, from Texas, Colorado and Minnesota, from California and Idaho, and so on. One comes from the Bishop of Porto Rico and another from Bishop Logan H. Roots of Hankow, China, who is at present in the United States. Bishop Brent's reasons for advocating amnesty which the other bishops endorse are: "(1) The nations with whom we were associated in the war all promptly granted an amnesty to their political prisoners; (2) I am assured by competent lawyers who have examined the evidence in the case that these men are in prison solely for expression of opinion in writing or speech; (3) this is a fitting moment in which to grant them an unconditional amnesty as an act of delayed justice; (4) my observation leads me to believe that such a course would meet with the unqualified support of the vast majority of our citizens." Bishop Du Moulin of Ohio writes: "I am more than glad to ask you to add my name to such an appeal, as I feel very strongly in sympathy with Bishop Brent's position in the matter and desire to follow his lead." The bishops in all three States where groups of political prisoners were tried and sentenced, i.e., Illinois, Kansas and California, are most desirous of the release of all the groups of prisoners in the free speech class. Bishop Charles P. Anderson of Chicago, who has advocated amnesty for some time, urges that there be no further delays in granting it. Bishop James Wise of Kansas telegraphed the President: "I respectfully urge you as National Executive to grant amnesty to all war-time political prisoners being held for expressions of opinion. Believe such action at this time would meet cordial approval of big majority of American citizens." Four California bishops, Bishop W. Bertram Stevens of Los Angeles, Bishop J. W. Johnson also of Los Angeles, Bishop Sanford of Fresno and Bishop Edward L. Parsons of San Francisco petition for unconditional amnesty. Bishop Stevens wrote President Harding, saying: "I am glad to add my name to the list of those appealing for an unconditional amnesty to remaining political prisoners. There are many of us who feel that the time has come when such action should be taken. I believe that it would be welcomed by everyone regardless of political opinion. I am sure you will understand my sending a message of this sort, as the matter seems to me to be a very vital one." Bishop Johnson wrote: "I am one of a large number of American citizens who would be greatly pleased were you to grant an unconditional amnesty to the political prisoners who are still incarcerated at various places in the United States. A strong sense of justice compels me to press this matter, as other bishops of our Church have done and are doing. With the strong conviction that we all have that a great nation can protect itself from any menace that is likely to emanate from the prisoners to whom I refer, we feel that the time has come when this nation can afford to be magnanimous."

The great movement out of the Roman Catholic Church in Czechoslovakia has become familiar to us all. There is now, of course, the steady need of training the new Evangelicals. The whole movement is well illustrated in the record of the work of one man, Rev. J. W. Dobias, who was sent from this country through a special fund last year. He has charge of five different congregations about Domazlice. Practically all his people came out of the Church of Rome within the last few years. In Domazlice his congregation numbers approximately five hundred, in Nova Kdyně two thousand five hundred, and in the three other smaller towns two hundred each. In addition to the preaching services and mid-week meetings, Mr. Dobias has to take care of the religious instruction of the children, which in Czechoslovakia is carried on as a part of the public school system. The people respond most warmly to his ministry. These new converts are enthusiastic and interested. Of course, they need very careful shepherding, because they have no Protestant background at all, and very little knowledge of the Bible or of the Protestant conception of the church and its work. The congregations at present meet in school buildings. Probably the local people will be able to make some sort of church building for themselves ere long, but in the meanwhile American friends need to support such men as Mr. Dobias. Of course, the Protestant Church of Czechoslovakia will be quite self-supporting in due time.

In the fourth annual report of the Institute of International Education, Stephen P. Duggan, director, announces that an agreement has been reached between the Commissioner of Immigration at Ellis Island, Mr. Robert E. Tod, and the Institute whereby the entrance of bona fide students to this country will be allowed even though the quota of the student's country has been exhausted. Since the present immigration law makes no provision for foreign students coming to this country, a good many deserving applicants were at first refused because the quota of their country had been exhausted. Later these surplus numbers were allowed to enter under bond, but this resulted in some impostors declaring themselves students in order to gain admission to this country.

At a lecture on the origin of man in the Mormon Tabernacle at Ogden this spring, Apostle John Widtsoe, former president of the University of Utah and a Mormon in good standing, gave some sound advice, which we wish every Christian minister and layman had courage enough to give. "You Mormons," he said in effect, "must be open-minded to see the fruits of education, not to be afraid of science, and to expect to find truth both in science and in revelation." While Mormons who accept such counsel will not always regard Joseph Smith as a trustworthy channel of revelation neither will Christians who accept it remain "literalists."

Gifts Unto the Lord: The Leavings

NOT long ago we sat in the pulpit of a large church waiting for the time for us to preach the sermon. Suddenly our eyes were caught by the motto carved on the wooden offertory plates which rested on the table beneath us: "Gifts for the Lord." Then the offering was received and while the pastor was dedicating the gifts to God's service we glanced into the plates. There was a big congregation present; there were a few quarters, dimes and nickels and many pennies in the plate with its inscription, "Gifts for the Lord."

It set us to thinking at the time. Was the Lord simply getting the leavings—the left-overs of life—and we and the world getting the big, great things, and the real gifts of both our money and our interests? We have not been able to get the question out of our minds—hence this asking of it here. For this church was no exception. Everyone knows that the offerings of the average congregation is a small collection of pennies and ten-cent pieces. It has become a standing joke. Many of the people drop something in because they are ashamed not to. They put in as little as they can. Again and again the plate comes back from its journey of collection through a big congregation of people in comfortable circumstances with a mere pittance in it. Men who spend five dollars a week on cigars put a quarter in the plate. Women who spend five dollars a week for theater tickets put in a quarter. Young men and women who spend a dollar on movies or ice cream sodas put a penny in the plate. Many a man will go to church in the morning and put a quarter in the plate and then take the family into the country in a car, buy dinner for all at an expensive inn and burn up two or three dollars worth of gas. It would be very interesting to take any average congregation and after deducting what each member spent for his household expenses see what proportion of the balance went on self—for amusements, theaters, cigars, pleasure trips, country clubs, etc., and what proportion went to the church. Let any reader of these words ask himself, how much of my income above household expenses goes for "gifts for the Lord," how much for "gifts for myself?" Is the Lord simply getting the leavings of our money? Sometimes it looks as though that was all. There lies on our table a pitiful plea of a foreign missionary society for a small sum, as money goes in America—$300,000. The work—and it is a splendid work—must be retrenched unless this sum can be raised. (A great British missionary society had almost to go out of business two years ago for lack of funds.) This $300,000 could be raised by contribution of the money the members of this denomination will spend on amusement and pleasure seeking in a week. What a leap forward the Kingdom will take when the Lord gets the big sums and we keep the leavings for ourselves.

We once attended a football match where we were told there were sixty thousand people present. We never saw such enthusiasm in our lives. The twenty-two players were fairly calm—faces grim, set and determined—although they were putting all the brain and muscle they had into the game. But the vast crowd acted like a pack of wild men. They yelled themselves hoarse. They almost leaped over the rails into the oval. There was enough enthusiasm vented to have put a national reform over, had it been turned in that direction and lengthened out a little. Of course, half the men had bet on the outcome and that accounted for their delirium; but the other half were simply enthusiastic for their college to win and were lending their aid. Previously they had all spent exorbitant sums for seats. Now we imagine a large proportion of that crowd of sixty thousand were church people. It may have been out of place there, but we could not help wondering what would happen in the local church, in the missionary work of the denomination, in the Kingdom at large, if one-tenth of the enthusiasm vented on that game should be put into the work of the Lord. Is the Lord getting only the leavings of our enthusiasms as well as the leavings of our money? It is a very serious question at just this time when civilization is in such a bad state and the one question before the world is this: Is it to be Christ or chaos?

We were staying with a friend not long ago and his wife said to us in confidence: "Do you know George can't wait until Saturday comes, he is so crazy to get to the golf links. He is as devoted to golf as a lover to his mistress." Our first thought was—George being a member of the church in good and regular standing—whether George "could not wait until Sunday came, so crazy was he to worship God." How much of our real devotion is to God and the things of God, how much to the world? Does God get as much outpouring of our heart in prayer and worship as the favorite amusement gets of our thought and interest? Do we put as much thought on God during the week as we do on a hundred other things? Is our religion a full, continuous, abiding thing, permeating not only our actions, but our thoughts, or is it merely the incident of life—a hymn and sermon on Sunday? Is our evening prayer a perfunctory thing after a day spent in tiring devotion to business, the fag-end of our soul's endeavors? It is the same question, Is the Lord getting only the leavings of our devotion, other things getting the great sum of them, and their unwearied strength?

It was with this danger in mind that Christ told the rich young man to sell his goods. It was no condemnation of riches, but the fear that the young man would give the riches his full, glorious youth and the Kingdom of God only the leavings. It was the knowledge on Christ's part of the temptation of work and play to consume the full enthusiasm and devotion of the soul, while He got only the leavings, that led Him to say so often that truly to follow Him one must put many things we love and cherish now out of our lives. The saint is made not more by his sinlessness and purity than by the fact that his chief enthusiasms and devotions are for God and His Kingdom. F. L.

Solving an Old Problem

LET us make a science of the application of religion to the every-day life. Let us turn each church into a spiritual hospital, or perhaps hospital and school combined, and let each minister be changed into a physician of the soul. His sermons and leadership are merely the means to bring about the accomplished fact, the healing of the soul.

The medical science, dealing with the body, is fairly well developed. Psychology is gradually crystallizing more and more into a definite science; and so let ministers be trained to know not only God's mind, but man's mind, and even his body, that they may know how to harmonize man's actions with God's truth.

For each man who comes to him let the minister be able to read the man's temperament, and so far as he is able to receive light, to give him light. Show him where he is weak, how he can be strong: Destroy his superstitions, set his feet on the rock of truth. And later, when the patient has another need, or he meets complications in his life that blind him to the right path, let him come again for further help.

At first, of course, this definite science of right living, this harmonizing of man's spirit with God's, and its practical application to each man's need must be worked out, perhaps much of it must be discovered. The wheat of truth must be separated from the tares of error and trivialities; but let it be made as much of an exact science as that of medicine. And here is part of the minister's work for to-day—this discovering of what must be done to perfect the new science.

Then let the people be trained to understand their need for this personal application of a religious science in their lives. This, too, is the work of the minister; for as doctors of medicine have trained the public to appreciate the need at times for examination and guidance for physical welfare, so must persons be trained to understand their need for help in this far more important matter of spiritual welfare.

Perhaps we hear someone saying, "People will never take any personal spiritual advice from ministers." It is probable that some never will, for many heretofore have been too proud to go for such advice. Doctors have had to meet these same conditions and to overcome them. Still many to-day will not listen to the man of medical science, but instead will run around to different faddists of healing. But more persons are appreciating the value of the science of medicine and what it is doing, and more are turning to it for help for physical ills than ever before.

There are, and there will be, faddists in the religious life, but gradually a definite science will win its proper place as its truth becomes apparent.

Therefore, let Christians be trained to go to the minister for religious help, not as a man goes to a priest, tabulating what he considers his sins, and getting what he thinks is forgiveness; nor yet as a man goes to his Protestant pastor, telling him with shame and agony something of his life, and getting prayers and a call upon God for forgiveness, and yet perhaps with a subconscious feeling that his pastor really scorns him for his weakness, his vileness. But let him go as to a wise physician, subject to the same ills as his patient, but understanding those ills, is able to diagnose and able to help.

John Wesley had an inkling of what was needed in men's lives when he instituted the class meeting. Doubtless he got this idea from his mother's way of dealing with her children, for each child in this family had an appointed time for a serious talk with the mother, when spiritual instruction was given. Wesley must have realized that so-called conversion was merely an attitude of mind in desiring goodness or righteousness. But the whole process of incorporating righteousness into the life—that continual struggle after what is decent and good—comes after a man's conversion or the decision to do right. And the science of understanding a man's soul has been so undeveloped that the class meeting never filled the need. Its failure proved the religious science of the day to be as embryonic and as clumsy as the medical science was a hundred years ago. Yet the class meeting served a purpose at a certain time; but where is the Wesley to-day who will develop this new religious science?

There is a strong analogy between the physical mental and spiritual natures. There is also a strong analogy in their treatments. At the present time the healing of the insane in hospitals is looked upon as the correct scientific method, rather than the old idea of imprisonment, and an equally scientific method applied to the soul will reach still deeper into lives. But since the physical intellectual and spiritual natures are so interwoven with each other the minister must understand the sciences pertaining to the body and the mind in order to administer his own, the science of the spirit, to the best advantage. The doctor, the psychologist and the minister should all work together, each one a specialist in his own field, and each one able to understand when his patient would require treatment at the hands of a co-worker.

There can be no more community religion than there can be community health of the body. There can be community sanitation which is conducive to good health, and there can be a community attitude toward the moral life which may make it easier for each individual to keep God's commandments; but genuine health of soul, as well as health of body, is, and ever will be, in the last analysis, an individual matter only.

On every hand you hear people say, "So-and-So ought not to be in the church." If all the So-and-Sos were taken out, who would remain? But if you think of the church as a hospital for the healing of the soul, a different face is put on the matter; for only one thing is necessary in a hospital, and that is a sincere desire on the part of the patient to get well. Sometimes it is a hard matter to make a man understand that he is spiritually unfit, as we know that everybody is likely to be blinded to his own faults, his own besetting sin, and he does not enjoy having the veil lifted so he can see his own sin face to face. But almost every man is in love with at least one virtue. When he is in love with all the virtues, and harmonizes with them his love for his physical and intellectual life, he is in love with God. The man who can be brought to no sense of right and wrong in his life is morally feeble, and has no more right to propagate than the man who is mentally feeble. High intellectual gifts and a feeble moral nature are scarcely compatible; but if such could be found to exist in an individual, that person should be prevented from having heirs the same as the one who is feeble of mind. The world has too long bowed down in worship at the shrine of the soulless intellect.

Along with individual diagnosis and treatment from the minister will come strong, definite statements from the pulpit dealing with the spiritual side of the whole life of man. A minister perhaps will talk on "The Causes and Effects of Anger," "The Necessity of Honesty," "Forgiveness," "Symptoms of a Run-Down Soul," "Psychology and Pseudo-Psychology, or Fads and Truth," "The Sin of the Capitalist and Laborer," "Knowledge on Proper Mating," "The Training of Children for the Kingdom of Heaven," and so on. People will come to hear such a minister talk from the pulpit and will come to him personally, because they will get that concrete help—that light—which they will be able to get nowhere else. They will learn to look forward in their lives, learn how to "get life, and not to let life get them." The science of the soul will be broad and deep and high—as broad as humanity, as deep as man's soul, as high as God. And it will tax all the powers of a strong man to dispense it wisely.

Possibly to some this idea will seem to be trying to convert into a science what is, in reality, a very simple matter. Some may think the path of life, with all its complications, is, nevertheless, so plain that "wayfaring men, though fools, shall not err therein." Rather, let us through science make the "Way of holiness" easy. If it is all so simple, then what need have we for ministers at all? Or possibly we need them only to give general direction to the way we are to take, to point the path we are to choose. But note that the greatest influence the world can possibly have in shaping decisions comes early in a child's life, and from the parents. If the decision to do right is all that is really needed, and the rest of life is very simple—too simple, in fact, to be reduced to a science—then the mission of the Church is narrowed to only those people whose spiritual determination has been neglected by their parents.

But if in addition to the individual decision to do right—which is justly considered the one thing necessary for uniting with the church—one is supposed to receive guidance in the affairs of life in a most general way, then we are back at our starting point; for to those who wish it this general guidance in right living can be found in books and magazines, and chiefly in the Bible itself. For those who do not care to read, but who receive truth more readily through the ear, the Church as it now exists may still have a mission; but it narrows its usefulness to persons of a particular type.

To-day ministers are being told to study farming because so many of their flocks, especially in the rural districts, are vitally interested in farming. One might as well tell the doctors to study fashions because so many of their patients are vitally interested in this subject. Such an idea is enough to make the angels weep, and we might with equal sense tell school teachers to study hair-dressing and lawyers to learn brick-laying. Let everything be topsy-turvy and no man know his own business, but plenty about the other man's.

But is this taking up of farming on the part of ministers a plain way of telling the world that they have no business of their own, nothing more than a dried-up, out-of-date theology, and that to all practical purposes the minister knows not much more of the science of right living, no more how to give individual guidance over the steep and thorny way of life, than the man who comes to hear him? Soon the farmer will know his own science of farming. Then in what science or art will the minister indulge in order to attract to him country or city parishioners?

Is it a dream that the time will come when each person might be able to get just the help he needs in his own life, so that he would not bruise his wings or break his heart on the rock of experience? When he would be able, through another's guidance, to look ahead in his life, to "get life, and not let life get him"? Or if he should sin, could he learn how to take sin the right way, so that it might, through the knowledge gained, build up to a stronger character, and not tear down to something weaker?

If there cannot be more and more personal direction regarding the right and wrong of every question entering into life, and of every condition of life, then the Church will gradually lose more and more power among men. But still we believe, and still we hope. We believe it is October with the churches; and if it is October, then let us say with Mark Sabre, "It is not 'Take down. It is done.' It is 'Take down. It is beginning.'"

The General Assembly at Indianapolis

THE Presbyterians this year followed the example set by their Baptist brethren last year and met in Indianapolis.

Indianapolis itself is an attractive town. It is a real capital. It gives one very much the sense that it is the chief city of its region. Indeed, the stranger would find it hard to tell why the city should exist except that Indiana needed a capital.

Those whose taste lies in superlatives declare that Indianapolis is the biggest city in the world not on a waterway. We cannot vouch for the truth of the statement.

But to our muttons. For some years several of the Presbyterian boards and agencies have held conferences at the Assembly city before the meeting of the judicatory one of the organizations which hold such a meeting is the Home Missions Council. This Council is composed of an elected representative from each Synod. Last year Dr. U. L. Mackey superintendent of Synodical Missions in New York, urged on the Council the great need of looking out for the emotional equipment of the seminary student. THE CHRIS-TIAN WORK printed an article by Dr. Mackey embodying his suggestion. That suggestion led to much interesting discussion. This year also Dr. Mackey made the most significant contribution to the Council's program. He took up the problem which has been discussed in extenso in our columns following Rev. J. C. Berry's article on "The Gap in the Wall." Dr. Mackey suggests that we help close that gap by a system of following and recording the work of each individual minister, and then making these confidential records available to churches which are seeking pastors. We shall publish Dr. Mackey's article in due time.

This year's Assembly began, according to regular custom, with a sermon by the retiring Moderator (we print Dr. Hays' sermon this week), followed by a communion service. Although there are fifteen Presbyterian churches in Indianapolis, the opening session of the Assembly met in the First Baptist Church on account of its size and convenience. Dr. Taylor, the distinguished pastor of the church, is retiring president of the Northern Baptist Convention this year. He gave the service an atmosphere of Christian unity by assisting in the dispensation of the elements at the communion.

The significant part of the Moderator's sermon was his plea for the spirit of unity. Time and again later speakers referred to that plea.

On the afternoon of Wednesday comes the election of the Moderator. This year one of the candidates was a man known the world around. A great many men high in the councils of the Church had urged Mr. Bryan not to run. The Presbyterian Church is just now reorganizing all its boards. Also, the issue of liberty of thought has come before the Church through the objections to Dr. Fosdick's preaching in the First Presbyterian Church in New York. It was not the time for the representative of any extreme wing in the Church to be Moderator.

Other years, when there has been talk of Mr. Bryan's running for Moderator, he always let it be understood that he would not be a candidate unless he was nominated by acclamation. He has absented himself from the Assembly several times for the first afternoon because he did not want his name presented.

This year he left the public uncertain until almost the time of the Assembly whether he would run or not. When an acquaintance went to him and asked him on what platform he would run, Mr. Bryan refused to commit himself. "But," said this man, "I voted for you for President three times, and each time you had a platform."

The Nebraskan—or rather Floridan—was vexed. He would say nothing. Later he apologized for his display of temper. Even so, however, his seconder, Dr. Pence, of Portland, could report Mr. Bryan's position only in a very general way. Dr. Pence had said to Mr. Bryan that in backing him he represented eighty per cent. of the honest conscience of the Assembly. Bryan answered his question, implied if not expressed, by saying:

"I think you can trust me, sir, as one who loves the peace of this Church as much as any man in the Assembly." The Assembly greeted the statement with applause. One or two of the enthusiasts shouted their approval. But as all the world knows now, Mr. Bryan would have been well advised if he had followed the advice of those of his friends who blew cold on his ambition.

Dr. Aquilla Webb, of Wilmington, Delaware, put Mr. Bryan in nomination. Mr. Bryan, he argued, should be elected as a layman, as a representative of the South—he comes as a commissioner from southeast Florida—and because of his deep interest in evangelism. Mr. Bryan, he said, believes that the Church might double its membership in a comparatively short time.

Other nominations followed in rapid succession. The name of Dr. Frank Mitchell Silsley, minister of the First Presbyterian Church of Oakland, California, was presented by the Presbyterians of San Francisco. In the six years of his pastorate his church increased from a membership of six hundred to one of twenty-one hundred.

Dr. Silsley's nomination was a surprise to the California delegation generally. Most of that delegation had counted on supporting Dr. Hugh K. Walker, "the Presbyterian Bishop of California." Dr. John Willis Bauer, formerly president of Occidental College, California, the only lay Moderator of the Presbyterian Church in the history of the General Assembly, nominated Dr. Walker. Dr. Walker has been head of the California Anti-Saloon League, president of the Board of Trustees of Occidental College, a member of the Presbyterian Board of Church Election, and is familiar with the work of the Church.

Then Dr. Martin D. Hardin, of Ithaca, New York, began a eulogy of Mr. Bryan. "Some day," he said, "I hope to see the moderatorship of our Assembly given to William Jennings Bryan by acclamation. But I feel that right now we are at a critical time. I am here to present the name of Charles M. Wishart." There was a round of hearty applause. Dr. Hardin went on to tell something about his candidate. Dr. Wishart is president of the College of Wooster. For five years he was minister of the Second Presbyterian Church of Chicago. The late Dr. Gunsaulus said of him, "I don't know any other man who has moved my heart and mind as has Dr. Wishart. I regard him as the strongest man who has graced the pulpit of Chicago." Like Dr. Swearingen, the Moderator in 1921, Dr. Wishart came from the United Presbyterian Church. For four years, 1910-14, he was professor of systematic theology at their Pittsburgh Theological Seminary.

Then came the seconding speeches, one for each candidate. There were curious omissions in the speeches in behalf of Bryan. Neither Dr. Webb nor Dr. Pence spoke of the two elements in Mr. Bryan's public service which would have appealed to the Assembly most strongly his work in behalf of prohibition and in behalf of world peace. Rumor has it that Dr. Webb was called on to make the nominating speech only shortly before the meeting. Indeed, rumor has it that the night before the Assembly opening Bryan himself was seeking a man to nominate him.

Two things stood out in the nominating and seconding speeches. Every speaker asserted of his candidate that he was "sound in the faith," and that he was a believer in evangelism. Those phrases were simply shibboleths. One would like to have heard a prophetic note. One would like to have heard some man say of his candidate, "He is a Christian. He has been applying the teachings of Jesus in this or that realm of activity." But there was nothing of that.

All the world knows how the balloting went. On the first ballot Mr. Bryan received 391 votes, Dr. Silsley 36, Dr. Walker 133, Dr. Wishart 315. Dr. Reid, of San Francisco, withdrew Dr. Silsley's name in favor of Dr. Walker. The net ballot ran, Bryan 421, Wishart 400, Walker, 56. Dr. Baer withdrew the name of Dr. Walker. On the third ballot Dr. Wishart won with 451 votes to 427 for Mr. Bryan. Not for ten years has it taken three ballots to choose a Moderator. The election was a remarkable victory for sanity. It was not a victory for Dr. Wishart. It was a defeat for Mr. Bryan. Mr Bryan was defeated not only because he is unwilling to believe that the Lord may be accomplishing His great work of creation through evolution, but he is apparently unwilling that men who are convinced of that view should remain in the Church.

Except for President Wilson, no Presbyterian elder in America is better known than Mr. Bryan. That he should have been defeated is the more remarkable when we think how probably nine-tenths of the laymen in the Assembly and a fifth of the ministers had never heard of Dr. Wishart. Bryan carried the conservative Synods of Pennsylvania, Oregon and Washington, the Welsh Synods, and the Solid South. The Welsh Synods are made up of the Welsh Calvinistic Church, which united with the Presbyterian Church two years ago. New York, New Jersey, the Synods in the northern Mississippi valley and the Negro Synods emphatically voted against him.

Mr. Bryan took his defeat badly. When Dr. Hardin came down from the platform after nominating Wishart he spoke to Mr. Bryan, who is a personal friend. Mr. Bryan said to him, "I had a right to expect something better of you." Dr. Hardin is a son-in-law of the late Adlai Stevenson and his father was a personal friend of Bryan. Dr. Hardin answered to the effect that he had written Mr. Bryan and told him that he did not think this was the time for him to run, and that he (Dr. Hardin) would oppose him.

"I have no use," Bryan answered, "for any man who prefers the blood of the beast to the blood of the Lamb."

It is the custom of the Moderator to appoint the leading defeated candidate chairman of the Committee on Bills and Overtures. That committee is of primary importance. The Fosdick matter comes before it this year. Dr. Wishart broke over the usual custom and appointed Dr. Walker chairman. As a matter of fact, the instructions provided that Mr. Bryan's section should appoint a minister on that committee, but probably that technicality could have been got over. Mr. Bryan's section elected him to the Committee on Education. The Moderator, however, appointed him chairman of the Committee on Home Missions. Mr. Bryan refused the appointment and will hold his position on the Education Committee.

The Moderator also asked Mr. Bryan to act as Vice Moderator. Mr. Bryan took the matter under advisement and suddenly learned that the Moderator had appointed a Philadelphia layman to the position. According to the newspapers, Mr. Bryan is put out by these incidents.

After his defeat Mr. Bryan gave out a statement, the major part of which ran:

I feel as much called to the fight against evolution, which is paralyzing many of our pulpits and destroying the faith of many of our students, as any preacher feels called to preach. The question in my mind has been whether the work the Moderator could do was of sufficient importance to justify my suspending for a year the active discussion of this subject.

I finally concluded that it was worth while to lead the Church if the delegates so desired in a national effort to unite the Christian churches in the effort to bring the Gospel to that large section in the United States which is outside all churches. That seemed to me to be possible as well as desirable.

But as the choice has fallen upon another, I am left free to continue the work which I feel to be of vital importance to our Church and to all other Christian churches, namely, the aligning of the Church against the brute doctrine that man is the descendant of the lower animals. This, I believe, to be the greatest menace to civilization as well as religion. This comes up in many forms, and I shall feel free to discuss the subject on the floor, whereas I would have been restrained if I was Moderator and acting for the entire Church.

The vote I received showed that the Church itself is orthodox, and only a small fraction has been led away by the brute hypothesis. If I could receive the vote I did among the commissioners, when the other side concealed the real issue, what chance have they among the rank and file of the Church when they come to choose between Darwin and Moses?

The evening after Mr. Bryan's statement appeared, Dr. Wishart in the course of an address on education at a popular meeting of the Assembly, declared his own position:

"Either you can shut your eyes to the facts," he said, "or you can accept the facts and draw the proper inferences. I never see any particular gain to shutting our eyes to the facts. When you look at the facts squarely and without blinking, the best and highest inferences you can draw from them do not weaken but strengthen and fortify the highest ideals of the Christian faith. But remember that the professors you so bitterly criticize did not invent the facts. . . . It is part of religious education to know the great facts of life. There is no question that in some of our colleges certain facts of science are taught from which some professors draw inferences hostile to Christianity. . . . But let me remind you that every boy or girl worth his salt will go through a period of upheaval when they bump into the great facts of life. The boy will find himself in his maturity if in his home you have given him the religion that is not a mere statement of dogma, but is the inner life."

The Assembly is not much more than under way at this writing. Will H. Hays, head of the moving picture industry, a member of the Committee on Ministerial Relief and Sustentation, gave a ringing address Thursday evening in behalf of the Sustentation and Pension Fund of the Church and in behalf of an increase in ministers' salaries.

A veritable demonstration in honor of Dr. William Hiram Foulkes marked Friday afternoon's session. In a speech to the Assembly Dr. Foulkes had shown how the New Era Movement has increased the giving of the Church, despite any mistakes it may have made. As he finished Dr. Reid, of San Francisco, came to the platform and paid a tribute to Dr. Foulkes as a man who, criticized and assailed, nevertheless has served the Church ardently and effectively. The Assembly rose in honor to the head of the New Era Movement. The work of the New Era Movement will be taken over by the Executive Council which the Church will set up at this Assembly.

The plans for "Every Community Service Endeavor" have worked out so well in Montana, that the Home Missions Council will hold conferences in Idaho, Northern California and Wyoming to undertake similar work in those areas in June and July. The plan is that one man from the home mission headquarters of the denominations working in those areas will accompany the Home Mission Council deputation and that in each area all the administrators of home mission work will make the tour. Such developments make one believe that the Churches are growing in good old-fashioned—or new-fashioned (?)—common sense.

Two Notable British Preachers Enter New Fields

[This page is devoted to a weekly letter recording the significant events and movements of the day from the Christian point of view.]

CHURCH people in America will be as much interested in the new fields which Dr. John A. Hutton, of Glasgow, and Dr. Sidney M. Berry, of Birmingham, are about to enter as will be our British brethren. Dr. Hutton for many years has been one of the most popular pastors visiting Northfield and has regularly supplied the pulpit of the Fifth Avenue Baptist Church, New York, through the summer Sundays. The Rev. Sidney M. Berry has been the English correspondent of THE CHRISTIAN WORK for some time and was one of the outstanding delegates to the International Congregational Council at Boston in 1920. Both Dr. Hutton's and Mr. Berry's books have had wide and appreciative reading in America, and American visitors to Scotland and England have often taken opportunity to hear them both.

Dr. Hutton has just accepted the call to succeed Dr. Jowett at Westminster Chapel, London. There is great rejoicing in London, but great sorrow in Glasgow, tempered with pride that Dr. Hutton should have been called to this great preaching station, for Westminster Chapel has become a sort of Free Church Cathedral. When Dr. G. Campbell Morgan went there fifteen or twenty years ago the parish had already largely disappeared and the congregations were made up of visitors from all parts of London and from all England and Scotland. When Dr. Jowett was called to Westminster it was with the understanding that he was to devote all of his energy to preaching and great crowds hung upon his words during his eventful pastorate. It is even more a preaching station now than it was when Dr. Jowett came to London and no one could adequately fill the pulpit who was not known to all Britain and America.

Dr. Hutton's congregations will be gathered from all the ends of the earth. Great satisfaction is everywhere expressed over Dr. Hutton's acceptance of this call. There are many who consider him the most outstanding preacher in either England or Scotland to-day. Dr. J. Fort Newton, in his recent volume, "Some Living Masters of the Pulpit," is very pronounced in this opinion. Speaking of a sermon which Dr. Hutton preached in the City Temple, London, as having moved him more than any sermon he had heard in England during his long stay there, Dr. Newton says:

"What a sermon Dr. Hutton preached in the City Temple yesterday, both for its eloquence and its appropriateness. He dealt with 'The Temptation,' that is the one temptation which sums up all others, including that of the minister to which he alluded with illuminative understanding. What is the Great Temptation, faced by Jesus in the wilderness and escaped by none of the sons of men? It is the cynical spirit, by which we are sorely tried in these days, and will be more terribly tried later, because it haunts all high moods. Subtly, artfully, it seeks to lower, somehow, the lights of the soul, to slay ideals, to betray and deliver us to base-mindedness. Satan, said the preacher, is the base-minded spirit; he is the denier, as God is the Affirmer, within all souls. Such preaching! He searches like a surgeon and heals like a physician. Seldom, if ever, have I had a man walk right into my heart with a lighted candle in his hand, as he did and look into the dark corners. For years I had known Dr. Hutton as a master of the inner life, whether dealing with the Bible at close quarters or with the friends and aiders of faith, like Browning; and there are passages in 'The Winds of God' that haunt me like great music. And no book in this dark time of war—in which, alas, the author has suffered his share of bitter loss—has gripped me more firmly, more surely, than his 'Loyalty, the Approach to Faith.' There one hears not the great guns behind dim horizons, but their echo in the lonely places of the soul. As a guide to those who are walking in the middle years of life, where bafflements of faith are many and moral pitfalls are deep, there is no one like Hutton; no one to stand alongside him. Rich as his books are, his preaching is much more wonderful than his writings. His style is indeed a marvel, but one does not think of it while he is preaching. While his sermon has the finish of a literary essay, it is delivered with the enthusiasm of an evangelist. The whole man goes into it, uniting humor, pathos, poetry and hard reason, literature, life, unction with a certain wildness of abandon, as of one possessed, which is the note of truly great preaching. In my humble judgment, he is the greatest preacher in Britain."

The church at Belhaven in Glasgow has been filled morning and evening, not only by the university group in Scotland, but by people of all classes, and no one thought of visiting Glasgow on Sunday without hearing Dr. Hutton. He has been one of the most popular visitors to the Northfield Summer Conference and his services in New York have always drawn great swarms of people. He has been one of the most prolific writers in the British pulpit and his books have a suggestiveness and originality about them that has made them widely read. I have taken occasion to say several times that "The Persistent Word of God" is about the best example of expository preaching that we have had in recent years, and also that his lectures on preaching delivered to the students of Glasgow and Aberdeen, "That the Ministry Be Not Blamed," are among the most unique and suggestive that have been delivered. He has been a student of all literatures and is steeped in the great poetry of the ages. Perhaps no one has made a deeper study of the Russian novelists than he has, and he is continually going back to them as the men who have, beyond all others, sounded the depths of the human heart. He believes that no one has pictured the ravages of sin and the way of redemption more faithfully than have the great Russians. He comes to the Westminster pulpit in the very ripeness of his powers. He is expected to begin his ministry at Westminster before the first of June.

Mr. Berry has been called from the great Carr's Lane Chapel at Birmingham to accept the secretaryship of the Congregational Union of England and Wales. As the English papers are saying, there was something inevitable about the nomination of Mr. Berry for this office. The office is much more than is conveyed in the term "secretary." If it were in the Anglican communion rather than the Congregational he would be called archbishop.

Mr. Berry, as my readers know, is the son of that outstanding preacher, Dr. Charles A. Berry, of Wolverhampton, who was the first man called to succeed Henry Ward Beecher, but the son has built up his reputation on his own efforts and it rests upon his own genius. He is not the successor of his father in any way. As a preacher he is wholly different from his illustrious father, whose impetuous rhetoric was in sharp contrast to Mr. Sidney Berry's far more measured eloquence. When Mr. Berry was called to succeed Dr. Jowett at Birmingham there was something of a venture of faith in it. He had achieved considerable success as a preacher in one or two small parishes and there was some surprise, perhaps, throughout England that he had been called to this great charge, but he soon rose to the occasion and now holds his own place in the illustrious succession of James, Dale, Jowett and Berry. Carr's Lane Chapel never had larger congregations—its 1,700 seats having been filled every Sunday—than while Mr. Berry has been its pastor, and he has come at the same time to occupy a large place in the public life of Birmingham and the Free Church life of all England.

His books are getting to be known on this side of the Atlantic as well as in England. The volumes of sermons and addresses published by F. H. Revell and Company are finding their way into the studies of the American preachers everywhere. Mr. Berry has been particularly successful in his ministry to men. I had the pleasure of preaching in the Carrs Lane Chapel one Sunday morning two years ago and the first impression I received was the great number of men in the congregation. There is a reality and a vigor about his preaching that appeals especially to men. It is a great satisfaction to know that in his new office as Secretary of the Congregational Union he is to be relieved so far as possible from administrative tasks and left free to visit the churches.

I am sure the readers of THE CHRISTIAN WORK will watch both Dr. Hutton and Mr. Berry in their new and outstanding positions, and wish them all success, for both are the real prophets of the larger gospel.

The Appeal of God to a Faltering Church

By Rev. C. C. Hays, D.D.

Moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America

"Put on thy strength, O Zion."—Isaiah 52:1.

[The following is the sermon preached by Dr. Hays at the opening of the Presbyterian General Assembly at Indianapolis on May 17th.]

WHETHER there were two Isaiahs, as some scholarly critics say, or only one, is a matter of small consequence to most of us. There is one, at any rate, and he had a great vision of God and the Church. The thought running through these chapters and binding the book together as a masterpiece is that of the divine Being, the Holy One of Israel, ruling and reigning in the affairs of his people and bringing them promised deliverance. This makes Isaiah a book for to-day and gives us cheer and confidence in our work.

In the chapter preceding the text there is an appeal to God that He would put on His strength, that He would manifest His power as in the days of old. "Awake, awake, put on thy strength, O arm of the Lord. Awake as in the ancient days, in the generations of old." But in this chapter we have an appeal to the Church as though God himself, willing and ready to do His part, were answering back, "Awake, awake, put on thy strength, O Zion, put on thy beautiful garments, O Jerusalem."

It is God's call to His hesitating, faltering Church, and it comes to us to-day at the opening of our one hundred and thirty-fifth Assembly with striking significance.

I. Think first of the Lord's favor toward the Church and the encouragement we have from past successes.

We cordially acknowledge the Church to consist of all those who profess the true religion, by whatever denominational name they may be known, but it is our own branch of believers with which we are especially concerned at this time. We are all more or less familiar with the history of Presbyterianism in our own land, yet it cannot be too often recalled. Our fathers came to this country for the same reason that foreigners are coming today, in search of a better chance. We flatter ourselves also that many of them, like the Pilgrim Fathers, had high and unselfish ideals. They carried the Gospel with them, and desired more than anything better religious privileges for themselves and their families. Once here they were not content until they had the church, and also the school and the college, built upon religious foundations. It is heartening to read how in the days of Makemie the settlers on the banks of the Pokamoke longed for a minister of their faith to break to them the bread of life, and how, when at last he came, they clamored to hear him. We know how our early history is inwrought into the very fiber of our nation, and the part that Presbyterian elders and Presbyterianism played in the formation of our national Constitution and our national life. As a church we had a right worthy part in the nation's start, and have always been loyal to the core. Our first Moderator was a signer of the Declaration of Independence, and we have been asserting our prerogatives ever since. Whatever may be said for or against Presbyterians, it cannot be said that we have ever been afraid to speak our minds.

We were slow, like others, to see the great future in store for our country and to realize the part we must play in her destiny, but it is evident from the early minutes of our Assembly that the missionary principle has always been dominant among us. In 1802 a Standing Committee of Missions was elected to superintend the "missionary business" of the church. This was the true beginning of our Board of Home Missions, although it was not until 1816 that our first Board, known as the "Board of Missions," was actually set up. How interesting to read the report of the special committee which had the courage and vision to recommend the creation of a Board! The report rehearses the marvelous growth of the country and the demand for missionary labors, and goes on to say:

God in His adorable providence seems to have changed, in these latter times, the scale on which He has for years conducted the affairs of His government. Changes which were formerly the work of years are now produced in a day. Magnificent and astonishing events have passed so often before the eyes of men of the present age that their minds have acquired a tone and vigor which prompt them to undertake and accomplish great things. We ourselves witness every day the wonderful effects of combined counsel and exertions, both in the moral and political world.

That was one hundred and seven years ago, yet it reads as though it might have been written yesterday. And incidentally, we see how boards grow out of conditions and needs. The Board of Education was organized soon after the Board of Missions, for it was seen at once that to preach the Gospel there must be men trained and qualified for the purpose. Our boards and agencies have come into being one after the other as the needs of the church demanded and progress justified. To amalgamate a number of them now into a great Board of National Missions is a fitting thing in view of the fact that our work has spread until it embraces the nation and extends to nations beyond.

Thirty-eight years ago at the opening of the Assembly in Cincinnati the Moderator (Rev. George P. Hays, D.D.) preached a missionary sermon on the text, "Look unto the rock whence ye are hewn, and to the hole of the pit whence ye are digged," in which he rehearsed the story of the church's beginnings and brought it down to date, concluding with an eloquent appeal and this final declaration, "The mission of the Church is missions." Our membership has since grown to three times what it was then, and our annual contributions to Home and Foreign Missions are eight times as large as they then were. We are distressed sometimes because of our slow progress, yet in the lifetime of a single generation we have made a great advance and are at last coming to see that our chief business as Christian men and women is to build up the Kingdom of Christ and get the Gospel to those who do not have it.

2. Look now at the open doors before us and the claims upon us as a denomination.

Our very successes are to-day our greatest concern. The problems of the Church, as one of our secretaries has said, are not the problems of failure, but the problems of success. We have, in fact, succeeded so well that we are bound to push our work or suffer humiliation and disgrace. There are many communities in our own land and vast sections in foreign lands which are virtually turned over to us by a comity of arrangement with other denominations. We must enter in and possess the fields or give way that there may be enlargement and deliverance from some other source.

When we think of the prospects in foreign lands and of the opportunities for enlarged work and usefulness there is only one word to describe them—it is the word unlimited. In Persia, for example, slowly recovering from the war, there are vast stretches of country dotted with villages in most of which the Gospel has never been preached, and this is peculiarly Presbyterian territory. One of our missionaries who has just returned to Syria writes: "The refugee problem is most heart-breaking and taxes every possible resource. In Aleppo I saw six or seven thousand Greek refugees living in caves in the old quarries near the city"—which, to quote no more, reminds us of the Near East relief work yet waiting to be done, and how, by supplying temporal needs, we may reach the hearts of countless numbers. In Korea, in China, in India, and practically all Asiatic countries, there is a new turning toward Christ as the true teacher of mankind, while in Mexico, Central America, South America, and even in troubled nations of Europe, like the republic of Czechoslovakia, there is dissatisfaction with the old order and an appeal to Protestant Christianity such as we have not known before. Where the outlook has been darkest, the call is now loudest. In West Africa, where a few years ago there was talk of abandoning the field for want of encouragement, we have to-day the largest Presbyterian church in the world with a waiting list considerably larger than the membership. We are gaining now every year in foreign fields more converts than we had all told after the first fifty years of our foreign mission work.

But it is not only the open doors and our missionary activities which call for an aroused church. The forces of evil challenge us. What has frequently been referred to in the Assembly as the "greatest obstacle to the progress of the Kingdom" received its death sentence in the passage of the Eighteenth Amendment; and the devil has not got over it. Hell has enlarged herself in the effort to recover her lost stronghold. The temperance triumph was a triumph of the Church, and it is no time to retreat. The Church owes a duty to society as well as to the individual; and we must faithfully bear our share of responsibility in ridding the land and the world not only of the drink evil, but of social injustice and of every wrong which hinders the reign of Christ.

Some think they see evidences of an organized propaganda against the Church. Whether this be true or not, we know the enemy was never more alert than now to pick flaws and hinder spiritual progress. Every slightest defection in our ranks, every smallest symptom of a weakening in Christian testimony, every departure of any minister from the faith, is taken up and magnified and broadcasted as though to create an impression that the old foundations are slipping and the Church is losing ground. Now is the time for loyalty to Christian truth and Christian principle. Now is the day of all days when we should be clean who bear the vessels of the Lord, and when the army of Christ should stand with a solid, united and inflexible front before an unbelieving yet perishing world.

3. Consider, in the third place, the latent power of the Church and our ability to meet the responsibilities of the hour.

First, our material resources. Money is one of them—not the most important, to be sure, but it takes money to run the business of the Kingdom, as it requires money to run any business. One great hindrance to the progress of the Gospel has been our failure to provide the means. We have been putting money into our work but nothing like as we might. Many think our benevolence budget of $15,000,000 excessive. Some of us have argued about it in our Presbyteries and session meetings and excused ourselves concerning it, when the fact is, it is far below our ability as a church. As compared with others, it is low, for a number of denominations excel us in per capita giving. As compared with our expense budget, it is low, for we expend more than twice as much on ourselves every year. As compared with our ability to give and our expenditures for luxuries, it will shame us in the judgment. What it really amounts to is a little more than a two-cent postage stamp for every member of the church every day in the year. The government estimates that we have in this country a per capita income, including children, of $500 a year; and we know that Presbyterians are above the average in ability rather than below. But at the government figures, we, with our 1,800,000 members, to say nothing of our adherents, should have $90,000,000 annually to lay at the feet of our King; and if we should give to others as much as we spend on ourselves for local church purposes, as two or three of our sister denominations are now actually doing, we will have $45,000,000 for benevolent work on the old tithe basis. Our budget for the current year is full $4,000,000 short of what could be readily used, and the Church should provide the entire amount asked without quibble or question. We have the money to meet every call if we will recognize our obligation and acknowledge our stewardship.

We have resources in numbers of which we have not availed ourselves and herein is a great weakness of the Church. One difficulty about our finances is that we have so much dead timber on our rolls and too many dead-heads. So many members of the Body of Christ have been struck with the paralysis of worldliness and are hindering rather than helping. The Church is not an ark for the mere saving of an elect few although we still believe in election. Nor is it a ferryboat, all obligations having been settled when the fare is paid. It is not an insurance company organized to insure against loss in the world to come, as some seem to think. It is not a social organization nor club for entertainment. Nor is it a school of instruction merely. The Church exists for work as well as worship, for service as well as sociability, for this world rather than the next.

Then think of our spiritual resources, which, after all, are the true measure of the Church's strength. It is entirely possible that we are losing rather than gaining by our interest in wealth and numbers, not because these things are not sources of strength, but because in stressing them we have been overlooking the real secret of the Church's power. Of silver and gold the disciples had none, but they could say to the lame man, "In the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, rise and walk;" and it was the exhibition of divine power that filled the people with wonder and amazement as they gazed upon the Church. We have lost the power to work miracles, but Heaven forbid that we should lose the power to supply spiritual need.

The Gospel itself for one thing. It is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth, and it is the power of God unto the salvation of the Church. The preaching of the cross is to them that perish foolishness, but unto us who are saved it is the power of God and the wisdom of God.

The charge that rationalism and unbelief are widespread among us, and are even creeping into many of our pulpits, is a charge that cannot be sustained. Those of us who have been much over the Church in the past year have found no evidence of this whatever, but only deepest regret everywhere expressed that such sweeping assertion should be made. The worst that can be said is that we have not been stressing the cardinal truths of our religion with the emphasis they merit. And as for the Church herself, the antidote for error is the truth. Nothing will heal our woes like grace, and there is nothing like light to deliver us from darkness. No appeal to force, no resource to law, no ecclesiastical bull will drive out heresy where heresy appears. We have the more excellent way depicted in the thirteenth chapter of First Corinthians. What is needed is the spirit of Christ and a return to gospel preaching where we have departed from it, every man to his task, the laying of new emphasis upon the things most surely believed among us, in every pulpit and classroom of the Church.

Faith is another of the secrets of strength, significant and vital. We limit God by our unbelief, we draw upon Him by our faith. "According to your faith be it unto you," was not spoken to blind men alone, but to us. "If thou canst believe, all things are possible to him that believeth." It is the men of strong convictions who have fashioned the world. It is confidence which has girded men's loins and nerved them for the putting forth of energy.

A revival of faith and of prayer will do more than anything to solve our problems. Prayer is the power by which we lay hold of the spiritual resources at our disposal. Prayer is not overcoming God's reluctance; it is taking hold of God's willingness. "Call upon me," is the command, yet we have not called—no, not with that sense of need and desire which brought the blessing in the olden time, which has sent revival after revival sweeping through our land in the nick of time to save the Church and save the land.

"Ye shall receive power after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you," is another of the old-time promises which needs to be recalled to the Church. The early believers were few in number, but marvelous in power because of Pentecost. Well did Spurgeon declare, "If a church have not the Holy Ghost, its members may as well close its doors, bar its windows, place a black cross on them and cry, 'God be merciful unto us'."

And the Holy Spirit came to testify of and to glorify Another whose presence and supporting power we must not overlook. It is He whom Isaiah prophesied, "whose name is called Wonderful, Counselor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father and the Prince of Peace." It is He who is so marvelously portrayed in the very chapter following the text as the deliverer of Zion, "wounded for our transgressions and bruised for our iniquities"—whose sacrificial death we in this Assembly are about to commemorate, Head over all things to the Church—"the conqueror from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah, glorious in his apparel, marching in the greatness of his strength."

The Church is not dead nor dying. With all her faults, she is the liveliest institution the world knows anything about, and the gates of hell cannot prevail against her. The world's criticism and the world's need are the Church's challenge. Let Zion arise and shine, let our men and women in the Church count it the highest privilege of life to advance the work of Christ. Let us enter with joy and enthusiasm into his service now that we may meet Him with joy when our work is done.

And I heard, as it were, the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of mighty thunders, saying, Hallelujah for the Lord our God the Almighty reigneth. Let us rejoice and be exceeding glad and let us give glory unto Him for the marriage of the Lamb is come and his wife hath made herself ready. And it was given unto her that she should array herself in fine linen, bright and pure, for the fine linen is the righteous acts of His saints.

The Call to Adventure: A Quaker View*

By Edward Thomas

I.—THE STORY.

CLOSE to the battle lines in France, from September, 1914, until the Armistice in 1918, a group of adventurous idealists faced the realities and the perils of war among the common people. They maintained maternity and general civilian hospitals, operated milk stations for babies, ploughed fields, sowed grain, reaped crops, restored devastated farms. They sold and distributed many thousands of dollars worth of seeds, of furniture, and of other supplies. Much was sold a little below cost, much they sold for nominal amounts of money, often on long credit, according to the ability of the purchaser to pay. Some goods they gave away. They built hundreds of demountable houses, for this purpose operating two wood-working factories, they cared for many thousands of refugees, especially women and children, they cared for the insane. In places more remote, to obtain adequate supplies for restocking farms, they became large-scale emergency farmers, raising, or buying and shipping to the needy, horses, cows, sheep, goats, chickens, pigs rabbits and bees. They managed the government of besieged Ypres when the proper forms of authority failed to operate. They found typhoid raging among the neglected populace and stamped out the epidemic by effectively vaccinating over twenty-six thousand people, treating seven hundred of those already stricken in extemporized hospitals. Wherever they found themselves they attempted to construct livable ways of living out of lives broken by the war machine and neglected by the armies called their protectors. Moreover they supplied and manned several convoys of motor ambulances at the front which ultimately carried two hundred and sixty thousand wounded, and manned four or five ambulance trains of some ten cars each running to base hospitals, and provided and manned two hospital ships on the sea.

Those who did this work were, for the most part, well educated idealists, devoted to the cause of humanity, but untrained for such work. Their ideals were despised and rejected by the military mind and they were called conscientious objectors. They proved to be marvelously efficient in carrying out this work scorned by so-called patriots. No better proof is needed than the success of their maternity hospital at Chalons. Out of 878 babies born there, 838 were born alive and survived the first month. Of the mothers only two died and one of these was brought in dying. The record of this hospital in the war zone, even though mothers and babies had to be moved in emergencies into and out of bomb-proofs, is equal to the best peace-time records of well-managed hospitals in any city. Its devoted intelligent attendants, serving without pay proved as efficient as the highly trained, well-paid staff of the best hospitals in the world.

During the war these adventurers, ever looking toward the brotherhood of man, were in France, Russia, Serbia and Italy. Besides this they provided regular visitors or supervisors at prison and relief camps in England, Holland and Corfu. After the Armistice they went with their helping hands into Belgium, Germany, Austria, Syria and Siberia, stretching out over Asia until they came to Japan. They operated their own freight trains on a branch railroad in France; when a locomotive failed them they stripped a heavy motor truck of its rubber tires and fitted the iron rims of its wheels to the railroad track that their operations might not be interrupted. They opened a chain of co-operative general stores. They became the largest milk dealers in Austria, and they handled millions of dollars worth of other supplies. They unexpectedly found they had no bad debts, the refugees paid for all the goods they had received on sales. So these workers endowed a $200,000 hospital with these and some other surplus funds of the French work.

Their uniform came to be so respected that those who wore it were given free passes on some of the greatest railroads of Europe. Goods in warehouses labeled with their name and insignia, often guarded by only nominal and unarmed watchmen, proved safer from thieving than the military camps and national well-guarded storehouses in either America or France. Their losses by thieving on their far-flung lines of transportation and from their storehouses were less than a New York department store loses within its own walls.

They were more effective peacemakers than armed police. It was unsafe to be out alone at night in the Balkan towns. Two years after these adventurers had established their hospital in Petch, one of the worst of the towns, the spirit of brotherhood had planted itself so firmly that anyone could walk alone at night and find the streets safe. What some psychologists call the hate-complex had been cured by the love that suffereth long and is kind, that vaunteth not itself and is not puffed up.

Those who came to Continental Europe after the Armistice had many surprises. They expected to find the doors of government offices shut in their faces. Instead, government officials welcomed their visits for advice or for assistance in overcoming difficulties. One worker, who entered late upon the work and for only a short time, thus expresses himself, "It is very strange to be on such intimate terms with Ministers of State. Most people find more difficulty in meeting European Ministers than in reaching the President at Washington, but with us it was very different. If I wanted to see the Minister of Foreign Affairs, or the Minister of Reconstruction, or the Minister of War, I merely telephoned for an appointment. I was usually told to come at once, and was never put off more than half a day. We always got along very well with the ministers in spite of our different point of view when it came to war or politics or economics." Another worker needs more than a thousand horses to enable returning refugees to plough their lands for seeding. Ploughs were available, but everyone said, "All the horses are in the army. You can't get them. Poland refused to reduce her military establishment when the League of Nations asked her, and also when the Supreme Council of the Allies asked her." But this adventurous worker refused to be discouraged. She went to the Polish Minister of War, and because she asked nothing for herself or for her organization, but went in the spirit of the prophets of old, the Minister of War listened to her and gave her all the horses she needed—more than a thousand.

Bread cards and even legal tender currency were issued by cities as tributes to the unselfish efficiency of the workers, bearing the name of their church and their insignia. When one of their head workers in Russia asked how much land he could count on controlling for the work he was taken up into a high place and offered all the land as far as he could see. And they had many other adventures.

II.—THE LESSON.

Every church that seeks will find adventures. If any church is ready to forsake its property, its houses and lands, and is ready to be brought before rulers and be persecuted for the sake of bringing good news to the poor, for the sake of healing the broken-hearted, for the giving of sight to the blind, and for the breaking of chains, economic or military, it will receive its reward, manifold more, and in the time to come good reputation. Eventually rulers will welcome its messengers, listening to their words as to the words of those who are true prophets.

Adventures like these interest the world, they interest the man in the street, command the respect of the scoffer, open the eyes of the self-satisfied, and teach the needs of the world to the thoughtless. These adventurers for the brotherhood of man awaken sympathy for those who need the very help they have to offer.

In their homelands one adult in every thousand of the population is counted as a member of the church which gave its name to the work and staked its reputation on the faithfulness and wisdom of the workers. If ten times as many would give their support to such work carried out by their own churches, can anyone doubt that war would be banished from the earth. If one out of every hundred adults was willing to support this kind of work and their churches were willing to undertake it, wars would be impossible. The common people will gladly hear a physician who will cure the world of war and all its unutterable brutality. They are looking for the church which will be a physician.

The remarkable reverence which grew up in hostile countries in less than two years for the uniform of these adventurous relief workers is in sharp contrast to the mere tolerance for the uniforms worn by some other groups of workers. This reverence and respect, amounting to love, was won in several of the countries by workers from nations recently bitterly hated as enemies. It is evident that patriotism and the emotions of solidarity can be personified and idealized in the uniforms of workers for brotherhood as effectively as has been done in the past by the uniforms of soldiery. The insignia of brotherhood, worn by workers striving against evil, in the Spirit of Jesus, can be made inspiring—as inspiring as war and hate have made the insignia of war—uniforms and flags and swords and guns.

This war-time adventure of one group has shown the conditions for success. The workers should serve without pay, except for necessary pocket money, and should enlist for short terms only, so that the spirit of adventure is ever fresh. They must be intelligent and devoted to the ideal, wear inconspicuous uniforms and go unarmed, lest the form of the institution outshine the spirit of the work. They must be willing to accept minor positions, to do their full share of monotonous weary labor, and to undergo some persecution.

The constant endeavor of relief workers must be to make continued work unnecessary. They must avoid pauperizing those they seek to help. Unlike foreign missions which are most successful in well-tilled fields and succeed only if they build up churches, relief workers must always be ready to abandon their work before it becomes an institution in the eyes of those they help. These workers for this reason, with the advice and consent of the governments concerned, have withdrawn from France, from Germany and from Serbia. Like the most forward-looking of the foreign missionaries who seek to build up self-reliant congregations, relief workers must make self-reliant people out of those they help. Workers must not only be adventurers but teach others to adventure toward constructive ideals.

The very complexity of modern life gives each church an opportunity to center the romance of adventure in itself by offering adventurous relief work to its young men and women. The romance of adventure has gone out of every-day modern life. Civilization means institutions, means organization, and organization makes adventure less normal and more difficult to seek out. For an organization to run smoothly on its wheels men and women must fit the deep ruts worn by travel of the wheels. Whoever leaves his groove, whoever jumps the track, is likely to cause a serious wreck. In adventurous relief work the workers are restoring to usefulness lives wrecked by the selfishness of the economic machinery of civilization or by the war machine. Such lives are numbered by millions and all the charitable institutions of the nations fail to lessen their number. Christians must learn again that the spirit of Jesus does not come by outward forms, does not thrive in institutions, but within the soul of the adventurer for the brotherhood of man. When the military machine made their hospital ships institutions in which the Spirit of Jesus could not dwell, these workers gave them up, and turned to other work. They were about to give up their ambulance trains for the same reason when the Armistice came.

It is unnecessary, perhaps it is unwise, for a church to officially organize constructive relief work. Small bands of adventurous men and women in England in August, 1914, assured of the moral support of their church, independently began the work which resulted in the adventures recounted above. All that is needed to start work which may revolutionize the world is the moral support of a church numbering a substantial fraction of the population among its adherents, any church with a million members can supply the leaders and the financial backing adequate to become a leader of the nation toward higher ideals. A central organization is needed for selecting and managing workers and supplies, but financing relief work is the least of its difficulties. Five thousand dollars together with the vacation time, free use of a college equipment, and the volunteer services of a few instructors and business men, started the American branch of the work which soon grew until it was contributing largely to the results.

In the winter of 1921 to 1922 some forty workers were in the famine-stricken regions of Russia. A quarter of these fell sick with typhus. New workers have gone to replace those invalidated home. The adventure still calls in Russia. It calls in the Pennsylvania and West Virginia coal fields, all up and down the Appalachian Mountains, in Mexico, in China—all over the world. The whole world is calling for adventurers who will do every-day work, ever looking toward the brotherhood of man. The world is profoundly thankful and deeply stirred when the Spirit of Jesus shows itself embodied and personified in a group of adventurous workers. In our complex civilization such work can only be done by individuals working in groups and burning with the spirit of idealism. The world should find that spirit in the churches, and is saying to each church, "Art thou the one that should come or look we for another?"

III.—TOWARDS THE OUTLAWRY OF WAR.

The causes for which wars are fought—liberty, justice and peace—are noble and Christian causes. But the method of war is not only un-Christian, it is ineffective for these ends. The war to end war has failed. Those who have been in the trenches and have seen the fate of the civilian population behind the lines agree with G. A. Studdart-Kennedy, the most popular of the British army chaplains, who said, "The brutality of war is literally unutterable. There are no words foul and filthy enough to describe it."

Just before he died, William Austin Smith, the clear-sighted editor of "The Churchman," began a campaign against war. He cried out, "War is sin." Almost his last words named one pole of the compass needle which he hoped was to guide men toward better ideals. Every compass needle, however, has two poles, and the pole which actually points toward the better ideal is adventurous belief in the brotherhood of man.

More than a compass is needed. A chart is indispensable. Not every chart that is offered can be trusted. Trustworthy charts are based on the experiences of the successful navigators of the past. To learn the dangers which must be avoided inexperienced navigators must go to such charts and to the history of voyagers who have come closest to their aim.

Moreover, before prosperous people living well-ordered lives in comfortable houses can see war in its true light as an embodiment of evil, injustice and hate, they must meet evil, injustice and hate, face to face, in concrete form, and learn the impossibility of overcoming them with weapons made in their own likeness. And it is seldom possible to persuade such people to visit their unfortunate neighbors in the slums so as to understand their lives, or to enter into foreign missionary work. An engineer who is typical of the Rotary Club type, genial, optimistic, enterprising and appearing prosperous, asserts that all progress is due to selfishness. Like so many of his type he talks about service, meaning the intelligent selfishness which realizes that it can do business only by producing serviceable goods, saying that selfishness is the greatest thing in the world. He believes he has a moral obligation to be prosperous. But imagination and adventure are really just as an important part of his life as selfishness. They are a part of the successful business mind and of the successful scientific mind. This engineer's scientific mind can accomplish nothing without adventuring into the unknown, bringing his imagination to bear on the problems that face him. He recently gave up a good position to start out for himself under great handicaps. Preaching love will not reach him now, but telling stories of adventure toward the brotherhood of man will open his eyes. Such stories will not only interest him, but will eventually teach him that there are other things in the world, and that the greatest of these is love—love working through adventure and imagination working through love.

History is full of the stories of adventurers who had such a clear vision of the brotherhood of man that they refused to take part in war. Some of the stories are almost as old as the books of the New Testament. Many who refused were followers of the saints—of Francis of Assisi. There were great numbers who refused military service in Cromwell's time. A century ago the Mennonites refused to serve as soldiers under Bonaparte, but shared the dangers of his campaigns while succoring those to whom war brought suffering. These and other groups who have set their faces firmly against war have been adventurous idealists. The great groups of reformers that gave us free public education, that agitated against slavery until the slaves were free, and reformed the worst of the prisons, were the spiritual ancestors of those whose deeds have been recounted above.

The stable structure of peace and education for peace has always been founded upon a sympathetic human interest in the sufferings and doings of all mankind, a loving interest that believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things, until it becomes adventurous following of the Man of Nazareth, an adventurous belief in the brotherhood of man. If a man hate not the spirit which wrongs his neighbor whom he hath seen, how shall he hate the spirit which wrongs the foreigner whom he hath not seen. If a man hate not the selfish economic spirit which wrongs his unfortunate neighbor whom he hath seen and passed by on the street, how shall he hate the military spirit of his own nation which wrongs foreigners whom he hath not seen. In adventurous relief work begun in peace time with workers devoted enough to withstand the temptations of prosperity lies the possibility of establishing so firm a tradition of the evils of war that coming generations will forbid any experimentation with war even as a means of redressing wrongs.

A Prayer for Unity

O GOD, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, our only Saviour, the Prince of Peace, give us grace seriously to lay to heart the great dangers we are in by our unhappy divisions. Take away all hatred and prejudice, and whatsoever else may hinder us from godly union and concord; that as there is but one Body and one Spirit, and one hope of our calling, one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism, one God and Father of us all, so we may be all of one heart and of one soul, united in one holy bond of truth and peace, of faith and charity, and may with one mind and one mouth glorify Thee; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

A Negro's Pledge

THE following pledge has been taken by large numbers of Negro students:

"I will never bring disgrace upon my race by any unworthy deed or dishonorable act; I will live a clean, decent, manly life, and will ever respect and defend the virtue and honor of womanhood. I will uphold and obey the just laws of my country and of the community in which I live and will encourage others to do likewise; I will not allow prejudice, injustice, insult or outrage to cower my spirit or sour my soul, but will ever preserve the inner freedom of heart and conscience; I will not allow myself to be overcome of evil but will strive to overcome evil with good; I will endeavor to develop and unceasingly to quicken the sense of racial duty and responsibility; I will in all these ways aim to uplift my race, so that, to everyone bound to it by ties of blood, it shall become a bond of ennoblement, and not a byword of reproach."

Education in Utah

By Rev. H. W. Reherd, D.D.

President of Westminster College, Salt Lake City, Utah

IN the early development of Utah, education had little or no part. Brigham Young led the advance guard of the Latter Day Saints into Salt Lake Valley in July, 1847, and for more than twenty-five years the territory had no schools worthy the name. Making a living and raising large families to populate the American desert seemed to be the chief aims of the Mormon people. In fact, education was discouraged by Brigham Young, President of the Mormon Church. In an address at a conference held at Mt. Pleasant, Utah, on July 16, 1875, he urged the Mormons to keep away from the Presbyterian academy at that place. He said: "Keep your children away from that school. If God wants them to know grammar and arithmetic, he can inspire them with that knowledge as well as with spiritual truth."

The establishment of Christian schools by various denominations nearly fifty years ago opened the way for Utah education. These church schools, manned by well-trained, cultured teachers were so good that children flocked to them everywhere and the Mormons, in self-defense, were compelled to organize a public school system.

To-day there are four types of schools in Utah; the State, the Catholic, the Mormon and the Protestant schools.

In most respects public school education in Utah is much the same as it is in any of the other newer Western States. The State maintains the ordinary primary and secondary schools with a State Agricultural College at Logan and a State University at Salt Lake City.

In one respect, however, Utah's agricultural college and university differ from those of every other State in the Union. They are both controlled by the Mormon Church, with the results which would naturally follow such control. In each case the institution is headed by a Mormon president, backed by a Mormon board of regents, buttressed by a Mormon governor and a Mormon legislature. The majority of the professors and students are Mormons. One result of this control is that all forms of organized religious effort are forbidden on the campus. No Y. M. C. A. or Y. W. C. A. is allowed and no denomination has ever been able to establish a university pastor there. The writer does not attempt to say how wise this decision to rule off the campus all forms of religious discussion may be in a State like Utah, but this fact remains very clear: that Utah is conspicuous in that her State university students are denied the privilege of religious discussion on the campus under any form of organized Christianity.

The Catholic Church maintains in Utah a system of schools. These schools are not numerous. Chief among them are the two girls' academies, one at Salt Lake and one at Ogden. In the former city a recently organized parochial school is maintained. Some years ago All Hallows College, an institution of junior college grade for boys, was operated by the church, but it has been closed for several years.

The Mormon system of schools is well organized and is being steadily developed. The church owns and operates these schools, which in the past have run from the primary grades through secondary schools and a so-called university. The newly adopted program calls for the abandonment of all Mormon academies, the development of five junior colleges to train teachers and fit students for the Mormon university, one university and ultimately seventy-five theological seminaries—one beside every high school in the State. These seminaries are to teach the Mormon students of the local public high school the polity and doctrines of the Mormon Church and thus prepare missionaries for work in various parts of the world.

There are also religion classes taught in the meeting houses on week days after the public school sessions. More than fifty thousand children of grade school age are thus being taught. Sometimes overzealous leaders will insist on teaching Mormon religion classes in public school buildings by public school teachers on public school time in defiance of the State law. A flagrant example of this is the persistent following of this practice last fall and winter at Payson and other nearby towns in Utah in spite of the vigorous protests of a Presbyterian missionary on the field.

Education, which was so thoroughly neglected by the Mormons in the early days in Utah, is now being pushed vigorously by them. It is safe to say that the Mormon Church is doing more to indoctrinate its young people in the articles of its faith than any other religious denomination in America.

We may now speak of the Protestant Christian schools, which do not form a system, but which labor together in sympathetic fashion and with a common aim, that of furnishing trained Christian leaders for Utah and the surrounding Mormon country.

A half century ago Protestant schools were planned for Utah and for the first thirty years the day schools and boarding academies were scattered all through the State and did a great work. Gradually the public schools took the place of the day schools and some of the academies gave way to the public high school.

To-day there are five Protestant academies in the State, counting the preparatory department of Westminster College. The Episcopalians support one, the Congregationalists another and the Presbyterians three. They are logical feeders for the one Protestant Christian college of the State, are well distributed and all should be maintained. Unlike Eastern States, the Christian academy will long be needed in Utah because of the large sections which will never be able to support a public high school, and because many non-Mormon parents are not satisfied to educate their children in public high schools where the schools are dominated by the Mormon Church.

Westminster College of Salt Lake City is the one Protestant Christian college of Utah. In fact, it is the only college of its type in Utah and four contiguous States—the only one in a territory one thousand miles long and one thousand miles wide. Every other college or university in Utah is either owned or controlled by the Mormon Church.

Organized twenty-five years ago and steadily growing these later years, it is still but a junior college, being handicapped because of lack of funds. If ever a strong four-year Christian college was needed anywhere, it is needed in Utah under the shadow of the Mormon Church. Courses for the bachelors' degrees will be offered just as soon as financial help makes that possible.

Westminster College is perhaps the most striking example in America of Protestant Christian co-operation in college education. Although it is technically a Presbyterian institution and is loyal to Presbyterian ideals in education, it is practically interdenominational in its operation. Six denominations are co-operating in the development of the college. Not only are they helping locally with students and money, but the boards of education of these denominations are considering the appropriation of sufficient money to support a professor each in the college.

Because of its strong Mormon population, Utah is missionary territory for a Christian college. Because there are only four self-supporting Presbyterian churches in the State, and not more than a dozen of all Protestant denominations, Westminster stands as probably the most thoroughly missionary college in America.

In spite of its handicaps of various sorts, this college has multiplied its student body three hundred per cent. in nine years and has a scholastic record of high standards not equalled in the past five years by any college or university in Utah.

Westminster enrolls students from the houses of Mormons, Apostate Mormons, Catholics, Jews, Christian Scientists, Unitarians and all types of Protestant faith found in Utah.

These students come into a college whose program is planned for the definite teaching of Christianity by precept and example. Contact of teacher and student is close. Evening prayers are held in each dormitory. Every student carries a Bible course as long as he is in school. Required chapel attendance on school days and on Sunday, active Christian associations, Christian teachers, an annual evangelistic and vocational week—these indicate that making "full-grown men after the pattern of Jesus Christ" is the definite aim of this one Christian college located at the heart of Mormonism.

When you ask why Mormons, Jews, etc., will send their young people to a school with such a definite Christian program, we can only say that many parents desire above all else that their children become men and women of good character. Westminster's reputation for fashioning strong, wholesome men and women has spread far and wide and her halls are crowded with students.

So important does the Presbyterian General Board of Education regard this strategic college, which many believe is the greatest single factor in the solution of the Mormon problem, that it has made Westminster a "special object" and is co-operating to bring it before the entire Presbyterian Church for financial help. President H. W. Reherd has been invited by many of the prominent churches to tell the fascinating story of his work in Utah and during the coming months will be heard in many of the pulpits of the East.

On the Top of a Basket

By William Willard Howard

UP a creaking stair at the rear of an old wooden building in a city over against the borders of Bolshevik Russia, along a covered passage through which dry snow oozed like drifting smoke, through a bare, bleak room that once had been the kitchen of an upper-floor apartment, thence into a room that had been a pantry—a narrow space about the size of a ship's stateroom—lighted dimly by a small window, one broken pane of which was pasted over with a sheet of paper.

In this diminutive place there was neither bed nor chair nor table nor any scrap of food; yet was it a home—for in it abode faith and hope and a yearning mother-love.

Two planks supported by boxes served as the semblance of a bed, on which there was neither mattress nor blankets nor sheets nor pillow-slips. An up-ended box, on which I was invited to sit, was the only substitute for a chair. On the floor against the wall opposite the narrow doorway was a flat-top wicker basket, perhaps fourteen inches wide and eighteen inches long. Under the window stood a cross-legged toilet stand of ancient pattern masquerading as a table. Pinned to the wall, where the feeble light from the window fell upon it, was a photograph of a good-looking young man of the intellectual type—one of the intelligentsia of monarchist Russia who had fled from home to escape death at the hands of revolutionists. Except an insignificant sheet-iron stove, in which there was not any fire, there was not one other thing in the room.

A young woman, clad in a coarse woolen skirt and a jacket on which a succession of patches had reduced rather materially the area of the original cloth, bade we welcome. She had called upon Anne Louise Howard early the same morning asking for work at making the hand-embroidered, hand-sewn Russian Princess Blouses that I now am offering for sale as a means of helping destitute members of the nobility and intelligentsia of monarchist Russia who fled for their lives at the time of the revolution. My call was our usual visit of investigation.

The young woman explained that her husband was a musician and music publisher, and that until the coming of war he had owned a prosperous music store in a city in the interior of Russia. The revolution destroyed his music store and drove him, his wife and little daughter into exile in an alien land. The husband had not been able to obtain any sort of employment, even at cleaning streets or cutting firewood. He had gone recently to the lumber camps of the interior seeking work. No word had come from him since he left.

As in duty bound, I made inquiry concerning the young woman's domestic facilities for making blouses. Had she an embroidery needle? She could borrow a needle from a neighbor. It was this same neighbor who gave to her the use of the kitchen stove on which to cook her bowl of soup once a day.

"Have you a good lamp?" I asked. "You must have a lamp that will give a clear white light, for the days are short and the evenings long, and our embroidery requires such fine, precise needlework."

The young woman sighed, shook her head sadly, and took from the window sill a discarded perfumery bottle, through an opening in the nozzle of which she had threaded a cotton wick.

"This is my lamp," she said. "I found the old bottle in a garbage can. A neighbor gave me the wick."

I lighted the wick and held its flame alongside the burning match. The two flames were about equal in illuminating power.

"Do you expect to embroider blouses by the light of this firefly?" I asked.

"It is the best that I can do until I earn enough to buy a lamp with a glass chimney."

I unwrapped a bulky package that I had carried under my arm. "I have heard of your highly ingenious lamp," I said, "so on my way here I stopped at a shop and bought this new lamp with a glass chimney and a polished reflector. Now, let us pour the oil from your lamp into this new lamp, and let us see what sort of blaze it will make."

We poured the oil from the perfumery bottle into the glass bowl of the new lamp. There was just enough to wet the wick. Lighting the new lamp was a sort of ceremony. I held the lamp, the Russian lady of title who accompanied me as assistant investigator held the chimney, the young woman struck a match and lighted the wick. I hung the lighted lamp upon a nail in the wall. The clear, white flame burned bravely.

"Ah-h-h!" said three voices as one. "The beautiful light!"

"This is your lamp," said I to the young woman. "Anne Louise Howard gives it to you. She made inquiries after you called on her this morning. But of what use is the best of lamps without oil? You must have oil. Here is a piece of paper that you can exchange for oil at any shop."

I stepped back quickly and gave attention to the regulation of the wick, for I had seen tears fill the young woman's eyes to overflowing. Tears of gratitude embarrass and distress me. And the cause of this woman's grateful tears was only a glass lamp! The quick-witted Russian lady of title came to my relief by asking about the young woman's little daughter.

"My small daughter is at school," said the young woman. There was a touch of pride in the tone of her voice. "She goes to school every day. She will be home in an hour. It is a great comfort to me to know that I can send my little girl to school; there are so many among the Russian refugees who cannot send their children to school because of lack of shoes and stockings!"

"And also lack of food," said the Russian lady.

"Yes," I said. "A destitute woman came to Anne Louise Howard yesterday saying that she must have work in order that her sixteen-year-old daughter, who has free tuition in a private school, could have enough food to enable her to study. The woman explained that the girl was so hungry that she could not study; that black specks and little cloudy blurs floated across the pages of her books when she tried to get her lessons."

The two women looked at me, almost in compassion.

"Yes," said one; "but there are so many such!"

I looked around the bare room, at the narrow planks that served as bed.

"Where does your little daughter sleep?" I asked the young woman. "The bed is barely wide enough for one rather thin person."

"My little girl sleeps on the top of the basket," answered the woman.

I looked again at the flat basket—fourteen by eighteen.

"But there is not any mattress," I blundered on.

"You are sitting on it."

I rose hastily from the box on which I was seated. Something like a sofa cushion fell to the floor. It was not quite large enough to cover the top of the basket.

"Suppose that the little one stretched out in her sleep?" I went on. "Her little toes would freeze."

"She must not stretch out; she must sleep curled up like a kitten."

I wanted to ask about blankets and sheets and pillows and a fire in the small stove, but the situation was too painful for further probing. There are limits beyond which one cannot go.

"You will keep your little girl in school?" I said as I rose to go.

"If the American lady will let me make blouses," she answered. "To keep my little girl in school is now my one object in living. Aside from my loving duty as a parent, it is a patriotic duty to my country to educate my child and so prepare her to take her part in the restoration and upbuilding of our beloved Russia, now so cruelly wronged and basely betrayed. The day will come when this present madness will pass, when Russia will lie helpless and bewildered. In that day those of us who now are starving exiles in alien lands will be called upon to guide our country to a new life. The day may not come this year, nor next year; but when it does come we must be ready. We will be ready—those of us who survive starvation and grief and broken hearts."

"We must educate and train our children to follow in our footsteps. Unless we prepare our children for this patriotic service Russia will be two whole centuries rising to her proper place in the family nations. To this end our children must be fed and sent to school, no matter what privation we mothers must endure. For the sake of the future our children must come first. You see me in broken shoes and patched garments, but my little girl goes to school every day!"

It is thus that the nobility and intelligentsia of monarchist Russia seek to keep alight the torch of learning among their children. Some, by heroic self-sacrifice and infinite labor, do succeed in keeping their children in school. The secretary of the Y. W. C. A. told me that there were girls in her classes who did not know where their next meal was coming from. Many others, like the mother of the two little girls whose adventure in the playroom of the "Y" was described in "Gentle Waifs," published in THE CHRISTIAN WORK on May 5, are unable to send their children to school because of lack of food and shoes and stockings.

Yet it is literally true that the hope of a future Russia of progress and civilization rests to-day upon the top of a basket in an alien land, for this little girl, curled up like a kitten on the top of a basket in an ancient pantry, is typical of thousands upon thousands of other little girls upon whose well-being rests the future of their native land. Unless the little girls and their little brothers can be saved Russia will be lost to civilization for two hundred years.

We paid out many millions of dollars to keep peasant children of Russia from starving to death during the past two years. Shall we let the children of the exiled nobility and intelligentsia perish of hunger? Are they not as well worth saving?

As I already have made known in these pages, Anne Louise Howard has put into operation in a city of Eastern Europe a relief industry in which two hundred exiled Russian gentlewomen are employed at making hand-embroidered, hand-sewn blouses. I will send to anyone who wants it a forty-page booklet giving photo-engravings of twenty-five of the blouses. The proceeds of the sales of blouses are cabled to Eastern Europe to be used over again in giving further employment.

Many women are asking for work. Most of them have young children who need shoes and stockings. We will put these women to work if we can have a larger working fund. Contributions to the working fund, in any amount, will be welcomed. The address is The Russian Refugee Fund, care THE CHRISTIAN WORK, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

The Minister vs. The Fire Department Horse

By Will H. Hays

Head of the Motion Picture Industry and Member of the Committee on Ministerial Relief and Sustentation of the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A.

[The following article is part of the address given by Mr. Hays at the Presbyterian General Assembly at Indianapolis last week. The address speaks for itself.]

THERE is no career among men to-day that is as fine and helpful as that of the true clergyman, through whom "we perceive the light, and whence it flows . . . and by that vision splendid are on our way attended."

His place in the community is the all important one. His church represents in the town a spiritual province of which he is the head, and he is the moving force in all efforts for civic betterment and public welfare, for improvement of education, for the elevation of moral and intellectual standards.

We can not realize what the minister means to the individual or to the community until we try to imagine what existence would be without him. No worship, no sacraments, no baptism, no marriage ceremony, save the signing of a contract; at the grave, the lowering of the coffin in silence with no word of to-morrow. We could not bear it a week. We would starve. We could not exist as a nation if we did not have among us, working early and late, interpreters of God, reminding us in days of prosperity, as in days of adversity, that, in the last analysis the eternal things are the only things that count.

And what do we do for those who furnish the leaven for our individual lives and for our national life? We magnificently reward those who buy and sell; we reward well, but not quite so well, those who produce the things which others buy and sell; what now do we do for those who neither produce nor deal in material things, but whose function is to interpret eternity to the struggling heart, to lead to God the bewildered and wayward children of men? Do we give them riches? Do we give them fame? Do we give them, at least, freedom from the bondage of care? We give them not riches, nor fame nor freedom. We give them hand-to-mouth living. We give them what amounts in many cases to grinding poverty. We give them exhausting labor without making adequate provision for them, when the labor shall have exhausted them. We hang the dread of old age like a millstone about their necks.

Consider the lives of these men with their work never done. At all hours they must be ready to give the new hope, and all that that means to man. Rain and storm offer no excuse to these physicians of the soul when their services are required. In and through the various and varying lives in his charge the minister moves and labors. The artisan and the professional man come to an end of their day and go home; the clergyman's home as well as his church is his workshop. The rest of the world gets a day off from labor on Sunday, but not the minister. It is the one most crowded life, filled, for him who would conscientiously be a "minister" to his people, with endless pain and struggle and apprehension. Is it wise, is it just, is it Christian, is it decent to add financial care to a minister's other burdens; and to his other anxieties to add the anxiety for his family's welfare, if he should die, or for his own helpless old age? We provide for our own old age; we speak with scorn of those who fail so to provide, who become a public charge, who allow their dependents to become a public charge after their death. But those, who fulfill what is at its best the highest function in a community which any man can fulfil, we give to those a pittance without hope of provision for the future! We ask them to lead us to the kingdom of heaven; in our joys and perplexities and griefs, we ask them to interpret to us the laws of eternal life; but we say to them, You shall not only show us the light; you shall not only serve us and our children day in, day out; but you shall know poverty and want; your wife shall work from early morning till late at night; she shall have no help; she shall wash her own dishes, sew her own clothes and her children's clothes or be dependent on the generosity of your parishioners for their cast-off garments. And all the while she, too, shall serve the parish. She shall be a leader among the women, at her husband's right hand, the first in good works. Together you shall receive, to keep you and your family clothed and fed, about thirty dollars a week—scarcely more than the wage of the garbage collector, one-half the wage of a carpenter, one-third the wage of a mason. For the builders of the walls of the temple, one-third the wage of the bricklayers on an apartment house!

Do you think I am exaggerating? Let me give you some figures. The ten thousand Presbyterian clergymen receive an annual salary of $1,803. That is $34.67 per week. Since we are generally—or so our statisticians say—an urban sect, it is fair to compare the $34.67 a week average we pay our clergymen with the wages of city workers in general industry. I wonder if you realize how it compares?

The lumber industry is a great business, and lumber workers are men of brawn and courage and importance in the world. In 1921 the average weekly earning of a band sawyer was $46.07. The cotton manufacturing business helps clothe the world. In 1920 card grinders got $30.98 a week, speeder tenders $30.65, loom fixers $35.76, beamer tenders $36.19 and mule spinners $40.39.

Is the Presbyterian ministry relatively on a fair proportion with lumber and cotton mill work?

In 1921, in the slaughter and packing house industry, their blacksmiths got $32.06 a week; boilermakers, $32.06; bricklayers, $51.33. During 1922 boot and shoe hand cutters were paid $38.11, hand cutters of linings, $33.82; outsole cutters, $34.59, and sole layers $31.32.

The proper disposition of a cow's carcass and hide is important to the daily material life of mankind, but is the weekly pay of the Presbyterian clergy on a proper level with what meat workers and shoe factory employees are paid?

In the great steel industry, without which the world could not keep pace with its needs for one hour, 1920 weekly pay statistics show stokers earning $39.68; larryman's helpers, $39.09; blowers, $62.87; stove tenders, $43.38; cinder-men, $37.85, and laborers, $34.60. In comparison with the thirty-one cents per hour average we pay our clergymen—for they work sixteen hours every day—during 1921 iron molders were paid forty cents and plasterers forty-four cents. To match our $34.67 a week, painters had an average of $37.40 and structural iron workers $41.80, while chauffeurs, teamsters and drivers were paid an average of more than $30 a week, in most cases including board.

In 1906 the average pay of a minister was $663 a year, and for Protestant denominations alone it was even less.

In 1918 the average salary of clergymen in ten of the largest Protestant denominations was $793 a year, an average raise of less than twenty per cent. in twelve years, with the cost of living increased seventy-eight per cent. In 1918 the Presbyterian Church reported an actual budget in each of 5,817 churches of less than $1,200, indicating a lower salary in more than half of our pulpits. Two out of every three clergymen in 1918 were paid less than one thousand dollars a year.

In 1916, of the one hundred and seventy thousand active clergymen in the United States, only 1,671 reported to the Income Tax Bureau total incomes in excess of three thousand dollars. This, of course, included income from private property.

In the same year of 1916, 21,273 lawyers—or one in five—and 20,348 doctors—or one in seven and one-half—reported incomes more than three thousand dollars a year, as against 1,671 ministers—or one in one hundred.

I know that people say when their attention is called to the contrast between the wages of an unskilled hand worker and of a highly trained minister of the church, "The services the clergy renders cannot be paid for and should not be measured in terms of dollars and cents." Fine—but also rank cant and hypocrisy. The men we ask to serve us, to minister to our spiritual needs, we ask them to serve us not in heaven but on earth, not in paradise, but in New York, Chicago, St. Louis, Indianapolis, and Sullivan, Indiana, and in ten thousand little towns and villages where milk costs so much a quart and eggs so much a dozen and meat so much a pound. If the Church does not give these men enough money to buy what the rest of us regard as necessities of life they have to forego the necessities and thank God for the substitutes. An artificially pious official complained to a preacher concerning his request for an increase in salary. "Why, doctor, I thought you were preaching for souls." The clergyman quickly responded, "I can not live on souls, and if I could it would take one thousand the size of yours to make one square meal."

As Uncle Remus remarked, "You can't preach heah and bo'd in heaven."

The world long has known that no man can do his best when he is beset with present need and future fear; man must have mental peace; worry is the hidden Apache which kills the best efforts of our race, and if we would have strong ministers to combat the rising cynicism of the time we must let them think in peace, forge their weapons for our defense in peace, set apart from the shadows to save the Church and the world in peace!

The laborer is worthy of his hire, and his hire should in decency be adjusted to the common needs of self-respecting men.

The immediate purpose of finding the means of increasing our own relief and sustentation funds should not be difficult.

The Prebyterian Church with its two million members is as strong numerically as were the thirteen colonies when they declared and won their independence from Great Britain. We can and will arrange the simple details incident to doing our duty toward those to whom we cheerfully confess our great indebtedness—the white-crowned veterans of the Presbyterian pulpit!

You do not need any arguments from me as to what pensions in any occupation will do. Many of those who will give to this cause will give from the wisdom of their own experience. It is now the enlightened policy of industry to care for the veterans who have given their lives to it; industry finds that its employees work better when this dread of future hardship is lifted from their minds and political prophets see the end of the disturber when we shall have given to old age everywhere the assurance of a peaceful decline after the dust and sweat of the day are gone.

Our "soulless corporations" with more conscience than most of our churches in this regard find it good business to pension well their faithful employees; the Army and Navy set splendid examples; and the City of New York extends the same benevolences even to the horses of the fire department when they are worn out and sends them to the upstate farm to be well cared for during the rest of their lives.

It is grotesque to care for the old age of firemen, policemen, soldiers, workmen in all other lines—just and wise as all this is—yet leave the leaders of our only really indispensable work to the tender mercies of a frigid world!

I will not mince words on this subject. I have spoken frankly, as you would have me speak. This is not a new subject to me, and I do not speak as a recent convert. I have in my desk a printed copy of an effort I tried to make for the underpaid preacher eleven years ago, and that address was merely an amplification of a speech I had made on the same subject eight years before that. I am after this thing now in earnest, and I do not propose to let it fail. We will raise what is needed, of course, without question, without hesitation, without apprehension. And then we must strike out beyond that, go to the fundamental causes that underlie the problem of the underpaid clergy, and find a remedy. This is, as I said, not our problem alone. It is a problem which all the other churches share with us. But let it be said that the Presbyterian Church took the lead in its solution. It is the kind of leadership which I believe the Leader of leaders will not look upon with disapproval.

Ours be the triumph! Humanity calls!

Life's not a dream in the clover.

On, to the walls, on, to the walls,

On to the walls, and OVER!

Prodigal Daughters*

By Joseph Hocking

SYNOPSIS

Colonel Lester Trelawney arrives home in England after six years of military service in India and Mesopotamia to find his two daughters sadly beset by the flood of new morals, and ethics and dress of the "younger generation." Eleanor, he soon discovers, is associating with young women of strange tendencies. Tamsin Cory, her most intimate friend, believes that girls should "have their fling like their brothers." Peggy has been "keeping company" with a young man of doubtful character. Both have been coming home at all hours of the night. After an unsatisfactory interview with the girls, the Colonel meets "Barnes" and forbids further acquaintance with Peggy. While the Colonel is visiting his son both girls pack up and leave home. He receives a note from Barnes asking for a meeting. In the course of the conversation Barnes hints that Peggy is living with him and if the Colonel will do the "right thing," he will marry her. He is thoroughly thrashed by John and her address is finally secured.

INSTALLMENT XI.

ELEANOR AND PEGGY DEFIANT.

"HOW are you, Peg? You haven't been lonely, have you? I tried to come home sooner, but couldn't. Oh, I forgot, this is my friend Jenkins. You don't know Jenkins, do you? He's a white man, white through and through. Bit of a swell, too, in his way. This is my wife, Jenkins."

"Pleased to meet you, Mrs. Barnes," said Jenkins, evidently trying to appear sober. "If I am not too late I should like to congratulate you. Splendid fellow, your husband. One of the very best. No flies on Barnes."

The girl looked at them both, speechless, and a sense of horror possessed her. In the past she had admitted that Barnes was a little bit gay, without ever realizing what it meant. Now, as she saw his bloodshot eyes and blotched cheeks she, for the first time, felt the gulf that existed between her father and the man she had married.

"What's the matter, Jim?" she asked. "Have you met with an accident?"

"No, my dear, no accident, but—but—you tell her, Jenkins. My head's a little bit dizzy."

"We've had rather an exciting time, Mrs. Barnes," giggled Jenkins. "We've had an interview with your father."

Peggy hated the thought of this man, a stranger, too, being cognizant of her private affairs, but she was eager to know what had taken place. "How did you get on?" she asked. "What did you say?"

"Your father's no gentleman," hiccuped Barnes with drunken gravity. "I'm sorry to say it, Peg, but he's no—no—gentleman." and he had difficulty in enunciating the words. "He wouldn't see anything in a reasonable light, and he insulted me. But I'll pay him out for it. By—by God, I'll pay him out for it!"

"But what happened?" cried the girl. "There is a nasty wound on your face, and your lip is cut open. What have you been doing?"

"Peg," he said solemnly, "I'm disappointed. All my finer feelings are wounded. I don't mind what he said to me so much but I can't forgive his hard-heartedness to you. He refused to forgive us, Peg, and it nearly broke my heart. It did, straight. That's why I'm afraid I took a drop too much whisky: I felt down-hearted, and I wanted cheering up. How could I help it? I did not mind his insulting me, but how dare he insult you, Peg?"

"Yes, but tell me what happened, Jim. How did you get that nasty place on your face, and that horrible cut on your lip?"

"Oh, that's all right, Peg. I paid him out for that, didn't I, Jenkins? He'll not forget the licking I gave him in a hurry, will he, old man? He'll have to lie in bed for a week."

"Who'll to have to lie in bed for a week?" asked Peggy quickly. "My father?"

"No, that whipper-snapper brother of yours. I took it out of him. I've owed it him for a long time. He'll never call me a bounder and a dirty swine again. I knocked all the stuffing out of him. Didn't I, Jenkins?"

"That you did, old man," said Jenkins. "He had the licking of his life. Well, I must be going now. Good-night, Mrs. Barnes. I congratulate you again. You've got a white man, through and through. Take it from me, there are no flies on Barnes. Good-night."

He left the room as he spoke, and Peg and Barnes were together.

"Never mind, Jim," she said; "we can do without them."

"Of course we can, old girl," replied the man solemnly. "You shall have your Rolls-Royce yet. All the same, I'm very sad, Peg. He insulted you, he did. I don't care anything about myself, but he insulted you. He called you names and said you should never darken his doors again. I think I'll go to bed. I'm not very well. I'm very tired, and I'm wounded in the heart. I'm a bit dizzy, too. Will you help me, Peg?"

She led him into the little bedroom where he, without undressing, threw himself on the bed, and a few seconds later was fast asleep. The girl returned to the sitting room, and sat for a long time in deadly silence. In her eyes was a look difficult to describe.

The next morning when Barnes awoke he was in an evil humor. His head ached badly and his limbs were sore. As he looked into the glass and saw his discolored face and cut lip he muttered savagely. As for Peggy, she had spent a sleepless night, but although she felt utterly miserable, she was wise enough to be silent. She sat with him without a word while he ate his breakfast, and heaved a sigh of relief when at length the time came for him to go to business.

"I'm a nice sight, aren't I?" he snarled just before he left the flat.

Still the girl did not speak.

"What are you thinking about?" he asked roughly. "Don't look at me like that."

"It's all right, Jim," she said, trying to smile. "We shall both be better presently."

"We need to be. Look here, Peg, we'll have to do something to—" He hesitated as if trying to make up his mind how to say something. Then looking at his watch he gave an exclamation as if of relief. "I must be off," he said. "So long, old girl."

"Mind, Alice, I'm afraid we are not taking a wise step," said Colonel Trelawney a few minutes after their interview with Eleanor.

"I cannot help it, Lester. I feel I must see her—talk to her."

"Yes, I can understand that, but what can we say to her? That man will, of course, have given a garbled story of our meeting last night, and Peggy will be more rebellious than ever. Our interview with Eleanor has been a failure, and it will be worse with her."

"I don't know that it has been a failure," replied the mother. "At any rate, I feel we have done what is right. Of course, it is all heart-breaking and awful to think about. I know, too, that they have been bad children, and that they have spurned your kindness, but I cannot help it. I must see her!"

"But it can lead to no good. Had we not better wait a few days and then you go alone? Don't mistake me, Alice, I think I want to see Peg as badly as you do, but we must try to be wise."

Presently they found the number of Peggy's room, and knocked.

The Colonel heard Barnes' voice. "Some one's knocking at the door, Peg. You go—all right, then—I'm not fit to be seen, but I'll open it."

He opened the door as he spoke, and seeing who his visitors were started back in astonishment.

Barnes had evidently done his best to remove all traces of his last night's encounter, and on the whole had been fairly successful. It is true that the court-plaster on his cheek did not improve his appearance, while his left eye showed unpleasant discolorment. Still he was well dressed and showed no signs of having been drinking. Peggy had done her best to prepare a meal which would be pleasing to him, and had succeeded in doing so. She was at that moment getting dressed in order to go out with her husband.

"I say, Peg," shouted Barnes after he had overcome his astonishment, "here are visitors! Your father and mother have come to see you. Won't you sit down, Colonel? And you, too, Mrs. Trelawney. I'm sure Peggy will be delighted to see you."

The Colonel did not take the chair which Barnes had indicated, however, while Mrs. Trelawney looked eagerly around the room as if in search of some one.

"Where is Peggy?" she asked.

"In her bedroom dressing, Mrs. Trelawney. I was just going to take her out to a theater. Peg, your mother's waiting for you."

The man spoke nervously, uneasily, but with an evident desire to please his visitors. Furtively but eagerly he scanned the Colonel's face as if trying to discover signs of relenting.

"Ah, there you are, Peg," he went on as the girl entered the room. "This is a surprise for you, isn't it? Colonel, can't I offer you some refreshment? Let me get you a whisky and soda."

As far as the Colonel was concerned, Barnes might never have spoken. He took no notice of him whatever, but kept his eyes fixed on his daughter. He did not speak, however.

Mrs. Trelawney, on the other hand, rushed towards her girl and kissed her.

"Oh, Peg, my darling!" she sobbed.

"Hello, mother," and although her voice was somewhat unnatural, Peggy tried to assume her old defiant attitude. "So you have found us out, then?"

"Of course we have," replied the mother. "How could we do otherwise?"

"Oh, I don't know. I didn't think you would. Of course, I have been a naughty girl, and so I thought I should be crossed off the book of your remembrance." She spoke flippantly, almost insolently.

"But, Peg, my darling," pleaded the mother, "you knew we should want to know where you were. How could you?"

"How could I what?"

"Why—why this," and the mother looked around the room.

"I can't help it if you are not pleased," and she still kept up her defiant tones. "I told you I should do it."

"Come, come, Peg," pleaded Barnes, "that's not the way to treat your mother. Of course, we loved each other, and we got married in a hurry. Perhaps we were not wise, but we acted in love, and—and anybody could forgive that," and again Barnes gave the Colonel a covert glance.

But Peggy was not in the mood to be amiable. She remembered Barnes' description of his interview with her father on the previous night, and she felt angry and rebellious. She was ashamed, too, that her parents should see the kind of home to which Barnes had brought her; but she was too proud to confess it, even to herself. She wanted them to believe she was proud of what she had done—that she was justified in her action.

"It's no use your coming here to cry over me, mother," she went on. "You know what father said to me, and—and I told you what I should do. Well, I've done it, and I would do it again. What right had he to interfere with me?"

"Is that all you have to say, Peggy?" asked the mother sorrowfully.

"What else is there to say?" retorted the girl. "Of course, in a way I am sorry I had to leave you, and if he had not come home," she looked towards her father as she spoke, "things might have been different."

"Then you don't care about breaking our hearts?" said the mother a little unwisely.

"Oh, don't talk bosh," replied Peggy flippantly. "As I have said, I am sorry for you, mother, but you'll get over it. As for him," and again she looked towards her father, "I don't see what he has to bother about."

"Evidently," said the Colonel, speaking for the first time, "you have decided that I have no right to come here, no right to interfere. Evidently, too, you think you know better than I as to what is good for you, and you have acted on your own judgment rather than on mine. That being so, I have no more to say about it. I have only this to tell you, Peggy, although you admit you have no affection for me, I cannot help loving you. Even yet, you are my child."

"Yes," broke in Mrs. Trelawney, "and our home is still your home, Peg."

"What's the use of saying that, mother, when you know he won't have it so? Will he let me bring home Jim? I have married the man I love. Will he let me bring him home as my husband?"

"That's it, old girl," assented Barnes. "You've hit the nail on the head there. That's what I call the 'acid test.' I have done the straight thing. I never asked Peg a word about what dowry she would have, or anything of that sort. I might have married money and have been helped to make a home and set up in business. But I didn't do it. I followed my heart, and married the girl I loved. Now then, Colonel, you insulted me last night, do the straight thing now."

The Colonel gave Barnes a glance of contempt, and then turned to his wife. "I don't think we can do any good by staying here longer, Alice," he said. "Let us go home.

Good-night, Peggy. You don't believe it now, but the time will come when you'll know I acted for the best, and that in spite of everything you are very dear to me. I want you to remember that—always."

He took his wife's arm as he spoke and drew her towards the door, as though the interview was ended, but evidently this was not according to Barnes' ideas.

"Have you nothing to say to me?" persisted Barnes.

"No," replied the Colonel.

COUNTRY CHURCH DEPARTMENT

A Community of Contrasts—I.

By Marjorie Patten

IN the midst of the great cattle country of northeast New Mexico, in a valley of Colfax County, where the mountains meet the plains, stands a busy, new community church which has been built for the service of a frontier parish covering two thousand square miles of territory. It is the result of a "we-did-it effort," proclaims the free, virile, out-of-doors spirit of the builders, and is supported by cowboys, cattle ranchers, lumbermen, business men, bankers and prospectors. They are of all denominations—and none. They know not fences. Their only boundaries are the Rocky Mountains. The community in which this church is located is called Cimarron, and a picturesque, colorful community it is, with its golden wheat fields and great ranches on every side, its mountain roads winding away through green canyons, and among the bald peaks, its great open spaces, its clear, bracing air and its gorgeous sunsets.

Cimarron village is scarcely a mile square, and in it live about three hundred Americans and as many Mexicans. Once only a station on the Santa Fe trail, it is to-day a vigorous, prospering western community. The traveler finds no monotony here, no dead level existence. He glories in the freedom from the beaten track, the perfect climate, and as he passes through the village he feels very much as if he were in a story-book country.

Many times a day he meets Gil Traveller, the young fair-haired, bronzed preacher of the Community Church and Cimarron's best-known citizen. Sometimes he meets him going west, sometimes east, sometimes south and north. Sometimes the cow-puncher preacher is dressed in the garb of an American gentleman driving his big Buick car to the Casa del Gavalon to dine with Mr. and Mrs. Nairn; again he races by in the saddle, his purple satin shirt rustling in the wind, corduroy riding trousers, high soft leather boots and big beaver hat with its band of rattlesnake skin. The corner store man tells the stranger, "The preacher goes most everywhere and knows everybody by his first name," and that "there isn't a cowboy in the place that wouldn't do anything under the sun for Reverend Traveller."

There are all sorts of amusements in this great country. If a person desires solitude, he may ride over trails leading into the wilderness; if he desires society, he will soon find that Cimarron is not so far from New York as he thought. After a warm welcome at one of the homes he wonders if this is the "wild and woolly" west after all, yet just outside the Rockies rise up and up. As he stands looking out over the landscape the butler announces dinner and he follows his host into the softly lighted dining hall and is soon discussing topics of the day. He remembers that only this morning he cantered over to Maxwell, to where the C. S. cowboys were holding a cattle dipping, and that this noon he had sat on the sand of the prairie and watched Tom, the cow-puncher chef, prepare a meal of beans, sour dough biscuits and coffee on a stove which was no more than a three-foot trench with iron bars extended above. He decides these are simply more of Cimarron's magnificent contrasts, and he lets it go at that.

Cimarron's sidewalks are paved, if you please. The village has its own waterworks and telephone exchange. "You'll find no tin cans in our yards, and have you noticed our well-trimmed hedges?" said a proud citizen.

Economic records tell of long continued success in accumulating wealth in this community. Church records tell a different story, though from the very first days of Protestant settlement the faithful few have tried again and again to build up a strong religious life in Cimarron. Storms, dissension, fire, denominational antagonism, indifference, all have thwarted the progress of the church from the early days when the pastor of the Methodist church, South, hired the band of saloon toughs to go in the night to the Methodist church, North, and steal the only church property it had—the church organ! Finally a church was built, but in 1918 forty-two inches of snow crushed the crude little church to the ground. A few old pews and a piano from which the melody had long since fled were saved from the debris and stored away in one end of a butcher shop. Then came a new day to the religious life of Cimarron, New Mexico. - Rev. "Gil" Traveller, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, North, arrived at Hebron, a little junction point on

Nehemiah, the Bold Builder

NEHEMIAH 4:6-15.

"Be not afraid of them: remember the Lord."—Neh. 4:14.

GREAT men, mighty in intellect and trustworthy in character, are God's best gifts to mankind. Would-be leaders are many. They often win a multitude of followers with aims like their own. Real leaders are few. Every citizen owes fealty to those chosen to responsible positions in state or church. To give them a fair trial he will strive to promote and make evident every virtue they possess. To those found qualified for their task he will give his unstinted support. He will freely show his appreciation of their abilities and of their devotion to their trust. His criticisms though just will be generous. He will jealously cherish his sense of partnership with them in their high endeavor for the public good. On the other hand, every true leader seeks to cultivate the best in his followers. Their values are his possession. Their interests are his interests. He strives to unify his aims and theirs. When leader and people are united in worthy aims the achievements are great. They illumine the pages of history and immortalize its heroes.

Among the few whose luster is undimmed from age to age is the Jew, Nehemiah. His life story told in his own words reveal to us not only his work but his inward experiences. His character is one of the noblest in Hebrew history. He was the most influential man of the period of the renaissance of Judaism, when the library of the books of the Covenant was formed, the period which brought forth Jesus Christ, the Founder of the New Covenant. He is worthy of a place beside Abraham, Moses, Samuel, David and the prophets. We wonder that his name was not included in the list of heroes in the eleventh chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews. Let us consider his chief characteristics as revealed in his autobiography.

1. His unselfish interest in his fellowmen. He was a Jew, but born in a foreign land, and educated among people who knew little of what Jews cherished most and cared nothing for it. His interests were identical with those with whom he lived. He was in the midst of a prosperous career, which promised greater usefulness with higher honors. He held a high office in the court of the world empire of Persia. But one day a relative of his with trustworthy friends came to visit him in the royal palace. They brought him distressing news of his nation and theirs. Its capital was a crumbling ruin. The inhabitants of Judah were in helpless, hopeless misery. They told him their race was in imminent peril of becoming extinct.

Why should he care? His own fortunes were secure. Wealth, power, an honorable place with the best society in Persia, were already his. Probably he had never seen Jerusalem. He knew it only through the traditions of his fathers; its ancient splendor, once the dwelling-place of Jehovah his God, its age-long hope of blessing and renewing the world in righteousness. Only a profound interest in the welfare of those far-away Jews could have disturbed his peace.

But read his account of his meditations and prayers and plans following the tidings he had received. Note his thought of his God, "great and terrible," "who keepeth covenant and loving kindness with those that love him and keep his commandments." Mark his ever conscious identification of himself with his family and nation. "I and my father's house have sinned," he confessed. "We have not kept the commandments." If he had been less noble would he not have thrown the responsibility on them, blamed them for their perversity in which he had had no apparent share, and left them to their fate? Yet the true patriot cannot escape the burden of the sins of his countrymen nor of his misfortunes that follow. Christ could not. No more could Nehemiah. Whoever would save his nation from its sins must feel the stripes by which it is to be healed.

2. Nehemiah's sense of partnership with God. He knew the history of Israel. He knew how God had chosen her. He knew the promises his fathers had cherished. He believed they would be fulfilled. "If you return unto me I will gather your outcasts from the uttermost parts and will bring them to the place I have chosen." Nehemiah felt that he was giving himself to be God's instrument to fulfill his purpose. He proved it step by step as he went forward. When he was summoned into the king's presence he prayed, "Prosper thy servant this day and grant him mercy in the sight of this man." When the king asked him what he desired, he writes that before answering, "I prayed before the God of heaven." And he records the result, "The king granted me according to the good hand of God upon me." The man who loved his fellow men as Nehemiah loved, who loved his own country and people best, who knew his God and theirs, was ready for any service for which they needed him when God called him. He had come to know their need as his own. He had heard the call of his God and theirs, and he was answering it.

3. His qualities for leadership. He had undertaken, for good reasons, a definite task. He had decided what he needed in order to accomplish it. He had secured from the king permission to go to Jerusalem, and the equipment he asked for. Behold him, then, with a Persian army, captains and horsemen, escorting him. He carries royal authority, the way to Cimarron. As he waited for his train in the cold, dismal, snowy station he wondered why he had ever left Los Angeles, and when he reached Cimarron he still wondered.

There were neither church building nor parsonage, and only fourteen active members. There was a debt of $600 and services were being held in a rented building. Said Mr. Traveller, "I have had three pastorates and built two churches, why not add one more to my list?" And he went to work. He began to hold services in the butcher shop and opened his study in a little frame cabin. He surveyed the parish and found it in mining camps, logging camps, cow camps. He noted the new $875,000 irrigation project just completed at Eagle's Nest Dam. The Baptist and Methodist, South, organizations had abandoned the field. Antlers Parish, a territory twice the size of the State of Rhode Island, lay wholly in the hands of the organization he had come to serve. He found that he was the only Protestant pastor in all that great territory. There was Red River Canyon, where lived a hundred prospectors still waiting for their dream to come true; Elizabethtown, with a population of 150; the agricultural community of Merino Valley, with a population of 175, three-fourths of whom were Polish, Hungarians and other foreign nationalities, and four other neighborhoods. The preacher decided to serve them all, with the base of operation at Cimarron. He laid the facts before the Home Board, which furnished $4,000 for a new building. Six thousand dollars was raised locally and in 1921 a two-story brick building, an old-time dance hall, was purchased and remodelled for an up-to-date community church. The "whirlwind" Mr. Traveller stirred up all Cimarron to the project. Bankers, merchants, farmers, cow-punchers, ranchers, prospectors, miners and laborers all did their bit. One man, not a church member, came to Mr. Traveller saying, "I have five kiddies at home and I reckon a church of your kind is going to be worth $30 a piece to them. Here's $150." That man is Cimarron's truckman. It is this spirit that has given encouragement to the young pastor to "carry on."

In the congregation there are Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Baptists and Methodists, and they are working together and enjoying it. There is no question of "what denomination do you belong to?" Everyone is satisfied.

The community church is a strongly built, practical building that will stand through the storm and wind of this pioneer country. Its brick and stucco plainness adds dignity, and yet all about it there is a "come in" atmosphere. From the hall you enter a spacious dining hall on your left. At one end of the great beamed room are thirty little chairs in a circle. It is here that Mrs. Traveller and her kindergarten meet on Sunday mornings. You are told that "last Sunday every little chair was filled," and no wonder, for Mrs. Traveller is a wizard with little people and her enthusiasm reaches every corner of Cimarron. Even little Mexican boys and girls love to come to Sunday-school. From the dining room you proceed to the ladies' room, cozy in every detail, with its soft green silk side hangings, reading tables and easy chairs. Beyond is the young people's classroom, where hangs the banner for Sunday-school attendance. Here are maps and charts and blackboards. The remainder of the ground floor is given over to a marvelous kitchen equipped with the best modern devices.

Present Needs

The Board is asked for large appropriations from the missionary fields of the church, Cuba, Porto Rico and Alaska. Congregations, all over the land, are planning to build houses of worship and manses. The building task is increasing. Cost of labor and material is still high, and, in some sections of the country, is rising. The Board needs all its Budget and more, if the needs of our congregations and mission fields are to be met.

Total obligations and disbursement of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions for the year ending March 31st, 1923---$4,529,002.89.

Towards these obligations the total receipts and credits were $3,998,113.76 or $75,000 less than a year ago.

Causing a deficit for the year of $530,889.13.

To this new deficit must be added the old deficit amounting to $126,298.44.

Because of the increase in expenses for the conduct of the work and the failure of the Presbyterian Church to provide the usual annual increase in gifts for the support of its Foreign Mission Work the Board is compelled to report to the General Assembly an accumulated deficit of $657,187.57.

This deficit must be removed during the year.

opening the way for him to pass through provinces that might otherwise have been hostile, allowing him to appropriate provisions on the way, and to take with him materials for building the walls.

Arrived on the spot he viewed alone by night the work that awaited him. It was worse than he had expected. He guided the donkey he rode along the desolate ruin, over the heaps of stone and mortar, the charred timbers of the broken gates, till the rubbish blocked the way completely.
Then he turned back and went again into the silent city through the gate by which he had gone out. But he told no one the details of what he had seen and experienced that night. Calling together the rulers of the surrounding villages, the priests and other leaders, with those he expected would do the work, he pointed out to them what they all could see. He told them who he was, why he had come, what warrant he brought that the city their fathers and they had loved could be restored.

He found those on whose help he must rely in no better condition than the walls themselves. They were discouraged, disorganized, inefficient and wretchedly poor.
But he chose the right moment to tell them of the good hand of God on him, what the king had promised, what he had already done, what they could do and how they could do it. He brought his address to a climax by crying, "Let us build up the wall of Jerusalem." They caught his enthusiasm and echoed his cry. "Let us rise up and build," they shouted. "So," he writes,
"they strengthened their hands for the good work." This one leader's wisely directed courage permeated the whole people. His slaves, whom he had brought with him from Persia, probably cared little for the city that had long ago fallen into ruin so far from their own homes. But he roused them to such zeal that neither they nor he nor his associates put off their clothes for fifty-two nights till their task was done. He took the people as they were and led them to do their best. He united with them in things in which they were agreed, and fixed their attention on those things, instead of on those about which they differed.

The Hymn-Book Engineer

When you plan a church edifice you consult an architect; when you want an organ you go to an organ builder. The Hymn-Book is just as important. Consult a man who is giving his life to the development of congregational singing. H. Augustine Smith has done more for church music than any man of this generation.

494 Hymns and Tunes with the words printed in the music.

30 pages of chants and responses marking a new epoch in chanting and antiphonal singing.

An outstanding series of responsive readings and services of worship, prepared by

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN WORK:

As a European from a neutral country and being by my international activity in constant touch with representatives from all European countries, I cannot let pass without protestation the thesis of Mr. William W. Howard in the last number of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, pretending that Europe is full of hatred towards America. This is a colossal misinterpretation of certain facts and a quite fallacious generalization according to the ancient proverb "dolus est in generalibus." Mr. Howard must surely have a very suggestive way of asking people for arriving at such a conclusion. He could, for sure, not have found the feeling of hatred in France, Belgium, and the Scandinavian and other neutral countries. This would simply be untrue. The question, however, is whether such hatred is to be found in the European peoples who have lost the war through America's participation in it. Although I am in constant contact with hundreds of men and women of these countries, I never heard one word of hatred, but very frequently the expression of another feeling which is widely spread all over Europe: it is disappointment, but not hatred. This has little to do with America's participation in the war, but with the fact that America towards the end of the war launched a great constructive program, but kept aloof when real international co-operation was expected. America announced a great idea to the suffering world and then fell silent. This silence is terrible to the European peoples who, not to be identified with their governments, had expected that America would assume a widely recognized leadership in constructive work and international co-operation. Though this disappointment sometimes may be worded in strong language by ignorant and incompetent people, it is not to be confounded with hatred. It would quickly disappear if America would assume that place in international constructive co-operation which we all desire it would take.

For Churches Old or New

ONE of the attractive features of Wilson Sectionfold partitions is that they can be made to match any style of architecture or decoration. That is the result of our "made to your order" method of construction.

No matter what you have, or are going to have in the way of decoration, we can match it exactly. And for churches already built, we can make and install the partitions without in any way interfering with the regular church activities.

If you believe one-half century of experience in building church folding and rolling partitions can be of service to you, we would be glad to talk with you or send you an illustrated, fully descriptive booklet.

give to the Sunday-school teacher inspiring and practical insight into the essential spiritual messages of the International Uniform Lessons. The book consists of a series of short expository sermons on the lessons by such leading American preachers as Francis E. Clark, W. E. Barton, Charles Reynolds Brown, William Elliot Griffis, Cornelius H. Patton, John E. Tuttle, and others.

Dr. Frederick Lynch, editor of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, says in a recent letter:

"The other day The Monday Club Sermons for 1923 happened to come to my hand, and I was very much impressed both by the list of contributors, and by the unusually fine standard of the execution."

Dr. Lynch has arranged with us to run The Monday Club Sermons serially in THE CHRISTIAN WORK, beginning with the January 27th issue. But many Sunday-school teachers, pastors and superintendents will wish to own the whole series, so as to have it at all times conveniently at hand. #### DR. LOWELL CHALLENGES PRESIDENT HARDING TO PROVE THAT THE THIRTY-ONE ERRED

Both President Lowell of Harvard University and Justice Clark of the League of Nations meeting referred to above challenged President Harding to prove that he had not meant that he had been opposed to entering the League without substantial reservations when he allowed the thirty-one Republicans to sign the now famous letter inviting the people of the United States to vote for Mr. Harding on the ground that he would get them into the League. President Lowell insists that all of the thirty-one understood that Mr. Harding was in favor of entering the present League with such reservations as would safeguard the rights of the United States. This was what the thirty-one Republicans clearly understood, and Dr. Lowell added that the President had been so busy in the last two years that he seemed to have forgotten these facts.' Dr. Lowell reviewed President Harding's various speeches on the League and contended that they all pointed to this fact, and that they also proved that Mr. Harding was not against entering the League on any terms. Justice Clark said that the President had never dissented from the declaration made by the thirty-one Republicans that the issue was not League or no League, but whether the League should be accepted in a changed or unchanged form. President Lowell seems to feel with the Hon. Everett Colby that many of the Republicans in the United States who would have voted for Mr. Cox because of their desire to enter the League were deceived by the letter of the thirty-one, and that the thirty-one were innocent perpetrators of this deception. Both President Lowell and Justice Clark maintain that every one of the men who signed that letter did it with the sincerest conviction that President Harding would do everything in his power to accomplish the entrance of the United States into the present League with such modifications as the Senate might desire. Both of these addresses have attracted wide attention throughout the nation; some of the New York papers having printed them in full. It is a pretty serious thing, Dr. Lowell says, for these thirty-one Republicans to send out a letter containing this paragraph, "The question, accordingly, is not between a League and no League, but is whether certain provisions in the proposed League agreement shall be accepted unchanged or shall be changed," and then to have it absolutely ignored by the President. Both President Lowell and Justice Clarke insist that the great Republican majority at the last election was not a mandate against the League, but that many of these votes were secured on the understanding stated explicitly in the letter of the thirty-one that a vote for Mr. Harding was the shortest way to speedily enter the League. If the Washington meeting is any reflection of the state of opinion in the United States a very decided interest in the League of Nations is being aroused.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS NON-PARTISAN ASSOCIATION MOVES ON WASHINGTON

The League of Nations advocates have moved upon Washington and the irreconcilables have at last exhibited something of a panic. A great public mass meeting in Memorial Continental Hall, within shouting distance of the State Department, was held on the evening of Tuesday, May 22, and Justice Clark, President Lowell of Harvard University and Miss Grace Abbott all urged the entrance of the United States into the League of Nations. This is sort of a closing meeting of the campaign which has been carried on all over the United States by the Church Peace Union, the World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches, the World Peace Foundation and the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, co-operating with the League of Nations Non-Partisan Association. The thing that seems to have at last frightened the irreconcilables is the realization which they got from this meeting that the religious forces of the United States are becoming tremendously interested in the humanitarian efforts of the League. For the moment the World Court as a door into the League sinks into insignificance, for here is the United States sending delegates to various committees of the League, which committees report directly back to the League and are responsible to it for all their actions. It seems to have escaped the notice of the irreconcilables that the United States was not only having permanent representatives upon these committees—Miss Abbott herself, for instance—but is sending groups of delegates to the sessions of the committees. This is regarded by them as the gradual commitment of the United States to friendly co-operation with the League in its welfare work. There is a general feeling in Washington that these various groups have accomplished a strategic move of the highest value to their cause, and the enemies of the League are beginning to be greatly worried about the attractiveness which the League may have for the religious elements of America in internal welfare and humanitarian endeavors. Miss Abbott, indeed, spoke upon the humanitarian aspects of the League and aroused great enthusiasm. She opened the eyes of understanding, even to those who have been thoroughgoing friends of the League. Among the directors who are to sit upon the League of Nations Opium Committee, which began its sessions in Geneva, Wednesday, May 23, is Bishop Brent of the Protestant Episcopal Church, who is a trustee of the Church Peace Union and very active in the movement for the United States entering the League of Nations.

REFORMED AND PRESBYTERIAN CHURCHES IN CONFERENCE

On July 21, 1923, the next Continental Conference of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches holding the Presbyterian system will be opened in the town of Zwingli. There is a peculiar fitness in its assembling at Zurich this year, which marks the quarter centenary of great events in the history of the Swiss Reformation. It was in 1519 that Zwingli began his Ministry in Zurich, but not till 1523 did the great Council of the City take the important step of arranging a public discussion that indeed decided the future ecclesiastical constitution of the community, and eventually began the work of Church Reform in the Alpine Republic—twelve years before Geneva, thirty-seven years before Scotland, and only six years after Luther's nailing of his ninety-five theses to the door of the Castle Church in Wittenberg. 1523 also saw the publication of Zwingli's sixty-seven articles which, more thorough-going than Luther's Manifesto, were directed against the whole structure of Roman Catholicism and not merely against the abuse of indulgences. The Swiss Federation of Evangelical Churches, which recently joined the Alliance has its headquarters in Zurich, and its secretary, Dr. Adolph Keller, a very able organizer, who is at present visiting America in the interests of Continental Relief, is superintending the local arrangements. Zurich, the chief center of German-speaking Switzerland, has never before been the place of meeting of a Conference of the Reformed Churches. On account of its convenient position it is very suitable for that purpose. Then its situation is beautiful, and after the Conference is over, the opportunities for visiting the choicest parts of Switzerland will be abundant. All the Churches of the Alliance, particularly those of the Eastern section, are being invited to send delegates.

DR. GULICK ON THE FAR EAST

"The problems of the Far East are far from solved. They still call for active work on the part of men of good-will, specially between the United States and Japan. The California situation may flare up at any moment," reports Dr. Sidney L. Gulick, an authority on the Far East and secretary of the Commission on International Justice and Good-will of the Federal Council of Churches, in an article sent to this country from Japan. As a result of several months of study in Japan and China he writes: "The problems of the Far East, however, are far from solved. The present more favorable atmosphere is simply a challenge to more energetic efforts to establish friendly relations. Tasks still call for active work on the part of men of good-will who would establish 'perfect, permanent and universal peace and sincere and cordial amity between the United States and Japan and between their peoples respectively without exception of persons and places,' as our first treaty with Japan declares should be the aim of both nations. 'Enlightened leadership in Japan' has an important role to play in carrying into concrete expression the spirit of the new arrangements and agreements. Not only are the naval agreements to be observed—this will be easy—but also the new policies in regard to China and Siberia. Japan has a new and a rare opportunity to take a still more distinguished place among the nations. It lies more with her than with any other single power to make meaning-full or meaning-less for China and for the rest of the world the agreements reached at the Washington Conference. The liberal movement in Japan can now go forward with more hope of large success. Japanese jingoes and militarists can no longer easily persuade their people that America has ulterior military or naval designs in the Far East. Americans also have their part to perform in reaping the full benefit of the agreements of the Washington Conference. The scrapping of our capital ships; the abandonment of plans for expansion of our naval bases in Guam and the Philippines; co-operation in commissions and committees for helping unravel the Chinese tangle—these tasks and duties will not be difficult to perform. But we have more to do than this. We need to remove suspicions against Japan that for a decade have been sedulously cultivated. The public mind has been poisoned in regard to Japan and the Japanese. We need to interpret her recent years of militaristic development and aggression in the light of Occidental militarism and aggression. Our people need to understand Japan's problems. Insight and sympathy are called for. We need to help our people to realize that Japanese militarism was the inevitable and necessary response to Western militarism. We need also to see and to say that the whole world should now turn a sharp corner; that militarism both in the West and in the East should be given up completely. By thus cultivating a better understanding of Japan we can do much to strengthen the hands of Japan's liberal leaders, and also help to create a better world to live in."

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

DR. GILROY ON UNITED PROTESTANTISM IN PANAMA

Dr. W. E. Gilroy, editor of "The Congregationalist," recently visited the Panama Canal Zone and came to the following conclusions after observing the work of the United Protestant Church: Four great ends, it seems to me, may we hope to accomplish by worthy support of the Union Protestant enterprise in the Panama Canal Zone: (1) To help to maintain wholesome Christian influences for members of American churches who, with their families, are permanently located on the Canal, and at the same time serve the larger constituency of those whose stay is more transitory, but who live around the Zone long enough to be permanently influenced for good or evil. (2) To build up moral safeguards and spiritual influences where thousands of American soldiers and sailors will always be located, and where all the allurements of evil are flagrant. (3) To set in an environment where Romanism has meant superstition and ignorance some worthy example of what Protestant Christianity can effect. It is a strategic missionary opportunity. (4) To set alongside the Canal, which is the most unique monument to American genius for organization and for the conquest of difficulties, some worthy expression of the genius of American religion. Where rulers, soldiers, business men and engineers have thought in hundreds of millions, the Christian Church ought to think at least in terms of tens of thousands. It will be to the lasting shame of the Protestant Churches of America if a strip of land destined, possibly, to be the most important upon the whole earth's surface, and for which this country has assumed financial, political and military responsibility, lacks adequate provision for the institutions and services of religion; and it will be unfortunate if in any sense the Christian Church is left to lag behind at a time and in a place of such amazing opportunity.

A "BIBLE MISSIONARY TRUST"

An organized attempt is being made by a small but determined group of men to force the missionary and benevolent societies of England to toe the line (or, rather, their line) in regard to the interpretation of the Bible, on pain of withdrawal of financial support. A form of cheque has been drawn up, and books of these forms are actually on sale, and this cheque ingeniously provides for the signing of a creed before the cheque can be cashed. This creed affirms that all criticism which questions the full inspiration and divine authority of the Bible is "evil." The same body which issues this book of cheque forms now, on the grounds of "faithful stewardship," appeals to every church contributing money for the spread of the Gospel to use this form of cheque or adopt some similar method to ascertain the attitude towards "destructive" criticism of the Bible of the societies which in the ordinary course would be supported. A further step has now been taken in the formation of the "Bible Missionary Trust," which has been established "in response to widely expressed desires, to receive and administer the gifts of the Lord's people of all denominations who desire to help as far as possible such missionaries as may have to leave their societies through loyalty to God, to His only begotten Son our Lord Jesus Christ, and to the whole Bible as His fully inspired Word. . . . Where no wish is expressed, all monies will be apportioned by the Trust for the furtherance of the pure Gospel of the grace of God and for the extension of the Kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ through such channels and in such ways as may be deemed expedient." The members of the Trust have prepared a creed, or "doctrinal basis," and, having signed such basis themselves, declare that they will support as missionaries only such persons as sign it, and who solemnly affirm that they sincerely believe it and will teach in full accordance with it. Furthermore, the said basis is to be signed, not once for all, but once every year. One reason assigned for the establishment of this new Trust is that "the present spread of modernism in the mission field is causing much distress and anxiety to many supporters of missions who are determined not to participate knowingly in the spread of unproved theories that are destroying belief in the Bible as the divinely inspired and infallible Word of God." Gifts sent to the Trust will be disbursed "for the support only of such work and workers as are loyal to the Bible, to the Lord Jesus Christ and to His Gospel." Attention may well be drawn to the following significant resolution of the National Missionary Council of India: "That this Council draws attention to the harm that is done by missionaries of narrow sympathies and outlook, and requests boards to pay due regard to this both in the preparation, appointment and retention of missionaries."

The War Department is undertaking considerable publicity work. The Secretary of War has sent out recently a letter addressed to representatives of various religious denominations in which he writes: "In keeping with the nationwide sentiment for a quickened interest in the fundamentals of religion, a representative board of chaplains of the Army of the United States has been directed to meet at Washington, June 6-8, 1923, to devise ways for magnifying the place of religion in the Army, to consider plans for a more intensive program of moral training for soldiers, to develop community contracts and to recommend those activities which will strengthen the religious program for regular army posts and stations, and safeguard young men who enter the various training camps." May the type of religion which is brought to the men in the Army be virile and very real. May it recognize all the facts of life and that God, the Creator, is behind them all!

The Baptists at Atlantic City

[This page is devoted to a weekly letter recording the significant events and movements of the day from the Christian point of view.]

THE one place to go in these days if one wants real excitement is to one of the national church conventions. The political conventions are pale, drab, barren beside them. I met a friend yesterday who had just returned from the Presbyterian General Assembly at Indianapolis and he burst forth: "I never had such a good time in my life!" But he went on to say, however, that when one really stopped to think about it, it was a very serious matter. The more time devoted to Dr. Fosdick and Mr. Bryan and his evolution childishness, and the more time devoted by both Presbyterians and Baptists to discussing "fundamentalism," the less time there was for considering the larger work for the Kingdom of God. (I think I found some men at Atlantic City yesterday who were much more concerned in getting a victory for the Fundamentalist party than they were over the expansion of the religious activities of the really great Baptist Church of America.) I came to Atlantic City with the vivid newspaper account in my hand of how Dr. John Roach Straton arose in the Convention on the occasion of President Faunce delivering the opening address and demanded that Dr. Faunce be prohibited from speaking, and even be asked to leave the speakers' platform. (By the time I had arrived here the version was that Dr. Straton had demanded that Dr. Faunce be thrown into the sea.) I had been invited to speak and I began to get timid. I began to mistrust my Baptist friends. However, I discovered when I arrived here that the event was not so exciting as pictured. Dr. Straton was simply exercising his parliamentary right as a delegate to protest against anyone speaking and giving his reasons. He thinks President Faunce is a Thomas Paine, Robert G. Ingersoll and George Bernard Shaw rolled into one, with leaning toward H. G. Wells. It was just too much for Dr. Straton, and he leaped to the floor and protested. The conference should have simply let him protest and sit down. Instead of that, many of the delegates, having been keyed up to a rather high pitch of nerves by rumors that the Fundamentalists were in an invasive mood and had come prepared to take the Convention by force, booed and hissed, and there was considerable excitement for a while. Finally President Faunce was allowed to proceed, and up to this moment no deaths as a result of the address have been reported and no one even seems to have lost his faith.

I did find upon my arrival that there was a very determined effort upon the part of the Fundamentalist group to put through a resolution to the effect that the Baptist boards be allowed to accept large sums of money to which theological tests were attached. Nothing could be more disastrous than this. Think of some wealthy man with a very peculiar, individualistic creed leaving a million dollars to the Foreign Missionary Board with the condition attached to the gift that it be spent for teaching his particular theology! The Convention recognized the danger, many even of the Fundamentalists included, and finally passed the following resolution, which has brought about a better understanding between the two camps than has existed for some time:

"1. A large degree of liberty must be left to all our missionary, benevolent and educational organizations which receive and administer denominational funds. With such a wide and varied constituency, and with such complex needs to be met, it is necessary to trust the judgment of the men and women who constitute the management of our societies. In the exercise of liberty, due regard must be given, on the one hand, to the demand of loyalty to fundamental Baptist doctrines and to the integrity of workers. On the other hand, we must always insure the complete freedom of our boards, executive officers, missionaries and other representatives from subjection to formal creedal tests.

"2. While recognizing the right and freedom of any individual to proffer a gift to our societies or boards for use in our denominational enterprises with such specifications as may seem desirable to the donor, we nevertheless recommend that the Convention advise all donors to trust the loyalty and integrity of our respective societies and boards and to make their gifts to our denominational enterprises without doctrinal conditions. And we furthermore recommend that the Convention advise the officers and managers of our societies and boards to make clear to donors desiring to attach doctrinal conditions to their gifts the difficulty of administering such bequests and the danger of embarrassing entanglements.

"We express the hope that the spirit of mutual confidence through which Baptists have been so greatly blessed in the past may continue to abide with us. We stand together facing a world which needs our ministry of faith and love. Our program of advance at home and abroad calls for our united strength. In common devotion to Jesus Christ as Saviour and Lord let us finish the work which He has given us to do."

A group of the Fundamentalists have put out a statement demanding that the preachers displaying "modernist" tendencies leave the Baptist communion and seek the Unitarian fold, where they belong, but it was not put officially before the Convention. The Convention, the four days I have been here, has been considering with great zeal, harmony and intelligence the big tasks before the Church: evangelism, transforming the social and industrial order, missions, home and foreign, education and international good-will. The report of the General Board of Promotion was received with great enthusiasm and revealed remarkable growth and expansion of work along all the above mentioned lines. The only difference of opinion that has been manifested has been over the question as to whether there was enough "democracy" in the conduct of denominational affairs.

A future denominational program was presented and won hearty and enthusiastic endorsement, seemingly unanimous,

The Outlawing of War

SENATOR BORAH, Professor John Dewey of Columbia University, Mr. Salmon O. Levinson, Dr. John Haynes Holmes, Rev. Charles F. Dole and other eminent men have recently been writing and speaking to the effect that the only sure road to peace is to make war a crime, to outlaw it, as we have outlawed the saloon, slavery and other evils. With their hatred of war and their desire to outlaw it, THE CHRISTIAN WORK is in fullest sympathy. No one hates war more than do we, no one seems more clearly than we that it is not only a crime against humanity, but a denial of Jesus Christ and everything for which he stood. For years THE CHRISTIAN WORK has advocated the outlawing of war and the banishing even of preparation for it, which for centuries has been absorbing the chief energies of the nations. We have no quarrel with these men. But there is a marked difference between them and THE CHRISTIAN WORK. THE CHRISTIAN WORK has offered a constructive program, that is, it has advocated a method of outlawing war, while so far our above mentioned friends have offered us no means or methods whatever by which war can be outlawed or made a crime. We recall nothing from them, although we have personally asked some of them again and again what is the nature of the program by which war can be outlawed.

Furthermore all of these men immediately oppose any institution which the rest of the world sets up, whereby war can be outlawed. It cannot be outlawed by mere wishes of any one group or nation. It is to no effect for Great Britain, for instance, to pass a vote through Parliament declaring war to be a crime, while the United States, Germany, France, Russia and Italy declare it legal. The only way anything is outlawed is by a vote of all concerned. When the saloon was outlawed it was by joint action of all the States in the United States. A thing is made a crime only by vote of a legislative assembly. The manufacture and traffic in drink was outlawed by a vote of the national legislature, which vote had afterwards to be ratified by the State legislatures. There is no other way of outlawing an evil.

But just the moment the nations of the world try to perfect some form of organization through which steps can be taken for joint action in outlawing war—and as we said, we know no other way, the above mentioned men oppose it, as do all their radical friends, and they offer nothing in their place. The League of Nations is organized with the one end in view of ultimately substituting peaceful methods for war in the settlement of international disputes. Its covenant is framed with the one end in view of eliminating war. It still keeps force in its constitution, as every city and town keeps force for use against the criminal, but every word in it is directed toward making force less and less, and conference and judicial methods more and more. (Note in this connection how Lord Robert Cecil, a member of the League Assembly, in his recent visit to America emphasized the fact that even in three years of the League's existence the force quality in the covenant was being eliminated. The Assembly is even now considering taking the word out of Article XVI as a result of three years' experience.) Every act and recommendation of the League thus far has been a movement away from the old world of force to the new world of conference and law. All the League's meetings have been devoted not to talk war, but to talk of things which take the mind of the world off war, to things making for peace, disarmament, courts, conference, pressure of public opinion upon recalcitrant nations, and that failing, temporary ostracism, the community life of nations, the common welfare of the world.

But more than this, were all the nations in the League, here is the only organization, a sort of legislature of the nations, which can make any world practise criminal. Furthermore, we know no real student of world affairs who does not believe that had the United States, with its idealism, with its Borahs, Holmeses, Deweys, Levinsons, Doles, and thousands of others who hate war as bitterly as they, been in the League from the beginning the Ruhr invasion with its reliance upon force, and the Greco-Turkish war would have been avoided, and these things, with the whole problem of reparations and minorities and atrocities been peacefully settled; and all Europe to-day thinking less of force and more of conference and peaceable ways. In the face of all this we may go farther and say that had the United States been there the League would have, by this time been much nearer to that stage where talk of outlawing war and mutual disarmament could be seriously indulged in. It is what the League is organized for, to make war criminal and it can never be made criminal except through action by some such organization; and the men who want war outlawed are the bitterest enemies of the League and yet offer no other way. And now when it is proposed that the United States enter the World Court, another step toward the outlawing of war, the same group oppose this also.

It is one of the paradoxes of our time that some of the bitterest enemies of war are always the first to oppose with all their might any real step toward its abolition. They preach peace endlessly and then oppose the only steps toward it. We suppose they opposed in the same way the first organization of individuals into a community or village, and yet it was that which disarmed individuals and made war among them criminal by acts of town councils or State legislatures, and which disarmed the individual who had previously always carried his own weapon. They were present when it was proposed that the original thirteen States should form a federation of United States, and yet it was that action—and it could have been no other—which made war between the States criminal and took away the armies and navies of the separate States. Now when the nations of the world are endeavoring to apply the same principle to the nations, those who claim as their one desire of life to be to seek peace and pursue it, oppose it bitterly. Who can explain it? Can it be that they expect international peace to drop from the heavens already made as manna fell upon the wilderness? Even then how can war be outlawed except by joint action of some sort?

We said above that we wait in vain for some answer to these questions, for some proposal of some better way, or of any way, from these men. For years we have been asking all our radical friends, who hate war, for some way of outlawing it, but get no answer. We should slightly qualify this statement for Mr. Holmes in an article in "Unity" of April 5 with the caption "Outlaw War"—does say something—quite incidentally however, as though it were not much more important than all his previous exhortation—about means for reaching the desired end. Now the interesting thing is that when he does hint upon an outline, he describes just what the League of Nations can do and is created to do and which nothing else can do. For what is the League in spirit, but the institution for doing just what he proposes in the following words:

"Secondly, the work of moral revolt having been accomplished, there comes the step of writing the sentiments of this moral revolt, by due process of legislation, into law. What has come to be regarded as a sin, or an abomination, is now officially pronounced to be a crime, to be duly punished as such by government. The institution, in other words, which has won the moral condemnation of society, is now visited with its heaviest legal penalties. It is outlawed, made disreputable in law and custom, banished from the practise and approval of decent men. Thus slavery, and later the manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages, were abolished by constitutional amendment; duelling was cast outside the social pale by statute law; prostitution, by State and national laws, municipal police and health ordinances, and now elaborate international agreements, is being fought to a finish. Outlawry is the stroke by which sooner or later we bring death to the evils with which society cannot live in peace and safety."

"What has come to be regarded as a sin, or an abomination, is now officially pronounced to be a crime, to be duly punished as such by government." Who is officially to pronounce war to be a crime except some joint organ of the nations? Does not Mr. Holmes remember that one of the most clearly emphasized functions of the League is to punish the nation that goes to war? A little further on Mr. Holmes also acknowledges that there must be a court, an opinion which Senator Borah and Mr. Levinson shares, but the moment a beginning is made upon a court all these friends of peace begin fighting it. Why? Only because it is not just the court they want. It is the only court possible at just this moment, although many statesmen think that had the United States been in the League demanding the kind of court they want "with absolute powers of jurisdiction," to quote Mr. Holmes' word, it could have been put through. No human institutions are born perfect. They come to perfection by growth. There is not the slightest doubt in the world that the moment enough people want a court with absolute power the present court will become such. It was doubt of the court in a world not educated up to the idea that prevented us getting an absolute court. After the present court works well for a while it will be easy to increase its powers, anyhow, the court has been set up by the League and it is this court—or no court—just as it is the present League or no League, or Association of Nations. Mr. Holmes and his friends have got to choose between taking these two organizations set up to achieve by steps just what they are after or go on vainly beating the air.

What Is a Gentleman?

WE are happily moving out of the time when we think that being a gentleman has anything to do with a man's occupation or want of one. It was not always so. It used to be that if a man were beyond the necessity of working for his living, then we would say, he did not work, he did not need to, he was a gentleman.

Samuel Smiles tells in one of his books about a man named Evans who invented a stationary steam engine. It ran splendidly, but it had one peculiarity: it would only run when there was no load upon it. As long as it ran idle, the piston worked in and out and the fly wheel revolved in fine shape. Then, as soon as it was harnessed to the work it was meant to do, it would stop. And because of this peculiarity of only running when it was idle they called this engine Evans's "gentlemanly engine." It must have been gentlemanly if it would not stoop to work!

There was in my boyhood days a young fellow who had started work at some kind of menial labor. His father was asked how James was getting along at his new task. He replied that he was doing very well, "But," said he, "I really think that James is more fit to be a gentleman." It had not occurred to him that James had the privilege of combining the two things—to work for his living and to be a gentleman at the same time.

But I believe we have now entirely outgrown that obsolete idea that being a gentleman has anything to do with a man's occupation, providing it is honorable.

But what is a gentleman? It may seem trite to say that a gentleman is a gentle-man. But when we say this I fear there may be a momentary lessening of the attractiveness of the word. We might wish to be called a gentleman, but we might resent being referred to as gentle. We think of gentleness as a kind of softness. We think it implies an absence of robustness. We cannot link it up with sturdiness. We think there is something of femininity in the word. Here is a curious thing, the word has become debased when it stands by itself, but its value stands as high as ever when we incorporate it in that word—gentleman. It stands a witness of what the highest manhood really is. The highest type of a man is a gentle-man.

EDITORIAL

But this gentleness does not have its source in the body. The source of true gentleness is in the soul. It moves out into the world amid the feelings, the susceptibilities and the thoughts of men and women, and it treads lightly, carefully, gently.

There is a very significant thing that was once said of Robert Louis Stevenson. It was said that he went through the world on tip-toe. That is, I take it, he trod carefully wherever he went. We have all known people who go through the world differently. They go through the world in hobnailed boots, stamping and thumping and stepping on anyone who is not quick enough to get out of their way.

There was an African lad who lived in darkest Africa. Through the instrumentality of the missionaries he was converted to Christianity. In his picturesque way, this was how he described the life he was to live, as he conceived it, now that he was a Christian. He said, "Jesus boy must tread softly." He realized that henceforth he must go through life with a gentler step. He had perception enough to see that a Christian is but another name for a gentle man. Jesus boy must tread softly.

King Edward VII was said to be the first gentleman in Europe. He had that faculty of passing carefully and gently in sensitive places among the different nationalities. During one of his holidays he had occasion to land rather unexpectedly at one of the Italian seaports. It had been raining heavily and the roads were muddy. The local officials laid down a carpet between the pier and the carriage, but it was not quite long enough. They therefore supplemented it with an Italian flag, the only fabric they had by them at the time. When the King landed he marched across the carpet, but when he approached the flag he noticed it at once. Without a moment's hesitation he stepped aside into the muddy roadway and raised his hat in respect for the national flag of the country upon whose soil he stood. It is said this beautiful act of true gentlemanliness roused the onlookers to a pitch of wild enthusiasm. It was his way. He did not stalk through Europe with a swaggering stride; he trod with a light gentle step.

But it is surprising how hard some find it to be a gentleman when mingling with those of other nationalities, of other faiths, and with those who fill other and perhaps lower stations in life.

Frederick Douglass, the colored orator, paid a beautiful tribute to Abraham Lincoln. It was a tribute such as we might expect for our great hero who was in all respects a gentleman, beautifully gentle with the oppressed and the weak. "Lincoln," said Fred Douglass, "was the first great man I talked with freely in the United States who in no single instance reminded me of the difference between himself and me—of the difference in color."

Lincoln followed, perhaps unconsciously, the teaching Confucius gave his disciples: "When you go abroad," he said, "behave to everyone as if you were receiving a great guest."

He who treats everyone as though he were receiving a guest must be a gentleman. This was William Cullen Bryant's rule of life. He treated every neighbor as if he were an angel in disguise sent to test his loyalty to the Golden Rule.

The common road, the daily task brings to us all an arena wherein to exercise this finest of all arts—the art of being a gentle-man. They said of Sir Walter Scott, "He was a gentleman, even to his dogs."

When Professor James Hope Moulton, the famous Greek scholar, died, someone told of once having received a telegram from him. It ran thus: "Please come four-thirty instead—Moulton." He had made an appointment for four o'clock with a friend, and on that particular afternoon an opportunity presented itself for him to go out and get a little much needed relaxation in playing a game of golf. He feared he might be a little late, but he was too gentle of another's feelings to run the risk of keeping them waiting. Hence his telegram sent three or four miles across the city. It was characteristic of the man. He was one of God's gentlemen. The receiver of the message treasures it, for it continually teaches him a lesson in true Christian gentlemanliness.

Some time ago a writer protested we should not sing that hymn about "Gentle Jesus, meek and mild." He said Jesus was courageous and could be stern. As though he could not be gentle if he had courage and sternness. Paul, who understood the character of the Master so well, knew of this gentleness that ran like a thread of deeper gold through His golden character. "I beseech you," he wrote, "by the gentleness of Christ." For Jesus was a gentle-man. Gentle with the little children, gentle with the publicans and sinners, gentle with the fallen, gentle to the blind and to the diseased. He was gentle with those twelve men who sojourned with Him and gentle even with Judas, who betrayed Him.

The General Assembly at Indianapolis

A CITIZEN of Indianapolis, sitting in the gallery of Tomlinson Hall, listened to the applause which greeted many of Bryan's sallies in his speech against the doctrine of evolution. He sat back in amazement when the vote was taken, two to one against Bryan. He remarked to his neighbor, "I am not a Presbyterian, but I drop in here whenever I can, and I marvel at the sound sense displayed by this body of men."

He made that remark before the fatal Wednesday afternoon when the Assembly approved the Philadelphia overture in objection to the preaching of Harry Emerson Fosdick at the First Presbyterian Church in New York. We do not know whether the Indianapolis man would have stuck to his opinion after that.

Beside the election of Moderator, the two outstanding events of the Assembly were, of course, the two contests referred to above. Mr. Bryan was a member of the Committee on Education. That committee gave him the opportunity to bring in his anti-evolution resolution at the close of their report Tuesday. His resolution ran:

That no part of the educational fund of the Presbyterian Church of the U. S. A., shall be paid to any school, college, university or theological seminary that teaches or permits to be taught as a proven fact, either Darwinism or any other evolutionary hypothesis that links men in blood relationship with any other form of life.

The Assembly cleared the decks for action. It voted that

EDITORIAL

Mr. Bryan should have all the time he wanted, and that debate should be unlimited. The Commoner made his familiar speech against evolution. One man at the press table said he had heard it twelve times. In a longer form, Mr. Bryan had given it the Sunday night before to a packed church in the eastern part of Indianapolis.

For three-quarters of an hour the Commoner denounced, made fun of it, and caricatured the Darwinian form of evolution, as he understands it.

Mr. Bryan, as the Moderator remarked, is the foremost platform orator of the time. He can be extremely amusing. He argued against Darwin's suggestion that the human race may have lost its hair through the preference of the females for the males with the least hair, by declaring that at no time had the females of the species ever been unanimous on anything, and, anyway, if such a decisive preference had existed, it should still show itself, with the result that bald men would be favored by women over others.

Mr. Bryan considers that belief in evolution overthrows the authority of the Bible. It no doubt would overthrow such a belief in it as Mr. Bryan has. He also considers that those who believe it are likely no longer to believe in the virgin birth. He also declared, "More of those who take Darwinism die spiritually than of those who take smallpox dies physically. Five per cent. of those who take smallpox die." According to figures which he cited from Professor Leuba's "Belief in God and Immortality," the proportion of students in college who discard Christianity rises from fifteen per cent. among the Freshmen to forty or forty-five per cent. among those who graduate. The Southern Baptist Convention has just passed a resolution similar to that which Bryan submitted to the General Assembly, and the States of Florida and Oklahoma have actually passed laws forbidding the teaching of evolution. "I draw the line," shouted Mr. Bryan, "against the teaching of any hypothesis that links man with the brutes in blood relationship." (Mr. Bryan is so intense in this feeling that the other day when he found he was eating breakfast with a man who believed in evolution and did not accept the virgin birth, he refused to finish his meal with him and left the table!)

The Moderator, Dr. Wishart, has proved himself both a generous hearted and a spiritual minded man. When Mr. Bryan had finished, Dr. Wishart, commenting that "We are about to enter upon a very momentous debate," asked Dr. S. S. Palmer, of Columbus, Moderator of the Assembly in 1920, to lead the Assembly in prayer.

The ex-Moderator offered a very noble petition. "Almighty God," he began, "we are thy children, sent here by the Church of Christ. May our concern be to know and follow the truth."

Murray S. Howland, the keen, courageous minister of the great Lafayette church in Buffalo, was the first to take the floor. He offered a substitute motion, running:

The teachings of science and its philosophy have in some colleges been of a character to unsettle the faith of the students, and whereas there are many devout men and women of unquestioned Christian character and faith possessing accurate, scientific knowledge who believe in evolution, finding it not unsettling, but confirmatory to their faith in Christianity.

That this General Assembly enjoins all officers and trustees of colleges under the Board of Christian Education to secure that the teaching of evolution in their institutions be of such a character as to show that it is not subversive of the Christian faith.

"It seems to me," said Dr. Howland, "as we listened to Mr. Bryan, we have been led aside from the question at issue. The question whether we are related to the animals has nothing to do with it. Since my college days I have found evolution an aid to my belief in the Bible and in Christ. It seems to me that Mr. Bryan's proposition is absolutely contrary to the genius of the Presbyterian Church, which in its meeting in the Jerusalem Chambers, refused to hold to the principle of authority. Its standards refer all questions to the Holy Spirit. Those of us who believe in evolution and those of us who do not have a right to their place in the Presbyterian Church. As Presbyterians we must demand freedom to study, and freedom for teachers to guide the students as their consciences dictate." That is his speech in very abbreviated form.

Dr. E. H. Pence, of Portland, who had seconded Mr. Bryan's nomination for Moderator, presented a resolution referring back Mr. Bryan's resolution to the Committee on Education, with instructions to prepare and submit a statement of the form of evolution intended, drawing the distinction between one form which affirms or implies the conclusions of a material philosophy, to wit: that man was evolved with all his mental, moral, spiritual content to his consciousness of self and God by the operation of laws inherently within a form from which he came; (2) the acknowledgment of possibilities or even probabilities that a physical organism may have been evolved by forces and processes implanted by God, sacred because so chosen and used by Him, and that this organism did not and could not have become human until by creative fiat of God he breathed into it the inherent parts which constituted man as the potential Son of God.

Then George H. Richards spoke. Mr. Richards is an elder in the Brick Presbyterian Church, New York, and son of the late distinguished minister of that church.

"The adoption of this resolution," said Mr. Richards, "would close the door of the church to thousands of men. This resolution would mean that no man who is an evolutionist can be a Christian. I believe that the cause of the loss of faith is not the teaching of evolution in our colleges, but what is taught in our homes and churches and Sunday-schools. The scholar finds in his laboratory something that seems to contradict something his preacher taught, and he thinks he must give up his Christian faith. He would not feel that if he had been taught that God is a spirit. Many of us believe in evolution, but not in the material form in which Mr. Bryan has defined it. But we believe that God's method was to make everything gradually.

"Fathers and brethren," he finished, "I have given you an abbreviated form of my confession of faith. Are you going to close the doors of the church to me and to thousands of others of like faith?"

Shout of "No," mingled with some shouts of "Yes," answered him.

Then Nolan R. Best, editor of "The Continent," took the floor. He began by quoting "a Presbyterian elder, whose Christianity no one would dare to impeach," Professor John M. Coulter, an elder in Hyde Park Presbyterian Church, Chicago, former president of Lake Forest University, one of the most distinguished biologists of America and certainly her most distinguished botanist. In a recent conversation, to Mr. Best's question whether evolution was a guess, Professor Coulter had answered, "We know that one species may be changed into another because we have changed them."

E D I T O R I A L

When Mr. Best asked him if evolution was an hypothesis, Professor Coulter answered, "As to individual facts, we can prove it. As to the explanation of those facts, we are not quite sure. In fact, much less sure than we thought we were twenty years ago."

"Mr. Bryan's resolution," commented Mr. Best, "would allow Professor Coulter to teach the theory of evolution, but not to show his students the experiments on which he bases his theory."

Mr. Best concluded with three very shrewd questions. Mr. Bryan in his speech, which we intend to publish in the form in which he gave it out to the press, had declared himself against evolution because he believed in the Apostles' Creed.

"Which clause of the Apostles' Creed," asked Mr. Best, forbids one to believe in evolution?

"Where can Mr. Bryan find in the writings of Thomas Jefferson, his distinguished prototype in the leadership of American democracy, any justification for appealing to a State legislature for the suppression of a religious heresy?"

"When has the Church arraigned itself against science and won out?"

Then Rev. George E. White, of the University of Florida, spoke in support of Mr. Bryan's resolution, and Dr. William P. Merrill, of the Brick Presbyterian Church, New York, opposed it. "I think we all want the same thing," said Dr. Merrill. "I have been distressed that in our colleges are people definitely materialist. The colleges have got to recognize that the religious spirit is just as important as the scientific." But, he went on, if Mr. Bryan's resolution were adopted, everywhere it would be understood that the Presbyterian Church had declared against evolution.

After an attempt to get the whole matter referred back to the committee, John Willis Baer came forward to speak. Years ago Mr. Baer led in the early Christian Endeavor work in this country. Later he served as president of Occidental College, California. In recent years he has become a banker in Pasadena. Four years ago he was elected Moderator of the Assembly, the first layman in a century to occupy the position. He has the confidence of the church. Moreover, he has a voice that in itself is thrilling. To some of us it has a moving quality in it like Robert E. Spear's. He was chairman of the standing committee on the General Board of Education.

Mr. Baer began by saying that he was in favor of Dr. Howland's resolution, and that if Dr. Howland had not offered it he should have offered the following:

That Synods and Presbyteries within whose bounds Presbyterian supported academies, colleges and training schools are located are hereby instructed to exercise careful oversight over the instruction given in such institutions and that Synods and Presbyteries withhold their official approval from such academies, colleges and training schools where any teaching or instruction is given which seeks to establish a materialistic evolutionary philosophy of life or which disregards or attempts to discredit the Christian faith.

"Mr. Bryan's resolution will close the Christian Church to some who have a right to the Church. I want Christian liberty for the young life that is coming along. We have had put before us a definition of evolution that I do not recognize in my reading. Darwinism is dead now. This gentleman has resurrected what has been buried. He is mistaken, as he has been before. We'll not shut a door or a window to any light that God may give to us, and I ask Him for more in His own day." There was tremendous applause. Dr. Howland accepted Dr. Baer's resolution in place of his own.

Mr. Bryan fairly leaped to the front to close the debate on his side. Mr. Baer's remark that he was mistaken had got under his skin. Whatever he may have been in reality, to the Assembly he seemed angry, as he shouted out, "I object to the statement that I've been mistaken several times, I object to having my democracy used against this resolution." He cited a dozen national reforms in which he has helped and which have been adopted.

"I'm in the greatest reform I've ever been in," he went on, "to save the Christian Church from what destroys faith in the virgin birth, in the miracles, in the resurrection of Christ's body. We have preachers who don't believe in those things because they believe in evolution. They make evolution a God. I'd rather be called an ignoramus by the son of an ape than be a believer in evolution. They tell us these young men from the colleges won't come to us if we don't reduce the requirements for Church membership. I beg the Presbyterian Church to stand for the Christ of history, and let some other people go off to get the college boys."

Mr. Baer rose to close the debate on the other side. "Every word of the Apostles' Creed," he said, "expresses my belief. I believe in the virgin birth."

Then the Assembly voted on the motion to substitute Mr. Baer's resolution for Mr. Bryan's, and carried it on a rising vote by more than two to one.

Then it adopted the Baer resolution. The great debate was over. The better wisdom had won. At the Moderator's request, Mr. Baer offered prayer. He ended it with the petition, "O God, trust us with more of thy grace."

Then the Assembly stood and sang the first stanza of "Blest be the tie that binds our hearts in Christian love."

That was a triumph for sanity. Mr. Bryan talked about an Assembly machine, working perfectly, and so putting across its desires. The experience of the next day showed that there was no "machine" in control.

S. L. Smith, of Nashville, Tenn., field agent of "The Julius Rosenwald Fund," which was created to assist in the building of better Negro rural schools, reported at a Hampton Institute conference of State agents for colored schools throughout the South that, up to April 30, there had been built 1,700 "Rosenwald schools" and forty-nine teachers' homes at a total cost of $6,257,492. Of this amount Negroes had contributed $1,600,667, or 25.6 per cent.; white people, $352,199, or 5.6 per cent.; public funds, $3,100,148, or 49.5 per cent.; and Julius Rosenwald of Chicago, $1,204,478, or 19.3 per cent. The number of buildings follows: Alabama, 260; Arkansas, 84; Florida, 7; Georgia, 73; Kentucky, 73; Louisiana, 173; Maryland, 40; Mississippi, 213; North Carolina, 287; Oklahoma, 35; South Carolina, 116; Tennessee, 146; Texas, 103, and Virginia, 139. While 474 Rosenwald schools are one-teacher and 650 are two-teacher schools, there are also the following groups: Three-teacher, 275; four-teacher, 165; five-teacher, 56; six-teacher, 55; seven-teacher, 6; eight-teacher, 10; nine-teacher, 2; ten-teacher, 3; and one school each of the eleven-, twelve-, fourteen-, and sixteen-teacher types.

Prodigal Daughters*

By Joseph Hocking

SYNOPSIS

Colonel Lester Trelawney arrives home in England after six years of military service in India and Mesopotamia to find his two daughters sadly beset by the flood of new morals, and ethics and dress of the "younger generation." Eleanor, he soon discovers, is associating with young women of strange tendencies. Peggy has been "keeping company" with a young man of doubtful character. Both have been coming home at all hours of the night. The Colonel insists upon their recognition of his authority. They refuse. He is called away for a few days, but is recalled by a message saying that both girls have left home. He meets Peggy's lover and forces from him the addresses of both girls. The Colonel and Mrs. Trelawney visit them. Eleanor, they find, has taken a room in London and is seeking a position. Peggy has just been married to Barnes. Both girls are still defiant.

INSTALLMENT XII.

THE HORROR OF THE AWAKENING.

WHEN Eleanor entered her cheerless room one night she found it in entire darkness. She felt as though she were going mad. Horrible as had been her previous experiences, they were as nothing to this. Suddenly it had come to her that Rod Ravenscroft was all the world to her, had come to her at the time when he must be thinking of her with loathing and scorn!

She could not understand it at all. Hitherto she had thought of him kindly and regarded him as a pleasant fellow, but utterly old-fashioned and conventional. On one or two occasions before her father came home she had gone with him to places of amusement with her mother's consent and approval. More than once, too, she had had an idea that he was fond of her. But as for caring for him, the thought had never seriously appealed to her. For that matter, she had regarded herself as incapable of love, and had felt a kind of contempt for girls who would sacrifice the liberties and privileges of girlhood to become the wife of any man. And now everything had changed. It seemed to her as though some new part of her being had been called into life, and that everything else in her past was submerged in this new wonderful passion which possessed her. She did not know whether she admired him or not. She had a feeling that he was strong and chivalrous, and that he suggested safety and confidence, but somehow these things did not seem to matter. He was the only man in the world for her, and all her past dreams seemed like so much mockery. Her heart went out to him in its entirety. All the wealth of her being was given to him. He was her king, her all. She would brave anything for him, do anything to serve him.

If—if—? But no, it was too late now. She had made everything impossible by her own actions.

What did he think of her?

Her mind swept back again over the events of the evening. She saw herself accepting her employer's invitation and going with him to the tawdry music hall. She remembered his coarse, vulgar laugh and his still coarser remarks which she had listened to, and not rebuffed. And then there was the horror of the night club afterwards. She had found herself in a place which was the resort of bad women and worse men. It was true many so-called society women went to such places. They went there "to see life," as they termed it, but she found no comfort in the thought. The horror of that hour haunted her. She remembered the coarse girls who came and greeted her so familiarly, called to mind their painted lips and cheeks, their coarse laughter, their silly, vulgar chatter. And she had been there among them. She had allowed herself to be accompanied by a man who was a member of the club. Perhaps by this time the police had taken possession of it, while the names of those who had been there would on the following day be published to the world. From what had she escaped?

But that was not the worst of it. It was the hour which followed. Wakeman had spoken to her as though she were a thing to be bought and sold. He had made suggestions which made her wish that the earth would swallow her up; she felt demented, horror-stricken.

This, then, was the actual outcome, the grim and ghastly logic, of Tamsin Cory's so-called advanced views. She felt that her womanhood was besmirched at the thought of it.

Then she recalled that other scene, when, after a mad struggle, she had managed to get into the street, and had fled from what now appeared to her in its ghastly nakedness. She thought of the drunken men who had spoken to her, of the words they had said to her—and then came Rod Ravenscroft.

What must he think of her? Yesterday she professed not to care, but to-day, now, the world had become changed. She hungered for the love she had scorned, hungered for the love she had laughed at; and she had made everything impossible.

How wise her father had been! How kind! And she had spurned his kindness. Oh, if he would only come to her now and speak to her as he had spoken to her months before.

And then there was Peg. She had aided and abetted her in her mad determination to marry Barnes. She was largely responsible for the tragedy of it all, for it was tragedy. For the first time she saw things as they really were. She saw Barnes as he really was, a low-bred, vulgar, outsider, a man who was common to the finger-tips. And she had half encouraged Peg in her mad infatuation for him. If what his sister said was true, Peg's whole life might be ruined, and she, because of the attitude she had taken, was largely responsible for it.

Hour after hour, heedless of the passing time, she sat thinking. The night was wonderfully still; London was asleep. Presently she looked at her watch. It had stopped. Then she heard one of the city clocks striking. It was three in the morning.

THE WEEKLY SERMON

The Unbelief of the Orthodox

By Richard Roberts, D.D.

Preached at the American Presbyterian Church in Montreal

"We are the Circumcision, who worship by the Spirit of God, and have no confidence in the flesh."—Philippians 2:3.

THERE are few men of our time who have done more for the cause of a living religion than Harry Emerson Fosdick. By his writing and preaching he has made faith, prayer and the figure of Jesus Christ vivid and real to multitudes of people to whom these cardinal things of religion had become dim and phantasmal. He is one of a company, none too large, who by distinguished service are restoring men's faith in the mission of the Church. Had it not come to pass it would have been incredible that this man should have been chosen as the quarry of a heresy hunt. But the incredible thing has happened. The Presbytery of Philadelphia has addressed to the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of the United States of America a protest against Dr. Fosdick's ministry in the First Presbyterian Church of New York City. I speak of this not because I propose to take up the cudgels for Dr. Fosdick; he is well able to take care of his own case. But something more important than Dr. Fosdick's position is involved in this controversy; it is what our fathers called "the liberty of prophesying." I am happy to think that here in Canada there appears to be little prospect of so deplorable an exhibition as this that the Presbytery of Philadelphia has indulged itself in, though as by reason of historical circumstances the ecclesiastical affiliation of this church is with the Presbytery of New York, it is perhaps possible that we may find ourselves in the line of fire. But we are not perturbed. Meantime let us take occasion to reaffirm our spiritual freedom and review the ground on which it stands. For some years there has been in the United States a movement for the defense and promulgation of certain statements of the evangelical truth. The movement is commonly described as "Fundamentalist." It appears to be supported by a great deal of wealth, for its propaganda has been carried on widely and persistently, not only in the States, but elsewhere. It very nearly provoked a serious breach in the last Baptist Convention in the States, and it almost succeeded in creating a schism in the missionary force in China. It may yet do a great deal of damage before its force is spent. The Philadelphia protest, even if it be not a direct outcome of this movement, is of a piece with it.

No one doubts the sincerity and earnestness of these brethren; it is not their character, but their convictions, and the frame of mind that their convictions betray, that are called in question. And while it is our business to commend their motives, it is also our business to condemn their methods. They are moved by a real desire to preserve what they think is the faith once delivered to the saints from what appear to them to be the dangers of modernism. There is room in the Church for the conservative temper, as there should also be for the radical temper; and as our poor human nature finds it difficult to get a conservative and a liberal within the same skin, we shall always fall into groups, each with its own bias. The conservative bias, which is essential and invaluable, is to be jealous of and to preserve our inheritance from the past. But there is a conservatism which overdoes and in the end defeats itself—the die-hard conservatism which not only wishes to conserve the past, but to live in it forever. And it is this die-hard conservatism that provokes on every side—in economics and politics no less than in religion—those die-hard radicalisms which combine to arrest all rational progress. Between them they are all the time tying up the traffic. What with old men in a panic and new men in a hurry, the Ship of State and the Ark of God make poor time. It is the peculiar quality of this die-hard conservatism that it is not willing to maintain its own convictions in peace, but must impose them on the rest of us, and threaten to unchurch us if we decline to be imposed upon. It is a sort of theological Prussianism that wants to impress its own "rubber stamp" on every man's religion. I confess that it is somewhat depressing to have reached this age of the world only to find that there are still men who are so little sensible to some of the plain meanings of history that they can engage themselves in this futile and forlorn business. They do not, of course, see themselves in this light. To themselves they are no doubt austere apostolic figures set in defense of the integrity of the faith; but that should not deter us from seeing them for what they really are—pathetic theological King Canutes trying to hold back the tide of life by threatening it with a heresy hunt. This is no new thing in the world. The Pharisees did it with Jesus; the Judaizers did it with St. Paul; the Inquisition with Galileo; the Roman Church with Luther; the English Church with the Puritans, and the Puritans of New England with the Quakers. Always, conventional orthodoxy has tried to silence the dissenter; and always, the dissenter has won out. And that for a very simple reason. The conventional orthodoxy has always defended the wrong thing. It has supposed that the way to preserve the body is to preserve the clothes; that the way to keep the kernel sweet is to keep the shell uncracked. It has been supposed that the essential matter is the creed, the doctrine, the formula, and that if these are only preserved everything else is safe. But it isn't. These things do not constitute the substance of our inheritance from the past. They are the clothes, not the body; the shell, not the kernel. Our inheritance from the past is a life and an experience; and we conserve our inheritance from the past, not by conserving the creed, but by living the life; not by defending the formula, but by diffusing the experience. These are the essential and priceless things—the life and the experience; and the creeds and the confessions are no more than little explanatory footnotes to them.

Let us keep in mind what the creeds and confessions are. You know that as you live things happen to you, and the sum of these things that happen to you is called experience. If you are wise and reflect upon your experience, you will discover in it some of the truth and wisdom of life. Then you will cast what you have learned into words in order to fix it and to pass it on to others. Now, it is the same in that aspect of life that we call religion. You live the life of faith in God through Christ and you gather a certain experience; and as you ponder upon that experience you discern something of the truth about God and the meaning and ends of life. This you cast into a form of words in order that it may be fixed and be made communicable. When this casting of the truth, discerned in a religious experience, into a form of words is done on a large scale, the result is a creed or a confession. But you will please observe that it is done under two conditions. First, the statement has to be made in the prevailing thought-forms; and second, it has to be made in the prevailing language. Well, the historian of philosophy and of language will tell you that in this changeful world there is nothing so changeful as thought-forms and words. So that your creed will be wholly valid only within two limits. It will be wholly valid only for you or for the company that formulated it, and only in its own time and setting. A creed is a purely intellectual affair, a statement of belief and not an expression of faith. From its very nature, it is a thing of its own time and circumstance. From its very nature, a creed begins to go out of date on the very day after it is formulated. Let me illustrate this. The first attempt to state the significance of Jesus was in the thought-forms of the Jewish religion, and specifically in terms of the Messianic idea. But when Christianity passed over the frontiers of Judaism it came into a world with other thought-forms, the world of Greek philosophy. And the person that the Jew saw as a Messiah, the Greek saw as the Logos. To the Jewish believer, Jesus was the Saviour and Deliverer; to the Greek believer, He was the Revealer and the Mediator. These two ideas, though they are not at all contradictory, are however quite different; and they show you how differently two different habits of thought can interpret the same experience. Every attempt to define a religious truth must inevitably reflect the color of its own time and circumstance.

Now, here is the one dominating fact that we have to remember to-day. In our study of the Bible we have never got away from its Jewish background, and that, I think, is as it should be, for more than one reason. But it is to be noted that this background is a wholly religious background and not at all an intellectual; for the ancient Jew seems to have had little capacity for sustained and systematic thought. And it was only when the Gospel penetrated the Greek world that it found an intellectual background. You will find the beginnings of this contact in St. Paul and the Fourth Gospel. And it was that same contact that gave Christianity its theology. Christian theology was born out of the impact of the Gospel on Greek philosophy. And Greek philosophy has dominated our theology ever since. The Formula of Chalcedon, the Nicene Creed, the Athanasian Creed, and later documents like the Augsburg Confession, the Thirty-nine Articles, the Westminster Confession, are all attempts to state the truth of the Gospel against the background and in some or other of the thought-forms of Greek philosophy. And though our Fundamentalist friends do not know it, their five points of evangelical orthodoxy are belated and rehashed outcrops of this same tradition. But a revolution has taken place, and that is what the present trouble is really about. For the last century brought us the scientific spirit and the scientific method—perhaps the greatest revolution in the history of our race. It was not that it brought the theory of evolution and other disturbing things, but that it entirely reversed the traditional processes of thought. The difference may be put roughly in this way: the philosopher started with general ideas and brought these general ideas to the interpretation of the facts of life and the universe, while the scientist starts from the facts and tries to reach out from the facts to general ideas. For instance, the most notable tradition in philosophy has been "monistic." It has, that is, assumed that somehow all things are but one thing; and its effort has been to show that matter and spirit, good and evil, and the innumerable particulars that go to make up life, are all aspects, phases, expressions of some one ultimate thing. But science comes along and says: I do not assume anything beforehand. I go to the facts as I see them. I try to discover all the facts I can. I try to get as close to the facts as possible. And then by the study of the facts I shall discover little by little the ultimate truth of life. Now, let me say that science has become a little sceptical about its ability to reach all the truth that at one time it thought it could. But that does not invalidate its method and spirit, as far as it can go. Let me also say that I am not pitting these two methods against one another. For myself, I believe that the two movements are necessary to a complete system of thought—the movement from the particular to the general and the movement from the general to the particular. And as I understand it, the underlying effort of modern thought is an endeavor to combine these two movements into a single technique for the discovery of truth.

But the philosopher had had so long an innings that the scientist when he came seemed to be turning the world upside down; and the timid hardened their hearts against him. But he had come to stay. Slowly the scientific spirit entered into every region of life. It transformed, for instance, the study of history; and at length it invaded the sphere of religion. Religion had also to take notice of it; and even beyond all other interests of life, for the simple reason that religion professed to deal with the most tremendous of all issues—the origins, the values and the ends of life. But religion up to this time had rested its claim upon authority. And in the dawn of the scientific spirit this authority was taken to be embodied either in an infallible person, the Pope, or in an infallible book, the Bible. And science said bluntly: I cannot accept this authority or that; certainly not until it has proved itself. The claims of religion, like everything else, have to be tested by the scientific method. The religious mind had been so long habituated to authority that it was not easily reconciled to this view. But the scientific method was so validating itself within its own field that its challenge to religion could not be ignored, especially if religion was to commend itself to the mind of the future. There were, moreover, men who were so sure of their religion that they saw that it had nothing to lose but much to gain by accepting the challenge. And the result is the growth of a new and extensive science of religion, a study starting from the facts of religion.

First, there began an examination of the sacred records in order to ascertain the reliability of the historical facts upon which Christianity rests; and out of that has grown the modern literary and historical criticism of the Bible. Often indeed this criticism has not been informed by the scientific spirit, and the critics have often been at odds among themselves. Nevertheless, the net result has been an enormous gain, as it was bound to be, seeing that there was nothing afoot but a scientific examination of the historical background of faith. Second, there has been a sustained and patient examination of the facts of religious experience. Out of this has come all our new hope in the matter of religious education; and the study itself has grown into one of the most important branches of the science of psychology. Third, there has been a wide and detailed study of the history of religion, its origins, its growth, its primitive forms, carried on by the investigation of ancient documents and of still living primitive peoples; and the study is to-day the most important part of the science of anthropology, and is, I think, destined to add much to the effectiveness of the missionary enterprise. Now, all this and much more has happened. And the actual result is this: the claims of religion are established upon firmer foundations than ever; religion has been enriched by a body of new and priceless knowledge. We no longer hear of the conflict of science and religion, except from a few old-fogey scientists who live in their laboratories and suppose that religion is still where it stood a century ago. It is no extravagance to say that the science of religion is to-day as soundly established as the science of biology.

It was not to be expected that all this new knowledge would leave everything unchanged in our traditional religious outlook. Indeed, it has been one of the remarkable characteristics of the scientific age that science as its own growth went on found itself continually compelled to revise and sometimes to discard its earlier findings. And it has been the conviction of all intelligent and well-informed students of religion that some effort to restate its content in the light of the new knowledge was urgently called for. As a matter of fact, however, we have not yet been able to make an adequate restatement or to relate all the new knowledge to the life and practice of religion. But many devout thinkers have been and are engaged upon the task. We are trying to build up a system of religious thought that will embrace congruously within itself all our rich inheritance from the past and all that the scientific method has brought to us, not only in the field of religion, but in its own special field as well. That is a very long task, a task that will outlive all of us. For this has been a tremendous revolution, and the greater the revolution the more protracted the task of reconstruction will be. Moreover, this is not the only revolution that we have on hand. In addition to the impact of the scientific method we have also had the impact of the new social consciousness on religion with its demand that religion shall be stated, not in terms of an individual salvation only, but in terms of a social redemption as well. It is going to be a long and laborious business to gather up all that the past has bequeathed to us and all that this bewildering present is bringing to us into a single, coherent, flaming word. And now, our Fundamentalist friends are coming along and daring us to try it. No, they say, you shall not do it. We will excommunicate you, we will unchurch you. Here is the old line; toe it or out you go. Well, we do not expect to be put out of doors; if we are, it will be nothing new in the world. It had been done to better men than we. But we are not expecting it to happen. After all, this is the year of grace 1923. And while we shall try to think charitably of the Fundamentalist brethren, we have a duty to the Church of God—to lay bare the heresy that lurks behind their attitude. Do you recall how St. Paul in a similar situation turned the tables upon his assailants? We, said he, are the Circumcision, who worship God in the Spirit and have no confidence in the flesh. Not these people who put their trust in outward forms, but we are the true believers who worship God in the Spirit. And in the same spirit of humility and confidence we say, We are the true believers who do not put our trust in ancient forms of words, but who believe that God will and can look after His truth. The trouble with these brethren is not their intolerance but their unbelief. They believe in their dogmas, but they do not really believe in God. Too far east is west, and their orthodoxy has become a kind of atheism.

For observe, they decline to see the mind of God in modern knowledge. All truth is one truth, since there be but one God. And Nature must tell the same tale as grace. Wheresoever the hand of God has been at work, there His mind is revealed. It was Kepler, I think, who said one night as he was looking at the stars through his telescope, "I am thinking the thoughts of God." And though often without knowing it, modern science has done no other than search out and retrace the footprints of God. But even greater than the triumphs of science in discovery and invention is the gift of the scientific method, and it is a sad unbelief that cannot descry in it a gift of God. For in its own field it is a mode of revelation and an organic part of the Divine plan of revealing to man His own mind and purpose. I repeat, it is sheer unbelief that repudiates this method or declines to take account of it. So far it is true that the major interest of science has lain in the technical application of its discoveries. But the day is coming, and even now is, when the religious spirit will pervade science as the scientific spirit will pervade religion, to the immense enrichment of both and of that life in God which both are meant to serve. But our champions of orthodoxy have not faith to see the wide sweep of the mind and hand of God, and cannot perceive that the scientific method is a divinely given auxiliary to the discovery and apprehension of God's purpose, a ministry of that Spirit whose office is to guide us into all the truth. But I suspect that the fact is that our protesting brethren have not thought the matter through, and that they have taken the field against the liberals because they are fearful for the old faith. But the old faith has never been in any danger; it is only that it has outgrown its old clothes. Yet this fear is, after all, the worst kind of unbelief. For they do not believe that God can or will take care of His truth. They do not believe that God can or will reveal any more truth. Their God is a God who has stopped thinking and stopped revealing Himself, a God who has retired from business, and has no more to say than He said in their five points of evangelical orthodoxy. They do not trust God enough to let others listen, even if they themselves choose not to hear. Suppose that God has something to say to this generation that we have not yet perceived. Are we who suspect that He has to be unchurched because we try to hear it? Seriously, this looks like an attempt to muzzle God, to save the Spirit of Truth from Himself. Here we are in the presence of something graver than intolerance, graver than unbelief. It comes perilously near to blasphemy. During the war, when the troops had gained new ground, they dug themselves in in order to secure the ground gained. But suppose that one day the order had gone out that the front-line trench on that day was to be regarded as the final limit of the advance, and that it would be an offense not only to go beyond it, but even to talk of doing so. It sounds ridiculous, and it is. But that is what is happening just now. When the Spirit of Life makes an advance, it digs itself in, in a creed or a doctrine, in order to secure the new ground. You can see in the history of Christianity how the front-line trench has been pushed forward here and there right along the Christian centuries. A century or more ago the evangelical fathers made an advance and dug themselves in. And now we are being told that we must stay in that trench forever. But you cannot tie up the Spirit of God in any trench. He will not "stay put" to our order. And He touches this man and that and that, and bids them go "over the top," to make a new advance, to invade the no-man's-land of mystery and darkness, and to add new territory to the Kingdom of Truth and Light. That is what is happening to-day and what this trouble is about. There is a hue and cry after the men who have heard the call of the Spirit and are going "over the top." But they are going ahead, for, with Robinson of Leyden, they believe that "God has still more light and truth to break forth from His Holy Word."

And, though we are as yet far from having fully restated the truth of the Gospel in the new idiom, we have some certainties to go on with. We are surer than we ever were of Jesus, not so sure of some of the old definitions of His person, perhaps, but surer of Him as the Revealer of God and the Saviour of man. We are surer than we ever were of the cross, not indeed surer of some of the traditional interpretations of it, but surer of it as the hope of all the earth. We are surer than we ever were of the present and universal activity of the Spirit of God, not indeed as the agent of a narrowly conceived and sectarian "holiness," but as the all-pervading, creative and redemptive energy through the whole kingdom of life. We are surer of the Bible than we ever were, not as a compendium of texts to prove an infallible theology, but as the God-revealing Book of Life. And upon these sure foundations we shall build the faith of tomorrow, the faith of the Christ that was and that is and that is to be.

Is There a Via Media?

By Chaplain Charles S. Macfarland

Major, Officers' Reserve Corps

"I AM sick and tired of confused pacifists, but equally so of military men who are everlastingly hunting up something to take a crack at." This was the remark of my irritated friend. Colonel ———, late of the ——— Division, A. E. F., as he violently threw down his paper at the club the other evening. I looked at the paper and noted three articles—one thrashing away hilariously at the pacifists, another superficially knocking the Washington Conference on Limitation of Armament and a third directing purely guesswork suspicions on a friendly nation.

If one were obliged to form his judgments by some of the unrestrained bulletins intended to promote peace or by some of the pronouncements of some spokesmen of the Army and Navy, some of us would find ourselves starving like the mule between two bales of hay, because of our inability to make a choice. My own personal experiences and judgments would, of course, be of no importance were it not for the fact that there are really among the people a good many thousands of me.

I meet my friend, the inflexible pacifist, some day when for some service I am in uniform. He shrinks and plays the part of a Jew to the Samaritan, and the next day writes me a vigorous letter of protest. Recently, on the other hand, I wrote a gracious letter to a leading officer in the Reserve Corps, creating suspicion of a desire to discuss the possibility of a via media between pacifism and competitive armaments. He treats my letter with disregard and myself with military discourtesy, although just at that moment he is bitterly lamenting because the Congressmen have treated him that same way.

At first sight it would seem as though I were a man without a country to both of these superior classes of brethren. To them there is no via media. If each looks at me with the eyes of both, I am anomalous, inconsistent and unsophisticated.

I desire to say a few words for those of us who seek a via media.

On the one hand, we are trying, with enthusiasm, to develop good-will and friendship between nations and peoples through the intimacy of group relationships. On the other hand, at one and the same time, we hold it an honor to have a commission in the Army of the United States, with papers marked for "active service with troops." The result is that one of these gentlemen treats us as lacking in intelligence, while the other regards us as hopeless utilitarians.

We are working with earnestness and faith for the development of institutions to prevent war through international co-operation, while at the same time we heartily support General Pershing in his request of Congress for an army sufficient for police service and defense, gladly assist in his comprehensive plan and deplore the action of the War Department obliterating the uniform because it offended some Congressmen who never wore one. Indeed, we are seemingly inconsistent enough to believe that a clean, disciplined army of men with high ideals, both national and humanitarian, may be a real force for peace, when its purpose is defined in moral terms and we should be ready to protest against any unjust use of its power, within or without the nation.

There are groups of men earnestly seeking moral substitutes for war, while simultaneously they consider it a wrong to proceed with the inconsiderate derangement of our army and regard it as of the same nature as to dismiss the city police; in other words, they are not willing to believe that you stop crime by abolishing policemen or fires by dismissing the fire department. But good firemen are always careful not to set fires.

We believe in the possibility of a nation exercising a moral domination among nations and finding thereby its own security. That does not hinder me, however, from supporting training camps for our young men or serving as commissioner to the Boy Scout Movement for our boys to prepare them for any service the nation may need, and I change back and forth my preacher's gown for the uniform of either of the other two without any sense of shame.

We belong to the legitimate army organizations to which we are eligible and also to all the societies for international friendship in existence, are incensed at some articles in peace magazines which treat the last war with everything on a dead level, as though there were no moral issues for which men ought to contend, but also deplore the articles in the army service papers, often inaccurate, sometimes untrue, which are calculated to arouse suspicion and antagonism between nations, races and peoples. We do not accept the intimation that internationally minded men are either fools or traitors, nor do we believe that our army is composed of or led by imperialists or militarists. We are idealistic enough to believe that war can be practically abolished and yet practical enough to realize that it must be the development of spiritual forces formed into political institutions and not something which can be done by simply crying, "Peace, Peace," when there is no peace. We approve the resolutions of military conventions urging proper protection and defense, but would always preface them with a declaration of international idealism, with the repudiation of the war spirit, and would not pad them with scare lines or interlard them with contemptuous slaps at humanitarian ideals. I have heard several recent speeches for our army which were spoiled by splashes of superfluous cynicism. We may reason Congress and the people into taxation, but they are not likely to be scared into it.

For these attitudes, however, we sometimes find ourselves regarded as a bit short on patriotism by one group and as semi-militarists by the other. Must we accept either of these alternatives, or is there a via media?

I was talking the other day with an officer of a foreign army of a nation whose former militarism is fast losing ground, and he said: "You are evidently like us, with the issue between your pacifists and militarism." Of course, I told him that it was no such thing, and yet we are in danger of creating just this optical illusion, because these two extremes do so much shouting in a cloud of dust, while the ordinary thinking man thinks with his lips closed and his eyes open. Pacifists are not always peacemakers, by any means.

I am writing this for two or three important reasons. First of all, the Army is suffering in popular estimation because people get the impression (wrongly except in possible occasional instances) that our military men are setting up scares in order to assure their jobs and strengthen their profession. This feeling is created every time even that a prominent officer of the Army or Navy takes a whack at the pacifists, but more still and with serious consequences when he speaks contemptuously of the possibility of international friendship and good-will among nations.

In the second place, let the impression get fixed that there is such a thing as a militarist party in America and the worst sufferers will be the Army and Navy. We are in danger of estranging large bodies of citizens by fouling our own nest.

Some of our strong men in the Army and Navy are losing moral influence because they are misrepresenting themselves and their own ideals by their occasional flings and jibes at international brotherhood. The presence of General Pershing at the Washington Conference and his earlier frank appeals for reduction of armaments did more to win popular support to the Army than a thousand men with diatribes against the pacifists would do, even if the latter were fully merited. General Tasker H. Bliss would have infinitely more influence in getting the people to enlighten and move our Congress than a whole army of vitriolic speechmakers on "America First." General O'Ryan, declaring "I should not be a patriot if I did not do everything in my power to abolish war," and proposing constructive study to eliminate war as a task for Army officers in time of peace, is the type of man to insure the confidence of the people rather than some other men who go at it differently. Not all the peacemakers are pacifists.

For there are many thousands of men and women who are earnestly seeking the via media of what we may call, for want of a better term, "progressive idealism," and who are willing to start at the point where we are, but yet insist on speedily seeking the higher goal. So I think that after all I will keep along and bear as calmly as possible the sad reproaches on both sides, because thereby I can best fulfil my duty to those ideals which it is the task of a preacher of the Gospel to set forth, and at the same time best serve the Army to which I belong, which just now is very much in need of friends. There is nothing worse than an unrighteous declaration of war, unless it be the status of an unrighteous evasion of moral responsibility, whether it be for self-defense or for the defense of others against wrong. This nation of ours needs to face no such alternatives if all good men and women are willing, first of all, to make the nation both morally and physically strong and then, when needed, to lend its strength to other peoples and nations less favored than ourselves and to other causes than our own "interests," and, above all, to use its power to prevent war. Just keeping out of war is not a high ideal and may be low and selfish, and at any rate, is simply jumping half-way over a ditch.

We may be even willing to accept Article X, provided the right be reserved to decide the nation's action on the basis of the righteousness of the issue and of its necessity, and feel just a bit of contempt for the men who came back with the slogan, "Never Again," if or when it means that if the same moral issue were presented they would not be willing to meet it in the same way, if there appeared no other way. And yet, at the same time, we propose to go on seeking the other way, to allay suspicion, to soften antagonisms, to create brotherliness among peoples, to forgive enemies, and, above all, to seek to develop the spirit and to create the human institutions which will ultimately dispose of war, and must maintain this position with our present light, even if this statement relegates us to No Man's Land and intensifies both fires against us.

Just now the Army needs to be saved from some of its misguided friends, and likewise the cause of peace is suffering from reckless handling, and the ideals that all good men and women seek will be realized by those who walk the via media between the two, with their feet on the ground and their eyes fixed on the summit of the mountain top of human life. The times afford a splendid opportunity for the restraint of hasty and inconsiderate speech, especially on the part of those who have the honor and responsibility of being, as members of our military forces, the protectors and defenders of humanity and righteousness. The best policemen are always those who are busy preventing rows and who restrain the slightest word that would incite one.

An impartial conference of a dozen representative men and women who are capable, at one and the same time, of visualizing national and international ideals and recognizing human limitations, could resolve the problem, at least so far as the Army is concerned, and could command general assent to their conception of its size and nature. But their surroundings must not be too noisy.

I am quite sure there is a via media. But what is it? It is a conception of patriotism which recognizes the moral responsibility of nations to other nations, which seeks to create those political institutions which will eliminate war, which seeks through them and through conference the mutual reduction of armaments to the point that makes aggression practically impossible, and, above all, replacing suspicion and competition and racial antagonism with mutual confidence, co-operation and good-will, but in the meantime maintaining, by mutual agreement, the military strength necessary for internal order and defense and a physical and moral vigor in the manhood of the nation that can be confidently summoned under disciplined and ready leadership in case of need. No men, just now, can do more for the peace of the world than our leaders in the Army and Navy, if they avoid embarrassing and hampering our diplomatic representatives in their efforts to put the world on a different basis. A good many of them are doing it. Let us be ready to quench any fire that may start, but let us be careful that we do not throw matches out of the window. The chief need in the world to-day is not suspicion; it is the rebuilding of confidence upon sure foundations.

The fact is, I am so fond of so many men at both the extremes, I so admire their loyalty to the cause in each case, that I should like to bring them together in a common endeavor for the good of the nation and of the world of nations. They would make a good team if (with the elimination of some in both cases who belong in Class B) they would sit down together and find the via media.

No saner or more normal proposal has been made than that of General O'Ryan, that the trained intellect of the Army, with its knowledge of wars and their causes and results, be given, in time of peace, to the effort to eliminate war, not by ignoring its possibility, but by frankly realizing it, treating its causes and by constructive measures for dealing with them, to prevent war. Would this impair moral courage and efficiency? O'Ryan himself is a pretty good answer.

Saving Ourselves by Losing Ourselves

By Eward A. Filene

THE Jews have nobly, not ignobly, survived many centuries of persecution and denial of rights. If some have acquired obnoxious mannerisms and predilections, these have been the inescapable result of violence and fear of violence, of social ostracism, of injustice and denial of civil rights. But they have acquired also, as the fruit of their unhappy experiences, qualities which are vitally needed by the world to-day. Foremost among the attributes which they possess, perhaps in greater degree than other people, are imagination and vision joined with great practical ability.

I am often forced to think that the Jews of this country are not using these great qualities of imagination and vision as effectually as they ought to do, or as they will do at no distant time.

The great war marked the end of a definite stage of a great epoch in America. It was a period of enormous material advancement, a period of mechanical and business up-building of the country, a period of invention and general utilitarian progress. The great forces behind this progress, as is always true in similar cases, have gone in many respects beyond their legitimate goal. We have come to think of the means as the end, and our age has to a certain extent lost its soul.

As a result, social progress has lagged behind material progress. Without evil intent, injustice has been done to great masses of our people. Business and industry are charged with selfishness and short-sightedness. Often there is good reason for the charge. Insufficient thought has been given to basic national and international problems, and to our responsibility in helping solve them.

TIME TO SET THE WORLD'S HOUSE IN ORDER.

The situation is intense as a result of these abuses, and requires remedy. The time is ripe for the establishment of a social program of justice and good-will in our own land. The time has come also for the setting up of international programs of co-operation, of understanding and helpfulness between nations.

As the civilized world is organized, any program for greater social justice must, in order to be successful in this generation, have the help of organized religion. In order to be effective these programs should be common programs, not of one religion, but of all religions. A program of social justice cannot succeed if it is Protestant alone, nor if it is Catholic alone, nor yet if it is Jewish alone. It must appeal to the universal mind and conscience. An international program cannot succeed if it takes into account only America; its scope must embrace the nations.

In order that any program shall have sufficient power to become a common program it must also be made so basicly sound and broad that there is standing-ground upon it for all right-minded men.

The first requirement in the formulation of these programs is the study of economic and social facts of the civilization of to-day, so that scientific knowledge may replace the prepossessions, superstitions, traditions and many of the so-called principles that have grown up in the race for industrial and commercial supremacy.

MICAH'S CREDO STILL SOUND.

But this knowledge will never deal wisely and fundamentally with the social injustices of society unless it is thoroughly tempered by sympathy with our fellow men and understanding of their rights and legitimate longings. This sympathy and understanding and love of fellow men is really linked with religion, and the Jewish religion is rich in this spirit. A great Jewish teacher, moved by the social injustice around him, cried out millenniums ago: "What doth Jehovah require of thee, but to do justly and to love mercy and to walk humbly with thy God."

Of these three elements in religion, as the prophet defined it, the first two were concerned with social justice. A passion for social justice is the chief actuating motive of those who would to-day lead the movement that will balance with spiritual achievement the scale now weighed down by the often sordid products of our material age.

For the making of such social and international programs the Jew is peculiarly fitted. Having lived side by side with men of all religions, and dwelt in all the nations, he should be well able to understand them all. Having suffered injustice, he, of all men, should know the value of justice. Having lived in fear of the despoiler and the pogrom, he should best understand the longings of men for economic and political security. His power of imagination enables him to put himself in another man's place. The vision of an ultimate social millennium was voiced in the utterances of his prophets. Our Jewish people should more definitely recognize their obligation of leadership in these strivings toward social and international justice and should add to the good their race has performed in times past a new service to mankind of to-day, a new consecration to humanity.

ORGANIZED EFFORT NECESSARY.

We shall not be the first to make such a social or international program, for our day. Jews individually have done magnificent service for America and the world. But organized Judaism has lagged somewhat behind. We have been thinking somewhat exclusively of ourselves and of our own people; have been engaged somewhat exclusively with matters that concern our own betterment. While we have been using our new-found liberties and security to establish ourselves and aid our people, others have been at work on these broad, basic social and international problems.

But the Jew is big enough not to allow the fact that these programs have already been attempted with much success by the great body of Protestant churches to keep him from making his contribution and coming to the help of his Christian brethren. Organized Judaism, as well as organized Christianity, ought to attack these most important problems, and to do it now.

In my judgment, the probability is that the programs of the Christian churches will be found in the main satisfactory, and that we shall be glad to adopt them, just as the non-Jews have been glad to adopt the Jewish Ten Commandments as an important part of their ethical program. But even if the Christian programs shall prove to be similar to ours, the Jew, with his vision and his imagination, may be able to enrich the existing programs both in conception and in their practical working out.

A PROGRAM FOR SOCIAL JUSTICE.

Let us take a look at the social service program of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America. It is contained in sixteen articles, supplemented by four resolutions, as follows:

1. Equal rights and justice for all men in all stations of life.
2. Protection of the family by the single standard of purity, uniform divorce laws, proper regulation of marriage, proper housing.
3. The fullest possible development of every child, especially by the provision of education and recreation.
4. Abolition of child labor.
5. Such regulation of the conditions of toil for women as shall safeguard the physical and moral health of the community.
6. Abatement and prevention of poverty.
7. Protection of the individual and society from the social, economic and moral waste of the liquor traffic.
8. Conservation of health.
9. Protection of the worker from dangerous machinery, occupational diseases and mortality.
10. The right of all men to the opportunity for self-maintenance, for safeguarding this right against encroachments of every kind, for the protection from the hardships of enforced unemployment.

11. Suitable provision for the old age of the workers, and for those incapacitated by injury.

12. The right of employees and employers alike to organize; and for adequate means of conciliation and arbitration in industrial disputes.

13. Release from employment one day in seven.

14. Gradual and reasonable reduction of hours of labor to the lowest practical point, and for that degree of leisure for all which is a condition of the highest human life.

15. A living wage as a minimum in every industry, and for the highest wage that each industry can afford.

16. A new emphasis upon the application of Christian principles to the acquisition and use of property, and for the most equitable division of the product of industry that can ultimately be devised.

The four supplemental resolutions read:

1. We deplore class struggle and declare against all class domination, whether of capital or labor. Sympathizing with labor's desire for a better day and an equitable share in the profits and management of industry, we stand for orderly and progressive social reconstruction instead of revolution by violence.

2. That an ordered and constructive democracy in industry is as necessary as political democracy, and that collective bargaining and the sharing of shop control and management are inevitable steps in its attainment.

3. That the first charge upon industry should be that of a wage sufficient to support an American standard of living. To that end we advocate the guarantee of a minimum wage, the control of unemployment through government labor exchanges, public works, land settlement, social insurance and experimentation in profit-sharing and co-operative ownership.

4. We believe that they (women) should have full political and economic equality with equal pay for equal work, and a maximum eight-hour day. We declare for the abolition of child labor, and for the provision of adequate safeguards to insure the moral as well as the physical health of the mothers and children of the race.

PROGRAM FOR WORLD AMITY.

Let us quote also from the international program of the Federal Council. It is contained in a creed of ten articles, supplemented by a series of five resolutions:

1. We believe that nations no less than individuals are subject to God's immutable moral laws.

2. We believe that nations achieve true welfare, greatness and honor only through just dealing and unselfish service.

3. We believe that nations regarding themselves as Christians have special international obligations.

4. We believe that the spirit of Christian brotherliness can remove every unjust barrier of trade, color, creed and race.

5. We believe that Christian patriotism demands the practice of good-will between nations.

6. We believe that international policies should secure equal justice for all races.

7. We believe that all nations should associate themselves permanently for world peace and good-will.

8. We believe in international law, and in the universal use of international courts of justice and boards of arbitration.

9. We believe in a sweeping reduction of armaments by all nations.

10. We believe in a warless world, and dedicate ourselves to its achievement.

The amplified resolutions read:

1. We believe there is one way, and only one way, to outlaw war. We must first establish a peace system. Mere disarmament by itself alone will not stop war. Only the firm establishment of the institutions and agencies of justice and of liberty under law, maintained by effective sanctions at the hands of law-abiding and peace-loving nations, can possibly banish war from this war-cursed world. The most urgent need of mankind to-day is the speedy establishment of international institutions to assure equal justice, full security and fair economic opportunity for all nations alike. These are essential prerequisites to permanent peace.

2. We believe that the government of the United States should associate itself promptly with the other nations of the world to establish permanent institutions for the formulation of international law, for the effective operation of the International Court of Justice and of boards of arbitration and conciliation, for the assurance to law-abiding and peace-loving nations of security from attack and spoliation by any lawless and aggressive nation, and for the provision of fair treatment and equal economic opportunity to all.

3. We believe that the time has come for American public opinion to express unmistakably to Congress its emphatic support of President Harding and of the Administration in making adequate pledges and in giving satisfactory guarantees that the United States will take its full share of responsibility in international tasks and obligations.

4. We reject with indignation a policy of taking all possible economic advantages in all parts of the world while shirking international responsibilities and obligations.

5. We, therefore, ask that the United States unite in an economic conference of the leading nations to do in the realm of industry and finance what has been so well done by the Washington Conference in the realm of political understanding and in the reduction of armaments.

COMMONALITY WILL BREAK DOWN BARRIERS OF CREED.

As I read them, these programs seem to embody much of the religious teaching of the Jews. But whether Jewish or Christian in origin, the formulation, adoption and vigorous propaganda of social and international programs, scientific and non-sectarian in nature, will be of the utmost use to the Jews as well as to Christians, because, in the competitive rush of the era out of which we are just passing, we have, as I have already stated, missed some of the needed application of true religious ideals.

No race has so much to gain as the Jews from programs of social and international justice. If Jewish energy and vision are put into them the chances of success will be greatly improved and, as a by-product, the work will correct some of the evils in Jews which are offensive both to the Christians and to the Jews themselves. It will also set up positive ideals which can be realized by us Jews in our every-day life and work, and from which the submerged masses of Jews throughout the world will profit.

One other conclusion—and it is my main one, since I have been asked to suggest ways in which Jews can break down anti-Jewish prejudice. “There is no practical method of fighting anti-Jewish prejudice comparable in effectiveness with work along this line—work by the united forces of Judaism for the highest ideals of justice and religion at home and throughout the world—work in fellowship and association with our Christian brethren in a great movement for the service of humanity and the world.” Working effectively in this way, it will soon become generally known what Judaism really stands for, and with this knowledge the important part of anti-Jewish prejudice will disappear.

Report of Meeting of World Alliance at Zurich, Switzerland

By Rev. Henry A. Atkinson, D.D.

Secretary, American Council of the World Alliance

IT was in circumstances of special and peculiar stress that the Management Committee of the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the Churches met in Zurich on April 13-16. The critical situation on the Ruhr was at its acutest phase. France, disheartened by the failure of her scheme for hastening Germany's payment of reparation money by occupying the Reich's most valuable industrial area, was showing signs of obvious impatience. Germany, equally obviously feeling the intense strain of maintaining the passive resistance of her people in the Ruhr, was seething with impotent bitterness. It was in this atmosphere—and near enough to it is Zurich to feel its impact strongly—that the World Alliance committee began its conference. The Ruhr question was the main topic on the agenda. French and German delegates were to meet around the same table, and with the delegates from twenty-two other national committees of the Alliance were to seek at least the outlines of a policy based on the Christian principles of right and good-will. It was to be expected that sparks would fly. They did; but happily the first clash between French and German came, not on the Ruhr question at all, but upon the reports from their several councils. The French report made a reference to Germany to which the senior German delegate raised objection. It was pointed out by the American secretary that the German report (due to be presented a few minutes later) contained an equally recriminatory reference to France. A suggestion that Christian good-will dictated the omission of both the objectionable passages was like oil poured on the troubled waters. The French delegates agreed, and the German delegates made concessions. Then Frenchmen and Germans stood and shook hands. The earthquake had been followed by the still small voice. An atmosphere of conciliation had been established, and though later when the prickly Ruhr question was on the tapis there were tense moments when clash threatened and good-will seemed in danger. These fears proved false, however, and an agreed resolution was reached after long and labored discussion.

The Conference met with the Dean of Worcester (representing the Archbishop of Canterbury) acting as president. At once three committees were set up—the main one, with a very representative personnel, having the Ruhr question committed to it. Through four days, including Sunday, the Management Committee and its three sub-committees worked with an energy and application that almost overtaxed the mental and physical capacity of the delegates. It needs to be reported triumphantly that the World Alliance has created a national council in Poland and has now councils in twenty-seven countries. From all the national councils came reports clearly indicating that the Copenhagen Conference last August gave a notable impetus to the growth of the World Alliance throughout Europe. The reorganization of the national councils on a strictly representative basis is a new development of great significance. Britain has led the way in this departure and has reconstituted its national council so that all its members are now elected and authorized by their denominational organizations. Thus the Church of England has twenty delegates, the Baptists six, Congregationalists six, Methodists 12, Presbyterians 3, Friends 2, Salvation Army 2, and Unitarians 2. Scotland and Wales have their own directly elected representative. All the churches have elected to the Council men of light and leading to their own denominations and the British Council will have an authority such as no joint Anglican and Free Church Council has ever possessed since the year 1662, when nonconformity began. It is hoped that this British model of a national council will become the form throughout the World Alliance. Dr. Ramsay, the traveling secretary for Europe, is furthering the process and several national councils are actually engaged in reshaping their constitutions on the British plan. Apart from the Council reports, the Management Committee addressed itself to much useful business. It was decided to issue, through the London Press Bureau, an international by-monthly bulletin providing exact information as to religious and social conditions in all the European states. Some grievances were brought to notice and steps taken for their redress. The minorities problem, e.g., was visualized afresh. Then from Riga came news of a Lutheran Protestant church being confiscated and handed over to Roman Catholics for use as a cathedral. A protest was made against the continued restrictions upon the religious liberties of Protestants in Spain and the failure of the government to redeem a promise of redress. A new sub-committee was set up to form a closer link with the League of Nations and steps were taken to give force to the Copenhagen resolution about getting international good-will introduced into the curriculum of schools. All this was useful work, even if humdrum, and the Zurich delegates bent their minds to such tasks, feeling that the World Alliance is relating its principles to action in far-reaching ways.

But the Ruhr question was the predominant question at Zurich and the committee engaged upon it spent about twenty hours in discussing ways by which the Christian spirit might best be brought to bear on a problem that is forcing Europe, and perhaps the world, to the very brink of renewed war. The discussions were in camera, but it may be said that however delicate and difficult were some of the apparent deadlocks that were reached, the spirit of good-will was never departed from. Still a sigh of relief went up when a manifesto drafted by the Dean of Worcester and Sir Willoughby Dickinson was, by a few deft touches by Prof. William Adams Brown, moulded into a form which both the French and German delegates felt they could accept and commend to their compatriots. This resolution has already attained wide publicity, not in the United States only, but throughout Europe, and has received much commendation.

The passage of this resolution through the Management Committee at Zurich recalled the dramatic scene at Copenhagen. The chairman of the Ruhr sub-committee, Professor Choisy, stated that it was an agreed resolution, attained after toil and anxiety, and he thought it should be adopted, if possible, without amendment. Eagerly the Management Committee acquiesced, and even vetoed discussion. The resolution was submitted and was carried unanimously. Then a German, a French and a Belgian delegate each offered a fervent prayer of thanksgiving. The old German hymn, written during the thirty years' war, "Now Thank We all Our God," was sung with fervor and then, all standing and each speaking in his native tongue—and there was a babel of tongues present—the delegates joined in the Lord's Prayer. A long silence followed the prayer and then with a spasm of release from the weary, trying, tension the committee adjourned with a sense that something attempted, something done had earned a night's repose.

The full text of the World Alliance resolution follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE MANAGEMENT COMMITTEE TO THE NATIONAL COUNCILS CONCERNING THE PRESENT EUROPEAN SITUATION.

The Management Committee of the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the Churches, assembled in Zurich on April 16th, 1923, and consisting of representatives from the national councils in twenty-four different countries, place on record the profound concern with which they view the continued unrest in Europe.

They declare their conviction that the only hope for the salvation of Europe and its escape from present difficulties lies in applying the spirit and teaching of Christ to the problem with which it is confronted.

The Committee, therefore, urge the Christians in all lands to manifest this spirit in the face of all influences which make for national egoism and bitterness of feeling; to strive unceasingly for the diffusion of such good-will and reasonableness as will demand the settlement of all international disputes by methods of conciliation and arbitration and a readiness on the part of every nation to make sacrifices for the general well-being; and to abound in prayer to the God and Father of all men that He may guide the nations into the way of true and righteous peace.

The Committee reaffirm the declaration of the World Alliance that in the League of Nations, enlarged and improved, is to be found the most hopeful means of removing the danger of war, and that it should be the task of the Church to inspire among the people of every land enthusiasm for this great conception and willingness to labor for its complete realization.

At the present moment it is clear that the settlement of the question of reparations on a sound economic basis is the most urgent step towards the adjustment of the relations between France and Germany and the reconciliation of Europe, and, in the opinion of the Committee, this can only be accomplished by an impartial authority.

But the question is not confined to France and Germany. All civilized nations are interested in a just and permanent settlement, and it should, therefore, be carried through by a common effort inspired by a Christian purpose of brotherly aid and mutual sacrifice.

The League of Nations is the only international agency which can take the initiative in bringing this about. By its action, in co-operation with all these nations, including Germany and the United States of America, it should be possible to constitute a body before which all parties would consent to lay their case, to organize adequate financial measures for carrying the decision into effect and to set up such a system of mutual protection as will secure the safety of all countries and general peace.

If, for any reason, it should prove impracticable for the League to take the initiative, the Committee is convinced that the situation is so critical that some other means must be found for bringing together such a conference.

The Committee appeal to the National Councils of the Alliance to lay this message before their various churches and to seek the co-operation of all representative persons, especially in financial, political, labor and journalistic circles, so that the mind of all the people may be turned to this problem and a way be found to its solution in and by the spirit of Jesus Christ.

The Sunday-school field secretary in Egypt, Metry S. Dewairy, now holds the title of "Sheikh" on account of his election as an elder in the Evangelical Church of Egypt. Sheikh Dewairy has translated thirty books from English into Arabic, nine of them are especially Sunday-school literature. So the Egyptians now can read in their own Arabic "The Point of Contact in Teaching," "Beckonings from Little Hands," "The Boy and the Sunday-school," "The Teacher that Teaches," "The Girl and Her Religion," "The Pupil and the Teacher," Part II, "Shepard of Aintab," "A Hero of the Afghan Frontier," and "A Master Builder on the Nile."

Evolution and Christian Theology

By Rev. Walter Spence

Minister of the Congregational Church, Peru, Illinois

THE doctrine of evolution has wrought a far-reaching and profound effect upon every department of investigation and thought. As a result we have a new biology, a new physiology, a new astronomy, a new sociology—in short, it has either revolutionized or greatly modified all science and all philosophy.

Theology has not escaped from the conquering arms of this modern Alexander. Though it made stubborn resistance, it was forced back from point to point, from one redoubt to another, till every stronghold was surrendered. There was many a hard-fought battle: the length of the "days" of creation, whether twenty-four hours or immeasurable ages; the method of creation, whether immediately by Divine fiat or by slow, age-long processes; the order of creation, that of Genesis or that of geology; the origin of species, whether by special creations or by derivation from pre-existing species; and especially the origin of the human race. These were the battlefields where evolution and traditional theology met and fought. And the issues were settled in favor of the evolutionary hypothesis.

The acceptance of the doctrine of evolution by the Christian theologian has necessitated some important and even radical changes in his theology. It is the purpose of this paper to point out some of these changes. The writer does not assume to speak for all Christian evolutionists, but he believes that he is expressing the views of many evangelical Christians who have accepted the conclusions of modern science.

And first in regard to the origin of man. "There are three theories," wrote Professor LeConte, "concerning the origin of the individual. The first is that of the pious child who thinks that he was made very much as he himself makes dirt pies; the second is that of the street gamin, or Topsy, who says, 'I was not made at all—I grewed'; the third is that of most intelligent Christians, i.e., that we are made by a process of evolution." So there are three theories as to the origin of the human race. Mr. Bryan believes that man was made immediately by Divine fiat, both body and soul; the materialist believes that man was the product of blind force inherent in matter, working by blind evolution—he "was not made at all—he grewed"; the Christian evolutionist believes that man was created by eternal God by a process of evolution beginning at the very dawn of life on the earth. God did not create the first human beings instantly, directly out of dust, but developed them from lower forms of life through immeasurable ages.

This does not deny that God created man. The earth, as all educated persons believe, was brought to its present form through a long process of development from original nebulae; yet we say God made the earth. The giant oak that towers heavenward and bids defiance to the storms grew from a little acorn; yet we say God made the oak. The individual man developed from a spherule of protoplasm to a little babe and from a babe to mature manhood; yet we say

God made the man. Even so, though we hold that the genus homo was developed from lower forms of life, we may yet say that God made the genus homo.

This conception of creation is, to my mind, more sublime than that which was taught to me in childhood—God taking a handful of dust and shaping it into the form of a man, then blowing His breath into it, and, lo! it comes to life and begins to move! A good story for children, it was well adapted to the childhood of the race. It was of inestimable value to the people for whom it was written. Valuable to us also if we interpret it in a large spiritual sense.

But no person can accept it throughout as a literal statement of facts. The most conservative theologians take great liberties with the Mosaic account of creation. Does God breathe, and did He literally blow his breath into Adam's nostrils? Did He, really, make Eve out of one of Adam's ribs? Were the Tree of Life and the Tree of Knowledge literal trees with literal fruit? Was the serpent a sure-enough snake, and did it talk to Eve with audible words? Did God really come down to take a walk in the Garden "in the cool of the day"? Not even Mr. Bryan will insist that all these details are to be taken literally. The most conservative "literalist" gives a figurative interpretation to some parts of the story. Is it not more consistent and reasonable to consider the whole story as allegorical and not at all a scientific account of creation? "Its true and deep object," said Farrar, "was to set right an erring world in the supremely important knowledge that there was one God and Father of all, the Creator of heaven and earth, a God who saw all things which He had made and pronounced them to be very good."

Evolution gives a different explanation of the origin of human depravity—not different from the Bible, but different from the traditional theology. We cannot close our eyes to the fact of depravity. Man is apparently a weak, erring, sinful creature, constantly going astray, constantly falling below his ideals, constantly giving way to the demands of his lower nature. But why this weakness, infirmity, depravity? The traditional theology explained it thus: God made the first man and woman perfect; they disobeyed God by eating the forbidden fruit and thus fell from their estate of innocence; they transmitted to their posterity their fallen nature and thus the whole stream of humanity was polluted and depraved.

It is commonly supposed that this dogma of the fall of the race in Adam is Scriptural. But one can find no sufficient basis for it in the Bible. The story in Genesis, even if taken literally, gives no hint of results so far-reaching. No Old Testament lawgiver or priest or prophet makes any allusion to such a race-wide catastrophe. Jesus in all His discourses about sin and salvation never once alludes to the so-called "fall" of the race in Adam. St. John, in his sublime Apocalyptic drama of the conflict between good and evil, never remotely hints at such a fall as being the origin of evil. Of all the Biblical writers, Paul alone alludes to it. He speaks of this Pharisaic doctrine as if it were familiar to his readers. He uses it as a premise in an ad hominem argument, just as he used the superstitious practice of baptism for the dead as a premise for an argument. It was neither an Old Testament doctrine, nor a New Testament doctrine, but a "leaven of the Pharisees." And yet nearly every old system of theology was founded upon this huge assumption.

The Christian evolutionist denies this dogma. The race has never fallen. Individuals fall. Tribes and nations may degenerate. But the race as a whole has ever been ascending. Man did not begin at the top and fall to the bottom. He began at the bottom, and has been climbing up. One of the surest conclusions of geology and archaeology and history is that man was once a savage and through the ages has been climbing upward. His progress has been traced from the lowest savage of the river drift to the civilized man of to-day.

The Christian evolutionist holds that the animal origin of man accounts for his depravity. The evil evinced in human nature is the beast nature that still remains in man. Sin is a falling back into the beast, a reversion to the lower type, a subordination of the higher nature to the lower.

What is normal and right in a lower animal may be abnormal and sinful in a human being. Gluttony is normal in the swine, combativeness in the dog, vanity in the peacock, ferocity in the tiger, cowardice in the deer, polygamy in the barnyard. But these qualities in men are abnormal and sinful. Is it not much more rational to ascribe the source of these abnormal tendencies to a bestial ancestry than to hypothetical fore-parents who, according to the story, were only guilty of one act of disobedience? As man emerged from his simian ancestry he brought with him much of the lower nature. This has been transmitted from generation to generation, and has been bequeathed, more or less of it, to every one of us by our parents. It has been modified here and there in different ages and different races. On the whole, the race has ascended very far from the original primitive state. But there still remains a large element of the beast-nature in humanity. Still we need to "move upward and let the ape and tiger die."

The doctrine of evolution made necessary a new interpretation of the doctrine of redemption. Let me first state the traditional view. Those who hold the old dogma of "the fall" ground the necessity of redemption in the fall of Adam. If it had not been for Adam's disobedience, the race would have needed no Saviour. The work of Christ was to save the race from the ruin wrought in the fall. Man was condemned to eternal punishment, either because, to quote from Lyman Abbott, "the whole race was in Adam as the oak is in the acorn and sinned in him, or because the whole race was represented by Adam and is held responsible for his act, or because the whole race descended from Adam and inherited his sinful nature from him." In either case the human race was ruined and reprobate. The work of Christ was to undo what Adam did—to restore man to favor with God; to satisfy justice and propitiate God; to remove the curse that rested upon the race.

The Christian evolutionist finds the necessity of redemption in the animalism that still clings to human nature. Sin is not the "old Adam," but the old animal rising up and gaining ascendancy. Christ came to save men, not from the curse of Adam, but from the curse of the beast. We need salvation, not because Adam sinned, but because we ourselves have sinned, because we have yielded to this lower nature, because without Divine help we are constantly falling back into animalism. Salvation is the lifting of men out of the animal nature into the spiritual nature. The work of Christ is to carry forward to perfection the evolution of man. As Henry Drummond said, "Christianity is the further evolution." It is the force that evolves character, that develops the spiritual nature.

The object of the atonement is not to move the heart of God to pity so that He will forgive the race for something which Adam did, and which the vast majority of the race even yet has not heard of; neither is it to patch up some rent which Adam is said to have made in the moral law and thus satisfy justice. As an evolutionist sees it, the mission of Christ was to touch the heart of man; to reveal the Father's love; to present an uplifting ideal; to inspire men with a nobler altruism; to bind them to Christ with the ties of a holy passion, and thus to lift them out of selfishness into altruism, out of animalism into spirituality, out of sin into righteousness, out of beast-likeness into God-likeness.

Christ uplifts men, not only by the cultural power of His ethics and the inspiration of hope, but by presenting in His own character a lofty ideal. It is a well-known law that men tend to become like their ideals. This is one of the great factors in human evolution. As Professor LeConte has said, "In organic evolution species are transformed by their environment. In human evolution character is transformed by its own ideal. Organic evolution is by necessary law; human evolution is by voluntary effort, i.e., by free law. Organic evolution is pushed onward and upward from behind and below; human evolution is drawn upward and forward from above and in front by the attractive force of ideals." The same writer wrote: "The most powerfully attractive ideal ever presented to the human mind, and therefore the most potent agent in the evolution of human character, is the Christ." Jesus himself declared: "And I, if I be lifted up will draw all men unto me." As He is lifted up before men, and they look upon Him and accept Him as their ideal, they do, consciously or unconsciously, become more and more like Him. "But we all, with unveiled face, beholding as in a mirror the glory of the Lord, are transformed into the same image from glory to glory." That is evolution's philosophy of redemption.

The passion of Jesus fits into this scheme of redemption. "Vicarious sacrifice is not an episode," as Lyman Abbott has said; "it is the universal law of life. Life comes only from life, and life-giving costs the life-giver something. It is a part of the Divine order of Nature, that the birth of a life should be through the pain of another." The lowest of all living creatures, the unicellular organism, in reproduction must sacrifice one-half of its own life. The flower cannot perpetuate its kind without giving up all or a part of its own life. The parent bird sacrifices its liberty to incubate and its energy to feed its young. The human mother in travail brings forth her child, and in so doing sacrifices part of her life. So Christ, in sacrificing Himself to give life to humanity, is fulfilling the law of nature. It is the law which He himself declared, "Except a grain of wheat fall into the earth and die, it abideth by itself alone; but if it die, it beareth much fruit." So He, in order to bear much fruit, in order to redeem humanity, in order to give spiritual life to men, must sacrifice Himself.

The only way in which He could give life to humanity was through sacrifice. It was not substitutionary, but vicarious; not Christ bearing penalty in our stead, but Christ suffering for our sake, as a life-giver to give spiritual life to us, and thus to save us from sin.

Two great factors or forces in evolution are "the struggle for self" and "the struggle for others." They appear in the vegetable kingdom in nutrition and reproduction. We see them working in the long history of the animal kingdom, the one seeking to preserve the individual and the other to preserve the species. As life rises higher in the scale, the struggle for self becomes less and the struggle for others is intensified, reaching its acme in maternity—the struggle of the mother to preserve her offspring. In the human species we find these same forces at work, individuals struggling for their own lives, and parents struggling for their offspring. At first among primeval human beings this altruism, or this struggle for others, was limited to the family. Then it grew till it took in the whole clan or tribe. Then as patriotism it extended itself to embrace a nation. Christianity has widened altruism so as to embrace the whole brotherhood of man, and has intensified it in every relation of life. True Christianity is the flower of altruism. While not annulling the primal law of self-preservation, it exalts the struggle for others to the supreme place in life. Christ's life is the beau ideal of this virtue, and the essence of His gospel is "love thy neighbor as thyself." "Whatsoever ye would, even so do," is its Golden Rule of conduct. And as the years roll by and the race climbs steadily towards this ideal—as men learn to follow the Christ and to practice His Golden Rule and to live His law of love—the struggle for self will diminish and the struggle for others will be intensified until eventually altruism shall hold universal sway.

Evolution teaches us that redemption is a gradual process. It is not the work of an instant, but of months and years—in its highest and finest effects it is the work of ages. God works by processes of slow development as we measure time. But with God time seems to be of no consequence. As was said of a noted artist, so we may say of God, "He counts not the lapse of mortal years in creating an immortal work." When He wanted a world, instead of speaking it into existence in an instant, He took ages to make it. When He wanted certain species of plants and animals, He developed them through countless years. When He wanted the human species, He evolved it through innumerable generations. To-day, when He wants a tree, He makes it to grow from a tiny seed. Evolution has been defined as "God's way of doing things." Whatever God wants, either in physical nature or in human nature, He accomplishes by evolution. The redemption of a human soul is an evolutionary process. God plants the seed of spiritual life in the soul, and from that seed develops the beautiful flower of character. It is "like unto leaven, which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal," and the leaven kept growing "till the whole was leavened." It is "like to a grain of mustard seed, which a man took and sowed in his field," and the tiny seed evolved into a tree. The redemption of a soul is evolution: it is God's way of saving men.

From Fish to Fashions

By William Willard Howard

A GOOD friend in Middletown who bought a Russian Princess Blouse to send to her granddaughter in college made this comment:

"It seems a long step from salt codfish to ladies' blouses; but you seem to have taken it in a very short time. I think you must be the most nimble philanthropist I know. I wish it were in my power to help you more liberally in your beautiful enterprise."

This refers to the fact that two years ago, when two ships owned by me put in at a port in Newfoundland to repair damages caused by December gales, I helped destitute fishermen by taking on board cargoes of salt codfish and selling them by mail in the United States at approximately one-third the retail price, and that now, to help destitute and suffering members of the nobility and intelligentsia of monarchist Russia who fled from home to escape death at the hands of revolutionists and are existing miserably in alien lands bordering on Bolshevik Russia, I am offering for sale hand-embroidered, hand-sewn women's blouses made by starving Russian gentlewomen in a relief industry carried on by Anne Louise Howard in a far outpost of Eastern Europe.

From my point of view, the step from fish to fashions was short, because it was taken in literal obedience to the command, "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do."

I believe that this command means what it says. I believe that we are expected to obey it, without hesitation, without question, each one according to the measure of his ability.

In the matter of the codfish, my ships were in that particular port in Newfoundland by stress of weather and hazards of the sea; the destitution was there; the unsold codfish was there. Clearly, then, this was something laid upon me, because, going to that place to meet my ships, I found the need. It was something for my hand to do; so, without consulting anyone, or holding a meeting, or adopting resolutions, or calling upon the government to act, I did what my hand found to do—I loaded unsold codfish into my ships and sailed for home. When the fish trade refused to have anything to do with my cargoes I sold the fish in small lots by mail. I did what my hand found to do.

Going as far as the borders of Bolshevik Russia seeking cargoes for my ships, I found instead the ghastly tragedy of the Russian gentlewomen. It was a colossal and tragic situation—the brains, the education, the creative ability, the administrative experience of a nation of a hundred and fifty million inhabitants exiled, passed by, forgotten, left to die of hunger and broken hearts, while peasants of Bolshevik Russia had been fed and clothed at a cost to the United States of scores of millions of dollars.

Did I pass by on the other side because the problem of relief was of enormous magnitude? Did I call upon the American Congress to do something? Did I say that this was a task for an international committee? I certainly did not. The command, "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do," was laid upon me individually. It was meant for me. It meant that I was responsible for that which came within reach of my hand. I knew the need. I did that which my hand found that it could do. I have told the story in THE CHRISTIAN WORK. I need not repeat it.

I do not say that everyone who reads this could load ships with codfish to help destitute fishermen. Probably no other reader of THE CHRISTIAN WORK owns and operates ships. I do not say that many of you would have opportunity to put into operation a needlework industry for destitute Russian gentlewomen in the border lands of Eastern Europe. Probably no other reader has occasion to go to far places on the business of his ships.

I do say, however, that each one of you may have a part in this work by strengthening my hands and making it possible for me to go forward to a larger usefulness. If you think that the relief of the starving Russian gentlewomen is a thing that your hand finds to do, I shall be glad of any help that you may give, whether that help take the form of the purchase of a blouse or a gift, in any amount, to the working fund. With me it is a matter of individual responsibility, because I know the desperate need of the Russian gentlewomen. If the gentlewomen of America knew the need as I know it they would give millions of dollars for relief and count the giving a rare privilege.

Possibly the comment of the good friend in Middletown was based on a natural curiosity concerning my own knowledge of ladies' blouses. Frankly, then, if you were to ask me to define the difference between a blouse and a waist I might not qualify as a technical expert, but there is one thing about these Russian Princess Blouses that I do know absolutely and without qualification. It is this:

Certain styles of these hand-embroidered, hand-sewn blouses will take off about fifteen years from the apparent age of any woman past thirty-five. No, that is not a pleasant; it is a fact. Take, for instance, the Baroness Berends, who posed for some of the illustrations in the small booklet, "Princes in Poverty." I had not considered this excellent Russian lady from the court circles of Petrograd anything more than a good, wholesome looking woman of the intellectual type—certainly not anything to attract the professional attention of the editor of the roto-gravure section. But when she put on those blouses and stood before the camera I discovered that she was—well, look at the pictures in the booklet and form your own opinion. The highly qualified young women in the business office of THE CHRISTIAN WORK say that the baroness is a beautiful woman. They certainly should know. If you do not happen to have a copy of the booklet I will send one to you for the asking.

But, after all, the proof of the blouses lies in the opinion of purchasers. Here are a few extracts from letters:

Englewood, New Jersey: "The four blouses came, and we like them very much. They are really beautiful. This is a wonderful work you and Anne Louise Howard are doing. We hope it will be as successful as it deserves. We are showing your pamphlet to our friends and hope some may purchase these lovely blouses."

Woonsocket, Rhode Island: "The blouse came a few days ago and I am much pleased with it. The work is certainly beautifully done and the materials nice. I have shown the blouse to a few friends and they thought the work unusually fine. I consider them better judges than myself, and wished to ask them. I hope you may get other orders through this one."

Springfield, Illinois: "The blouses more than came up to expectations. Thank you for the beautiful selections."

Brookline, Massachusetts: "The blouse which you selected for me came by this morning's mail. It is a beauty."

Providence, Rhode Island: "The Russian Princess Blouse is very pretty."

I am in receipt of many letters expressing sympathy for the exiled Russian gentlewomen. The following from Peace Dale, Rhode Island, may be taken as typical:

"I am ordering two of the Russian blouses—one at $50 and one at $25—and am adding to my cheque in payment $50 as a small contribution to the splendid work you are doing. Nothing could be finer or more needed, and nothing appeals to me more than the need of these people who are the soul and brains of Russia, without whom she never could be more than headless and hopeless. I hope to be able to do more later on."

In the following letter from Boston is a slight misunderstanding concerning the import duty charged by the United States government:

"My sympathy for the Russian nobility and intelligentsia refugees is greater than for any other class of sufferers, and I planned getting two blouses to help along the work for them, but I read in the report sent me that the United States government imposes a tax of 75 per cent. on these garments. That seems to leave very little for the Russians and would put a substantial amount of the money paid for them into the United States treasury. So I will not buy any blouses, but will send you $50, which will go entirely toward the relief of these much-enduring people. I am a good American citizen, but an economical one, and I deplore the wastefulness of our government. We are overtaxed and underserved, both by the nation, the states and the cities."

The misunderstanding in the foregoing is that the writer seems to think that the import duty is assessed upon the selling price of the blouses whereas the duty is fixed upon the actual cost of materials and labor in the city of Eastern Europe in which they were made. But in the case of the blouses now offered for sale I paid import duty out of my own pocket. I paid also the cost of printing the booklet and the postage to put it into the mails. Therefore, the entire amount received from the sale of the blouses can be cabled to Eastern Europe to be used in giving further employment to the destitute Russian gentlewomen. You may buy these blouses with that understanding. It is another instance of doing what your hand is able to do.

I find it necessary to announce that, until further notice, blouses made of French crêpon, as illustrated in the booklet, will be accepted for deferred delivery only. These blouses—the blouses with collars—have been selected by so many purchasers that the supply brought home with me has become exhausted. Orders will be filled from the next lot, now nearly ready for shipment from Eastern Europe. All other styles are on hand for immediate delivery.

I desire to make plain the fact that I cannot deliver an exact duplicate of any blouse illustrated in the booklet, for the reason that each blouse is an original, with its own individuality. The best that I can do is to deliver a blouse of the same family group.

I shall be glad to send the illustrated booklet to any person who is interested in fine wearing apparel or who sympathizes with the Russian gentlewomen in their desperate need. Contributions to the working fund may be sent to the Russian Refugee Fund, care THE CHRISTIAN WORK, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

She shuddered and hid her head in shame. This was what loose conceptions of marriage really meant. This was the outcome of discarding the old religious beliefs in which she had been reared. And but for what seemed like a miracle she—she—

At length tired brain and body could bear no more. She threw herself on her bed and fell into a troubled sleep.

When morning came she awoke with a great weight on her heart. Something horrible had happened. At first she could not tell what, but presently it all flashed back to her. But she was less excited now and could think of things more calmly. She realized that she had her future to face, and she must think what to do. She counted her money carefully, and as she did so the gray drabness of her prospects rose before her again.

First of all, she determined not to go back to her work. After what had happened the night before it was impossible. She simply could not sit in the same room with a man who had insulted her pride, insulted her womanhood—the very thought of it made a flush of shame rush madly to her cheeks. She would starve rather than live in the poison of that man's presence.

Neither would she go home. That was as impossible as the other. How could she? She called to mind what had passed between her and her father. Remembered, too, what she had constantly said to her mother, for Eleanor Trelawney's pride was unconquered. All sorts of questions would be asked her, and she— No, she simply could not. She had left home because she wanted to live her own life, and although she felt she had been a failure, a miserable failure, she could not go back humbled and penitent.

But what could she do? She must find work, else she would starve.

She remembered the Russian who had offered her—whether seriously or not she was not sure—a post in some organization which existed for the purpose of Bolshevik propaganda. He had mentioned a good salary, too, but her heart gave no response to the suggestion. These people did not stand for law and order, and decency. These Bolsheviks not only scouted the idea of God, but of all Christian morals. She remembered a sentence which this man had said to her: "Religion is a sort of opiate, and opiates are always bad. Religion has no place in the life of a thoughtful man."

She could not help thinking of her father at this moment. He had given his life to the establishment of order and decency. How, then, could she work for that which he had offered his life to avert?

But what could she do?

That was the question which haunted her with grim persistence.

A few minutes later she sat down to her lonely breakfast. Outside the church bells were ringing, calling people to worship, but she had no thought of worship; her mind was too filled with the drab persistence of sordid facts.

Almost mechanically she washed the few breakfast utensils which she had been using and then stood still.

"I'll go and see Peg," she said. "I've neglected her."

She was on the point of putting on her hat and jacket when she heard a step outside her door. Then someone knocked.

Could it be Mr. Wakeman, her employer? Had he dared to hunt her in this fashion? But she was not afraid now; daylight gave her confidence, and a score of people were within call.

The knock was repeated.

Her heart beat wildly, why she could not tell, but she went to the door and opened it, and saw Rod Ravenscroft. Instantly her face was suffused with a flush of shame. She called to mind their meeting on the previous night, remembered what had taken place. Then pride came to her aid. Not for worlds would she let him see, or even suspect, what she felt towards him.

"Good-morning, Miss Trelawney. You'll forgive my calling, won't you? But I thought you looked ill last night."

"You are very kind," she replied quietly. "Won't you come in?"

He entered the room hesitatingly, awkwardly. He, too, remembered the previous night's experience, and felt sensitive. As a consequence he tried to find something to say in order to explain his presence, but nothing would come. He was but a simple-hearted fellow, in spite of a brilliant university career, and he was not an adept in talking with girls. Besides, the circumstances were peculiar.

By this time Eleanor had been able to obtain control over herself. Somehow, why she could not say, he had given her a sense of confidence.

"Won't you sit down, Mr. Ravenscroft? And will you please excuse me while I get the room into something like order? I—I did not expect a visitor."

She was glad she was able to speak calmly. Not for worlds would she let him know what she felt. Last night she had been mad with fear and terror, and as a consequence she felt abject, penitent; but now the old fighting spirit had come back again.

She loved him beyond words, but she would do anything rather than let him know it.

For a few minutes they talked on trivial matters, and never once did he refer to the predicament in which he had found her; but Eleanor knew what he was thinking, and while she dreaded explanations, she longed to stand well in his eyes. But how could she explain away what he had seen and heard?

"Have you been to Duloe lately?" she asked at length.

Duloe was the name of the parish in Cornwall where the original Trelawney mansion was situated, and this had perhaps led General Trelawney to give his house at Hampstead that name.

THE WORLD ALLIANCE MEETING

On April 13-16 the Management Committee of the World Alliance met in Zurich, Switzerland, and sat from early morning to late at night. The meeting was one of the most intense and significant of any that have been held in the history of the Alliance. Of course, the attitude of the churches toward the Ruhr invasion was the one question that was disturbing the European delegates and the Americans who were present were able to render very valuable service as mediators in the many discussions that were held. It should be remembered that both German and French delegates were there. Dr. Henry A. Atkinson, from America, was present throughout all the sessions; so also was Dr. William Adams Brown of our committee. Several questions received full consideration, but most of the meetings were given to the problems of the Ruhr and the outcome was a set of resolution to which reference is made below. So interesting and significant was this meeting that we are devolving the substance of this letter to an account from our Secretary, Dr. Henry A. Atkinson, which will be read with greatest interest.

ONE BOOK A WEEK

Under this caption, each week, we shall direct attention to some striking book, such as no Minister or those interested in religious thought and action can afford to remain unacquainted with

American Individualism*

THIS little book by the Secretary of Commerce is certainly one of the most important expressions of American faith in the last few years. It deserves to rank with the philosophical declarations of the British statesmen and with those of the late Franklin K. Lane. It is a sane, steady voice, speaking clearly amid storm and conflicting cries. Mr. Hoover describes in a few short and compact paragraphs the conflict of the five or six great social philosophies which are struggling in the world to-day for ascendancy—"Communism, Socialism, Syndicalism, Capitalism, and finally there is Autocracy." He admits that in facing the question before us "we must go far deeper than the superficials of our political and economic structure, for these are but the products of our social philosophy—the machinery of our social system." He speaks feelingly of "the great social and political havoc that can be worked where the bestial instincts of hate, murder and destruction are clothed by the demagogue in the fine terms of political idealism." He declares that out of seven years' experience with economic degeneration, social disintegration and incessant political dislocation he emerges "an individualist—an unashamed individualist." And he describes the particular nature of his individualism as "tempered with that firm and fixed ideal of American individualism—the equality of opportunity."

From this point the book goes on to describe this American individualism in its philosophic, spiritual, economic and political phases, especially as contrasted with the other great social philosophies contending in the world to-day. He says frankly, even bluntly, that "the day has not arrived when any economic or social system will function and last if founded upon altruism alone." And again, "The will-o'-the-wisp of all breeds of socialism is that they contemplate a motivation of human animals by altruism alone." On the other hand, he declares with equal emphasis, "The will-o'-the-wisp of autocracy in any form is that it supposes that the good Lord endowed a special few with all the divine attributes." Perhaps the most characteristically American statement in the book is that where he says, "All we can hope to assure to the individual through government is liberty, justice, intellectual welfare, equality of opportunity and stimulation to service." "It is in maintenance of a society fluid to these human qualities that our individualism departs from the individualism of Europe." He points out the significant fact that of the twelve men comprising the President, Vice-President and Cabinet, nine have earned their own way in life without economic inheritance, and eight of them started with manual labor. Everywhere the emphasis rests upon the individual man. "Leadership is a quality of the individual." "It is one of the most profound and important of exact psychological truths that man in the mass does not think but only feels. "Our individualism insists upon the divine in each human being." "I may repeat that the divine spark does not lie in agreements, in organizations, in institutions, in masses or in groups." Mr. Hoover believes that we have in our American system upon the whole sufficient check upon individualism run riot, both in taxation and in the strong trend of business organization towards co-operation. He rejoices that our economic system is not "a frozen organism," and decries the demagogues of both radical and stand-pat breed who insist on destroying an organization in order to remedy its defects, whereas progress lies in the "guardianship of the vital principles of our individualism with its safeguard of true equality of opportunity." He has no sympathy with the idea that all human ills can be cured by governmental regulation, any more than he has with the idea that all regulation is wrong. He believes that government must steer a ticklish course between regulation and freedom in order to preserve individual initiative, and offers a double test for government in relation to economic questions: "Does this act safeguard an equality of opportunity? Does it maintain the initiative of our people?"

Amidst many voices crying out against the injustices of our social order, he points steadily to the general standards of well-being and happiness among the people, and insists that while we labor for the improvement of the condition of the few who are under unjust circumstances, we do not overlook the primary facts of general well-being. Apropos of the radical accusation that private property is a fetish in America, he points to the fact that "the crushing of the liquor trade without a cent of compensation, with scarcely even a discussion of it, does not bear out the notion that we give property rights any headway over human rights."

If one were looking for points to criticize unfavorably one might perhaps point to the remark, "We have given more back to Europe than we received from her," which may or may not be true, but ought not to be said by an American; and again the somewhat dogmatic statement that "leaders can arise solely through the selection that comes from the free-running mills of competition"; or again, the declaration, which is not true in any strict sense, that "none of us is either hungry or cold or without a place to lay his head—and we have much besides."

The fine note of the book is its emphasis on individual effort and achievement. "The days of the pioneer are not over. There are continents of human welfare of which we have penetrated only the coastal plain. . . . What we need to-day is steady devotion to a better, brighter, broader individualism—an individualism that carries increasing responsibility and service to our fellows." Human advance does not come through government, but through the idealism of the government. Mr. Hoover would have us emphasize the sense of duty as well as the sense of right, and declares almost at the end of the book, "No one who buys 'bootleg' whisky can complain of gunmen and hoodlumism."

It is good to read so sane and balanced a statement of American political theory, which looks for the solution of our present difficulties rather to the idealism of the individual than to the external reform of a new social program. It is the man that counts, after all.

Esther, the Patriot Queen

ESTHER 4:13—5:3

"And who knoweth whether thou art not come to the kingdom for such a time as this?"—ESTHER 4:14.

AMONG the books of the Bible we find one which does not name the name of God, never refers to him, contains no direct teaching about him, recognizes no such thing as prayer or obedience to a divine will. But because it deals with human relations in such a way as to exalt the spirit of unselfishness and patriotism, the book of Esther has taken its place in the sacred Scriptures.

It may or may not be historical. Neither Xerxes nor any other ruler may exactly correspond to King Ahasuerus reigning from India even unto Ethiopia, over a hundred and seven and twenty provinces. Nevertheless it is true, in the same way that the parable of the Prodigal Son is true—it occurs and recurs repeatedly with varying modification.

How would you like to have lived at that time? Liquor flowed fast and free. For seven days the feast went on amid all the luxuries wealth could command. In vessels of gold they drank what and when they pleased. Royal wine was in abundance, and both men and women had hearts that were merry with drinking.

In the condition of mind produced by strong drink certain decisions were made. King Ahasuerus decided to show off his wife. Queen Vashti decided not to appear. The wise men decided such refusal if unpunished would turn every house in the realm into a place of brawling. Therefore Vashti was deposed. Strong drink doesn't strengthen family ties.

It has long been recognized that it is not good for man to live alone. But what about woman? The method King Ahasuerus chose for selecting a wife was to gather the most beautiful maidens from all his realm. A different one came to him each evening, but returned to him no more except the king delighteth in her and called for her by name.

One woman might be elevated, were the rest degraded? The lust of kings and the sins of man have made many women live alone. War-ravaged France to-day has five young women to every young man.

Women were but the playthings of men in the days of Ahasuerus. Consider the advance in the rights and development of womanhood to-day and then say whether the world is growing worse or better, whether retrogression necessitates the physical reappearance of Christ as Saviour, or whether progress constantly made shows that his spiritual coming is real.

Out of that black background of the past shines the pure character of Esther. Accepting life and the standards of womanhood as she found them, she played her part so unselfishly and patriotically as to become an ideal for countless others. The very vengeance in her heart against the house of Haman, while contrary to the later-revealed teachings of Christ, was in her day a virtue, for it was rooted in springs of love for her own people.

Let us note some of the crucial points in such a life. First comes her good fortune as an orphan girl in being adopted by her uncle Mordecai as his own daughter. In its formative period her impressionable young life thus was molded by his strong character. Instead of being spoiled as thousands of other lives have been spoiled when orphaned and dependent, her life was shielded and instructed. The world is indebted to Mordecai for his investment of love in Esther.

Second comes the experience of contest for the affections of the king. Whether or not she felt the injustice of woman's position, or had one spark of sympathy for the deposed Vashti, or pity for herself and the other maidens selected for the king's ravishing, we do not know. But we do know that she played the game; that she so conducted herself as to win favor in the sight of all; that she was not afraid of life's contest according to the standards of the time. Partly because of personal beauty, but unquestionably more because of the strength and beauty of her spirit, that which inspires personal charm and irresistible attraction, she succeeded in winning the king's love and was chosen as his favorite.

Having graduated from the home of Mordecai, and having reached what might be thought to be the pinnacle of success for one of her position, Queen Esther now came to the more crucial issue of life. Would she so retain Mordecai in her affection as to receive sympathetically his suggestion and advice? And could she continue to hold the affection of King Ahasuerus so that he would heed and fulfil her desires? These were the slow tests of character. Ingratitude toward Mordecai, or shallowness in the sight of the king—these would have destroyed her usefulness. Her character was equal to the test. She proved her magnificent womanhood. The right queen had come to the kingdom at the right time.

The event which precipitated the supreme crisis of her life is revealing of human nature. Wisely or unwisely, Mordecai would not do obeisance to the proud and haughty Haman whom the king had set over all his princes. Now because Mordecai was a Jew his action aroused the enmity of Haman against not only himself but against all other Jews. Other motives doubtless entered in, but the principle remains that prejudice spreads from an individual to a group, and a group is helped or harmed by the individual actions of its several members. Social, racial, and religious prejudices to-day illustrate this principle.

Under any form of government, the power for good or for evil of men high in office is tremendous. Haman accomplished a decree of death against all Jews in the realm. The time was set, the instructions were issued, the greed of the rougher element of the population assured the slaughter and plunder of the Jews. In this crisis Mordecai appealed to Esther. The matter was both delicate and dangerous.

A REPORT FROM HENRY A. ATKINSON

Secretary of the World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches

Before leaving for Europe, Dr. Lynch handed me a sum of money collected through THE CHRISTIAN WORK'S Children's Fund and commissioned me to expend it as I thought best for the purposes for which it was collected—that is, for the relief of the suffering children in the various countries of Europe. It was a pleasure to have the opportunity to take the amount that was represented by this gift as a contribution toward the awful need in Europe to-day. While I was attending the meeting of the International Committee of the World Alliance at Zurich I met representatives from various countries, and thus had the finest possible chance of giving this money to men who are vitally interested in the needs of their various countries and who were in a position to know where this money could do most good.

A part of the money went to the Belgians through Dr. Anet, a leading member of the Belgian Council of the World Alliance. I gave another sum to Dr. Demetrescu, of Rumania; I gave some to Dr. da Silva, of Portugal; I gave some to Dr. Douglas, of Spain, the first gift he has received from us; to Dr.

Siegmund-Schultze and Dr. Spiecker, of Germany, I gave considerable sums; and promised, but have not given because I had spent all the money I had, sums to Madame Jezequel, of France, for the French orphanages; and also promised sums to the various orphanages we are supporting in the Balkan states.

I quote from a letter from Dr. Alfredo da Silva, of Porto, Portugal: "I thank you for your so generous gift that I intend applying part to the existing schools for the children. These schools have grown in success and have been much blessed, having been the means of educating many people. Thousands of the new generation owe their education to the Protestant schools."

"The Methodist schools in Oporto have now over 700 children and about as many applicants for admission; the schools are unable to receive all who desire to be admitted."

"In the Methodist schools the children receive the elementary education up to twelve years of age, in accordance with the official program. Besides, they are taught the Gospel of Jesus Christ in the Sunday schools."

Dr. Anet, of Bruxelles, writes:

"By negotiating I was able to change the money you gave me into the largest number of Belgian francs. After careful consideration of the best use to make of that money so kindly entrusted to me I decided to give:

1. To the Belgian Protestant Orphanage at Uccle, near Brussels (has a serious deficit this year).
2. To the "Refuge," rescue home for girls (splendid institution, having very good results and administered with the utmost economy by a wonderful French Protestant lady) in Brussels.
3. To the "Commission des Etudes" Missionary Church helping by small subsidies students and young people who have suffered from the war (some have served in the Belgian army or have been deported to Germany or in exile and had to interrupt their studies) and whose families have been victims of the war.

"I hope you will be satisfied with my repartition. I can assure you that in every case the sum given will be a real blessing and received with great thankfulness."

"Thanking you again for your kind help and wishing to see you when you come back to Europe, I am, Very truly yours, N. ANET."

In any crisis it is always the women and children who suffer most, but aside from the physical needs of the children at present there is a still greater menace in the present unsettled state of affairs. European civilization is so sick that it is still a question as to whether it will recover. Many of the most intelligent men on the Continent believe that European civilization is actually dying. It is certain that in all the countries the one group that is hardest hit is the intellectual group. It is from the great middle class of the people that the world draws its leaders—preachers, lawyers, teachers, judges and doctors. In the homes of these people there is the most acute suffering. The toiler in the field and the worker in the factory are able to live; but the men and women who are dependent upon salaries, the great middle-class groups in all the countries, are gradually disappearing. The salaries have not been increased and living expenses have mounted to fantastic levels. The children are being deprived of food, heat, clothes, schooling and everything that goes to make normal life possible. Unless something is done to help these children there is no hope for trained leadership in the days that are to come. Therefore, it seems to me that over and above purely materialistic appeals, and these are great enough, that we ought to realize how strong the appeal is for help that will supplement living and make existence possible for the hundreds of thousands of children in the homes of the great middle class. In helping them we are helping to maintain the leadership for the days that are to come. I gave this money, therefore, with the understanding that it was to be devoted to the boys and girls of these classes.

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

Adroitness and courage were requisite, but all was contingent on the utter unselfishness of the queen. Was she willing to die if need be in the effort to save her people? Jeopardizing all that she had won, would she face the supreme sacrifice for the sake of her kindred and her people?

The overruling providence of God, seen not only in the book of Esther but in all human history, is dependent upon the co-operation of God's children. We are co-laborers with God. And there is no misjudging the fact that there and then in the history of his people God had need of a consecrated and obedient servant. The words and action of Esther excite our highest admiration. "Go, gather together all the Jews that are present in Shushan, and fast ye for me, and neither eat nor drink three days, night or day: I also and my maidens will fast in like manner; and so will I go in unto the king, which is not according to the law: and if I perish, I perish."

The favor of the king, the humiliation and death of Haman, the exaltation of Mordecai, the preserving of the Jews—these are stirringly written, and their reading year by year at the feast of Purim makes the blood of every patriot Jew course more swiftly. But not of Jews alone! Universal appeals are here. Here is the call to every individual to achieve power for public service, to protect the innocent against spoilation, to lay life down in order to find one's life in the public good. It is the inspiring example of a woman who became great but retained a warm and loving heart. And it reveals what can be accomplished when strong men and women will make the supreme venture in co-operation with other men and women, all being directed and inspired by the will of God.

REV. JASON NOBLE PIERCE.

WHAT THE CHURCH MEANS TO ME EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN WORK:

Rather than shake or weaken my faith, the recent theological controversies have strengthened it and have made me proud of being a child of God and an intelligent being of His creation. Rather than discourage me, these controversies (with their concomitant revelations and new concepts) have greatly encouraged me. "Where there is no vision, the people perish" (Proverbs 29:18a). Where there is no new scientific truth developed and promulgated the people die of spiritual ennui and lack of opportunity for growth.

"Grow in grace" was the exhortation of Peter (Second Epistle 3:18), and the accumulation of knowledge which the brilliancy of keen minds brings is the means of our development. We no more grow by the restatement of aged theological dogmas and the mouthing of ecclesiastical differences than could one add to his physical wellbeing by feeding upon cast-off food.

Theological controversy assures me that the Church is alive; indeed, I would fear for her continuance were there no new revelations—were each one of us content with our mauling over of worn-out truths. The Church is of divine origin; I fear no harm as long as she moves ahead. I do fear for her very life when she settles down to contentment with creeds and dogmas that keen intellect (born of God's gracious goodness) have laid aside as unworthy her greatest growth.

REV. ALAN PRESSLEY WILSON.

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN WORK:

I am glad that someone has been bold enough to answer your miserable slur on the Episcopal Church. And no one could do it better than Dr. Sturgis. And then you add to his letter that "he has deep concern for what seem minor matters to most evangelical Christians," i.e., apostolic orders and the Lord's Supper. If this is our "weakness," then we glory in it, because our Lord instituted the Lord's Supper, saying, "Do this in remembrance of Me." While it is not specially clear in the beginning, yet we see in the Acts of the Apostles orders of the ministry. What the disciples went and did after the Ascension is likely that they did because they had been instructed to do them. We are told of "the breaking of bread," of baptism, the laying of hands with prayer, etc. The weakness of Protestantism is that our Lord's instructions about the Sacraments, etc., are treated as "minor matters." Which is the part of a gentleman, to treat these sacred matters reverently or to speak of them flippantly? Is it gentlemanly to speak discourteously of one in his absence? That is practically what you do in a paper read by few Episcopalians. You are as inconsistent as many other Protestants. Only recently there was an article which emphasized worship rather than preaching, which emphasized a churchly building rather than one built for hearing, one that would aid in the devotion of the people as well as that of the preacher. The article deplored the neglect of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, often making it subsidiary, a mere after-service, after the sermon. We have little respect for one who is a "knocker." How much worse to be a "knocker" in an editorial of a magazine that claims to represent all religious bodies!

THE BAPTISTS AT ATLANTIC CITY

from Fundamentalists and Progressives alike. This program, which involves certain marked changes in the working of the machinery of the denomination, was presented by J. F. Vichert, dean of Colgate University, chairman of the committee which has been engaged upon the consideration of the future denominational program for the past year. The program itself, if accepted, is to be entered upon in May, 1924, at the close of the five-year period of the New World Movement. Adoption of the program will not be ratified until the three thousand delegates assembled here have had opportunity to refer the matter to the local churches from which they come. The unanimity and enthusiasm manifested here, however, seem to leave little doubt of its ultimate adoption.

Waves of applause swept the convention hall when Dr. J. C. Massee, of Boston, leader of the Fundamentalist forces, expressed his hearty approval of the proposed denominational program, and his desire to co-operate in it. "I wish to commend without reservation this splendid report," said Dr. Massee. "I express my appreciation of it, not only in my own name, but in that of my group or constituency. I earnestly believe that a saner document, worked out with more care for the equities of the situation, could hardly have been prepared. It is my most earnest wish to co-operate without reservation in this splendid program." Dr. Massee declared that he had only one objection to offer to the present program. "It does not provide for the election of the chief executive officer of the board," he explained. "I am profoundly convinced that the success of the new administration will depend in large degrees upon this detail. I wish to amend the report by inserting words to the effect that this officer must be elected annually by the Convention."

Dr. John Y. Aitchison, director of the General Board of Promotion of the Northern Baptist Convention, seconded this amendment, which was unanimously carried by the delegates. Color was lent to this incident by the fact that Dr. Massee has opposed the General Board of Promotion in its present form consistently.

Among the important changes which the new denominational program recommends are: Increased emphasis upon the place and function of the local church, instead of the centralizing bodies of the denomination; more freedom to participating organizations of the denomination; an annual financial objective rather than those for a longer period; and freedom in designation of gifts to the denomination.

The following points were emphasized in detail by the committee:

1. The place and function of the local church should be emphasized anew. Promotion of its prosperity should be part of our united endeavor, and its verdict should be sought in determining denominational objectives.

2. A program of co-operation should be continued.

3. The co-operative plan should allow a larger measure of freedom to the participating organizations in securing funds.

While a comprehensive and far-reaching program of undertakings may be formulated, financial objectives should be determined annually, and pledges regularly be for one year.

5. Budgets should be concreted, and indicate in separate classes askings for regular operating expenses, and for specifics. Askings shall fall into three groups: The National Societies, State and City Missions, and Schools and Colleges.

6. Churches and individuals should have entire freedom in the designation of their gifts.

7. Organization essential to effective co-operation ought to be maintained. The present organization should not be discarded, but modified as the experience of the past four years may suggest.

8. Schools and colleges, approved by the State Conventions of the territory in which they are located, may be included in the co-operative program in the segregated budget.

The meetings have been most enthusiastically attended. The meeting to consider the relation of the Church to social problems, held Saturday afternoon, was an illustration of the interest being manifested in the larger work of the Church. Two thousand people assembled at the end of the great steel pier, a mile out in the ocean, to hear Mr. Holt, Mr. Nash, Mr. Johnson ("Pussyfoot") and others discuss this question for two hours. Three times a day this crowd gathers. Sunday the churches of all denominations were crowded to hear the visiting delegates preach. It is a good thing to go to one of these big conventions occasionally. It encourages one. He discovers that the Church is very much alive in spite of the fact that some pulpits and some magazines are always preaching its funeral sermon. One cannot spend a week here at Atlantic City with these Baptists without feeling that the report of the Church's death was greatly exaggerated.

RESOLVES FOR THE TOBACCO SMOKER

The tobacco manufacturers are a little troubled at the prospect that people who do not use tobacco will not always submit in silence to having their perfectly good air spoiled. At their Tobacco Exposition in New York last winter they endorsed a set of resolves for tobacco smokers. They run:

1. I shall not smoke or carry a lighted cigar or cigarette in any place or at any time where or when, either by placard or common understanding, smoking is prohibited.

2. I shall not smoke in any place or at any time where or when the fumes of tobacco are obviously annoying to others, even though such abstinence is not compulsory.

3. I shall not smoke in any passenger elevator, public or private.

4. I shall not smoke in a dense crowd of people, indoors or out, if I discover that my smoke is annoying some one near me who, owing to the circumstances, is unable to move away.

5. I shall not smoke in any home or any room wherein I am a guest without first making sure that smoking therein is agreeable to my host and others present.

6. I shall not smoke in the presence of any lady until I have been assured that she has no objections to my doing so.

7. I shall not approve of the use of tobacco by growing boys or girls.

8. I shall exercise caution in discarding the ends of cigars and cigarettes in order to preclude the possibility of fire.

9. I shall, in my enjoyment of the smoking privilege, be always considerate of those whose inclinations happen to differ from my own and always be guided by the finer instincts of true chivalry and American manhood.

10. I shall faithfully adhere to the foregoing self-imposed rules myself, and I shall urge others to do the same, that the days of tobacco may be long and its friends legion in the land of our fathers.

Not a bad program if tobacco smoking is not to be driven beyond the pale.

Confronting Young Men with The Living Christ

CLOTH, $1.50

The heart of Dr. Mott's message, given during the past thirty years to the men and boys of forty nations, is in this series of addresses. In a recent continent-wide tour, speaking before tens of thousands, he made such a profound impression, sounded such a clear note of advance, that calls for publication became insistent.

Eight of these addresses were chosen. They are comprehensive messages—vigorous, far-reaching in their spirit of vision, commanding in their call to immediate service. They deal with the central theme of Christian faith, and light up the issues in the present world situation so that no one can escape a realization of his duty.

They point to the need of discovering and training stronger and more numerous leadership of Christian forces, of holding up the Christ of yesterday and to-day to the coming generation—men, young men, and boys, susceptible to influence now as never again.

These are highly personal messages, striking deep, speaking to the individual soul, stirring fundamental emotions, and offering a program of constructive significance.

SCIENCE AND RELIGION

A statement holding that there is no antagonism between science and religion has been issued as representing the conclusions of a group of forty distinguished Americans on a subject which recently has aroused bitter and widespread controversy. It was prepared by Dr. R. A. Milliken, director of the Norman Bridge Laboratory of Physics at Pasadena, California. "The purpose," said an accompanying explanation, "is to assist in correcting two erroneous impressions that seem to be current among certain groups of persons. The first is that religion to-day stands for medieval theology, the second that science is materialistic and irreligious." The statement itself reads: "We, the undersigned, deeply regret that in recent controversies there has been a tendency to present science and religion as irreconcilable and antagonistic domains of thought, for, in fact, they meet distinct human needs, and in the rounding out of human life they supplement rather than displace or oppose each other. The purpose of science is to develop, without prejudice or preconception of any kind, a knowledge of the facts, the laws and the processes of nature. The even more important task of religion, on the other hand, is to develop the consciences, the ideals and the aspirations of mankind. Each of these two activities represents a deep and vital function of the soul of man, and both are necessary for the life, the progress and the happiness of the human race. It is a sublime conception of God which is furnished by science, and one wholly consonant with the highest ideals of religion, when it represents Him as revealing Himself through countless ages in the development of the earth as an abode for man and in the age-long inbreathing of life into its constituent matter culminating in man with his spiritual nature and all his Godlike powers." Those whose names were attached to the statement included Bishops William Lawrence and William Thomas Manning of the Episcopal Church and Bishop Francis J. McConnell of the Methodist Episcopal Church; Dr. Charles D. Walcott of the Smithsonian Institution, who is president of the National Academy of Sciences; President Angell of Yale, President Burton of the University of Chicago, Dr. William J. Mayo, David F. ## ANOTHER AMNESTY PETITION

A petition by forty-eight prominent men and women, among them five governors of States, eleven college presidents and several well-known clergymen, Protestant, Catholic and Jewish, urging the release of all persons serving prison sentences for political offenses, has been presented to President Harding. The petition asserts that so fundamental "is the belief in civil liberties in the minds of the American people that adherents of the most divergent schools of thought and politics have joined together in asking the release of all the remaining free-speech prisoners," and add they make their plea "not because of sympathy for the views of the men imprisoned, but because of their belief that the United States should not stoop to the methods of Old World despotism." Among the signers are William Allen White, Mrs. Willard Straight, Governors Dixon of Montana, Davis of Kansas, Hunt of Arizona, Sweet of Colorado and Walton of Oklahoma; President MacCracken of Vassar, President Marion E. Park of Bryn Mawr, the Right Rev. T. J. Shahan, president of the Catholic University; Dr. Richard C. Cabot of the Harvard medical faculty; Rabbi Stephen S. Wise; Francis B. Sayre; Dr. Russell H. Conwell, of Philadelphia, Baptist clergyman and president of Temple University; Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick, of the Union Theological Seminary; Mrs. Charles L. Tiffany, of New York; Glenn Frank, editor of "The Century Magazine"; Herbert Bayard Swope, of the "New York World"; Julia Lathrop, former chief of the Children's Bureau, Department of Labor; John F. Moore, of the Boston Finance Commission; Dean Charles N. Lathrop, secretary of the Social Service Department of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and Dr. Charles Fleischer, editorial writer, Hearst newspapers.

METHODIST BISHOPS ON RURAL LIFE

The economic and social conditions of rural life and their relation to rural church work were discussed at considerable length by the Board of Bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church at its semi-annual meeting in Wichita, Kansas. The conditions of many of the rural churches and communities was brought forcibly to the attention of the bishops by a commission which was appointed by the bishops at its previous meeting, which consisted of five bishops and five leaders of rural and community work in the Methodist Episcopal Church. The bishops reappointed the commission of which Bishop E. L. Waldorf, of Wichita, is chairman. The following are among the resolutions: That the church should co-operate with other agencies in developing economic welfare of the farmer; that the Federal Council of Churches should organize a committee to co-operate with other agencies in the solution of national problems affecting rural life generally, such as the tenancy problem and the transient labor situation; that the church should encourage the co-operative movement among farmers as in harmony with the highest ideals of Christian brotherhood; that the health program of the church should be expanded to include public health nursing service for rural people; that the church should provide building and equipment for the social and recreational welfare of our young people, and should carry on a program designed to Christianize all of life; that interdenominational adjustments be made to eliminate duplications of religious effort and to assure to every rural family definite pastoral care; that as a remedy for the discrepancy between urban and rural pastorates the church should (a) assist in increasing the economic resources of the parish, (b) enlarge the geographical area of the parish and provide transportation maintenance, (c) increase the scope of pastoral service.

SOME SOCIAL STATISTICS

The editor of the "American City Magazine" (New York), Mr. Harold S. Bottenheim, is authority for the following statements of fact made a few weeks since before the Methodist Council of Cities. Although ten years ago the city management form of government was a new idea in the United States, to-day there are city manager charters in force in 225 municipalities, while seventy-nine other cities have appointed a city manager by ordinance. As reported by the Federal Department of Commerce in January of this year, 109 cities, towns and villages had been zoned prior to January 1, as compared with fifty-five up to January 1, 1922. Fifteen million people in the United States now live in zoned cities. The first city planning commission was created in Hartford, Conn., in 1907. Twenty States have laws authorizing or requiring the establishment of planning commissions and twenty-six States have partial or comprehensive enabling acts with reference to zoning. Although in 1890 there was only one publicly operated playground in this country, there are now more than five hundred where work is being carried on under paid leadership. A marked improvement in health conditions is shown by Census Bureau figures, according to which the average expectation of life at birth has increased from 49.2 years in 1901 to 51.5 years in 1910 and to 54.3 years in 1920. "It was not until 1908 that any American city admitted that the death of babies was a municipal concern. That year New York City established a Division of Child Hygiene in its Department of Health." Now forty-six out of forty-eight States have divisions or bureaus dealing with saving of child life and the preservation of child health. The estimated deaths from automobile accidents in the United States for 1922, according to the National Safety Council, were 12,000—an increase of 10,000 over the figures for 1911. The figure for the fatalities from all kinds of accidents was estimated at 76,000 for 1920. During 1921, according to figures compiled by the Prudential Life Insurance Company, there were 1910 cases of murder in twenty-eight American cities, an average murder rate of 9.3 per 100,000 population. Contrary to a rather common supposition, some of the cities having the highest percentage of foreign-born are among the lowest in the table of murder statistics. Chambers of commerce are giving increased attention to civic problems and in many small or medium-sized cities chambers of commerce have been reorganized or newly created with civic service as their chief emphasis. Some forty cities have created departments of public welfare "whose scope includes such activities as the management of all charitable and correctional institutions, the supervision of recreation and health work, the maintenance of employment bureaus and the giving of legal aid." By way of comment: "The good old American principle of individual liberty becomes an immoral principle unless exercised with due regard to the similar rights of other individuals; and while we may not be able to make people moral by law, we can by law prevent them in some respects from being immoral. We can, for example, by a zoning ordinance, prevent the encroachment of shops and garages into residential districts to the detriment of home life and of legitimate property values. . . . One of the most discouraging facts in our civic and religious life is the disproportionately large expenditure on charities and correction for the failing or fallen as against constructive methods to prevent the continued production of human wreckage."

ANOTHER YEAR OF WORLD-WIDE SERVICE

The American Bible Society reports the distribution of 4,667,839 volumes of Scriptures during the past year. Its work has been conducted in practically every country of the world and more than 2,373 persons have been engaged during the year in this task. In the 107 years of its history this Society has circulated 151,258,360 volumes. One of the outstanding features of this year has been the completion of the new Hispano-American New Testament which will be ready for circulation among the ninety millions of people that speak the Spanish language in all parts of the world. Translation work has been carried on during the year in the following languages: Yiddish, Quechua, Portuguese, Kurmanji-Kurdish, Siamese, Lao, Union Wenli, Chinese Phonetic Script, Japanese, Olunore, Kipelle and Zulu. In the United States alone the Scriptures have been circulated in as many as one hundred languages and dialects among the immigrants of many nationalities. Scriptures have been furnished to the American Merchant Marine Library Association, and vessels on the Great Lakes. It is the desire of the Society to see that no American ship will be lacking a copy of the Christian Scriptures. In the Republic of Mexico, unprecedented interest and enthusiasm for the Bible has been developed through a united "Know the Bible" campaign. Without doubt the demand for the Bible in Mexico will increase with the growing improvement in international relations. In the Near East, where the Society had planned for extensive advance, its hopes have been shattered. With the burning of Smyrna, its colporters were forced to flee with only the clothing they were wearing. The stock of Scriptures were burned, and the last of the fields in Asia Minor was closed to the Society's workers. The scattering of the Christian peoples of Turkey has added to the calamity. The Society has undertaken to supply copies of the Scriptures free to all the destitute refugees in this region. In the Far East there has been notable interest in the circulation of the Bible. The secretary for Japan speaks of "a lively time at the Bible House." He states: "While other dealers around us have complained of decreasing business, we have had the pleasure of experiencing continued increase of sales." During the year the smallest complete Bible ever issued in Japanese, measuring 3 x 4 x 1 inches, having 1,654 pages, although only on sale since April 1, 1922, reached a total distribution of 4,150 copies by the end of the year. The total receipts for the Society from all sources for the year was $1,142,729, of which only $488,838 was received from the sale of books. The Society's work is conducted as a missionary program.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL PIONEERING

The American Sunday-School Union, the oldest Sunday-school organization in the country, has just completed its one hundred and sixth year of service. It has seen the nation add one hundred million to the population of nine million which it had when the Society was organized. In its one hundred and six years it has organized one hundred and thirty-eight thousand Sunday-schools, into which it has gathered five and a half million people, chiefly children. During the past seventeen years there have been organized out of the Sunday-schools it planted 1,139 churches of many different denominations. This Society's work has always been like that of John the Baptist. It has pioneered the way, going into communities where no Christian work was being done for the children. As soon as the way opened for church organization in a community in which it has planted and developed a Sunday-school, it has left the denominational choice to the people themselves, and passed its responsibility over to the denomination which they chose. Its one hundred and sixth year has been one of the most vigorous in its history. It has either organized or reorganized eighteen hundred schools. Adding these to those already in operation, it has supervised the work of six thousand schools, most of them meeting in public school houses, but some six hundred in abandoned churches, two hundred and fifty in public halls, one hundred and fifty in farm homes, and others in all sorts of places like railroad stations, box cars, under brush arbors, etc. Its missionaries have paid great attention to home visitation, having made more than two hundred thousand visits to families, and in the course of this work distributed over nineteen thousand Gospels, Testaments and Bibles. For its schools and others desiring a sound, union, evangelical literature it has issued a dozen Sunday-school periodicals, with a circulation of some two million, and published two hundred thousand books, booklets, and other Sunday-school requisites. More than five thousand persons, young and old, have professed conversion in connection with its work during the past year, and forty-seven churches of various denominations have grown out of its schools. Its work covers the whole United States, and is supported by some twenty-five thousand givers—people who believe that union, evangelical work of this sort is the salvation of our outlying rural districts.

IS AMERICAN FREE EDUCATION TOO COSTLY?

Modern education is becoming so costly in the United States that free education may come to an abrupt halt. This at least is the conclusion reached by President Pritchett of the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching in a recently published report. The measurement of education in terms of cost to the taxpayer as well as by other standards has aroused vigorous discussion among educators throughout the country. After giving figures to show to what an alarming extent the amounts spent on public schools have increased (one billion dollars was spent on them in 1920, during which year the enrollment of pupils was two million), the report contrasts the theory of education which requires that a child know his own language, have some knowledge of arithmetic, know something of the government of his country, and his rights and obligations as a citizen, and an acquaintance with the processes and results of science with another view of education. According to this second theory, he must know something of a great number of things that are going on in the world. He must be taught something of art, something of science, something of literature, something of political economy, something of every form of knowledge in which the modern world interests itself. The first conception, in the words of the report, "makes for sincerity, thoroughness, intellectual vigor. The second, only too often, in the attempt to give the child some grasp of all knowledge, gives him only the most superficial smattering, and instead of quickening his powers of reasoning, tends to give him the impression that he can solve the problems of his own life and of his country by the same superficial processes that he has learnt in the school." The question of the cost of education leads directly to a consideration of its results, without which a hasting up of the amounts spent on schools fails to prove that they are a burden too great to carry. That those results are inadequate seems to be the consensus of opinion of most of the specialists in education who have commented on the Carnegie report. But the consensus of opinion also seems to be that, in spite of Dr. Pritchett's sensational suggestion that "the cost of the school system will not stop short of the financial solvency of the various states and communities," no sum can really be considered too great to spend on education in a democracy. "When the American people are spending annually $22,000,000,000 on luxuries, certainly they can afford to spend more on schools," declares the United States Commissioner of Education. Dr. Charles W. Eliot, former president of Harvard and one of the best loved of American educators, after describing the schools he would like to see in the United States, where the classes would be much smaller than they are now, admits that such schools "will cost more money in buildings, grounds, salaries and equipment than American communities have been accustomed to spend, and that therefore appropriations of public money and private gifts must both be increased." Moreover, he comes to the defense of the "enriched curriculum," the chief cause of the degeneration of American school training, according to Dr. Pritchett, by asserting that what some people call the fads or frills in schools and family life, like music and drawing, are really of fundamental importance. The variety of studies offered by the new program is essential to the discovery in every pupil of the kind of work he likes best. A variety of elective studies in high schools and colleges is indispensable to the general attainment of joy in work.

"COMPANY UNIONS VS. TRADE UNIONS"

Under this title Professor Henry R. Seager, of Columbia University, discusses in the "American Economic Review" for March, 1923, the relative merits of the company union vs. the trade union in public service industries, especially railroads, from the point of view of the public, the employers and the employees. He points out the growing trend of government policy toward strengthening the machinery for insuring continuous operation of public service industries. "This means," says Professor Seager, "the maintenance of an authoritative board or court to determine labor conditions on the railroads and of similar State boards or courts to determine conditions on street railways and other local public service industries. It means the formulation in statutes of the standards as regards wages and working conditions that are to be required in connection with public service industries. Finally, it means prohibition with enforceable penalties (not imprisonment, but fines which pursue the offender until paid, as in New Zealand) of strikes or other concerted efforts to interrupt the service." Insofar as this trend makes the strike a futile weapon it will weaken the hold of the trade union and increase the possible scope for the company union. Discussing the legal prohibition of strikes and punishment for interruptions of service, Professor Seager explains his position as follows: "I do not advocate this last step, logical and necessary as I believe it to be, because I feel strongly that any statute which deprives the employees of public service industries of their right to strike must in fairness establish definite minimum standards for their protection. Among these should be, in my opinion, the eight-hour day with extra compensation for overtime, a reasonable living wage, employment on a monthly or even annual, instead of merely daily, basis and the right to belong to labor organizations of their own choosing. Economists can, I think, render a more valuable service by urging the need of such standards than in joining the current hue and cry against strikes." Professor Seager finds that the company union tends to create a sense of community of interest between the employer and the employees in his service. Therefore the employers favor the company union on the ground that it promotes continuity of operation, economy and efficiency and makes the employees more amenable to changes initiated by the employers. Looking at the matter from the point of view of the employees, Professor Seager says: "While the evidence thus favors the company union as the better agency for promoting economy and efficiency and continuity of operation, the argument seems all on the side of the trade union from the viewpoint of the employees' chief interests—favorable wages, hours, working conditions and participation in determining these conditions. The company union is obviously not equipped to contend effectively for better conditions with a reluctant employer. In the first place, all the members, including even the officials of the organization, are employees of the employer to be influenced and dependent upon his good will for a livelihood. Second, because of their local character they are debarred from acquiring knowledge of conditions in other establishments where perhaps wages, hours and working arrangements are more favorable and thus are unable to exert the pressure which possession of this knowledge would make possible. In the third place, again because of their local character, they can offer no effective resistance to adverse changes initiated by the employer, since without outside support they can do little more than protest against what they consider unfair." The important question of which form of organization will have the greater constructive value for the workers, Professor Seager answers as follows: "The choice between the company union and the trade union as regards this vital question as to which will develop the better worker and citizen thus depends on the type of employer who as time goes on is to manage our public service industries. So long as the profit-seeking exploiter type predominates our preference must be unqualifiedly for the fighting trade union. As the co-operative employer who honestly regards himself as the senior partner in industry and his employees as his junior partners becomes predominant there will be less need for the fighting trade union and a larger field of usefulness for the company union as a step toward true co-partnership in industry."

Evolution and the Faith

IT is most unfortunate that the question of belief in evolution should be dragged into the councils of the Church.

In the first place, it is so absolutely childish to try to settle by vote what is true in science and what is not. In the second place, evolution is not necessarily related to materialism any more than the doctrine of special creations, or any other doctrine of science. Evolution is simply a doctrine of how God works, just as is the doctrine of special creations. The evolutionist says that God's method of creation is by law of orderly growth and development; the anti-evolutionist says God creates by direct and special acts. Both believe equally in God and God's action in all creation. Some of the most pronounced evolutionists have not only been believers in God, but have emphasized evolution as a method of God's working in their writings on that subject—such men as Alfred Russell Wallace, Professor Le Comte, N. S. Shaler, John Fiske, Sir Oliver Lodge and Lord Kelvin. The statement issued at Washington on May 26th, signed by forty distinguished Americans, all believers in God, all evolutionists, to deny that science is necessarily materialistic or antagonistic to religion has attached to it the names of several of the most outstanding evolutionists in the country, all of whom are believers in God—such men as Dr. Walcott, president of the National Academy of Arts and Sciences; Dr. William J. Mayo, the famous surgeon; Professor Henry Fairfield Osborn, of the American Museum of Natural History; Professor Michael Pupin, of Columbia University; Professor William Campbell, of Lick University. There are more in the list, as well as several distinguished theologians who hold the evolutionary view of science. These men are just as devout theists as is Mr. Bryan and the other special creationists; they believe that evolution calls for God as much as any other method of creation; indeed, they think it offers the sublimest conception of God and his creative process, as witness the following words from this manifesto (it is printed in full on page 707 of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN WORK):

"It is a sublime conception of God which is furnished by science and one wholly consonant with the highest ideals of religion, when it represents Him as revealing Himself through countless ages in the development of the earth as an abode for men and in the age-long inbreathing of life into its constituent matter, culminating in man with his spiritual nature and all his God-like powers."

This is the utterance of those evolutionists whom Mr. Bryan condemns so heartily and whom he would have prohibited from teaching in our colleges or speaking in our churches. Where Mr. Bryan and his followers are misled is in believing that evolution is necessarily materialistic. This comes from their not having read widely in science and from their confusing method with materialism. One method may be as spiritual as another. Surely God is in the wonderful process of unfolding a lordly oak tree from a tiny acorn as he would be in the placing of the oak tree ready made in its place. One method may be just as spiritual as the other. So surely God may be in the age-long process of unfolding the universe by laws of growth and development from simple beginnings to the complex universe of to-day as in a universe suddenly made by divine fiat. Surely God may be in the process of an ascending scale of life from simple forms to the beautifully complex form of man imparting more and more intelligence as the physical form was capable of containing it and finally crowning the perfect manhood with spirit and God-likeness. This is all the evolutionist says. He does not necessarily deny God. There have been some evolutionists—not many—who have been materialists; but there have been any number of scientists who were not evolutionists who lived before Darwin, Lamarck and Wallace, who were rampant materialists. There are men in our colleges who say that "man is simply evolved rationalized mud," to quote from a recent letter in "The Christian Century"; but, as Dr. John Wright Buckham shows in his reply to this letter, if it is God who "rationalizes" the mud, what is left of the materialistic doctrine? Even those who hold to the literal interpretation of Genesis have to admit that God made man out of mud. Then He breathed the breath of life into him by an instantaneous act. The evolutionists believe just as thoroughly as the writer of Genesis that God breathed the breath of life into man, but he believes his body is the result of long periods of development from simple to complex, perfect form.

Mr. Bryan and his followers have a perfect right to believe in the doctrine of special creation if they choose to; they have a right to protest against the teaching of materialism and a Godless universe in colleges supported by Christian money and fostered by the churches; but they have no right to infer that those who believe in the doctrine of creation by evolutionary processes are less Christian than are they, or that the doctrine of creation by growth and development is necessarily materialistic. Indeed, one can say without exaggeration, we think, that the thorough study of the evolutionary process of creation is more apt to lead to God than away from Him. If Mr. Bryan doubts this, we commend to him the words of one who, agnostically inclined, made the most thorough study of evolution that has perhaps ever been made by an American, John Fiske. In that wonderful little book, which is almost a hymn of creation, "The Destiny of Man," Mr. Fiske says as his closing word:

"I believe that the promise with which I started has now been amply redeemed. I believe it has been fully shown that so far from degrading humanity, or putting it on a level with the animal world in general, the doctrine of evolution shows as distinctly for the first time how the creation and the perfecting of man is the goal to which nature's work has been tending from the first. We can now see clearly that our new knowledge enlarges ten-fold the significance of human life and makes it seem more than ever the chief object of Divine care, the consummate fruition of creative energy which is manifested throughout the knowable universe."

(It is interesting to note that Mr. Fiske, in his introductory chapters, points out how the Copernican theory of astronomy was fought by the conservative churchmen of the time as belittling man by displacing the world as the center of the universe, and then points out how history is repeating itself in the same fear of the conservative for the evolutionary method. It will belittle man. Mr. Fiske then says it is his intention to show how, just as the Copernican theory exalted him, so does the new evolutionary theory of creation. He says that he will show that evolution, far from degrading man and pulling him down to the level of the animal, shows us distinctly for the first time how the perfecting of man is the goal of creation and gives us a "higher view of the workings of God and of the nature of man than was ever attainable before." This is the "promise" to which Mr. Fiske refers in his closing paragraph quoted above.)

The Widening Chasm Between the Church and the Masses

A LITTLE group of nationally known religious leaders were discussing the present serious situation confronting the churches. Two of these men were former church board secretaries who had practically been forced from their positions as board secretaries because they were not acceptable to the money interests in their respective denominations. One of these men, who had been a pioneer in the movement twenty years ago to bring the church closer to the workingmen, said very frankly that the chasm between the Church and the toiling masses was wider to-day than it was twenty years ago.

The other said he would go much further and say that the Church was powerless to bridge the chasm and that the breach was permanent. Another well-known religious leader, who had been forced by the money interests of his denomination to leave one of its universities, said that the Church to-day was facing a greater crisis than the Church of the sixteenth century faced. He said that if the Church to-day cast in her lot with the forces of reaction there was no hope for the future of civilization at the hands of the Church.

There was general agreement that there was widespread religious feeling and passion in millions of people outside the churches, and that these people longed for a voice of authority and leadership from the Church. All agreed that the Kingdom of God must be established in the earth. There was great unbelief as to the Church of to-day measuring up to the responsibility of the task of establishing the Kingdom of God on earth.

Each of these religious leaders has written many books concerning the relation of the Church to society and its complex problems. Each has been recognized as a prophetic voice by thousands of earnest seekers after truth within the Church. To what extent have they correctly interpreted the present attitude of the Church toward the world's workers and toward the problem of saving society? Is it true that the chasm between the Church and the workers is ever widening, and that the Church as an institution is failing in her divinely appointed task of bringing in the Kingdom of God?

These are questions that should cause pause and answer by the leaders of the Church. The statements of sober judgment by such men as have been quoted cannot be lightly brushed aside as of no consequence. These men are in a better position to know the pulse of the workers and the masses than any present-day leader in any of the churches. They are loyal to the Church and long to see the Church take her rightful place of leadership in the establishment of the Kingdom of God on earth.

In recent years the churches have passed many glowing resolutions in their highest ecclesiastical bodies, expressing sympathy for the workers and their aspirations for better lives. They have all declared in favor of collective bargaining, and minimum wages, and co-partnership of labor and capital, both in owning and managing industry. All these high-sounding phrases have been lightly considered until just recently. Now the churches must take their stand. Are they going to make action conform to resolution? If not, then the churches invite the charge of hypocrisy.

The employers' associations all over this country, most of whose members are pillars in the churches, are calling on the churches to repudiate these resolutions. This is not an over-statement of fact. Such associations are asking their members to refuse financial support to religious bodies professing such heretical economic doctrines. The Young Women's Christian Association recently passed through such an experience at the hands of the Employers' Association of Pittsburgh. The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America and the Interchurch World Movement have had the same experience.

The time has come for the Church to stand by her resolutions and not try to explain them away. The so-called Better America Federation has raved against a religious teacher because, forsooth, he taught that the Sermon on the Mount should be applied to business! The Gospel of Jesus has at least got to come out in the open in the field of industry. The battle royal is now on between human rights and property interests. All the resolutions passed by the Church place the Church on the side of human rights.

A great labor leader has said that the best friend labor has to-day is the Church. This statement should be placed over against the gloomy picture painted by the religious leaders. The labor leader was thinking of the resolutions passed by the Church; and the way the big business interests were putting the screws on certain interdenominational religious organizations because they stood for social justice.

The Church in the year nineteen hundred and twenty-three has before it the greatest opportunity in history to demonstrate that the resolutions of the past ten years are more than scraps of paper. To stand loyally by these resolutions in time of industrial war will be far harder for the churches than it was for them to stand by their resolutions against war and for peace during the World War. Everyone knows how those resolutions were forgotten while the war was on. Will it be so with the resolutions in favor of industrial peace?

The Church faces her supreme trial at this hour. The future of civilization and the destiny of many generations are in the balance.

The General Assembly at Indianapolis

LAST fall, under the leadership of Dr. Clarence Macartney, minister of the Arch Street Presbyterian Church, the Presbytery of Philadelphia drew up a protest against the preaching in the pulpit of the First Church of New York. The Philadelphia Presbytery, as everyone recalls, was particularly agitated on account of Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick's sermon, "Shall the Fundamentalists Win," which was printed in THE CHRISTIAN WORK for June 10, 1922. The Philadelphia Presbytery embodied its protest in a long overture to the General Assembly, citing some of the Assembly's doctrinal pronouncements in earlier years and asking for a renewed declaration of its faith.

The Philadelphia overture went before the Assembly's Committee on Bills and Overtures. Dr. Hugh K. Walker, of Los Angeles, one of the defeated candidates for Moderator, was chairman of the committee. Last week, Wednesday, the next to the last day of the Assembly, the committee brought in a report signed by all but one of its twenty-three members. Since the Presbytery of New York had already instituted "a formal study of the situation in the said First Church, as respects both the ecclesiastical relations of its ministerial staff and the preaching of the Gospel in its pulpit," the committee deemed it to be "needless, if not unfairly intrusive, to transmit to the Presbytery of New York any instructions as to the manner and method of this now pending investigation. Still less would the Assembly assume to indicate the conclusion to be reached by this inquiry."

However, on account of the general interest in the case, the committee asked the Presbytery of New York to report its action to the General Assembly next year.

Since the Philadelphia overture suggested the propriety of a doctrinal pronouncement, the committee concluded its report as follows:

Desiring, however, amid present theological controversies, to utter no uncertain sound respecting the doctrines of truth revealed by the Spirit of God in the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, this Assembly declares its full content with the ordination vows assumed by all its teaching and ruling elders, solemnly affirming that the Westminster Confession of Faith and the other doctrinal standards of our Church do "contain the system of doctrine taught in the Holy Scriptures"; and the Assembly here declares itself assured that the representative teachers, pastors and office-bearers of the Presbyterian Church have in good conscience taken that ordination vow and in good conscience continue everywhere honorably faithful thereunto.

Moreover, the General Assembly herewith bears witness that neither in modern philosophy nor in biblical criticism nor in any just claim of unfettered thought is the Presbyterian Church aware of any shadow of reason why it should alter, abate or obscure its corporate testimony to any article of faith characteristic of apostolic Christianity or integral to our "Reformed Theology."

Nevertheless, remembering the constant New Testament emphasis which magnifies the spirit of love above the letter of doctrine, the General Assembly bids all, ordained and unordained, who belong to the Lord Jesus Christ in the fellowship of our Church, to be ever mindful that not by the perfection of word, but by the power of life, shall Christ's Kingdom come and God's will be done among men, and that in unity of the Spirit and in the bond of peace it is ever the paramount obligation of the Church to proclaim more and more widely the one essential message of our sacred saving Gospel, "God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

That was a worthy statement, though if we were writing it we should have emphasized Christ's two essentials.

One member of the committee alone disagreed. He was Rev. A. Gordon MacLennan, of the Philadelphia Presbytery. He brought in the following minority report:

The 135th General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of the U. S. A., in answer to the petition of overture presented by the Presbytery of Philadelphia regarding the public proclamation of the word in the pulpit of the First Presbyterian Church of New York City, expresses its profound sorrow that doctrines contrary to the standards of the Presbyterian Church, proclaimed in said pulpit, have been the cause of controversy and division in our Church, and therefore would direct the Presbytery of New York to take such action (either through its present committee or by the appointment of a special commission) as will require the preaching and teaching in the First Presbyterian Church of New York to conform to the system of doctrines taught in the Confession of Faith; and that said Presbytery report its action in a full transcript of its records to the 136th General Assembly of 1924.

Furthermore, the General Assembly calls the attention of the Presbyteries to the deliverance of the General Assembly of 1910, which deliverance is hereby reaffirmed, and which is as follows:

"1. It is an essential doctrine of the Word of God and our standards that the Holy Spirit did so inspire, guide and move the writers of Holy Scripture as to keep them from error.

"2. It is an essential doctrine of the Word of God and our standards that our Lord Jesus Christ was born of the Virgin Mary.

"3. It is an essential doctrine of the Word of God and our standards that Christ offered up Himself a sacrifice to satisfy Divine justice and to reconcile us to God.

"4. It is an essential doctrine of the Word of God and of our standards concerning our Lord Jesus Christ, that on the third day He rose again from the dead with the same body with which He suffered, with which also He ascended into heaven, and there sitteth at the right hand of His Father, making intercession.

"5. It is an essential doctrine of the Word of God as the supreme standard of our faith that our Lord Jesus showed His power and love by working mighty miracles. This working was not contrary to nature, but superior to it."

Dr. Walker spoke for the majority report. Mr. MacLennan made a very vigorous speech in behalf of the minority. Men who take Dr. Fosdick's position are not Presbyterians, he declared. Mr. Bryan also came to the support of the minority report. He argued that if the Assembly voted down the minority report the world in general would understand that the Presbyterian Church did not support the five doctrines enunciated in it. The supporters of the majority report argued for it on the ground that its adoption would tend toward the peace and unity of the Church, and that the minority report found a man guilty without giving him a hearing. Two of the speakers called attention to the fact that the standards of the Presbyterian Church do not include the first of the five creedal statements in the minority report. The Westminster Confession holds the Scriptures to be the infallible rule of faith and practice, but does not refer to them as otherwise infallible. The one essential, Mr. Best argued, is the life of the Spirit in the heart of the Christian. Dr. Baer urged that we judge men by the judgment of Jesus, by their fruits. "God has given to Dr. Fosdick his hire of souls."

Dr. Macartney closed the debate in behalf of the minority report in an able speech. He termed the majority report a whitewash. "If you accept it," he concluded, "go home and whitewash out the words of fire on your churches, and write over their portals, 'Ichabod, the glory hath departed.'" Dr. James Wilson Bean, of St. Paul, closed the debate for the majority. Because the New York Presbytery was a party to the controversy, it put forth no speaker, and it regarded Dr. Macartney's taking part in the debate as out of place. The vote was so close that the Moderator ordered the roll to be called. The minority report won, 439 to 359 (unofficial figures).

The victory of the conservatives came like a thunderclap to the more liberal men. They were for the moment almost staggered. The next day sixty-six members of the Assembly put their signatures to the following paper:

The undersigned commissioners at the 135th General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A., meeting at Indianapolis, May, 1923, hereby enter their respectful protest against the action taken by the Assembly in connection with Overture No. 1.

1. We protest against the action taken because it was based upon allegations made by one Presbytery in regard to conditions in another Presbytery which are not substantiated by the evidence.

2. We protest against the action taken because it passes judgment on a matter which is not now, and never has been, before the Assembly by order of protest, and condemns without proper hearing.

3. We protest against the action taken because it seeks to impose upon the office-bearers of our Church doctrinal tests other than, or in addition to, those solemnly agreed upon in the Constitution of our Church.

We present this protest for record on the minutes of the Assembly.

The next day, good Dr. Alexander, the veteran minister of the First Church of New York, told the Assembly something of the work of that great church and asked for its patience. At the devotional hour that day he read the thirteenth chapter of First Corinthians. The clear words sounded through the hall, "Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels and have not charity, I am a sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal . . . hopeth all things, believeth all things, endureth all things." There was Christianity, not in any five points of 1910. But Dr. Alexander let Paul speak for himself, without comment. After all, no action of the Presbyterian Church, or of any church, makes any difference to Christianity. But a church can hurt itself. It can decrease its efficiency in helping to build up the Kingdom of God.

On the last day of the Assembly the majority in favor of the Philadelphia overture attempted to follow up its advantage by sending down to the presbyteries a proposal to amend the Church's form of government, so as to prevent such an arrangement as that under which Dr. Fosdick serves the First Church. The Assembly, however, weakened the overture so as to leave a possible loophole.

The Indianapolis Assembly did many other interesting things. At the suggestion of Mr. Bryan, it urged its ministers and officers, and the teachers in its schools, colleges and seminaries, and its people generally, to sign a total abstinence pledge. It discountenanced the use of tobacco, as it has before. It asked the state not to employ teachers who ridiculed Christianity. It expressed its sympathy with the ill-used people of the Near East. We should like to have seen it go further than it did in that respect. It took action looking toward the building up and maintaining "at their highest efficiency the Presbyterian agencies in our National Capital."

The Church completed the reorganization of its boards and agencies and set up a General Council, which will be responsible for the executive work of the Church between General Assemblies. Altogether, it was one of the Assemblies whose work will be recorded at considerable length in Presbyterian history.

THE OBSERVER

Sir William Robertson Nicoll

[This page is devoted to a weekly letter recording the significant events and movements of the day from the Christian point of view.]

WHEN death took Robertson Nicoll, as he was familiarly known in all Britain, it took one of the most versatile men of the last two generations. Great as preacher, editor, essayist and critic, he was also the most widely read man of his time. He seemed to know everything. When he took the well-known house at Hampstead he had to build a large ell on it to hold his great library. If you called on him you had to wade through literal fields of books. But the wonder was, he had read them, all of them. He never went from one room to another without a book in his hand. On his way from the house to the office of "The British Weekly"—less than an hour's journey—he always read one book through. When he traveled the satchels were full of books, not clothes. Unless the talker had something really fine to say, he would not talk, but turned to his book. Why talk with one who has only commonplaces to utter when one can talk with Plato? Readers of "The British Weekly" will remember the fugitive poem that was printed at the head of the devotional column each week. It was always good, sometimes striking, and many wondered as to its source. It was simply that Dr. Nicoll seemingly knew every poem that had ever been written and always knew where to turn for a real gem.

He came by all this by nature and inheritance, for his father, a country minister with never more than $1,000 a year, got together in his manse at Auchindoir a library of 17,000 volumes, said to be the largest private library in Scotland. Sir William had told the whole story of his boyhood in the beautiful little book, "My Father: An Aberdeenshire Minister." "My father's home," the writer says, "was remote and secluded. You had to go to Aberdeen, take the train out for some thirty miles to Gartly, and then walk or drive another eight miles to Lumsden in the parish of Auchindoir. You would then find yourself in an upland village. At the side of that village you would find a little manse with some 17,000 volumes gathered under its roof." The village contained 500 people and 17,000 books! The boy grew up among books, wild flowers, brooks, hills and snow in winter. In the home was the learned, interesting father and the beautiful mother who died when Sir William was a child. Not only were the books there, but every day the father read aloud while the mother and the children listened. To a boy reared this way books are as indispensable as air. As Mr. Barrie said of Sir William the other day, "He was never really comfortable without a book in his hand."

The boy showed signs of genius from the beginning. He took prize after prize at college and in the divinity school. While a student he began writing for the press. After an eight years' pastorate at Kelso, where he not only preached to his people, but kept up a growing literary output, he was threatened with tuberculosis, the disease that had taken away his mother, and he had to resign. After a rest during which health had come back he started "The British Weekly," with which he was so identified all the rest of his life that one can hardly disassociate the two. My first thought when I heard of Dr. Nicoll's death was, What will become of "The British Weekly? For from the beginning he wrote almost all of it. The paper went into every manse in Scotland; into many thousand manses in England and Wales; it also came to Canada and our own country. Always it was taken for the editorial beginning on the front page on some religious topic, and for the full page letter by "Claudius Clear," dealing with some recent book on some phase of life. These editorials and essays were of the finest quality from the beginning. They were literature, and to the writing of them Sir William devoted the whole week. They have been brought together in books year by year, the editorials in such great volumes as "The Garden of Nuts," "The Church's One Foundation," "The Return to the Cross," "Prayer in War-time" and "Princes of the Church"; and the letters of "Claudius Clear" in such volumes as "Letters on Life," "The Day Book of Claudius Clear" and "The Round of the Clock." Almost all of his books were made up of articles from "The British Weekly," and he also wrote the very interesting biography of John Watson (Ian Maclaren). He was also the editor of "The Expositor" and "The Bookman." He reviewed many books and his reviews were often more interesting than the books. He wrote remarkable sermons—remarkable not only for their exquisite English, but also for the light they threw on the text. (He almost always took a text that awakened curiosity, some striking and perhaps enigmatic verse, but out of which he drew most illuminating and helpful truths.) After all has been said, Sir William was "The British Weekly." In the tribute paid to him by Sir James M. Barrie the other day he dwells upon this fact. He writes:

"Seldom, I suppose, has there been an editor who was his paper so peculiarly as he was. He made 'The British Weekly' 'off his own bat'—made it by himself out of himself; it was so full of his personality that he came stalking out of all the pages, meeting every reader face to face, so that it can truly be said he paid a visit every week to every person who took in the paper. Myriads of people must have grown up under his guidance and learned many of the lessons of life from him, and, next to those who worked for him, they are the ones who will miss him most. But we, his contributors, who helped him to however slight an extent, will miss him most of all, remembering his thousand kindnesses, his glorious enthusiasms and the passion of his soul."

Not only was he a great writer, but he had a remarkable gift for discovering and encouraging other men. One of his earliest protégés was Barrie. He saw the genius in Barrie in the first two or three articles he brought to "The British Weekly." He encouraged him and became his friend at the start and perhaps we owe "The Window in Thrums" to Sir William. It was he who discovered Ian Maclaren and encouraged him to write, and perhaps it is to Sir William that we owe "The Bonnie Briar Bush," with its memorable sketch of "The Doctor of the Old School." If I remember rightly, he also discovered Crockett and the sketches of "The Stickit Minister" appeared first in "The British Weekly." He also made the columns of "The British Weekly" channels through which Dr. Alexander Whyte, Professor James Denney, Professor John Moffatt and Professor David Smith reached the clergy of the British Free Churches.

In theology Dr. Nicoll was a conservative, and the only signs of impatience he ever showed was when some one came forward with a theology that departed from the old and tried doctrines of the faith. Mr. Campbell's "New Theology" aroused his ire so much that he displayed toward him the only uncharitableness that will be remembered in his long career. He just could not abide it. His own faith centered about the cross and redemption and he was always writing of the exceeding wonder of it all. His faith in immortality was deep-rooted and he wrote many beautiful and convincing words upon it. But he was a mystic at heart, and the mystical note runs all through his writings and adds greatly to their charm. It was this note of mysticism that made even the old doctrines new when he wrote about them. His death is a great loss to British religious life and thought as well as to British letters.

FREDERICK LYNCH.

The Economic and Financial Section of the League of Nations has just given out a report dealing with the budgets of the countries which responded to its questionnaire. All the important European states except France and Germany answered the section's questions in detail. The report shows that the United States and Great Britain are the only countries in the world which are at present reducing their national debt. Finland, Sweden, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and Japan are confining their borrowing to permanent improvements, that it is to capital purposes. Among the states of Central Europe, Czechoslovakia and Austria are the only countries which are getting into better financial condition. Esthonia, Latvia and Lithuania also are making notable progress. France, Belgium and Italy spend a large proportion on reconstruction work. The report shows that in fourteen out of twenty-one countries there has been a reduction of paper circulation.

THE WEEKLY SERMON

Impressions from the General Assembly

By Rev. William Pierson Merrill, D.D.

Minister of the Brick Presbyterian Church, New York

[Dr. Merrill gave the following report on the General Assembly to his congregation on May 29th.]

IT has seemed to me that it might be not only more timely, but more interesting and profitable, if, instead of preaching a sermon this morning, I should give some impressions of the meeting of the General Assembly, from which I have just returned.

It has been my lot to attend four General Assemblies. This which has just been held was by far the most dramatic and probably the most important of them all. Vital issues came before the gathering, in some cases sharply defined, in others greatly confused but I believe there has been no meeting of the General Assembly of our Church for many years past which will prove so far-reaching in its consequences.

It seems wise also to take time for this report this morning, because the Presbytery of New York is so deeply involved in the action of the General Assembly. There is no need that I should attempt to report the general course of proceedings at the Assembly, for what was done was fully noted in the papers from day to day. I shall content myself with speaking of certain outstanding actions and giving some personal impressions.

Popular interest centered on the election of a Moderator. It was known for some time in advance that Mr. Bryan was a candidate for that office. Very many of the commissioners, in common with a great multitude of people in our Church, have honored Mr. Bryan as a courageous champion of many moral issues, and as a conspicuous example of a man who, in public life, has kept prominent his Christian profession and his interest in religion and in the Church.

Had the Moderatorship been simply an honor to be bestowed it is probable that almost all the commissioners would have been glad to vote for him. There was a time when the Moderatorship was simply the highest honor which the Presbyterian Church could bestow. The Moderator was a presiding officer for a few days over a convention transacting routine business, with an expert Stated Clerk by his side to be the real guiding figure in the business of the Assembly. Some years ago the Moderatorship of our Church took on new proportions. The Moderator now holds office, not in name only, but in fact, throughout the year. What he does at the Assembly has come to be of less importance than what he does the rest of the year. He has to carry many important duties and responsibilities. Within that same period an evolution has taken place in our Church (it is a satisfaction still to be able to use that word) whereby the Church has become a vast and intricate organism, carrying on an immense business. Especially during the coming year problems of the greatest delicacy and importance must be handled, such as the reorganization of the thirteen boards and agencies into four great boards, the planning and development of the work of the General Council, and the like. In addition to these facts, theological controversy has thrust itself into the life of the Church in a way which seriously threatened its power and usefulness.

It is thus a simple matter of fact that the Moderatorship of our great Church has come to demand, in addition to Christian character and good repute, at least four qualities. These are absolutely indispensable. The first is comparative freedom from public responsibilities, especially public speaking engagements. The second is administrative capacity, power and patience to give wise direction to the details of church business. The third is a judicious, well-balanced, impartial temperament, the ability to view questions impersonally and without passion. The fourth is wide and accurate acquaintance with the life and work of the Presbyterian Church. In each of these four qualities Mr. Bryan is conspicuously lacking. Of all the leading men present at the Assembly there was not one who was not better fitted than he in these special matters. It was that perfectly obvious consideration which, more than anything else, decided the election. Certainly, of all the men in the Assembly, no one was better fitted for the Moderatorship than the man who was chosen. We have been blessed now for several years with the right brand of presiding officer, and no one of them has been better than our present Moderator. He carried through the proceedings of a difficult and stormy meeting without making a single mistake or having a single ruling called into question. In this initial matter of the choice of a Moderator the Presbyterian Church showed its sanity in choosing, not the man of popular prestige, but the man of solid qualities needed just now.

The most decisive and far-reaching action was that taken on the subject of evolution. The Presbyterian Church is popularly classed as theologically conservative. On the whole, that classification is warranted. It might, therefore, be expected by some that it would take a reactionary position with regard to any important essential of modern thinking. Our Church, I believe, has never before been called upon to define its attitude on the principle or theory of evolution.

Fortunately, the issue was well defined. Of course, it was not a direct vote on the question, Shall the Presbyterian Church favor or disavow evolution? But it was a direct vote on whether the Church would so discriminate that, while disavowing and condemning all materialistic philosophies, it would at the same time admit that to be an evolutionist is not incompatible with holding a full and sound Christian faith.

Some of us who were present were well aware how—much was hanging on that decision. Had the action been such that it might have been said with any show of reason that evolution was banned or condemned by the Presbyterian Church, the effect would have been simply disastrous. It would have meant that the mass of students and thoughtful men and women generally would have been informed that there was no room for them in the Presbyterian Church. One of the leading ministers in the Assembly, pastor of a church in a town where there are some five thousand college students, came to me in great agitation just before the vote was taken, saying, "What shall we do, what shall we do, if this thing is lost?" It would have put our church on the defensive before the intelligence of mankind, with a lame defense, or none, to offer.

But once more the Assembly showed its sanity. Mr. Bryan's resolution would have put the Church on record as opposed to evolution in all its forms, and his speech supporting the resolution made that fact even more clear. The substitute resolution proposed to put the Church on record as opposed to any "materialistic evolutionary hypothesis," or any teachings subversive to Christian faith. That was exactly what the whole Church ought to stand for, and wants to stand for.

In the discussion Mr. Bryan was given ample, even generous, time. He had all he wanted; at the beginning he took about thirty minutes, and fifteen minutes was given to him at the close. His part in the discussion was fiery, witty, impassioned, keen, and given with all his unrivalled skill as a popular speaker. It was also undignified, unfair and unintelligent. It is a matter for congratulation on the part of all of us here that the most effective speech delivered in this discussion was made by our own elder, George Richards. Perhaps one might say that one other speech was still more effective in bringing about the decision—that was Mr. Bryan's closing speech. With every sentence he lost votes, for his speech was a regrettable exhibition of unrestrained fanaticism.

The vote was more decisive, at least two to one, which was a triumph for Presbyterian sanity and for Presbyterian freedom. Our Church is now on record officially as opposed to materialism, but as acknowledging that there is such a thing as theistic Christian evolution.

The third exciting contest was over the complaint lodged by the Presbytery of Philadelphia against the Presbytery of New York in the matter of Dr. Fosdick's preaching in the First Presbyterian Church. I am sure you will understand that it would scarcely be proper for me to say much at this time on the merits of the case. The New York Presbytery must meet the situation, and it will demand firmness, delicacy, clear thinking and frank speaking to bring about the right issue. But I am absolutely confident that the way is clear for a right decision. That statement may seem strange to some, in view of the action taken, but certain facts need to be clearly known in order to understand the action that was taken.

In the first place, the Presbytery of Philadelphia (and in using that term I mean, of course, the majority who have been acting) has talked and agitated all through the year. The Presbytery of New York has been absolutely silent. Some have asked whether this course was wise, and why we have taken it. The answer is that it was on the strength of the advice of the wise leaders of our Church. It is very likely that that counsel was wise, and will work out for the best. But the silence of New York Presbytery was also due to the fact that they were absolutely contented with the situation in the First Church, and saw no reason for taking action or saying anything, just because certain outsiders had voiced certain unwarranted complaints. This difference in the conduct of the two Presbyteries involved characterized the conduct of the delegations at the Assembly. In the Presbytery of New York there has been just one church which has questioned the arrangement at the First Church; the Presbytery of New York elected the pastor of that complaining church one of its commissioners to the Assembly. In the Presbytery of Philadelphia there were twenty-three members who voted against the Presbytery's action and signed a protest; included in their number were most of the leading ministers in the Presbytery. Not one of them was sent to the Assembly. No representation was given to that large and influential minority. The same contrast is seen in the conduct of the two delegations at the Assembly. Throughout all the discussion which so vitally affected their interests the New York commissioners, feeling in honor bound, observed an absolute silence. It was a representative of the Philadelphia Presbytery who presented the minority report, and it was another member of the Philadelphia Presbytery who made the closing speech. There are times, my friends, when it is better to lose with honor than to win temporarily in any other way. I am glad that I belong to a presbytery which has acted with the dignity and honor which has characterized the Presbytery of New York through all this period.

In the second place, the matter was handled very poorly. I have seldom heard a poorer presentation of a case before any body. The majority report was long and elaborate; the minority report was crisp and definite. The matter was never adequately put before the Assembly.

Yet even under these conditions the vote was so close that the wearisome process of a roll call had to be used. Four hundred thirty-nine voted for the more severe action and three hundred fifty-nine for the more generous action. A swing of forty votes would have changed the decision.

The action taken is very unfortunate, not so much for the First Church of New York, as for the Assembly which took the action. It declares "with sorrow" that doctrines contrary to our standards have been preached in the First Church. It thus pronounces on the very question at issue. It adds to this sin against justice a deliverance which presumes to name five essential doctrines of our Church. There is a confusion just now in the use of the words essential and fundamental. Anyone who thinks clearly wants to ask, "Essential to what?" Essential to salvation? Essential to church membership? Essential to good standing in the ministry? The matter is not defined. We take it that the Assembly's action means that it judges these five particular doctrines to be essential for good standing in the ministry. There are two fatal objections to this particular action. The first is that at least one of these particular doctrines which the majority of the Assembly declared to be essential to the Word of God and to the standards of our Church is not even to be found either in the Word of God or in the standards of our Church. Nowhere does the Bible profess to be wholly without error; nowhere do the Westminster standards declare that the Bible is wholly without error. The second serious objection to this deliverance is that it is a breach of contract for the Assembly to affirm as essential anything but the entire system of doctrine. The relationship of a minister to the Presbyterian Church is a sort of spiritual contract whereby he on his part declares his sincere acceptance of the Westminster Confession as a whole as containing the system of doctrine taught in the Scriptures, while the Church on its part engages to esteem him sound and worthy of confidence. The ground for hope is that a year is given for the Presbytery of New York to make its reply. That is a real and great opportunity to make the facts known. Those who complain that our Presbytery has maintained too close a silence will have no cause for such complaint in the year to come. Another reason is that the strong and just protest gives a sort of platform for further procedure.

There are two considerations also of a higher kind which make us hopeful. One is the statement made by Dr. George Alexander on the day following the action, and the warm-hearted and fine reception with which it met. Had it been possible for that statement to have been made when the discussion was on the result might have been different; but that could not be. Every commissioner present, I am sure, will go home deeply impressed with the spirit of candor and of love and of great-hearted loyalty which characterized Dr. Alexander's statement. The other ground for hope is the strong sentiment of the leaders in every part of our Church, that we simply must lift our Church up onto a higher plane, where it shall be considered more serious to offend against the spirit of Christ than to offend against any minor doctrine of the Church.

I have given so much time to these particular matters because they are of such important interest. But they were by no means the most important of the matters that came before the Assembly. All our great boards reported on their magnificent work. We were greatly cheered by the report of the Home Board, that its burden of debt has been completely lifted, and it faces the new year free from all encumbrances. The Foreign Board made a masterly presentation of its work. Great interest was aroused over the resolution calling upon all persons of influence in the Presbyterian Church to practice total abstinence. The Committee on Education made a very strong presentation of the opportunities and responsibilities of its work, now so tremendously expanded. One felt as he listened to each of these presentations, "Here is the most important thing we are doing," and the wish that came to my heart, over and over, was that all the membership of our Church might have been there to hear these statements of fact. Our benevolent contributions would be doubled or quadrupled if the members of our churches only knew what our great Church is doing.

A new, powerful and important governing body was established, a General Council, which is to take the place of the Executive Commission and the New Era Committee, and to have oversight of all the boards and their work.

One gained from attendance at the Assembly a new sense of the splendid strength of this great Church of ours and its real unity of spirit. Watching the roll call on the most critical and divisive question, one noted how little there was that was sectional in the voting. On the whole, it may be said that the men from the cities were more inclined to support the liberal or progressive side, and those from the country the more conservative or reactionary side; yet there were many exceptions to that general observation.

Friends, it is a great Church to which we belong. It has a fine history, it has the promise of a far nobler future. If only it can get above all clouds of petty theological controversy, and stay above them, there is no limit to its possibilities in the service of the Kingdom of God. We must, and we shall, be heartily loyal to our Church. The Presbytery of New York must prove its claim to be loyal by even greater service to the cause of Christ, by even firmer loyalty to the real essentials of our Presbyterian system, and by a bold and outspoken defense of those great principles of freedom of thinking and of the dominance of the Spirit, which are the heritage of Presbyterianism and of Protestantism, because they are the essence of Christianity.

The one great lesson that comes to every one of us is that we must set and keep at the center of all our thinking and action the great influence of Christ, His personality, His spirit, His message, His mission. In the present controversy, and in every such controversy, that side will ultimately win which manifests the most of the real spirit of Jesus Christ, our Lord. Other names may be great, other names we revere, but it is the simple, rock-bottom faith on which our great Church rests, that there is none other name whereby we must be saved, and we know that His one new commandment is the commandment, "Love one another." In the light of those great simple truths our hearts are full of hope, our way is clear, and the future is bright.

The Southern Presbyterian General Assembly

By Rev. James I. Vance, D.D.

Minister of the First Presbyterian Church, Nashville, Tenn.

THE Presbyterian Church in the United States, affectionately called by its own constituency "Southern Presbyterian," met this year in its sixty-third annual session at Montreat, North Carolina.

MONTREAT.

Montreat is a picturesque vale hid away in the Blue Ridge Mountains at an altitude of some three thousand feet above sea level, with half a dozen of the tallest peaks east of the Rockies, Mount Mitchell among them, towering above the vale and sentineling its beauty and peace. Here in this serene and lovely spot Southern Presbyterians gather in large numbers for their summer conferences, stretching from the middle of June to the first of September. In addition to the hotels and many cottages there is the great auditorium built of steel and the round stones gathered from the mountain gorge and worn smooth in some long past glacial period. The auditorium has a capacity of three thousand, with numerous rooms for committee meetings. In this auditorium the Assembly met, the three hundred commissioners and the visitors being cared for at the hotels near by.

THE ASSEMBLY.

The opening sermon was preached by the retiring Moderator, Dr. R. C. Reed, of Columbia Theological Seminary, on "Hell." To one of the commissioners he remarked before the Assembly was called to order, "I am going to preach on 'Hell,' and I am full of my subject." It is probably not necessary to add that on at least one doctrine Dr. Reed is a genial fundamentalist and can keenly sympathize with a story told on Dr. Dabney by one of his students. Dr. R. L. Dabney, whose name is still one to conjure with among Southern Presbyterians, one day in his class room, so the student declares, said: "Young gentlemen, but for the grace of God I would have been hung." The student added: "We never contradicted Dr. Dabney, because we always knew that what he said was so!"

The new Moderator is Dr. Alexander Sprunt, of Charleston, who is one of the outstanding pastors of the Church, and whose brother, Dr. James Sprunt, of Wilmington, North Carolina, is one of our best loved laymen.

Some years ago Southern Presbyterians did what their brethren of the U. S. A. Church have just done. They reduced their many executive committees (boards) to four, which they call "Foreign Missions," located at Nashville; "Home Missions," located at Atlanta; "Christian Education and Ministerial Relief," located at Louisville, and "Publication and Sunday-School Work," located at Richmond. In addition to this a Stewardship Committee has been formed which has charge of the "Progressive Program." There are also some "permanent committees" whose tenure is from Assembly to Assembly, like the Committee on Protestant Relief in Europe, which has raised $140,000 during the past five years and reported this year the completion of the church at Compiegne, France, which Southern Presbyterians have erected as a memorial to their sons who fell in the World War.

The reports of these various agencies were made on the first and second days of the Assembly and showed a year of steady growth along all lines.

The receipts of these committees were as follows: Foreign Missions, $1,214,383; Home Missions, $569,616; Christian Education and Ministerial Relief, $539,035; Publication, $701,049. The total benevolences for the year were $11,674,641, against $11,743,725 for the year previous.

The Assembly had in its membership few of the men, either ministers or laymen, who have been widely identified with any of the issues that have stirred the Church. The democratic character of Southern Presbyterianism was therefore the outstanding fact in the personnel of this Assembly, and its decisions probably register the way the average man back home feels on the subjects handled.

PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVES.

While there are a few modernists and a somewhat larger number of reactionaries, the overwhelming number of Southern Presbyterians may be classified as progressive conservatives—progressive as to church methods, conservative as to church doctrines. The Church, however, is not torn by factions on these matters, nor are its energies consumed in controversy. It is a fairly harmonious group of half a million communicants, enlisted in constructive Christianity, and whose per capita gifts to benevolences have placed it, with one exception, at the head of the churches of America. The additions on confession for the past year number 23,595.

THE FEDERAL COUNCIL.

It is a dull Assembly that fails to have a hot debate about co-operating with the Federal Council. A year ago the Church decided to remain in, but refused to contribute. The hostility to the Council is to its industrial and political deliverances, the Southern Presbyterian Church holding that the mission of the Church is purely spiritual, and that questions of labor and politics should be handled, not by church deliverances, but by Christianized individuals. There seem to be three groups—those who violently oppose the Council and would stay out altogether; those who agree with the Council and would go in without conditions, and those who object to the deliverances referred to, but believe in a federated testimony and feel that any protest the Church has to make would best be made inside.

This year Dr. Robert E. Speer, the president of the Council, who is greatly respected and beloved by Southern Presbyterians, spoke for the Council.

Both Dr. Robert E. Speer, the president of the Federal Council, and Dr. Charles L. Goodell, its secretary of evangelism, addressed the Assembly on the Council. Friday morning Dr. Speer had profoundly stirred the Assembly with an address on foreign missions. That afternoon he made his plea that Southern Presbyterians remain in the Council, urging that the evils of isolation were greater than those of federation. Many overtures had been sent up asking the Assembly to cut loose, a few to remain in. Two reports were before the body in line with these overtures. Following Dr. Speer's address the fight began. It was long and heated. It continued over into Monday, but when the vote was taken federation won and the Presbyterian Church in the United States remains in the Council.

A moment packed with tragic interest came when Isaac Yonan, of Armenia, in a brief address pled the cause of the Near East, and said: "America is the only friend we have left. Are you tired of us? If you quit, we will die."

The question of theological education received special attention. The four seminaries of the Church are flourishing, and the Committee on Christian Education reported the largest number of candidates for the ministry in the Church's history.

The Assembly manifested a lively interest in the work of the Committee on Protestant Relief in Europe. This committee, in addition to other aid, has provided the funds for the erection of two churches, one near Prague and the other at Compiegne in France. The church at Compiegne is a memorial to Southern Presbyterian boys who lost their lives in the World War. The building is nearing completion and is to be dedicated in September.

Organic union with other Presbyterian bodies received no encouragement, the Assembly declaring that the General Council of Presbyterian and Reformed Churches in America provides an agency for genuine fellowship and effective co-operation.

The most radical action taken by the Assembly was the placing of women on the executive committees of the Church. At the Orlando Assembly a few years ago the Church reversed its long-time position and granted women the right to speak and pray in public when the Session of a church was so disposed. The Montreat Assembly goes a step farther and gives her a voice in church administration and control.

The following were named as representatives on the Federal Council: Executive Committee: Dr. James I. Vance, Nashville; J. D. Hutton, Jackson, Miss. Federal Council members: A. M. Aikin, Chester, S. C.; R. F. Campbell, Asheville, N. C.; W. S. Campbell, Richmond, Va.; S. H. Chester, Nashville; William Crowe, St. Louis; A. B. Curry, Memphis; W. M. Everett, Atlanta; J. D. Hutton, Jackson; J. L. Mauze, Huntington, W. Va.; R. H. McCaslin, Jacksonville, Fla.; E. D. McDougall, Jackson, Tenn.; L. E. McNair, Jacksonville, Fla.; G. T. Story, Bay City, Tex.; George Summey, New Orleans; James I. Vance, Nashville; John Van Lear, Little Rock.

Prodigal Daughters*

By Joseph Hocking

SYNOPSIS

Colonel Lester Trelawney arrives home in England after six years of military service in India and Mesopotamia to find his two daughters sadly beset by the flood of new morals, and ethics and dress of the "younger generation." Eleanor, he soon discovers, is associating with young women of strange tendencies. Peggy has been "keeping company" with a young man of doubtful character. Both have been coming home at all hours of the night. The Colonel insists upon their recognition of his authority. They refuse. He is called away for a few days, but is recalled by a message saying that both girls have left home. He meets Peggy's lover and forces from him the addresses of both girls. The Colonel and Mrs. Trelawney visit them. Peggy has just been married to Barnes. Eleanor has secured a position in London where her employer forces his evil attentions upon her. She longs for the protection of her old friend Rod Ravenscroft.

INSTALLMENT XIII.

"No, not for two or three weeks," he replied, "but I sometimes call. You see, John is a great friend of mine."

"You have not been there this morning?"

He shook his head. "No, Miss Trelawney."

"I suppose you have been wondering at the predicament in which you saw me last night," she stammered.

"I'm very glad I happened to be passing," was his reply. "I had been spending the evening with some Oxford friends. We all met at the chambers of Dick Pascoe, and I had not left them more than a few minutes before I—I saw you. I was afraid you were in trouble."

Her face crimsoned with shame. She longed to let him know the truth, but she could not. Her mind was torn by conflicting influences.

"I suppose you feel it your duty to—inform them at Duloe of what you saw?" she blurted out presently, and she was angry with herself the moment the words had passed her lips.

"I don't think I deserve that, Miss Trelawney."

"Come now, confess," and she tried to speak lightly, "haven't you felt all the morning that you ought to go to General Trelawney and tell him that you saw his daughter under the most distressing circumstances, and that but for you something terrible might have happened to her?"

"And if I did?" he flashed back, "wouldn't it have been natural? Yes, I will be quite frank and candid with you: I will take the liberty of an old friend—I will even go farther than that—I will take the liberty of one who a few months ago dared to hope great things. But, of course, that has all gone now."

She misunderstood his meaning, and a kind of despair came into her heart which was mingled with an unreasoning anger.

"And why have you come here this morning?"

"I came—I hardly know why. I came, I think, because I wanted to help you."

"Why should you want to help me?"

"Because you need help. I am sure of that."

"Yes," she laughed, "I do need help. I need help in getting a position. I have lost my place. Her voice was hard and bitter.

"Come, Miss Trelawney," pleaded Ravenscroft, "isn't it foolish to talk like that? I'm sure your father and mother are longing for you to come home."

"My mother may be, but my father—"

"Yes, your father," repeated Ravenscroft. "I suppose you'll think me a prig and be angry at what seems like bad taste in speaking, but I cannot help it. If your father saw what I saw last night it would break his heart."

She laughed defiantly. "My father cares nothing for me," she cried. "He tried to treat me as though I were a child, as though I had no mind of my own, as though I were a little pet dog led by a string."

"No," said Ravenscroft, "that's false. I have never talked with your father about your reasons for leaving home, but I know you're not speaking the truth. Of course, it's not my business, but I tell you plainly I think your behavior damnable."

"What behavior?" she flashed back.

"Your behavior in leaving your home as you did."

"What do you know about it?" Eleanor had become utterly defiant and regardless of consequences. "What I did, I did after due consideration," she asserted hotly. "My father would not allow me to choose my own friends. He arrogated to himself the right of deciding who my friends should be, where I should go, and where I should not go; as though a girl of any individuality will allow herself to be dictated to in that way."

"Do you permit me to speak freely, Miss Trelawney?" asked Ravenscroft.

"Yes, speak," she laughed defiantly.

"Then I tell you this. I think your father was right in insisting on what he did. No girl, if she cares for her own self-respect, should come home in the early hours of the morning and refuse to let her parents know where she has been. No father with right feeling would allow it. And you did these things, Miss Trelawney, and then because your father insisted upon obedience to his will you aided and abetted your sister in making a mad marriage, and left home."

"What right have you to say this to me?" and her voice was husky with passion.

"The right you gave me a minute ago," he replied. "But that is not all. I have the right of one who once loved you, who months ago idealized you, and who would have given his life to serve you. I know now that my love was hopeless, but I cannot help caring for your welfare. And I say this, Miss Trelawney, you are leading a dangerous life."

"What do you know about my life?" she asked.

"What I saw last night."

"And because of that you came here to insult me?"

"No," he replied, "I came as one wishing you well. I came to ask you not to allow yourself to throw away your life."

"And because you rendered me a service you claim the right to—to dispose of my future, I suppose." In her mad anger she scarcely knew what words were passing her lips. "I tell you this, Mr. Ravenscroft, I am fully able to take care of myself, and I could, if I felt so disposed, explain everything you saw last night, even to your satisfaction. But I don't feel so disposed, because you have not the right to know."

"Few girls in London are able to take care of themselves," was his reply, "especially when they are as beautiful as you are. If I had a sister I would rather see her go into a house infected by smallpox than to see her living amidst such companionship as you have chosen."

"What do you know about my companionships?"

"I know the opinions Miss Tamsin Cory holds. I have heard about Miss Chelley, who occupies these rooms with you. I know men who know Miss Jeffreys and her friends, and Mrs. Gracechurch, who was divorced only a few months ago."

"How do you know these things?"

"Because I have made it my business to find out," and his voice was as defiant as hers. "If a woman lives in infectious houses, Miss Trelawney, the likelihood is that she will catch the disease. But I did not come here to quarrel with you. I came because I could not help it," and there was a catch in his voice as he uttered the last words.

She looked at him quickly, searchingly. There was something in his tones that made her heart throb madly. Again her anger died down, and a great longing came into her heart to defend, to justify herself, to prove to him that she was not what she imagined in her terror he thought she was.

"I know you're thinking about what you saw last night," she then said. "Let me tell you this, then, although the circumstances were—yes, horrible, my mother has no reason to blush for me. I went—where I did—to obtain a post. I went—in the hope of—helping Peg. The rest was—hideous, I know, but as far as I am concerned, you saw the—the worst." She half stammered, half sobbed the words that came from her with difficulty, and she could not help a feeling of joy as she saw the changed look in his eyes.

"Miss Trelawney," he said quietly, "I never thought—harm of you—that way. I couldn't. But will you not go back to your father?"

"No," she replied obstinately.

"All I want, Mr. Ravenscroft," she went on, "is the means to live my own life."

He rose to his feet. "I cannot persuade you to go back to your home, then?" he said.

She shook her head.

"May I tell your father and mother that I have seen you?"

"No, I hope you'll tell them nothing."

"Nothing?"

"No, nothing."

He held out his hand to her. "Good-morning, Miss Trelawney," he said. "I hope you'll forgive my coming. And, of course, I'd no right to speak to you as I did. Will you forgive me?"

Her eyes were drawn to his as he spoke, and something overmastered her, she knew not what. She felt that tears were welling up, that her lips were trembling. He held her hands in his.

"Will you not tell me that you forgive me?" he said.

"Go—go! please go!" and snatching her hand away from his, she flung herself on the chair and, burying her face in her hands, sobbed as though her heart would break.

"Miss Trelawney," said Rod Ravenscroft, anxiously, "are you not well? Tell me."

"Go! go! please go!" she sobbed.

He stood looking at her for a few seconds as if undecided what to do. Then with a sigh he opened the door and passed out, while she continued to sob as though her heart would break.

Reprieve

By William Willard Howard

NOT many days after these words are read by the persons for whom they are written a wonderful thing will come into the life of Vera Trenukhin. That wonderful thing will be a message equivalent to a reprieve from a sentence of death.

Readers of THE CHRISTIAN WORK who have done me the honor to read what I have written during the past weeks concerning the ghastly tragedy of the members of the nobility and intelligentsia of monarchist Russia who fled from their ancestral lands and homes to escape death at the hands of revolutionists may remember the story of Vera Trenukhin, as told in "The College Girl and the Wolf." In that article I reproduced, as clearly as possible, a literary photograph of a winter day in Vera Trenukhin's life. I need not repeat it here, more than to say that Vera Trenukhin, afflicted with heart trouble, climbed five thousand stair-treads each day delivering newspapers, for which she received thirteen cents, and that it was a matter of only a short time when she would drop dead at her task. Vera Trenukhin was as much under sentence of death as though a court of last resort had pronounced her doom.

A generous friend of humanity in Philadelphia read the story and sent to me a sum of money to be used in guaranteeing to Vera Trenukhin less arduous employment for one year. In a few more days Anne Louise Howard will receive this money, together with an outline of the giver's suggestions for its use. Then Vera Trenukhin will be told the wondrous news. She will be told that she can give up her newspaper delivery work, and that congenial light employment will be provided for her. I have left the details to Anne Louise Howard, who probably will give Vera Trenukhin employment at blouse making or knitting.

The giver of the money has saved this gentlewoman's life as definitely as though he had rescued her from drowning, for Vera Trenukhin could not have survived more than a few months.

There is another benefit in this that should not be overlooked. In leaving her present place of employment Vera Trenukhin will create a vacancy in the delivery force of the newspaper that she serves. Naturally she will recommend for the vacancy another destitute Russian refugee. In that way two Russian gentlewomen will be helped by the Philadelphia friend's gift.

Still another benefit will arise from this act of beneficence. Starving, despairing Russian gentlefolk will hear of this wonderful thing that has come to Vera Trenukhin and will be strengthened in their belief that human sympathy does exist in the world, and that there are men and women able and willing to relieve suffering and distress. The influence of a good deed travels far and soothes many stricken hearts.

Were it not for the fact that many folk do good by stealth and act as though they feared exposure I should publish in these pages tangible proof that human sympathy does exist in the world, and that the civilization of the United States, which is the highest in the world, rests upon a foundation composed of men and women bearing a close resemblance to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN WORK. I should like to publish the name and address of the minister of the Gospel who wrote the following letter: but I will print the letter, anyway:

"I am glad you have the heart and the means and the family sympathy to do what you do now and then for the needy.

"I have read your recent articles in THE CHRISTIAN WORK in regard to the dreadful sufferings among the Russian intelligentsia. I had made up my mind that if the Soviet is selling grain to get money for its devilish propaganda I would give no more for the Russian peasantry need, although they are not responsible; but this case is different.

"I am eighty-one years old and ought not to have to work to live. But I did earn $650 last year, and with interest on small savings I had less than $1,000 income. I gave, and have for some years given $100 a year for the Near East Relief. I gave $50 for missions. I gave for Dr. Grenfell. I gave, or agreed to give, $50 to our fund for pensioning our ministry, not a cent of which could I ever get. I have to eat and keep my house warm and have decent clothing, and pay taxes for my home.

"And yet I feel that I will give $10 for the Russian need-work enterprise which you and Anne Louise Howard are doing.

"Find those 'Gentle Waifs' and help their mother. I have tried to interest others in your work.

"I am in the midst of a local campaign for clothing for Near East refugees.

"God bless you and Anne Louise Howard in your noble work. I have been laid aside and have not my full strength back yet. My work is nearly done."

In every attribute of human existence our country stands head and shoulders above every other nation in the world. I know, because I have visited thirty-two foreign countries and thirty-eight States of my own land. That our country does occupy this highest position in the history of the human race is the result of the earnest, unselfish work of men such as this minister of the Gospel and of women who have worked with them.

While investigating the condition of the Russian refugees on the border of Bolshevik Russia last winter I made the acquaintance of Captain Paul. I omit his last name. The captain was living, with his wife and two children, in a small room without a stove. The place was bitterly cold. I offered to supply a stove, but as there was not any place for the stovepipe, and as the owner of the building would not let us put the pipe through the window because of the risk from fire, the captain was compelled to remain in the cold. The captain had been master of ships in foreign trade; then superintendent of a line of river steamboats in Russia. After twenty-four years' service he retired on a competence. Revolutionists took all his property and left him penniless. He fled from Russia with his family. In the country to which he fled he could not obtain work because the natives monopolized all lines of employment. His wife earned twelve cents a day working in a hospital, where she received also her food. From her earnings were paid the cost of food for the captain and the two children and school books and tuition for the children. As the captain was only fifty-four years old and in good health, he could have worked if he could have found any work to do.

In my mail yesterday was a letter saying that recently Captain Paul's wife, her mind probably unhinged by the sufferings of her family, had decided to go back to Russia and to take her fourteen-year-old daughter with her. The captain and his fellow refugees did everything possible to dissuade the woman from her purpose, but she said only that if she and her daughter had to die of starvation it would be better to die at home in Russia. In his grief and despair the captain declared that if his wife and daughter went back to Russia they would go over his dead body.

It is likely that this impending calamity temporarily affected the captain's mind. To me the wonder is that all the refugees do not go crazy. The woman persisted in her determination to return home to Russia.

The captain went to the top floor of the building and threw himself from a window. He was killed instantly.

I tell this story here not merely because I had put in an interesting hour listening to the captain's tales of the sea and of the far places known to both of us, but as one of the little tragedies that make up the one big tragedy of the Russian refugees. The coroner's verdict in Captain Paul's case would be "suicide while temporarily insane," but in cold truth it was death from starvation. Had the captain and his children been properly fed the woman never would have thought of returning to Russia. The slow starvation of her loved ones unhinged her mind.

This is the second death of my own acquaintances among the refugees since my return home—little tragedies that pass unnoticed. Thus the refugees pass on, one at a time—the men and women who gave their all to the Allied cause and asked nothing in return. This is not a tale of yesterday. It is the pitiful story of to-day. It will be the tragedy of to-morrow.

Anne Louise Howard, who put into operation a needle-work industry to give employment to destitute Russian gentlewomen, could prevent some of these little tragedies if she could add to her working force. You who read this may help her, if you will, by helping to increase the working fund. Contributions in any amount, large or small, may be sent to the Russian Refugee Fund, care THE CHRISTIAN WORK, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York City. Each contribution will be as a message of reprieve to some despairing gentlewoman under sentence of death by starvation.

A forty-page booklet giving photographic reproductions of the hand-embroidered, hand-sewn Russian Princess Blouses made in Anne Louise Howard's relief industry will be sent to any address for the asking.

A Group of Interesting Biographies

MY YEARS ON THE STAGE

By JOHN DREW. E. P. Dutton Company. $5.

The thing about John Drew's "My Years on the Stage" that strikes the reader most forcibly is that Mr. Drew must have had a great deal of pleasure in writing his book. For how could any one looking back on such a long and distinguished career—a career so consistently fine and successful and happy—fail to feel the glow of honest pride and satisfaction? Perhaps if anyone is to write the history of the golden age of the American theater—the age of Daly and Frohman, of Jefferson and Booth—John Drew is the fittest person for the undertaking. This book does not pretend to be such a history; it is, as the title indicates, merely a record of Mr. Drew's life in the theater. But his experience has been so long and so varied, his acquaintanceship so wide, and his knowledge of his art so complete, that his book makes an excellent and comprehensive story of the American stage from 1873 to the present time. The book is written in a gently detached and philosophic manner. Mr. Drew does not dominate it by any means. Among the people, from presidents and kings to doormen and office boys, who walk across its pages, Mr. Drew takes his proper place in a fitting and dignified manner. He deals modestly with his own successes, but very generously with those of his colleagues. As regards facts he is most particular. In most cases where he discusses a production, he gives the date, the theater, the names of the entire cast, excerpts from various newspaper criticisms, and the degree of success which each play attained. And between these careful statements, he inserts a host of humorous, pathetic and unusual incidents that aptly characterize the people of whom he writes, and lend an authentic atmosphere to his story. As a record the book is quite complete; as a narrative it is very entertaining. It is all well and simply written. And it is very human, especially when Mr. Drew speaks of his friends who have passed, or of his niece and nephews, in whose care he confidently leaves the great tradition of his family. In all, Mr. Drew is to be congratulated on having added another to his already long list of artistic achievements. The book contains a charming foreword by Booth Tarkington and some fifty illustrations which, in themselves, should make the book valuable to lovers of the theater.

A MISSIONARY PIONEER IN THE FAR EAST: A MEMORIAL OF DIVIE BETHUNE McCARTEE

Edited by ROBERT E. SPEER. Fleming H. Revell Company. $1.50.

Dr. McCartee was for more than fifty years a missionary of the Presbyterian Church in China and Japan. The story as edited by Dr. Speer is a romance of most intense interest. Fortunately Dr. McCartee, from day to day, wrote down the story of his life. From this story Dr. Speer has gathered the outstanding incidents. It is a story of wonderful achievement and is a striking illustration of how the missionary, when he has statesmanlike qualities, touches the whole life of the nation where he ministers. Dr. McCartee gave to the Far East not only the ministrations of school and church from day to day, but vision and Christian idealism, and touched the whole activity of the people. As is generally the case, when a foreign missionary writes, the story is very direct and forceful.

LIVES OF GIRLS WHO BECAME FAMOUS

By SARAH K. BOLTON. Thomas Y. Crowell Company, New York. $2.

Two or three years ago Mrs. Bolton published a little book called "Lives of Poor Boys Who Became Famous." At the time we remarked that it was one of the most interesting bits of biographical writing of recent years. We wish that the ambitious boys of the country could have it. We also remarked that probably no book was better fitted to stir ambitions than that book. We would like to repeat these same words in connection with this story of "Lives of Girls Who Became Famous." How the public in general agrees with us can be seen from the fact that more than 100,000 copies of Mrs. Bolton's biographical stories have been sold. In this book of three hundred pages we have the stories of such well known women as Mrs. Browning, George Eliot, Florence Nightingale, Jenny Lind, Rosa Bonheur, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Louisa M. Alcott, Julia Ward Howe, Jane Addams, Clara Barton, Helen Keller and many others. There are also many excellent photographs scattered through it.

JAMES W. BASHFORD, PASTOR, EDUCATOR, BISHOP

By GEORGE R. GROSE. Methodist Book Concern, New York. $2.

We remember saying just a little while ago when we heard of Bishop Bashford's death that "there was a man whose story had all the romance in it of a crusader, and whose touch upon China will be felt through the centuries." We are glad that Dr. Grose has told the story of his life so soon after his passing, because it is a story that should be put into the hands of youth immediately and also it is a story which his hosts of friends will want to read while the Bishop himself is present in their memories. The book falls into two parts—the first half the story of his boyhood, college life and pastorate in America. Even during his pastorate here, especially in Portland, Maine, he began to be felt as a national force. In 1889 Dr. Bashford became president of Ohio Wesleyan University and there he did remarkable work. His influence over the students was most pronounced. In May, 1904, Dr. Bashford was made a Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and in response to his own request he was assigned China. The rest of the book is devoted to the story of his remarkable work in China. Not only did he strengthen the Methodist Episcopal work in that country, but he became one of the closest advisers of the Chinese government and exerted much influence on the educational and national development of China. He was one of the best interpreters of China to America that that nation has ever had, and his visits to this country were always looked forward to with great eagerness by everybody.

WHEN I WAS A BOY IN DENMARK—A CHRONICLE OF HAPPY DAYS

By H. TROLLE-STEENSTRUP. Lothrop, Lee and Shepard Company, Boston. $1.25.

The boys and girls in this country are very fortunate who own a set of "Children of Other Lands" books. These fifteen books are written by natives of those countries. Now comes a new one by H. Trolle-Steenstrup telling the story of his boyhood in Denmark. Mr. Steenstrup knows how to tell a good story. It is not simply a description of Denmark and especially of Copenhagen, where he grew up, but it is a rather lively boyhood picture against the background of his native land. When one is finished he has a pretty good idea how people live in Denmark. There are twenty-five excellent illustrations. We would like, to suggest to the publishers that in future editions of this series or any new issues of those already out, someone write a page or two of introduction giving a short sketch of the life of the author of the book. The average boy and girl would read this book with added interest if they knew more about Mr. H. Trolle-Steenstrup.

THE LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

LIVING LEADERS, JUDGED BY CHRISTIAN STANDARDS

By LUCIUS H. BUGBEE. Abingdon Press, New York. 50 cents.

This is a little book of criticism of Gandhi, Clemenceau, Lenin, Coué, Lloyd George and Einstein. It is interesting, shows a good deal of insight and is pretty just in its conclusions. We are not quite sure that it is as just to Lloyd George as it is to the others. After all has been said, what statesman during the last ten years has thought in world terms more than has Lloyd George. Sometimes we wonder if anyone has done as much to hold Europe together during the welter of these years as has he.

HEROES OF THE FARTHEST NORTH AND FARTHEST SOUTH

By J. KENNEDY MACLEAN. Revised and enlarged by J. WALKER SPADDEN. Thomas Y. Crowell Company, New York. $1.75.

Here is a book of real adventure. It is a revision of Maclean's famous stories of polar explorers. This comes right down to date including Amundsen, Scott and Shackleton. It begins way back with men who first sought the Pole, tells the story of the search of the Northwest Passage, of Henry Hudson's quest and then, beginning with Franklin relates the heroic searches for both the North and the South Pole. It is well written and full of hairbreadth escapes.

PANDITA RAMABAI (SARASVATI)

By CLEMENTINA BUTLER. The Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. $1.

There was a real sorrow throughout the Christian world when that beautiful woman Pandita Ramabai died last June. Few women have been such blessings to their country as she was to India. She was a pioneer in the movement for the liberation of the child-widow of India and for the education of women. There are thousands of Americans who will remember the coming of this little woman to our land in 1886 to make her appeal for the child-widow of India. She made hosts of friends at once. Christians and many organizations became interested in her work and she went back to India and devoted the rest of her beautiful life to those unfortunate children who, married at eleven or twelve, are left widows, and by that act are consigned to a life which is almost that of a prison. All is changed since then and it has been largely due to her influence. Miss Butler in her little book has not only interestingly told the story of her work, but has drawn a faithful picture of one of the most beautiful characters that Asia has produced.

THINGS REMEMBERED

By ARTHUR SHERBURNE HARDY. Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $5.

This is not exactly an autobiography and yet it is the story of Professor Hardy's various contacts with men and life. Professor Hardy has had a very interesting career. As a member of the consular and diplomatic circles, he has met all sorts and conditions of men. He knew everybody in Persia and in Greece, and a good deal of the charm of this book is that one gets in touch with life in countries that as yet we know very little about in America. Switzerland and Spain he also knew and as a novelist came into touch with the literary people of many countries. There are very interesting sketches in this book of Sir Edwin Egerton, Count Burian, King George of Greece, the Queen of Rumania, Sir Mortimer Durand and the King of Spain. No less valuable and interesting a part of the book is the story of his father, Alpheus Hardy. Who does not remember him as the man who found Joseph Neesima, and became his second father? Mr. Hardy has told that remarkable story and the further story of the founding of Doshisha University by Neesima, in a volume published about thirty years ago. Today Doshisha stands as one of the greatest universities of the Far East and it would never have been had it not been for Alpheus Hardy befriending this Japanese boy. Mr. Hardy is very frank in criticisms of men and women whom he met. This makes the books even more valuable. Needless to say the man who wrote "Passe Rose" and "But Yet a Woman" writes with distinction of style and brilliance.

THOMAS NELSON PAGE

By ROSEWELL PAGE. Charles Scribners Sons, New York. $1.50.

This memoir by his brother, Rosewell Page, will be heartily welcomed by a large group of friends. Mr. Page was a decidedly friendly man and when he was appointed Ambassador to Italy there was a good deal of rejoicing. His death came as a sad shock. His last legacy was a fine volume on Dante, born out of his residence as Ambassador to Italy. This little book is a very intimate story of his life, not a critical estimate of his writing in any way, but a tribute from one who knew him as a brother knows a brother. His real contribution, of course, is his interpretation of Southern life through his many stories. He belongs with Joel Chandler Harris and George Cable as a real interpreter of the South. It is the story of a very successful and sunny life; also a life that drew to it many friends. Theodore Roosevelt was one of his most intimate friends; the colored people in the South were among his others. He loved Italy and accepted the Ambassadorship because it offered such an opportunity to make modern Italy's life and work known to America and to interpret America to Italy.

OLD MEMORIES: AUTOBIOGRAPHY

By SIR HENRY JONES, C.H. George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.35.

This is one of the most charming books of the spring. It is not a full autobiography, but simply the story of the author's boyhood in Wales and his college days. He had evidently written it during the latter years of his life as an encouragement to the boys of Britain and it would be a God-send to the youth of all lands if the book could be put into their hands. He handed it to an old pupil shortly before his death in February, 1922, with the remark that this was his legacy to youth. It is not only fascinating in its picture of a happy, struggling childhood in a two-room house, and in its story of "the short and simple annals of the poor," but it is one of the most encouraging stories of modern years. Sir Henry became a great man, one of the profoundest thinkers of recent years. His last book, "A Faith That Enquires" (the Gifford Lectures for 1920-21), has been everywhere recognized as a real contribution to philosophic and religious thought—but in "Old Memories" one gets a picture of one of the happiest, simplest, sweetest childhoods imaginable. Do not fail to read this book if you have any appreciation of childhood and also of charming writing.

A MAN FROM MAINE

By EDWARD W. BOK. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $3.

In "The Americanization of Edward Bok," the former editor of the "Ladies' Home Journal," wrote what seemed to us one of the great autobiographies—a book of special inspiration to the editor. "A Man from Maine," the life of the great publisher, Cyrus H. K. Curtis, by no means comes up to the standard of the earlier book. However, there is so much of interest in the life of the head of the great Curtis Publishing Company, that the book is well worth reading, and when Mr. Bok gets away from his thesis—that business is a wonderful romance—and forgets his desire to stimulate the young business man, he tells his story admirably. He is particularly enjoyable when he throws his subject to the winds and preaches on his favorite topic of the duty of a business man to do more than run a business, to have some interest in the public welfare. Two or three incidents concerning Curtis especially illustrate the fine uprightness of the man. Bok repeats the story which he told in his own autobiography of how Mr. Curtis had no hesitation in backing up his editor in his policy of advocating sex education in spite of the warning that it would cost him a hundred thousand circulation. After he had discovered what the furore was about Curtis turned over to Bok unread the letters and petitions asking the publisher to dismiss his editor. There is no finer illustration of Curtis' fairness than the fact that his employees, when they thought the publishing house was not dealing fairly with them, submitted the question to Curtis himself as an arbitrator. Curtis listened to what his managers and his workmen had to say. Then, without a moment's hesitation, said, "The workmen are right." The case was decided against what was apparently his own interests. Like any good biography, the book should prove the source of many good illustrations for the preacher.

Orthodoxy and Liberalism

RELIGION AND MODERN THOUGHT

By GEORGE GALLOWAY, D. Phil., D.D. pp. 336. T. and T. Clark, Edinburgh. $2.50.

The principal of St. Mary's College, St. Andrews, discusses frankly in these essays the problems raised by modern thinking in reference to religion and theology. This is a scholarly work written for the most part in simple terms. The only chapter which would demand a thorough philosophical training for its appreciation is that on "The influence of Kant on religious thought." The others deal with the questions which are before thoughtful persons to-day in language at once simple and profound. No more valuable book could be put in the hands of a college man who is troubled over the confusions of modern thought or into the hands of a "fundamentalist" who considers that all "modernists" are atheists or agnostics. It is a delight to perceive the patience and humility of these pages which the present reviewer finds to be characteristic of all who meditate in freedom and brotherly love on the great issues of life.

The very titles of the chapters provoke interest: "National Religion," "The Problem of the Personality of God," "Religion and the Supernatural," "Controversy: Its Meaning and Value." The first chapter (which is the inaugural address on entering on the Professorship of Divinity in St. Andrews's University), is a profound review of the task and present problems of theology. Great emphasis is placed on the necessity of distinguishing between what is essential and what is secondary in religion. The place of doctrine in religion is clearly emphasized: "If there were no such doctrines, an intelligent and consistent system of social worship would not be possible."

But emphasis is also placed on the fact that religion is not produced by doctrines, and that therefore the real fundamental is religious experience. "The history of dogmas is itself a refutation of the claim that they are absolutely fixed and unalterable." Faith and reason ought not be sharply opposed because in normal life they blend.

Four great questions are briefly discussed in this address and are dealt with more fully in other chapters of the book: (1) The distinction between what is primary and essential and what is merely secondary in the historic doctrines of the Church. (2) The relation between Christian theology and the doctrines of other religions. (3) What is the relation between theology and philosophy? (4) The relation in which theological doctrines stand to the principle of development.

In discussing the present religious outlook Principal Galloway has some very interesting statements concerning the spiritual nature of the Church's work, its teaching function, and the position of the minister: "At present the success of a congregation depends too much on one man—the minister." "I feel strongly that, if we are to work our Presbyterian system to better advantage, some effective method of superintendence is necessary." The author feels that a creed is needed for holding a church together and that this cannot be "a purely tentative and provisional creed," but that a frank acceptance of the principle of development should be allowed. "To revise a creed is simply to try to unfold better the meaning of religion."

The creeds were written in the generally accepted notion "that it was possible to elaborate a systematic body of religious doctrine which would be the norm of spiritual experience and belief for all time." "Apparently they [the creed makers] assumed there could be no other interpretation of Scripture admissible than their own."

On the other hand: "That doctrine (and the formulation of doctrines in a theological system) is a kind of excrescence on the religious life is not a tenable theory. . . . Only because religion is a thinking experience as well as a feeling-state can it function as an aspect of the growing life of culture."

Principal Galloway reminds us that there is a conviction among thinking people that "there are doctrines in the creeds about which there can be reasonable certitude, while there are others which have no relevancy to the spiritual needs of men and women." And he finds a solution in the recognition that Christianity is an historic faith that grew out of the life and work of Christ, and that the continuous and characteristic element in the Christian experience is the reference to Christ which each age seeks to express in terms of its own spiritual life and values. "After all," he concludes, "a doctrinal statement which seeks to set forth what Christian experience means for us, should rather serve as a guide and bond of union than a permanent and rigid test."

The essay on "National Religion" contains both an interesting historical survey and some very sane reflections on the value of National Religion. While concluding that National Religion can hardly be a final stage of the religious consciousness, the author yet emphasizes the fact of the difficulty of sustaining the moral life and character of a nation apart from any religious ideas and sanctions and deplores the tendency associated with the complete separation between Church and State to regard religion as a purely individualistic matter of private concern. He believes that National Religion, if it be full and spiritual, may help in preparing the way for a universal kingdom of the spirit.

It would be impossible to discuss all the themes mentioned in this most stimulating and strengthening volume. There is a sane treatment of the advantages of the Socratic method of controversy as a cure for the popular intellectual flabbiness of our age. "Controversy is, or ought to be, an intellectual process, the aim of which is to establish or set aside claims to truth, and the issue falls to be decided on grounds of reason." Again there is discussion of the relation between theological doctrines and philosophical thought. The author denies the reality of the antagonism, commonly found in the writings of the Ritschlian school.

The three concluding essays treat of the personality of God, the essence of Christianity and the supernatural in religion. These essays are most timely and are full of fine hints for preaching. Principal Galloway has a genius for simple thinking and clear expression. He seems both willing and able to go to the root of questions. Take, for example, his conclusion concerning the essence of Christianity: "The essence is therefore not to be defined in the form of something objective, unvarying and final. What each age finds most deep and moving in the complex whole of Christian faith, that it declares to be essential Christianity. This judgment of value has a relative justification: it expresses the essential meaning of Christianity for the life and thought of the age. If any one demurs that this is not enough, we invite him to show by a study of the relevant facts that he is entitled to go further."

We have never read a better discussion of the contrast between naturalism and theism with special reference to miracle, than is contained in the concluding pages of the valuable book. I think we have here a noble word addressed especially to the sloppy liberal—the kind of man who uses liberalism as a cloak for loose thinking.

"There need be nothing contradictory in the emergence of the supernatural within the natural course of things, provided its appearance is neither accidental nor capricious, but forms an element in that purpose of God which is realized both in the realms of nature and of spirit." The book closes with a fine appeal to turn for a solution of our difficulties to "the current of that religious life of which Christ is the fountain." "To appreciate the deeper significance of 'the fact of Christ' a man must enter the current of that religious life of which Christ is the fountain. Then the obscuring veil is lifted, and he discerns the seeking and saving activity of the transcendent God exercised on the souls of men. The individual for whom this has become a full assurance will not find it hard to believe that the God revealed in Christ is the continuous source of fresh spiritual movements which contribute to the fulfilment of His eternal purpose of good. There is nothing in the methods and results of science which invalidates this faith, and there is much in religious experience which demands it."

This book ought to be of great assistance in helping us through the present days of theological debate.

Books on Prayer

LORD, TEACH US TO PRAY

By ALEXANDER WHYTE, D.D., LL.D. pp. 292. George H. Doran Company. $2.

Dr. Whyte died in 1921 at the age of eighty-four, leaving behind him the reputation of being one of Scotland's greatest preachers (and that means the world's) and also one of the best beloved. We have often heard Dr. Kelman speak of both aspects of his fame. The present volume has gone through three English editions already and is heartily praised as a true presentation of the soul of the message of Dr. Whyte's forty-year ministry. There are here twenty-three sermons on aspects of prayer (selected by J. M. E. Ross from Dr. Whyte's sermons), each beginning with the text, "Lord, teach us to pray," and supplementing this with another text which shapes the course of the particular sermon. First appear three introductory sermons: "The Magnificence of Prayer," "The Geometry of Prayer," "The Heart of Man and the Heart of God." Then follow eleven sermons on "Some Bible Types of Prayer," six from the Old Testament and five from the New Testament. The last section of the book contains nine sermons illuminating aspects of the way of prayer, as for example: "The Costliness of Prayer," "Concentration in Prayer," "The Endless Quest," etc.

We do not propose to review these sermons in detail. They are unreviewable. Their fervency, their imagination, their simplicity, their faith, are a benediction to the reader. What they must have been to the hearer may be imagined, but not described. We feel that the secret of Dr. Whyte's power is indicated in the brief unsigned preface to the book. In one place it is said: "It was Dr. Whyte's own wish that he should be known as a specialist in the study of sin; he was willing to leave other distinctions to other men." Dr. Whyte plumbs human nature with an unerring but a kindly hand. Again the preface quotes Dr. Joseph Parker's statement, "Many would have announced the chaining of Satan for a thousand years with less expenditure of vital force than Dr. Whyte gave to the mere announcing of a hymn." Throughout these pages one feels the genuine sincerity of a man in constant communion with the living God. This book is a genuine consolation to the troubled heart and a noble stimulus to the preacher.

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF PRAYER

By KARL R. STOLZ. pp. 247. The Abingdon Press. $1.25.

This is a scientific work written in a devout spirit. The phraseology is technical only in the sense that it is accurately used. Difficult terms are frequently explained. Professor Norman D. Richardson, who writes a short introduction, compliments Professor Stolz as a psychologist by saying: "After reading this book many persons will use prayer intelligently and reverently as a distinct method of mental and moral control;" and again by saying, "As a philosopher the author holds a theory of reality and of ultimate values which is entirely compatible with an active, personal faith in God as revealed and interpreted in the Christian religion;" and finally as a teacher for his simple and lucid dealing with subtle and illusive materials.

The author employs a striking phrase when he says, "Prayer is religion alive." And he shows himself a thoroughgoing theist when he declares in his preface that his "contention is that God is not an impersonal force like the ether, if there be such; or the personification and deification of the complex of social values which are the resultant of race experience; but, rather, the personal spirit, uncreated and eternal, from which the world of man and nature is derived, the self-conscious and self-governing ultimate court of appeal."

One cannot but admire the orderly and systematic way in which Professor Stolz approaches each issue. For example, in taking up the psychological approach to prayer he is at great pains to emphasize "that the psychological phases analyzed do not constitute the whole prayer experience."

He discusses the threefold effect of suggestion: to inhibit, induce, and heighten states. And he points out that it is restricted to the field of personal influence and limited "by the amount of vitality which the human organism possesses." After pointing out the contacts between suggestion and prayer he enters upon a particular study of petitionary prayer, discussing attention, faith in prayer, various answers, and "ungranted petitions." The chapter entitled "Objective Answers" is short but nevertheless important for it deals with the vital questions: "Is prayer efficacious outside the range of personal and social influence? Does prayer infringe upon and suspend the laws of nature? Does the sweep of prayer include the physical as well as the moral and religious world?"

Professor Stolz finely says: "It is sheer scientific bigotry to assert that answer to prayer outside the scope of personal influence is impossible." But it seems to us that he falls from the high plane on which he has been proceeding when he says: "It is the Christian's belief that since God made the world as it is, he is able to depart from any customary method of expressing himself." (The italics are ours.) We would prefer to say: he is able to express himself in ways which are beyond the range of our limited observation of his methods.

The two following chapters give an interesting account of prayers of confession and praise and devotion, especially in the light of psychoanalysis and psychosynthesis.

The final chapter takes as its text William Jones' famous dictum: "The reason why we do pray is simply that we cannot help praying." The chapter is a fine statement of the elemental nature of prayer, closing with the noble paragraph: "In the spiritual culture of humanity prayer will ever be paramount. As both self-assertion and self-surrender, prayer can build the men who can build a new world. Not as a substitute for science or economics or government, but as a purifier of the springs of conduct and as a normal source of poise and power, prayer can hasten the coming of the Kingdom of God which is the desire of all nations."

There is a questionnaire on prayer, a brief bibliography of fifty-three titles and an index. This book is valuable both for its scientific and devout spirit and for the splendid illustrations scattered all through it. We recommend it heartily to teachers and preachers of religion.

THE POSSIBILITIES OF PRAYER

By EDWARD M. BOUNDS, D.D. pp. 159. Fleming H. Revell Company. $1.25.

Mr. Homer W. Hodge has performed a labor of love in assembling these enthusiastic addresses of Dr. Bounds' on prayer, a theme ever dear to both their hearts. Here is a plea for prayer in its highest and fullest sense, fervent, overflowing, persistent. Dr. Bounds has no doubts about prayer's universal validity in every field: "Prayer is a divine arrangement in the moral government of God, designed for the benefit of men and intended as a means for furthering the interests of His cause on earth, and carrying out His gracious purposes in redemption and providence. Prayer proves itself. It is susceptible of proving its virtue by those who pray. Prayer needs no proof other than its accomplishments." Special stress is laid upon Scripture promises in reference to prayer and we are urged because of them to pray in faith and expectancy: "Unfortunately we have failed to lay ourselves out in praying. . . . The ability to pray can be secured by the grace and power of the Holy Spirit, but it demands so strenuous and high a character that it is a rare thing for a man or woman to be on 'praying ground and on pleading terms with God.'" Dr. Bounds draws his illustrations almost exclusively from the Bible and hymnology. His addresses bear the mark of the extempore. They are fervid and direct, but not profound.

History

THE McKINLEY AND ROOSEVELT ADMINISTRATIONS

By JAMES FORD RHODES. pp. 418. The Macmillan Company, New York. $4.

This book really constitutes the ninth volume in Dr. Rhodes' "History of the United States" from 1850 on. Perhaps because of the fact that the period under consideration in this particular volume is not so far removed from the present day, the perspective on events seems to be not quite as clear as in the earlier volumes of this justly famous work. The present reviewer has read all of these volumes and can think of no more rewarding reading for a man who wishes to deal with affairs in his own country to-day, than is afforded in these fascinating pages. Dr. Rhodes writes with a spontaneous style and in a judicial spirit based on the widest investigation of the facts under consideration. It is a delight to realize his extensive knowledge of literature as well as of affairs, and to appreciate the enthusiasm with which he records the history of our country. The first thing that the present volume did for the reviewer was to thoroughly change the somewhat superficial view he had of Mark Hanna, of whom there is perhaps current an opinion which on careful consideration of the facts cannot be altogether justified. Dr. Rhodes quotes John Hay's statement concerning Mark Hanna: "I never knew him intimately until we went into this fight together, but my esteem and admiration for him have grown every hour. He is a born general in politics, perfectly square, honest and courageous, with a coup d'oeil for the battlefield and a knowledge of the enemy's weak points which is very important." There is also a fine and sympathetically drawn portrait of McKinley, which must of necessity make even those who disagree with his policy see in him the simple and profoundly religious man that he was. There is a picture of his strenuous efforts to avert the war with Spain, and also a convincing account of his final capitulation to the Yellow Press. Especially interesting at this time is Roosevelt's assertion that "the blood of the murdered men of the Maine calls not for indemnity, but for a full measure of atonement, which can only come by driving the Spaniard from the New World." And again, "McKinley has no more backbone than a chocolate éclair." Dr. Rhodes shows, as has been well illustrated in the letters of General Woodruff, our Ambassador to Spain, that the war was really unnecessary. "One may wonder," says Dr. Rhodes, "if Roosevelt, Lodge and Hay took fully into account the Spanish habit of procrastination." "McKinley feared a rupture in his own party, and on account of that fear had not the nerve and power to resist the pressure for war."

The account of the war which follows, and Roosevelt's part in it, the battle of Santiago and Dewey's famous exploit in Manila Bay, are fascinatingly told, and an interesting comment is made on the change in Europe's judgment of America that was induced by the winning of these battles. "Such," says Dr. Rhodes, "is the judgment of the civilized world. Our work toward the elevation of humanity, toward the greater diffusion of education, are counted as nought in contrast to these naval victories." There follows a most interesting record of the settlement of the Philippine question, and the horrible guerilla warfare with Aguinaldo. Dr. Rhodes describes McKinley's genuine hesitation as to the policy to adopt toward the Philippines when he quotes from his address to a Methodist conference. "I walked the floor of the White House night after night until midnight; and I am not ashamed to tell you, gentlemen, that I went down on my knees and prayed Almighty God for light and guidance more than one night." Although McKinley "accepted" the islands as the result of a religious conviction, Dr. Rhodes seems to be convinced that the taking of the Philippines was in reality "forcible annexation," because it violated the spirit if not the letter of the Monroe Doctrine.

In speaking of the Boxer uprising of 1900 in China Dr. Rhodes says that "while this feeling against foreigners as such was undoubtedly the main cause of the Boxer uprising, it was mixed with antagonism toward Christian missionaries who were trying to convert the Chinese to an alien religion. Material conditions likewise fostered the movement."

The record of Roosevelt's becoming President on the assassination of McKinley introduces the tremendous business development of the United States in the work of Morgan, Carnegie, Vanderbilt and John D. Rockefeller. The history of the development of oil in this country is particularly illuminating as regards the present situation both in the United States and in the Near East. Dr. Rhodes is evidently an admirer of General Wood in his administration of Cuba, and of Secretary Taft in the Philippines. He calls attention to the fact that on the authority of Archibald C. Coolidge "the idea may at once be dismissed that the United States made any money out of the Philippines." In describing Roosevelt's administration Dr. Rhodes finds a most congenial task, for he is evidently a great admirer of him. Particularly interesting is his presentation of the vigorous personality of Roosevelt, which is very well illustrated with quotations from his private letters in J. B. Bishop's book, and from State papers as well. In one place he makes the statement that "it is the opinion of some very well informed persons that had Roosevelt been President, the Great War would not have occurred during his occupancy of the White House." In view of Roosevelt's vehemently expressed attitude at the beginning of the war this sounds dubious to say the least. The account of the building of the Panama Canal and the voyage of the battle fleet around the world make most interesting reading. Particularly well does Dr. Rhodes illustrate the extraordinary effect that these and similar events of the period had in bringing America out as a "world power" in the opinion of European countries. The final chapters give further personal impressions of Roosevelt and his theories, much of which is especially valuable because of the fact of the author's personal relationship with him. The last sentence in the book is a quotation from Rudyard Kipling, who wrote in 1910 concerning Roosevelt: "I saw him for a hectic half hour in London and a little at Oxford. Take care of him. He is scarce and valuable." The book is well illustrated with a number of fine pictures of the important men and makes altogether a volume well worth studying by any one who is trying to apply religion honestly to the whole of our national life. It is strange that a few small but obvious imperfections should mar a work of this character, as, for example, the sentence at the top of page 100; another near the foot of page 311; and on page 335, where we are informed that a certain man was yet to write his "magnus (sic) opus."

BETWEEN THE LINES IN ASIA MINOR

By MARY CAROLINE HOLMES. Fleming H. Revell Company. 224 pp. $1.50.

Somehow or other, Miss Holmes has won the reputation of being somewhat pro-Turkish, but in the story of her experience in charge of the orphanage at Urfa, from 1919 to 1921, she refers to many an outrage committed by the Turks. Though she is eminently fair to them, there is, nonetheless, no getting away from the dreadful wrongs that they have perpetrated on the non-Turkish populations.

When the British were about to turn over Urfa to the French, the Mufti of Urfa caused to be read in all the mosques of his city a proclamation calling down dire curses on anyone who should interfere with the "Director of the Society for Good Works" or any of the Americans, or who should try to hinder their work. The book throws interesting sidelights on the Turks' faith in force. The Mutesurriif, that is the Governor, of Urfa, when the Nationalists attacked the French wrote to Miss Holmes, "If French occupation is really the decision of the Peace Conference, these troops can go and come back with a great force and with cannons and machine guns, all of which will solve the problem." When the Turks were deceived by the French running a long train to a neighboring town with pipes showing from the cars to simulate machine guns, they showed themselves very friendly to the Americans, offering to give them safe conduct to any place to which they wanted to go and sending to Miss Holmes telegrams and papers which had been held back for weeks. When they knew that they had the Americans in their power, the story was a different one.

Miss Holmes tells a romantic tale of the Chief of the African Senussi. When he came to Urfa, the trade guilds lined up along the road with their banners and sacrificed sheep as he passed by. The authorities gave him one of the finest houses in town, richly furnished. The few visitors who were admitted there, approached him walking on their knees. But for all the honor showed him, the Arabs and the Kurds generally held aloof from him. Miss Holmes believes that the Turks are really trying to break out a new way. She makes no prophecy as to whether they will succeed or not.

Theology

THE RETURN OF CHRIST

By CHARLES R. ERDMAN. George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.

This little volume is an endeavor by the Professor of Practical Theology at Princeton Seminary to restore reality to the New Testament doctrine of the return of Christ and to make peace between the several warring schools. There seem to be two attitudes in the present day: first, that of those who are entirely pre-occupied with the return of Christ, and second, those who are entirely oblivious to any meaning which the doctrine may have. Professor Erdman begins by speaking of the meaning of that doctrine itself, and insists that "the central elements are such as should bind believers into a closer union;" and again very beautifully says that "the ultimate proof of a true understanding of the doctrine will be found always, not in confident assertions of superior knowledge, nor in dogmatic statements of belief, but in beauty of character and in a growing likeness to Christ."

In speaking of this return Professor Erdman uses rather loosely the words "literal," and "visible" and "bodily." He mentions the undue emphasis on what he calls "social service" to the neglect of what he calls "the preaching of the gospel;" but it does not clearly appear how in actual life these two things are to be distinguished. As one would expect of Professor Erdman, he writes all that he says in a most kindly spirit and with an obvious faith that at bottom the differences among men are not permanent or real. But it is also equally apparent in the reading of this book that owing to his attitude toward the Bible, he is much concerned and at times troubled to reconcile the various conflicting statements there found. "In any case the order of events which are related to the return of our Lord is so imperfectly defined in the New Testament that those who expect his coming should now allow dissensions or divisions to arise because of divergent views as to the time when believers are to be caught up in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air."

One of the most curious charges which he brings against the post-millennialists in his criticism of the various positions taken by men in regard to Christ's return, is his statement, "To such empty dreams may be traced much unpreparedness in time of war, much radical socialism in time of peace, and constant endeavors to save society aside from the transformation of individual souls."

It is perhaps too much to expect of any of us to be always consistent. Certainly one of the great roots of difference of opinion in regard to the return of the Lord is as between those who take a "literal" view, and those who take a "spiritual" view. Professor Erdman's comment on the closing chapter of 2 Peter is an illustration of this when he says, "What he [Peter] predicts is not an end of the globe, but a moral transformation of the world."

The conclusion of the matter seems to be that we should be in an attitude of expectancy, realizing that "of that day and hour knoweth no man," but believing that the purpose of God is the establishment of the Kingdom, and thus to avoid both "idle watching" and "hopeless toil." "Working and watching are not the same, but true watchfulness will always issue in wise and devoted Christian service."

THE APOSTLE PAUL AND THE MODERN WORLD

By FRANCIS GREENLEAF PEABODY. The Macmillan Company, New York. $2.50.

THE LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

It is needless to say that those who are familiar with Professor Peabody's previous books, "Jesus Christ and the Social Question" and "Jesus Christ and the Christian Character"—and they are many—will turn to this examination of the teaching of Paul in its relation to some of the religious problems of modern life, with eagerness. Dr. Peabody grants, right at the beginning, that many may feel that there is no excuse for another book on Paul. (There are two thousand on the library shelves of Harvard University he tells us.) But there is an excuse for his book. Most of these two thousand books deal with Paul as the creator of a theology. "Augustinianism and Calvinism, creeds of predestination and election, doctrinal confessions and sacramental practises, have been, for the most part, modifications or applications of what is known as Paulinism." Paul, the man, Paul, the gifted writer and seer, Paul, the interpreter of Jesus Christ, Paul, the original theologian, Paul the preacher of the gospel, Paul, the reformer and moralist, has been somewhat lost in the maze of all the systems that have arisen from him and about him. Professor Peabody sets aside pretty much of all these things and proceeds to study Paul himself, his character and his permanent, enduring, timeless message, the message unconditioned by varying and passing phases of theological thought. The result is a fresh, original and even unique study of the great theologian and prophets, and one of really great worth. It has been evidently a labor of years as well as love and is a valuable contribution to Christianity.

CHRISTIAN WAYS OF SALVATION

By GEORGE W. RICHARDS, D.D., LL.D. The Macmillan Company, New York. $2.50.

"It is my purpose . . . to present a point of view and an attitude toward the fundamental facts of the Christian revelation, the experience of Christians, and the results of historical and scientific scholarship, according to which one may be soundly evangelical without reverting to a static, intolerant dogmatism, or falling into a destructive and equally intolerant radicalism." This purpose is well fulfilled in these lectures by the scholarly and indefatigable professor of Church history in the Reformed Church Seminary in Lancaster, Pa. The idea of salvation is formative in every religion, because in one of its various forms it is the goal of all religions. The book begins with an historical review of various conceptions of salvation in which Professor Richards limits himself to "ideas of salvation only of the primitive stages of religion and of the more highly developed religious or philosophies of the Hindus and the Greeks." Here he treats of the Vedanta, Buddha, Homer and Hesiod, the Orphic cult, and Plato. The next section of the book gives a careful review of the way of Jesus, the Apostles' way, the Ancient Catholic way, the Orthodox Catholic way, the Roman Catholic way, the Lutheran way and the Reformed way, and finally the Humanists' way, where he discusses the bold issue as to whether salvation is a work of God or man. The last section of the book records the author's conclusions in answer to the questions: "Do we still need salvation? Have we perhaps outgrown it? If not, how are we to be saved now? What is the relation of the present experience of salvation to the traditional doctrine, and what has this relation to do with the union of churches?" He portrays the increasing modern need of "men's getting away from themselves," and describes the three ideals of life which run the gamut of human experience, the barbarian, the Greek, and the Christian. He argues ably that "The essence of evangelical Christianity, therefore, is a spiritual experience of God in Christ, who satisfies the permanent threefold need of the human soul by revealing a God of love who provides, a god of grace who forgives, and a God of truth who guides." Underneath all minor differences among the churches he finds that "two redemptive factors are held in common, though under different forms, by all the churches—Jesus, and the community of believers." The final chapter on "A Credible Creed" presents the tentative confession of faith submitted to the General Assembly of the United Free Church of Scotland, May, 1921, and which was there commended "to the interest and study of the members of the Church." The author's analysis of this document is most interesting and his last word in the book is a fine and sane statement for the Church to-day: "It is our conviction that the way to closer fellowship requires more than a loyal adherence to past institutions; it needs a constructive interpretation 'of the great Christian certainties and of the Christian ideal of human life,' such as is attempted in this brief statement of the Church's faith."

HE OPENED UNTO US THE SCRIPTURES

By Professor BENJAMIN W. BACON. The Macmillan Company, New York. $1.

Professor Bacon has written in this book one of the most valuable and timely treatises we have yet read upon the Bible. No pastor charged with the honest shepherding of people in this noisy age can afford to omit reading this book. With tremendous weight of scholarship behind it, it is yet written simply and with real fervor. The essential justice of the author appears in his equal condemnation of those who take the Bible as "magic oracles independent of local and temporal environment" and those who demand the right to interpret all doctrines to suit themselves. As a cure for these excesses he calls for careful and honest historical study.

If any one thinks that the use of the Bible for teaching purposes is natural to the untrained mind, let him read the first two chapters of this book: "Primitive Ideas of Divine Revelation" and "How Christian Writers Conceive of their Own Inspiration." There is a fine historical presentation of the use of Scripture by Jesus and Paul. "Whether Jesus speaks of 'the signs of the times' or the working of God in nature, or in penitent human hearts melted in believing gratitude, the difference between him and the scribes in their interpretation of Scripture is that for them there is a great gulf between the God of whom they read and the God who lives and moves around them, while to Jesus there was none. He makes actuality the interpreter of the past."

The final chapter, "The Witness of the Spirit," is without doubt one of the most valuable contributions to the present need for clear thinking on the Bible to be found anywhere to-day. "The Church has not yet fully formulated its Christian doctrine of sacred Scripture because the issue has not as yet been squarely joined. Great principles of the faith lie latent until their time is fully come. But there are indications that in our day that time has come." "The New Testament supplies not the finished product but the ferment out of which must come the next great secular development of religion, the advance from letter to spirit, from the use of the records and documents of religious experience in the past as if conformity to their standards guaranteed eternal life, to a use of them as means of contact with the life of God in man." We cannot have enough of such thought and writing. If every Sunday-school teacher could read and meditate on this book it would mean more for religious progress than any single reform we know of.

THE RESURRECTION OF THE BODY

By W. W. WHITE. George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.

Dr. White has written a most interesting little book with several flashes of his poetic and prophetic spirit. He bears a fine witness to the vital character of faith in the resurrection of Jesus, but in so far as his book is a polemic against Harnack and other modernists he fails lamentably to present a case. His thesis is that "the body of the resurrection is nothing other than God's volitional repetition of the body of the grave—with splendid additions." He insists that the "Easter faith" depends on the "Easter message," but he de-finds neither one. "If Jesus is not alive according to the Easter message, of what special value to us is the faith that he is alive?" So far it is simple; but now comes the special pleading: "Surely according to the Scriptures the body of Jesus came out of those grave wrappings in a supernatural manner." What Dr. White has to say on the evidence of the Gospels and the Epistles to the fact of the resurrection of Jesus, is incontrovertible; but when he proceeds to give a detailed account of the precise nature of the event on the basis of the fragmentary and even inconsistent records of the Gospels, he launches out into the realm of private interpretation—no matter how often he says "facts." Dr. White declares himself "as fully and heartily in sympathy with all scientific investigation and advance of knowledge," and sagaciously adds, "Of some of the new knowledge we are not by any means sure. We are compelled sometimes to substitute for the words 'Every scholar knows,' these more conservative ones, 'Some scholars think.'" How then can he say so flatly: "It is thus seen that the modernist boldly rejects the documentary evidence (for the bodily resurrection). We frankly accept it, not blindly, but with fairly complete knowledge of the situation." After all, Christian faith is not only acceptance of the historic facts, but the translation of them into life to-day.

Miscellaneous

CLASSICS OF THE SOUL'S QUEST

By R. E. WELSH, M.A., D.D. George H. Doran Company, New York. $2.

Dr. Welsh is the Professor of Apologetics and Church History in the Presbyterian College, McGill University, Montreal, and he is also one of the most profound students of the world's great literature. He has been in the habit of gathering a group of earnest young men about him at McGill University and studying with them the great classics of spiritual experience. The talks he gave met with such appreciation that he was led to write this book. It is a very beautiful and enriching piece of writing—one every preacher ought to read, one every student of the deeper meaning of literature will thoroughly enjoy. The great classics whose spiritual endeavor and whose message he has sought to fathom and give us here are St. Augustine, Dante, Tauler, the "Theologica Germanica," Thomas à Kempis, Bunyan, Law, Wesley, Bachman, Tolstoy, Marcus Aurelius in Walter Pater's "Marius the Epicurean," Tagore, Omar Khayam, Pascal, Amiel, Madam Guyon, Newmans' "Apologia Pro Vita Sua." It is a rare book of interpretation. The reviewer is grateful for it.

THE GREAT DREAM

By MARGUERITE WILKINSON. The Macmillan Company, New York. $1.50.

This volume takes its title from the first poem, which is a vision of the transformation of Manhattan. The poem does not seem to be as clear and meaningful as others, but it is a fine illustration of the beautiful use of language and of poetic form. In the reflective and religious lyrics the author does her best work, and among these there are many which are well worth reading. In our opinion, "My Soul Makes Her Prayer" is one of the best of all the poems because of the very strong feeling which obviously permeates the verses. The author is a great lover of Nature, and in a way a sort of pantheist, as all good poets are:

"Then to the world outside the door
I would be less—I would be more—

Through the dumb passion of the throng,
Let me be song, and only song,
A voice to sound through life again
For love and sun, for death and rain!
And through my song may my soul be Scattered upon eternity
In atoms like the body's dust,
Vanishing silverly, as must
Light bird-notes, only vaguely heard,
So that we ask, "Was that a bird?"
And let the scattered spirit wake
Again, again, for life's dear sake,
In chemistry far more divine,
In souls more excellent than mine."

Another verse of great beauty is "Shelter":

"I had reared a roof for shelter from the sky;
The strong light of Heaven broke through from on high

I had shut my door to keep quiet and warm;
The strong word of Heaven came in like a storm.

I had built me walls and thought that all was well;
The strong wind of Heaven blew on them and they fell.

Blessed are the shelterless unto whom are given
The strong light, the strong word, the strong wind of Heaven."

Now and again Miss Wilkinson writes lines that are distinctly memorable. In the poem entitled "In the Berkshire Hills" she speaks of the strong emotion aroused by standing on some mountain height and looking over great stretches of landscape.

"And all of us are silent. Who would speak
When he has found more than he came to seek?

"We pause, and catch our breath, and gaze again,
And wonder whether we are gods, or men
Who share a swift redemption of delight
In the dear revelation of height to height."

In the poem "On Plover Hill" she makes a most delicate description of the sudden return of the spirit from a mood "rapt from earth away" to the appreciation of life in this world.

This is not great poetry, but it is simple and true and fresh and written in melodious forms.

FIVE-MINUTE SERMONS IN STORIES

By HENRY T. SELL, D.D. Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. $1.25.

Dr. Sell believes that in preaching to children the proper method of procedure is to tell a story, brief and to the point, and then to make practical applications from the story. In this volume he has gathered together sixty-four sermons on many different themes. As is to be expected, there is considerable variety both in their practical value and in the manner of their telling. There is a sort of tacit community ownership of stories for children, so that some of the stories which appear in this book can also be met with elsewhere. A number of them are very well told and are full of valuable suggestions to those who are following the difficult duty of preaching regularly to boys and girls. This is especially true of "The Steel Bar and Bottle Cork," "Saying and Not Doing," "Wings of Imagination" and "Use Your Eyes." For the most part Dr. Sell has practised his moralizing on the basis of his story with that due restraint which is the essence of strength. But occasionally he seems to take a wild flight of fancy, as in "A Swarm of Bees and Honey," which seems to me about as loose and irrational as it could well be. Again, Dr. Sell uses for the most part language and thoughts which are quite within the reach of boys and girls, but sometimes he speaks in terms which would be very difficult for any one except an adult to appreciate, as, for example, in "The Gold Doorknocker." Ever since the days of the early Church Fathers allegory has been for the careless preacher a source of disaster. The reviewer would like to recommend this book to those who are studying the question of preaching to boys and girls, especially because of the fact that it emphasizes the natural teaching qualities of the stories used. It is also a pleasure to find a book of children's stories that exceeds the curious limitation to fifty-two ("one fr every Sunday in the year"), which is so often considered the correct amount in books of sermons for children.

THE EVOLUTION OF THE COUNTRY COMMUNITY

By WARREN H. WILSON. The Pilgrim Press, Boston, Massachusetts. $2.25.

The revision of Dr. Wilson's "The Evolution of the Country Community," ten years after its first appearance is a real event. The book is longer by one-eighth than the first edition, but this increase does not represent simply new material. The entire work has been rewritten. Chapter headings have been changed. Some new chapters have been added, old ones have been expanded. The volume opens with an analysis of types of American rural life from the days of the manor and the pioneer to the coming days of the husbandman. The effect of the breaking up of household farming and of the period of exploitation and speculation in land values is interpreted with great insight and with many a suggestive phrase that throws light on the problems with which the rural community worker is grappling to-day. The author recognizes that rural people are played upon by many forces, but chiefly geographical, episodic or historical, industrial and economic in the sense of the economic wants of individuals. The play and inter-play of these forces upon different types of peoples and communities is sketched with vigor and ability. Here again there is much of suggestion that will help the worker, especially one new to his community, in understanding its make-up and psychology.

Dr. Wilson has modified but little his initial definition of the rural community as measurable by the team haul to and from a given center. He feels that the economic facts which have determined community boundaries are not so conclusive as to social life because there has never been any actual study of the village as such. He believes that the community is limited by its organization for recreation, that, as a rural community, it is composed of the farmers and villagers whose lives center in the town and the business and trade areas which extend out among the farms for a radius of from five to ten miles. This community, the church and social agencies can reach best by reaching the more marginal people. That institution which is successful in attaching tenants and farm hands will also find owners among its constituency. The way to successful ministry, then, lies in an understanding of the life of the marginal man which is social rather than literary. The weakness of Protestantism, Dr. Wilson says, is in its stubborn insistence "upon a literary interpretation of God and upon a Biblical ministry, while the population around these Protestant churches exemplifies the diminished value of literature for spiritual uses." This sentence also gives an insight into the fearless way in which the author criticizes and suggests. Dr. Wilson is no follower of current rural sociological thought. He is its critic and to a large extent its creator. For a decade rural church leaders have been following in his steps and his mature conclusions restated at the end of this time in this thoroughly revised book once again leave those who work in rural fields deeply in his debt. This observation applies particularly to the closing chapters of the volume which deal with the influence upon communities of health, economic conditions, economic co-operation, schools, recreation and morals, and common worship. Through these last chapters especially are sprinkled scores of practical suggestions for the worker who is interested in accomplishing definite objectives in his local community. With all the theory and philosophy it does contain in many a brilliant paragraph, the author's feet never leave the earth and his eyes constantly regard the commonplace work of the day. It is easy to believe that this book will be as much a standard for the decade ahead as the first edition was for the decade which has closed.

COUNTRY CHURCH DEPARTMENT

A Community of Contrasts—II.

By Marjorie Patten

And the cloakroom under the staircase must not be forgotten. Remember the old-time church socials when everybody went home in somebody else's rubbers and two-thirds of the folks lost their hats? Nothing of this kind can happen at the Methodist Episcopal community church at Cimarron. "It has a life-sized checkroom."

Upstairs, from the upper hall, you enter the main auditorium, with its simple artistic decoration, its adequate-for-every-occasion stage flanked on either side by dressing rooms. Did you every try to get make-up off after a performance in the church hall and hunt in vain for water? In these dressing rooms there is running water. The stage has a dark blue velvet front drop and the hangings at the windows are of the same material and blend beautifully with the fawn brown walls. The moving picture screen is suspended from the ceiling and on Sunday it is pulled back and in its place is the pulpit. Along the south side of the auditorium there are separate classrooms enough for every class. The moving picture machine is not in a room jutting out into the auditorium, as is the case in so many community buildings, but is built in back of the auditorium and is entered from the hall by a little flight of stairs.

The church land is valued at $1,000, the church at $20,000 and the parsonage at $4,500. The main auditorium seats 200 people and as many as 275 have been present at some of the services. The building is heated by a furnace and owns its own electric light plant.

Good moving pictures are shown every Saturday night in the new community hall and crowds attend them—cowboys, Mexicans, whole families, ranchmen, business men, bankers, children, housewives and all sorts and conditions of Cimarron's population. The money received from the shows more than pays for the running expense of the organization.

There is as yet no public library, but there is soon to be a reading room at the church.

Mr. Traveller has been fortunate, for the leaders of every walk of life in Cimarron have given him 100 per cent. support in carrying forward his work. The church treasurer is a trained auditor and has as fine a set of church books as any business concern. All money for denominational assessment and for missions and benevolence is raised by subscriptions received in monthly payments. An every-member canvass is held annually according to approved standard. Eighty per cent. of the total subscriptions are from people who are members of one church or another, but who are not members of this church. Over $13,000 was raised last year, $9,151 for the new building.

An annual grant of $500 Home Mission aid is received to be used toward pastor's expenses. The average per capita contribution to this church is far above that of the average rural organization, $70.24. During the last eight years support and financial response have increased 200 per cent. and more money has been raised in the last four years than in any ten years before for church work.

The actual membership of thirty-nine represents twenty-seven different households, of which number twenty-one families live within a mile from the church. Two live over five miles away and four live from two to five miles from the church.

"There is to be no morning preaching service to-day—everyone will be off in the canyon this beautiful morning. We'll have Sunday-school and evening service as usual." This from Mr. Traveller on a fine July Sabbath. And as a result what happened? There was a big Sunday-school attendance and an evening attendance of over two hundred. Mr. Traveller believes "in letting folks worship in the mountains if they choose rather than forcing them to come to service wishing every minute they were away." As a usual thing, however, there are four Sunday morning and four Sunday evening preaching services a month, with an average attendance of sixty and 125 respectively. The program changes to suit conditions, however, and if the night is hot free moving pictures are advertised. These are really illustrated Bible lectures or stories dealing with religious subjects, like "Modern Samaritans," but a good many are present who might not be moved to attend if no pictures were to be shown. Old familiar songs are sung. The unique thing about these evening services is that a whole section of seats is often occupied by interested Mexicans, who are always welcomed at services. It is thus that this cowboy preacher seeks to reach every soul in Cimarron.

Thirty families of individuals may be counted on for regular service attendance. Seventy-five per cent. of the attendance is made up of non-church members.

No evangelistic services are held in the community church. Mr. Traveller believes more in personal work, since there are people of so many denominations in this parish. Hand-picked members I'm after; I don't believe in shaking the tree," he will tell you. He is primarily a preacher, and he says, "If a man can't preach, he's done for as far as building up a church is concerned."

Ninety per cent. of the Protestant children of Cimarron are in the Sunday-school. The total enrollment is eighty-four and the average attendance sixty-two. Six Mexican children are enrolled in the primary classes.

There are no special organizations in this church excepting the Ladies' Aid. Mr. Traveller is depending on one big community organization, working as a unit with everyone, old and young, included in its program, rather than dividing the work among various age and sex groups. The lack of organizations does not mean a lack of activities. When the Sunday-school has a picnic all are invited. When the men give a turkey dinner, all are invited. If the young people's classes give a social, all Cimarron is invited. The unit plan in church, Sunday-school and social program has worked most successfully in every instance.

There is no definite program in this church. Things happen according to circumstances and the needs of the people. Civic improvement is a very important phase of the work.

Clean-up day was started by the church and resulted in a red-letter day for Cimarron. Plays, athletic competitions, picnics and socials all have their place on the program. Last year it backed a Chautauqua and a professional company was imported to play Ibsen's "Ghosts." Musical, dramatic and literary entertainments are always sure to bring crowded houses. National holidays and local anniversaries are duly observed.

There are five definitely organized committees in charge of the business of the community church, and the best thing of all is that there are people on these committees that fit. Besides the house committee there is a moving picture program committee, a finance committee, Sunday-school board, and the official church board.

From a page of the preacher's diary something of the kind of life he lives may be understood:

"Up in good season. Fed the horses. Had a bite for breakfast. Boy came along and wanted me to tack a shoe on his horse so he could go over the hill fishing. Was just finishing when a party came and wanted me to go down the river and conduct a funeral service for an old gentleman who had died suddenly. Hustled into my other clothes and went with them. Prepared the body for burial and shaved the corpse. After a simple service at the house we went to the little burying ground up on the side of the mountain and laid him in his final resting place. Back home a little after noon. At two o'clock a machine came to take me to the mill. A young fellow had been seriously injured by falling off a cliff and needed someone to dress his wounds. Such a looking human being I had never seen—scratched and torn and bleeding. It took me the best part of the afternoon to get him cleaned up. Had just returned home when a man came from the saw mill and wanted me to extract a splinter from his finger. Did the job for him. Had a bite of supper and then went over to the school house and preached to a fine congregation."

This tireless individual is ever on the go—always doing something for someone. After a long Sunday, with services morning and evening and two long trips in the afternoon, he offered to go way off across the prairie with food and bedding to the cowboys when he learned that they had somehow missed the chuck wagon and had been fighting prairie fire all day without food or rest. "It's no wonder the cowboys love him," said one of the men. "He never fails any of us."

Mr. Traveller is a picturesque typical western personality. He is Irish and jolly and free and serious and absolutely consecrated to his work. He fits in everywhere you find him. If you saw him bending over a cook fire in the mountains with a slice of bacon sizzling on the end of his fork you would say, "Is this a pastor—indeed?" And on Sunday, if you heard him preach or went with him to tea in one of those homes where he is always welcome, you would say, "Can this be a cow-puncher—indeed?"

He has traveled much and lectured in many States and is a friend of bishops and leaders everywhere. The responsibility of everyone's welfare he shoulders, and if anyone is in trouble he's right there. If a cowboy friend takes ill he is brought to the parsonage. Mr. Traveller is an excellent physician—a sure cure for bodily, mental and spiritual ills. It was a great day for Cimarron when the Travellers traveled to the Antlers Parish.

It looks as if this church had lassoed its entire parish. It has not been an easy task to minister to this scattered population to get results without over-organizing the church, to train young people of all denominations for future work, to fit the work to the needs of this community so full of contrasts. But the pastor and his people are imbued with the spirit of their great open country. In Mr. Traveller's words, "They have been willing to stay with the proposition long enough to accomplish results."

John, the Baptist

LUKE 3:3-8; 7:24-28.

"Blessed be the Lord, the God of Israel; for He hath visited and wrought redemption for His people."—Luke 1:68.

THE law of contrasts operates both to heighten and to lessen the greatness of John the Baptist. Inevitably, he is compared with Jesus, and as in the case of Peter, John and Paul, something of the supernal greatness of Jesus is reflected back upon his Forerunner. But as Jesus succeeded John in time the radiance of His person so outshone the words and works of John that they are at times obscured. Even when we grasp the historical relation of Jesus to John we are too likely to think of him simply in the light of an advance agent who may be a necessary part of an important enterprise, but who himself is not particularly interesting.

Apart, however, from Jesus and studied solely in the light of what he accomplished John is one of the colossal figures of the ancient world. We have in print only a fragment or two of his sermons. He left no extended letters bearing his name as did Peter, John and Paul. No last words are recorded as spoken in the gloomy dungeon of Machærus as the executioner entered his cell to fulfil a degenerate king-let's command prompted by the vindictive spirit of a dissolute woman. John's most prominent disciples became merged with those of Jesus. John had no epitaph other than that glowing sentence of Jesus', "Among them that are born of women there hath not arisen a greater than John the Baptist."

But though he stood historically on the other side of Jesus and flashed meteor-like in and out of Jewish history, John was a man of might. To draw into the wilderness from busy, noisy Jerusalem the populace to such an extent that Matthew declared that Jerusalem and all Judea sought him was in itself a notable achievement. To be able to pierce the hearts of Pharisees and Sadducees, soldiers and publicans, and the common people is further evidence of his prophetic power. To induce them to undergo what was practically the new rite of baptism accompanied by the confession of their sins was another proof of his dominance. To establish his disciples in the habit of frequent fasting meant that strict oversight which only an acknowledged religious leader is able to exercise. To look guilty Herod in the face and say, "It is not lawful for thee to have thy brother's wife," required supreme courage. To leave behind him such a reputation that after his summary execution the possibility of his still being alive haunted Herod, still further enhances our sense of John's greatness.

His place, indeed, is secure and pre-eminent, with the possible exception of Elijah, in the long line of uncommon, rugged, forceful personalities that have towered above the rank and file of their fellow-men—men of iron and blood and fire who have known how to use the hammer and the sword. Men corresponding to John have emerged from time to time throughout the centuries. In religious circles were such as Peter the Hermit, Luther, Whitefield, Moody, Booth: in political life, Cromwell, Gordon of Khartum, Roosevelt.

For the source of John's greatness we go first of all to his ancestry. To have had Zacharias for his father and Elizabeth for his mother, ripened saints who had walked blameless all their long lives in the commandments and ordinances of the Lord, was an inheritance which any Jew might have coveted. Blood tells and unto the third and fourth generation, in some form or other, is felt the touch of ancestors upon their posterity. "In the man whose childhood has known caresses," says George Eliot, "there lives a fiber of memory that can be touched to gentle issues." John grew up in an atmosphere of prayer and faith, becoming familiar from childhood with the great traditions and hopes of the Israelitish people, and saturated with the thought of their being set apart from all the peoples of the world for God's special uses.

In the pleasant hill country of Judea the boy grew to manhood. The changing seasons, the shadows on hilltop and valley, the free life of the country, away from the din of populous centers, must have made its due impression upon John. Trained to draw from nature what it has to give to responsive spirits, he was all the more susceptible, when the time came for him to take up his official work, to the influence of a new environment—the gloomy, rocky deserts of Judea between Kedron and the Dead Sea. In those solitudes he nourished the religion of his fathers already burning in his own heart. He grew to be a son of the wilderness, becoming more and more of an anchorite and ascetic outwardly and inwardly.

This carries us to the third and most important source of his power, namely, the consciousness of his mission. It was so vivid that when at last he began to preach, his words flamed forth as a consuming fire. Searching though they were, he had no lack for hearers. Soon the people, who knew that for four dreary centuries there had been no Elijah or Hosea or Micah, believed that here was another Elijah similar to him in outward demeanor and in the character of his message.

John had the power that always arises from the consciousness of being sent by some one higher for some particular errand. "I have a plough on my hands," Joseph Neesima, a founder of the Christian movement in Japan, used to say, "and I cannot leave it." Negatively, this consciousness made John aware of what he was not, so that he could promptly tell the committee from Jerusalem, that came down to see what all the hubbub was about, that he was neither Elijah nor Messiah, but just himself, the Voice calling out to anyone who would hear that he get right with God through repentance, confession and baptism. No one can crave a greater boon than to know what he is not meant to do in the world, to learn with Emerson, "that imitation is suicide," to keep out of the trap that ensnares unwary persons when they attempt slavishly to copy some outstanding person instead of finding out that God would have them develop their own individuality and do their own work.

Along with this clear-cut conception on John's part of his particular mission was the equally strong consciousness that

One was coming who would take up and complete his work. Thus we reach the point where we must think of John not as a solitary preacher of repentance and righteousness, but in the historic sequence in which he stands, coming "to bear witness of the light." That was the crowning source of his strength, the reason why he could speak so clearly, boldly and scathingly. He knew that the One was already at hand for whom his people for centuries had been waiting. He knew that it was time for him to begin to decrease, that while he was only a witness, Jesus was the Lamb of God who could do something for sinful men that they could not themselves accomplish simply by repentance and by submission to an outward rite.

We have now to register a limitation in John's equipment. As the dreary days of confinement in the fortress, to which Herod committed him, went on a moment came when he could no longer wait for the confirmation of the kingdom whose coming he had proclaimed. So some of his faithful disciples were deputed to carry to Jesus John's misgivings in the form of a direct question. Jesus meets the inquiry by pointing to the effects of his ministry upon the blind, the lame, lepers, the deaf, the poor and the dead. The message taken back to the lonely, troubled man languishing in prison, must have revived his faith and brightened the short period that remained before he went up the shining path of martyrdom.

One other limitation on John's greatness we must impose. Jesus himself pointed it out. That was John's necessary non-participation in the new era which began with Jesus himself. "Fortunate," says Jesus in substance, "is the person who has entered to any degree into the scope and sweep of my teachings and spirit." These are difficult words to interpret unless we see in Christ and the impulses and motives which he set at work in many hearts something

The SPEAKER'S BIBLE

Edited by the REV. JAMES HASTINGS, D.D.

Editor of THE EXPOSITORY TIMES, THE DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE, THE ENCYCLOPAEDIA OF RELIGION AND ETHICS, THE GREAT TEXTS OF THE BIBLE and other Works.

This is THE PREACHER'S CHANCE to secure A MAGAZINE FOR PREACHERS

edited by ONE OF THE GREATEST PREACHERS and certainly THE GREATEST BIBLICAL EXPOSITOR OF THE AGE.

This Magazine is issued in Monthly Numbers of 96 pages, 192 columns, or 76,800 words, at 50 cents per month (postage included). The recent reduction in Home postage enables the Publishers to give six-monthly and yearly subscribers the following terms: six months $2.75; one year $5.50. The Monthly Issue may be had only direct from THE SPEAKER'S BIBLE OFFICE, ABERDEEN, SCOTLAND. Binding cases are supplied for 50 cents (postage included). Orders should be accompanied by payment preferably in foreign money orders. U. S. stamps are of no value.

The Numbers issued up to date are four completing the Epistle to the Hebrews, and four dealing with St. Luke's Gospel.

Here is what some of our Subscribers, Preachers themselves, say about the Magazine.

"THE SPEAKER'S BIBLE needs no words of praise—it is unique."

"This book is a treasure."

"It is 'The Book' for Ministers."

"It is not only the best Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews I have ever come across, but it contains a veritable mine of wisdom."

"I am always glad to receive the new parts for they are so suggestive, and the promise of the first parts is being splendidly fulfilled."

"I find THE SPEAKER'S BIBLE most suggestive and stimulating. It is a perfect boon to ministers placed as I am far from theological resources."

"I am impressed with the equality of the material. I believe the same will be of no little value in throwing light on the text of the Bible, besides being a mine of inexhaustible suggestion for the building of sermons."

"It is the best thing of its kind I have met with—most suggestive and helpful to the busy pastor."

Dr. McClure, President of the McCo-mick Seminary, Chicago, writes in the Book-list for Alumni, published by that Seminary: "The numbers that I have seen of 'THE SPEAKER'S BIBLE' are to my mind the most suggestive and helpful material bearing upon lessons from the Hebrews that I have ever seen. I am positive that if I were a pastor to-day I should secure 'THE SPEAKER'S BIBLE,' 'The Epistle to the Hebrews.'" which while connected historically and logically with the old order, was so much finer and deeper as to be a totally new order of things. As Jesus saw God and man and the way in which God's children should carry themselves toward him and toward one another there was place for repentance and confession and baptism. But those rites marked only the beginning of a new era. It was not to be characterized by strong-arm methods—the axe laid at the root of the trees, the winnowing fan, and the consuming fire—but by the constant play of those gentle but mighty forces that love begets—reason, kindness, patience, forbearance, meekness, self-sacrifice. These fruits of the Christian spirit were at the same time to be foundation-stones of the new order.

John went as far as he could. He spoke the word needed for the hour. He lived the life that could best reinforce his message. But in due time, as Dr. William J. Dawson says, "The true bent of Christ's nature asserted itself and the pressure of John's example ceased to be effective. To tread the dusty pathways of the commonplace in the lofty spirit of duty; to seek comradeship with ordinary men and women; to be free, familiar, kind in social intercourse; to accept life as in itself good and capable of being better; to live as a man with men, this was to help the world after a fashion much superior to John's."

Well would it be for us and the world if as children of the larger light and of the new day we follow the path marked out for us with something of the same persistence and fidelity which John, the last of the prophets of Israel, "the man sent from God," exhibited at the dawn of Christianity

GETTING RESULTS FROM CHURCH ADVERTISING

By Rev. P. B. Hill, D.D.,

Pastor First Presbyterian Church, San Antonio, Texas.

The business end of the church is not different from the business end of any other organization. If other organizations can sell through proper advertising it stands to reason that the church, with what it has to offer to the world, can likewise obtain results. The church has lost no little in the past by its failure to properly present its appeal to the public through the press and through the media of advertising. The church has more to offer the human race than any other organization on earth, and it is a fearful loss to the organization and to the world not to publish the glad tidings.

I have always believed in the church advertising in every legitimate way, and wherever I have seen this tried it has been characterized by good results. My church has a contract for space each week in the morning and one of the evening papers, and is also using other methods of publicity.

There are two things to be considered in the matter of getting results from church advertising.

I. The results to be expected. These are, generally speaking, five.

1. Increased attendance upon the services. This may not come in one grand rush, but it would be unfortunate were the increase to come that way.

2. Increased gifts. Where a church has entered in a real way into an advertising program, the offerings have invariably increased. The business-like aspect of such advertising naturally prompts men to give to such a church in a business-like way.

3. Increased enthusiasm.

4. A general interest in religion and in the church. Apart from the direct results accruing to the individual church that is advertising there is a reaction on the rest of the churches of every faith and order. The man or woman who is inspired by an ad to become a Christian, to unite with the church or to lead a better life will often go to the minister of the church or faith of his or her parents or friends.

5. There are also intangible results such as the inspiration that goes out to all sections of the country through the ads in the newspapers. Other churches are aroused to use practical methods, and individuals are challenged to think of the things for which the church stands.

II. Four things must be kept in mind if you would get results from advertising.

1. The truth. Robert Burns says in one of his poems:

"Even ministers ha'e been kenned in holy rapture
A rousing whid to vend and nail it wi' Scripture."

If truth is essential to advertising in general it is peculiarly so to the church.

2. The character of the advertisement. There is a dignity that should characterize all ads, and this reacts with telling force upon the people you are hoping to reach. The form of the ad should be studied with care if it is to make an impression. The type to be used should be carefully considered, and crowding, over-wording and misplaced emphasis should be avoided in newspaper ads. In other forms of advertising poor printing, unattractive covers and too lengthy presentation should be avoided. This phase of advertising takes time and thought, but it surely repays every effort.

3. The place of the ad is important. Do not put your display ad on the church page. Only the ripe saints read that. Get it on the editorial page or on the sport page or wherever the people you want to interest are accustomed to read.

4. The kind of advertising. Each church must discover what form of advertising is best adapted to its needs. I use the "direct by mail method" with good results. The newspaper display ad is also effective. Blotters, attractive folders, free lithographed postcards of the church and the billboards as well as other methods are open. Our church contemplates the use of the billboard, special paper and other forms of advertising in the fall.

Wonderful things are in store for the church that has a vital spiritual message for the age and that makes this fact known to the public by every form of legitimate advertising.

DR. FOSDICK'S RESIGNATION NOT ACCEPTED

As a result of the vote taken at the Presbyterian General Assembly regarding the preaching in the First Presbyterian Church of New York on May 23rd, Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick offered his resignation as stated preacher for the church. Dr. Fosdick said in his letter that he had no personal reason for giving up the position, but that he was willing to withdraw if thereby the welfare of the church might be promoted. The session of the church, however, chose not to accept the resignation. The correspondence follows. Dr. Fosdick's letter of resignation to Mr. Henry N. Tift, the clerk of session, read thus:

I hereby hand you my resignation as stated preacher at the First Presbyterian Church. The action of the General Assembly in Indianapolis is such as to present a perplexing problem which centers around my preaching. I am very desirous that I shall never in any way be an obstacle to the best interests of the church. Those interests are paramount, and to protect them I wish you to have my resignation in your hands so that the session may act upon it at any time, severing my relations with the church.

Let me add, for the just expression of my position, that personally I have no reason to desire the severance of these relations. I am strongly bound by ties of warm affection to the ministers, officers and members of the church; I have rejoiced in my opportunities of service among you; I have deeply appreciated the friendship and support which I have received on every side, and I believe profoundly in the future of your growing work.

My sole reason in presenting this resignation is the welfare of the church. I wish my relations with you handled solely with that in view, and at any time when it will ease your perplexity or conduce to the better solution of your problem I wish you freely and without hesitation to accept this resignation.

With fraternal good-will, and affectionate wishes for the work of Christ among you, I am sincerely yours,

HARRY EMERSON FOSDICK.

The reply of the session was as follows:

The session of the First Prebyterian Church has received your letter dated May 24 in which you tender your resignation as one of its ministers. They appreciate profoundly the unselfish motive which prompts your action, but are confident that they express the mind of the congregation when they decline to release you.

Four years and a half ago, relying upon the unanimous vote of the General Assembly declaring their profound conviction that the time has come for the organic union of evangelical churches of America, you consented to enter with us upon an unusual experiment. We desired to prove whether in a far downtown church it is possible for several ministers, chosen without regard to denominational lines, to work together harmoniously and effectively. Your only stipulation was that your compensation for service should be no more than the equivalent of what you had been receiving for your ministry-at-large. The arrangement was immediately reported to the Presbytery of New York and received its unanimous endorsement.

With great ardor you threw yourself into the effort to unite in a gracious fellowship three Presbyterian churches diverse in tradition and with varying shades of theological opinion. This venture has been attended with signal tokens of divine approval. The lines of demarcation between the constituent bodies have disappeared, and the united church, with no impairment of its loyalty to the great communion to which it historically belongs, has girded itself for the task of making Christ known and loved in the midst of a crowded and heterogeneous population.

We gratefully acknowledge that your ministry has expanded our own vision and kindled in our own hearts a warmer desire to advance the kingdom of our Divine Redeemer and "to keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace."

We rejoice greatly that a multitude of educated youth, bewildered in their thinking and estranged from the house of God, have been recalled by your message and restored to the fellowship of Christ and His Church.

We deeply regret that certain of your utterances, divorced from their context and misinterpreted, have provoked the fears and protests of not a few who have lacked the opportunity to know the fulness and the winsomeness of the gospel which you proclaim. We confidently believe that sincere critics will in due time be convinced of your full acceptance of the evangelical faith.

We need not assure you that your expressions of personal affection are heartily reciprocated. You have a large place in our hearts, and we devoutly pray that your ministry among us may be continued with increasing power and more abundant fruitage.

THE ROCKEFELLER FOUNDATION DURING 1922

During the year 1922 the Rockefeller Foundation, among other activities, endowed chairs of medicine and of surgery in Hongkong University; pledged $1,125,000 toward new buildings for the College of Medicine of the State University of Iowa; contributed to the current maintenance of two medical schools in Canada; completed the buildings, strengthened the faculty and wholly financed the Peking Union Medical College; agreed to appropriate $300,000 toward laboratories and pre-medical teaching in two Chinese institutions and in one missionary university in Peking; helped nineteen hospitals in China to increase their efficiency in the care of patients and in the further training of doctors and nurses; made a survey of medical schools in Austria, Czechoslovakia, Germany, Hungary, Poland and Switzerland, and studies of English and Scotch methods of clinical teaching; pledged $2,000,000 toward the site, building and equipment of a school of hygiene in London; shared in malaria control in thirty-four country-wide and thirty-two town demonstrations in ten Southern States and continued field studies and surveys in the United States, Porto Rico, Nicaragua, Brazil, Palestine, Australia and the Philippines; co-operated with the Mexican and other governments in steadily restricting the prevalence of yellow fever; resurveyed centers of hookworm infection in four Southern States and carried on control work in twenty-one foreign governmental areas; took part in promoting full-time health service in 163 counties in eighteen States of the United States and in several counties in Brazil; agreed to support for five years the disease reporting service and for three years the international exchange of health personnel program of the Health Section of the League of Nations; provided fellowships in public health, medicine, nursing, chemistry and physics to 237 advanced students from twenty-three countries.

THE FEDERAL COUNCIL APPEAL FOR THE WORLD COURT

Church leaders are organizing their forces to support President Harding and Secretary of State Hughes in their effort to have the United States enter the Permanent Court of International Justice. They believe participation by the United States will mark a great step towards an eventual "warless world," which is their ideal and which they believe will be brought about step by step. As a first move in the fight the Federal Council of Churches is sending a call to church organizations and to congregations throughout the country urging educational work along these lines as a step towards permanent peace. As many of the denominations through their official bodies have urged the entrance of this country into the Court, and as the Federal Council of Churches in May, 1922, petitioned President Harding and Secretary of State Hughes to open the way for the United States to enter the Court, the line-up of the churches for the Court has no partisan political significance. With the Federal Council of Churches are affiliated thirty communions, with an adult membership of more than twenty million persons.

THE MOVIE COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC RELATIONS

The Committee on Public Relations, co-operating with the Motion Picture Producers and Distributors of America, Inc., Mr. Will H. Hays, president, invites church organizations to use the committee in any way that occurs to them in their desire to increase the value of the motion picture. The Committee on Public Relations had its beginning on June 22 of last year, when representatives of various civic, religious, educational and welfare organizations met at Mr. Hays' invitation to discuss the problems of the motion picture industry and to suggest ways and means of bringing about a better situation concerning it. In September last the committee began to function. During the short space of its existence eleven meetings of the committee have been held, and there have been hundreds of informal conferences with representatives of the various organizations. It is made up of leading members of some sixty-odd national, civic, religious, educational and welfare organizations for the purpose of giving counsel to the motion picture industry in its declared proposal to "attain and maintain the highest possible moral and artistic standards in production and increase the general usefulness of motion pictures. The committee is able to do this by acting as a channel of communication between the public and the industry, bringing to the attention of the industry the constructive and adverse criticism of the public as represented on the committee, and in turn advising the public of the problems involved in bringing about the results desired. In this flow of comments many suggestions are received which are readily accepted by the industry and other suggestions are having a wholesome effect upon future productions. The committee's address is 522 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

THIRTY-TWO YEARS AFTER POPE LEO'S ENCYCLICAL ON LABOR

The thirty-second anniversary of Pope Leo's Encyclical on the Condition of Labor, finds the elements of the labor problem unchanged and the solution which Pope Leo laid down for the labor problem still waiting to be applied. Some improvements during the past generation have been registered and in some matters affairs are worse, but in all the fundamental parts of the labor problem conditions remain the same. The United States still engrosses itself in searching for ways to patch up the more serious evils while delaying a real settlement. The solution proposed by Pope Leo centers in the practise of religion and the injection of Christian morals into industrial life. Rev. John A. Ryan, D.D., Professor of Moral Theology in the Catholic University and Director of the Social Action Department of the National Catholic Welfare Council, summarizes the specific teaching of the encyclical under four heads, wages, labor organization, the government and industry, and the diffusion of property. Quoting Pope Leo's statement that while free contract should decide wages, "there is a dictate of nature more imperious than any bargain between man and man." Dr. Ryan goes on to state that Pope Leo affirmed the fundamental justice of the family living wage. He adds that this is only the minimum of justice and Pope Leo did not bring up the question of complete justice in wages. Pope Leo strongly defended the right to form labor unions. Dr. Ryan quotes him as follows: "We may lay it down as a general and lasting law, that working men's associations should be so organized and governed as to furnish the best and most suitable means for attaining what is aimed at, that is to say, for helping each individual member to better his condition to the utmost in body, mind and property." Dr. Ryan goes on to say that Pope Leo's frequent commendation of joint associations of employers and employees indicates approbation of "joint conferences for the establishment of trade agreements, shop committees, workers' councils, and other arrangements for increasing the control of labor over employment conditions and industrial operations." Repeating the Pope's statement that "whenever the general interest or any particular class suffers or is threatened with injury which can in no other way be met or prevented, it is the duty of the public authority to intervene." Dr. Ryan points out that no more comprehensive authorization of State intervention could be reasonably desired. In closing Dr. Ryan refers to Pope Leo's advocacy of private ownership and says that "to represent this as merely a condemnation of socialism, as merely concerned with the institution of ownership and not with its distribution, is highly misleading." Dr. Ryan goes on to say that the whole argument of the Pope on this question "manifests a strong appreciation of the benefits which private property brings to the individual workingman."

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

CHURCH GROWTH IN CHICAGO

An increase of 40,394 members of the Protestant churches in Chicago as the result of an evangelistic campaign is announced by Walter H. Mee, secretary of the Chicago Church Federation. The Commission of Evangelism, of which Rev. C. K. Carpenter, D.D., pastor of Ravenswood Methodist Episcopal Church, is chairman, at the beginning of the evangelistic drive six months ago, set the goal at 40,000. Last year the goal was set at 30,000 and the increase was 37,000. This year the goal was 40,000 and the increase 40,394. The Lutherans, with 175 churches reporting to the Chicago Church Federation, had the largest increase, which was approximately 10,000. The Methodist Episcopal churches, which number 217, report an increase of 9,099; the Presbyterian churches, numbering 105, report an increase of 5,880; ninety-eight Protestant Episcopal churches report an increase of 2,955; 110 Congregational churches report an increase of 2,720; the Evangelical Synod of North America, with thirty-six churches, reports 2,007; ninety Baptist churches report 2,000; the Disciples of Christ, with twenty-three churches, report 1,000 increase. Thirty-five churches without denominational affiliations report 1,830 increase. The Swedish Mission churches in Chicago report 1,500 increase. Practically one thousand Protestant churches have reported to the commission and the total increase 40,394 does not include the conversions and increase of the Salvation Army and other missions which are Protestant. "There has been a remarkable spiritual revival in the churches under the auspices of the Chicago Church Federation which accounts for this extraordinary increase," says Rev. C. K. Carpenter, chairman of the Commission on Evangelism.

THE STEEL MEN AND THE TWELVE-HOUR DAY

The steel interests have decided again to keep the twelve-hour day by adopting a committee report presented by Judge Elbert H. Gary of the United States Steel Corporation. The reasons advanced are that the employees prefer to work twelve hours a day at their present hourly wage rate; that there are not enough men in the country to manufacture the steel demanded on an eight-hour day basis, and that the twelve-hour day keeps prices of steel at least fifteen per cent. below what they would be under the eight-hour day. In its report the committee declared that they have investigated the question and are convinced that the twelve-hour day has not of itself injured any employee physically, mentally or morally. They question whether or not the men who work eight hours a day spend more time with their families than the twelve-hour men. But in addition the committee says there is an economic conflict between the employees and the consuming public, and that the investors in the steel companies stand as arbitrators in this conflict to deal fairly by both sides. In this case the investors represented by Judge Gary and his committee, have decided that the eight-hour day will cut production and raise prices. This will harm the public, and since the employees, they say, are not harmed by the twelve-hour day and do not want the eight-hour day, the committee easily reached a decision. But against these arguments stand the following contentions. We present these as they have been outlined by the Department of Social Action of the National Catholic Welfare Council: 1. If the steel workers want a twelve-hour day, they are different from other men. 2. If they are not hurt "physically, mentally or morally" by such long hours, they are different from other men. 3. They showed during the steel strike that although unable to get it they want an eight-hour day. 4. If they prefer the longer hours at the present wage rate, they would not want it if their hourly wages were enough to give them and their families a living wage on an eight-hour basis. 5. If there are not enough men now to produce the present output of steel on an eight-hour basis, this condition is temporary, did not exist a year ago, and will not exist when the present boom passes. 6. If wages were good in the steel industry, the men needed for the eight-hour basis could be easily drawn to the steel mills from the country as a whole even during the present boom. 7. An independent committee consisting of economists and engineers has decided against the twelve-hour day. 8. If the price of steel should increase fifteen per cent. by reason of the eight-hour day, it should be adopted anyway, because of the serious harm the twelve-hour day does to employees. 9. Prices need not go up fifteen per cent. Steel investors could reduce their own dividends and the steel companies their surplus. 10. Prices might not go up fifteen per cent. because of the greater efficiency of men on an eight-hour basis. 11. Prices might not go up fifteen per cent. if the iron and steel industry at the same time that it introduced the eight-hour day placed itself at a high rate of efficiency. This judgment is reached from investigations by a committee of engineers in six other large industries, all of which were found to be on an inefficient basis and most of the inefficiency due to the management.

THE UNITED PROTEST ON THE TWELVE-HOUR DAY

Protestants, Roman Catholics and Jews joined forces last week in rebuking the committee of the American Iron and Steel Institute which recently reported unfavorably on the proposed elimination of the twelve-hour day in the steel industry. The report of the committee was made through its chairman, Elbert H. Gary, at a meeting of the institute in New York on May 25th and was adopted by the institute. The statement issued is put forth in the name of the Commission on the Church and Social Service of the Federal Council of Churches, the Social Action Department of the National Catholic Welfare Council, and the Social Justice Commission of the Central Conference of American Rabbis. In round figures, these groups represent fifty million members. The statement declares that the report of the Iron and Steel Institute "shatters public confidence" and advances an "unworthy and untenable argument." The churches pronounce the twelve-hour day régime "morally indefensible" and demand that it shall cease. The full statement follows:

"The report of the Committee on Proposed Total Elimination of the twelve-hour day appointed by the American Iron and Steel Institute shatters the public confidence that was inspired by the creation of the committee a year ago at the request of the President of the United States. It is a definite rejection of the proposal for the abolition of the long day. The public demand in response to which the committee was appointed is set aside as a 'sentiment' which was 'not created or endorsed by the workmen themselves.' The testimony of competent investigators, including eminent societies, is ignored, and the conclusion is put forth without supporting data that the twelve-hour day 'has not of itself been an injury to the employees, physically, mentally or morally.' This statement is made in face of the fact that the committee of stockholders of the United States Steel Corporation, appointed in 1912 to investigate this matter, expressed the opinion 'that a twelve-hour day of labor, followed continuously by any group of men for any considerable number of years, means a decreasing of the efficiency and lessening of the vigor and virility of such men.' Objection to the long day because of its effect on the family life of the twelve-hour workers is disposed of in the report with the complacent comment that it is questionable whether men who work shorter hours actually spend their leisure time at home. This is an unworthy and untenable argument which will be bitterly resented by the millions of home-loving workmen in America. The Steel Institute's committee contends that the workmen themselves prefer the long hours. Undoubtedly there are those who will voluntarily work long hours to their own hurt, but the committee's contention is chiefly significant as showing that workmen whose only choice is between abnormally long hours of labor and earnings that are insufficient to maintain a family on a level of health and decency, naturally adopt the more arduous alternative. The plea that a shortage of labor makes impracticable the change from two to three shifts of workmen affords but a meager defense. The shortage of labor was not the reason for the failure to abolish the long day two years ago when the public waited expectantly for such a salutary step on the part of the United States Steel Corporation. At that time there was appalling unemployment which could have been in large measure relieved in steel manufacturing districts by introducing the three-shift system in the steel industry. The task may be more difficult now than it would have been then, but a past delinquency affords no release from a present moral obligation. The Steel Institute's committee finds that the entire cost of a change to the eight-hour day would have to be paid by the consumers of steel, disregarding the possibility of some proportionate contribution out of the earnings of the industry. Thus the safeguarding of profits becomes a consideration superior to that of the wages and hours of the workers, and the willingness of the public to pay higher prices is made a condition of the accomplishment of a fundamental reform. The Steel Institute's committee finds that there are 'questions of high importance' involved in this whole matter which they assert have no moral or social features. 'They are economic,' say the steel manufacturers; 'they affect the pecuniary interest of the great public, which includes but is not confined to employers and employees.' This divorce between the 'moral' or 'social' elements of a problem and its economic aspects runs counter to the teaching of religion. It exalts a misconceived 'law of supply and demand' to a position of equal authority with the law of justice. It excuses inhumanities in the name of economic necessity. Furthermore, it overlooks an important series of demonstrations within the steel industry and elsewhere of the practicability and superior advantages of the three-shift system. These demonstrations confirm in practice what no honest mind can question in principle—that bad morals can never be economics. The one redeeming feature of the committee's report is the intimation that it is not final. The public has waited long for the fulfillment of a virtual promise from the industry that the twelve-hour day would be abandoned. The public expects the initiative to be taken by the United States Steel Corporation. It is a task that presents admitted difficulties, but none that a powerful corporation which has accumulated an enormous surplus should find insurmountable. The forces of organized religion in America are now warranted in declaring that this morally indefensible régime of the twelve-hour day must come to an end. A further report is due from the Iron and Steel Institute—a report of a very different tenor."

William H. Anderson, of the New York Anti-Saloon League, charges that there are bankers to-day who are lending money to finance bootleg operations, just as there were bankers who gambled on warehouse receipts for whiskey after prohibition was a certainty. They belong to the stripe that is trying to kill off the Anti-Saloon League because, unless they can bring to naught the effort of the people to compel the Government to be responsive to their moral convictions, these wealthy purchasers of politicians of both parties will find they have come to the end of their political overlordship. "The kind of men who will pay bootleggers $150 a case for whiskey, running the risk of damning the souls of their children as well as corrupting them into outlaws," we quote Mr. Anderson, "would make a scrap of paper of the Constitution of the United States, a failure of self-government, and a mockery of the moral leadership of the churches"—if they could.

The Silk Show of New York seems rather far from missions. It was hard to see any connection between them and the powder bedaubed and berouged young clothes racks who displayed the latest novelties in silk. But the Canton Christian College was shrewd enough to use the Silk Show to make its own work in behalf of Chinese silk better known. The college's agricultural department is leading in the working out of better methods in the care of the eggs in the selection of the moths, and in mulberry cultivation. The college has just printed a bulletin on sericulture in South China. The pamphlet is of general interest. It can be secured from the office of the trustees, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

but every people does that also. That is the experience of all mankind.

There are now before us three lands of promise. The first of these is the land of sobriety, the land freed from the awful curse of drink, the land in which mothers do not sob themselves to sleep because their son is going down into a drunkard's grave—the land in which wives do not tremble when they hear their husband's footfall on the stair, not knowing whether they will receive another beating—the land in which children never go to bed hungry because their father has spent his wages on drink—the land in which the community is not terrorized by frenzied men who have put an enemy into their mouth to steal away their brains—the land in which society is not blasted by an institution which is the rendezvous of harlots and thugs and scurvy politicians—the land in which industry is not crippled by wage-earners failing to report on Monday morning because they have not recovered from their Sunday debauch—the land in which jails and asylums and almshouses are not crowded with the human wreckage piled up by the demon of drink. That is a beautiful land, and every Moses has carried it in his eye. That is a land which God has promised, and toward that land humanity is moving. It was William E. Gladstone who years ago said in the House of Commons that the ravages of drink were equal to the combined ravages of famine and pestilence and war. Men of vision have long looked toward the land of promise. A few years ago our people set their faces in that direction. They put an amendment into the Constitution prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors to be used as a beverage. The promised land seemed near. Jubilant souls cried, "Now we are going in!" The Volstead Act was passed. "Now we are sure to go in!" The Mullan-Gage law was passed. "We are going in at once!" So did many think. But, alas, we are not in. We are still in the desert. We are likely to be there forty years. The land of promise is near, but we cannot go in. We have not enough character to take possession of this promised land.

We have the disposition and mental habits of slaves. It is not enough to pass laws. We must enforce them. The character of a nation is not revealed in the laws it writes. That character is revealed in the laws it enforces. It is in the enforcement of the law that moral character receives its severest test. And we are a nation of lawbreakers. What laws do we ever enforce, except in a desultory and procrastinating and lukewarm manner? We do not enforce them because we have not manhood enough. We allow them to be broken because our character is weak. Why do we not go into the promised land? Because we have so little moral stamina. See the men falling here and there, everywhere, going to pieces because their character is rotten. That is the rotten spot in our American character. If our Republic goes down, it will go down because we are rotten at that point. We have scant reverence for law, and we have not moral character enough to enforce the laws which we pass. In the presence of the lawbreakers we act like so many grasshoppers.

A second land of promise is a warless world. "They shall beat their swords into ploughshares and their spears into pruning-hooks, and nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." That is the promise. Moses has carried that beautiful land for centuries in his eye. The world in which there are no battleships, no

Three Lands of Promise

ONE of the best known stories in the world is that of the Israelites and the Promised Land. They had been slaves in Egypt and they had been delivered and were on the journey to the promised land, a land flowing with milk and honey. But God kept them outside this land of promise wandering in the wilderness for forty years. Here we find ourselves face to face with a strange contradiction. God had promised the Israelites to give them this land, yet He kept them wandering in the wilderness forty years. If one asks why they could not go in, the answer is that they were not the kind of men who would take possession of a promised land or hold it even if they should get it. They had the disposition and the mental habits of slaves. They were easily discouraged. An obstacle made their hearts faint. They had religion, but it was not a power in their lives. They had no capacity for engaging in co-operative effort. They were not fit for anything better than the wilderness. The Israelites did not go into the land flowing with milk and honey because they were lacking in character. It was their character which kept them out. Being what they were, there was no place for them but the wilderness, and there they lived and died.

What gives this Hebrew story perennial significance is that it is a picture of human experience constantly repeated. Not only did Israel wander forty years in the wilderness, submarines, no target practice on the water, no bayonet drill upon the land. Think of a world without a bayonet, and without poison gas, and without an airplane putting a blot on heaven by its antics in mastering the art of dropping bombs upon sleeping cities. All men of vision see that world. They catch the gleam of its glittering spires, they feel the uplift of its joy and peace and singing. A world in which munition-makers do not grow fat at the expense of the toiling millions, a world in which humanity is not terrorized by poisoned gossip and lying rumors of wars that are about to come, a world in which nations do not groan under budgets created by the lords of war while all the establishments of peace are handicapped and crippled because the resources of the people are squandered on the instruments of blood. That land is not far away, but humanity does not enter in. Why? Because we are slaves to old traditions, older than the times of Ramesses II. We are the victims of old suspicions and ancient hatreds, older than the oldest of the Pharaohs. We wander in the wilderness because we are not men of religious faith. We have a religion, but it is largely a religion of ritual. We go through religious forms, but we do not believe in God. We do not believe in love. Our religion is not a moving, all-conquering power in our lives. Like the ancient Israelites, we have the name of God and the decalogue, but the law of God is not written in our hearts, and therefore we are cowards in the presence of the giants who are determined that the policy of preparedness shall be continued everlastingly, and that nations shall keep on practising the art of war. In the presence of the old ideals and customs we feel ourselves grasshoppers, and that is why we must stay forty years in the region of sand and rock where the serpents hiss and the wild beasts roam.

The third promised land is a united world. God has made of one all the nations to live together. Humanity is on the way to an organized international life, a life so complete and beautiful that it lies before the imagination like a city with walls that flash like jewels. All the kings of the world are going to bring their wealth into this city. All the kingdoms are going to become the Kingdom of the King of Love. Every knee is going to bow to Him and every tongue is going to confess that He is Master. That is the promised land. Toward that land mankind is marching, but as yet we are in the wilderness. We cannot enter in. Two thousand years ago Paul declared that the whole creation was groaning and travailing in pain waiting for the appearance of a nobler type of men. What is the world groaning for to-day? The emergence of a higher type of men. We are timorous and fumbling creatures. We are afraid of Anak and his blustering sons. We shrink from going on ahead and taking part in the organization of the life of the world. There must be a League of Nations, a society, a federation, a family of nations, and this must be the creation of the human brain and heart. In this great work America should have a foremost place. How can we ever do our work so long as we persist in acting like children? Some people despise the idea of a League of Nations, because it was, as they think, Mr. Wilson's idea. They call it a Democratic idea, and for Democratic ideas they have no place in all their thought. They do not know that Mr. Taft had the idea before Mr. Wilson had it. Many Democrats despised the idea in the earlier years because it was a Republican idea. It is not a Democratic idea, nor is it a Republican idea; it is an American idea, and every American ought to be loyal to it. The idea of leaguening nations is the brightest idea we have ever given to the world. The work of leaguening nations is the one work of supreme significance which God has permitted us to perform. We began this work in the eighteenth century. We leagued thirteen nations. It was a difficult thing to do it, but we did it. There were many giants to oppose, but thank God they all were conquered. Our forefathers were not grasshoppers. They had no fear of giants. We forget sometimes that Europe is only a little larger than the United States, and that our States are as large as nations. Now if we can league Maine and Oregon, Massachusetts and California, Rhode Island and Idaho, why cannot nations be leagued separated by three thousand miles of water? Why cannot Great Britain and the United States be leagued, the United States and France and Italy and all the other nations of Europe, all the other nations of the world? Why cannot we have a federation of nations all of which are bound to submit their disputes to the arbitrament of a World Court? The world cannot get on without a League of Nations. There must be a league, and we must be in it. Let us put away our childishness and cease to indulge in mutual recriminations. No matter whose fault it was that we are not in the present League, let us see to it that we go in—if not into the present League, at least into some other league which shall take the place of the League in its present form. Let us put an end to the present tragedy of lagging behind with Turkey and Mexico when we ought to be in the forefront of those who are engaged in organizing the life of the world. In a crucial hour when the whole world expected our help we have held aloof to our everlasting disgrace!

But the world will be leagued. All these men who oppose a leagued world, and who whimper about the giants, are only for a day. They will die in the wilderness. They are not fit for a land of promise. Our only hope is in the cemetery. If men did not die, humanity could make no progress. Thank God then for death. The cowards and slaves are buried in the wilderness, but the Calebs and Joshuas press on. They go in. We are on the way to the land of promise. Our generation will die in the wilderness, but other men—nobler and stronger—will come after us, and to them God will fulfil His promise.

God's Way in the Sanctuary and in the Sea

ONE of the psalmists declared that God's way was in the sanctuary, and there he knew Him to be great above all gods. The same writer declared that God's way was in the sea, and there His footsteps were not known. We take the sea to represent the world of circumstance, human history, the complex story of this world's life. To trace the ways of God there is a baffling task. We take the sanctuary to mean the sphere of the inner life where there is a scale of values, where you know there is always a difference between right and wrong, and know which you ought to choose. In that sanctuary the way of God is clear. When we have found God in the sanctuary we declare He has a way in the sea, and a path in the great waters of the world's life, even when His footsteps are not known, i.e., not known in particulars.

E D I T O R I A L

When we look into human history for a revelation of the will and purpose of God we must remember that events are not purely the outcome of the Divine will. The interpretation of history as revelation is full of pitfalls. This was one of the central doctrines of Judaism, and of Hebrew religion before it. But who can read his Old Testament today and be satisfied with the way in which the Jews interpreted providence? When John Milton set out to write "Paradise Lost" he prayed that the Great Spirit who had sat brooding over the vast primeval abyss and brought the world to birth would illumine what was dark in him, and raise and support what was low, so that he might rise to the height of his great argument, and assert eternal providence and justify the ways of God to man. Does any modern student of "Paradise Lost" feel that the task was accomplished to his satisfaction, and that he can grasp the validity of the argument throughout? There are so many things at work in history besides the will of God—the wills of men, and their passions and their ambitions. Jews in the olden time believed that God meant to put them at the head of the nations of the world. Some Germans in recent time believed the same of their people. There have been Britishers, too, who have argued about the Empire in the same way, maintaining that its whole history shows that the Divine will is that it should take the greater part of the world under its wing—for the world's good, of course! This is always a dangerous doctrine. What do the Germans who once believed it think of it now? It would be equally dangerous for the Allies to attribute their success to the will of God. We are no more inclined to attribute to God the way in which the war ended than the way in which it began. For one thing is certain, the victory came to men who were not morally and spiritually prepared to make the right use of it.

Some would see Divine justice in the overthrow of pre-war despots. But then what about the new despots who have been put in power? And what about the good men who have been overtaken with calamity, and the little children, many of whom have died and many others who have been incapacitated for life as the result of the wicked war and the unjust peace? If we begin to interpret what befalls men and nations as a revelation of the will of God, it is hopeless to get any satisfactory theology out of it. Somebody said it was evident that God had intervened in the battle of Mons to save the British. Somebody else immediately asked, "Why did He not intervene at Gallipoli?" If parents tell me that their boy came through the war unhurt because they prayed constantly and earnestly to God for his safety, and are sure now that his safety is an answer to prayer, we think about the thousands of other parents who prayed just as earnestly and just as constantly but whose boys were killed. The attempt to theologize events is always a precarious business. The external fate of good men is often in the hands of wicked men—a Pilate can deliver up a Jesus to be crucified. A man may kill a child or maim it for life. A few men can hurl nations into war. A child is born in a slum, with all the physical and moral handicap that that means, whereas by the will of God there would have been no slum at all. So far as particular events are concerned, it is safer for us to say regarding history, "Thy way is in the sea, and Thy path in the great waters, and Thy footsteps are not known," the way is not known in exactness, not known in particulars. In large broad outlines, there is no doubt that the history of creation and the history of mankind do give indication of what Tennyson calls "The drift of the Maker." Creation is upward from lower to higher forms, and it is a fair inference that the Creator's mind is toward upward things. Human history is a much more difficult subject. There are not a few among our leading thinkers who even deny the reality of human progress. They have used the horrors of the recent war to support their argument. We believe it is a false argument. It would be quite safe to say that only a very small proportion of the men who have to do the horrible things done in war could be described as bloodthirsty or savage, even temporarily. The immense majority of them hated the whole business, and all through it large numbers of them kept their eye on the possibility of a better world. The intellectual and moral progress of humanity is a fact. And in that fact one may read the purpose of God. The subject has immense difficulties. The way of God in history is a way in the sea, and a path in the deep waters where the footsteps cannot be traced. Indeed, we are not likely to believe that He has a way there at all until we can first of all say, "Thy way God is in the sanctuary." When we have found Him in the sanctuary we shall believe that He has a way even in the sea of obscure history which we do not understand, and a path in the deep waters which we cannot fathom. It is in the soul of man that the primal and sure revelation of God is to be found. When we know ourselves we cannot doubt Him. By the very structure of the soul life is presented to us with a moral alternative, and there is a moral obligation attaching to the right and the higher. This is our surest clue to the nature of God; He who made us so must be righteous. His will is that we should be. The fact that there is in the mind a scale of values makes every attempt to explain man by physical or biological theories inadequate. The attempt has been made to explain the moral sense by saying that it is the register of the experience of the race, but this theory breaks down on the fact that the best men have often made their choice when they knew that the line they would take would bring pain and trouble and hardship. It will be said that such men would have more pleasure in bearing pain and hardship and trouble through being true to their convictions than they could possibly have by setting those convictions aside and taking pleasant courses. But the point is that they took their choice on the course because they felt it right, not because it would give them satisfaction and pleasure. To do the right because it was right whatever they might have to suffer was the line they took. Here the theory of racial experience of pain and pleasure does not work. We are up against a divine endowment of the human soul, something in its very nature that reveals the purpose and the will of God. If we obey this will it does not follow that we shall do what is best, but we shall do what we sincerely think is best. Man's knowledge of what is right is a growing thing, but his sense of obligation that the right must be done is a constant factor. If God is our Maker, He is the source of this persistent emphasis on righteousness. None of us can doubt that love is better than hate, and this is a revelation in the soul that the nature of God is love. Whatever may be the outward fortune of the man who obeys this inward demand, there can be no doubt about his inward fortune. The outward fortune will be affected by many factors—he may suffer much from the sins of other men, or he may be overtaken in some natural calamity from storm or fire, but in his inward character the way of God is clear enough, where obedience to the sense of right always pro-notes the true growth and strength of the soul, and where the cherishing of love issues in the enrichment of life. The man who lives from love as a main motive, whatever his outward fortunes may be, never doubts the superiority of the love-life. And he holds the assurance in himself that the supreme power in the universe is love. The way of God is well marked in the sanctuary.

In general history we may not be able to trace the particular footsteps, though we may discern the direction of the path. The greatest sufferers may not be the greatest sinners, and there may be little difference between the happenings to saints and sinners, but in the large outcome there is no question that selfishness and wrong create disorder and ruin, where unselfishness and love make a paradise. So far the way of God may be discerned in the sea, and the path found in the deep waters.

Two Interesting Testimonials

[This page is devoted to a weekly letter recording the significant events and movements of the day from the Christian point of view.]

It is very seldom that two such interesting and significant testimonials occur in one day as two given in New York last Thursday, the 31st of May. One was given by the Commission on International Justice and Good-will of the Federal Council of Churches to the President of the League of Nations and the other by the Clergy Club of New York City to Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick. Both luncheons were in the nature of testimonials of admiration and affection to two really great men, men who have rendered most conspicuous service to humanity.

President Edwards is a very interesting personality. His ancestors on his father's side were English who settled in Chile many years ago and amassed large wealth. His mother was a descendant of one of the fine old native families, so he has both British and Spanish blood in his veins. The President of the League of Nations has devoted his life to the service of his country and for several years has been Minister to the Court of St. James from Chile. Last year he was elected President of the League of Nations Assembly and is spending a few days in New York on his way to Geneva. Many functions have been arranged for him, but inasmuch as the League of Nations is the great endeavor to apply the Christian principle to international relationships, it seemed fitting that the Federal Council of Churches should be the first to welcome him. A large company was present to greet him and listened with intense interest to one of the most lucid addresses heard in New York for a long time. President Edwards speaks English, Spanish and French equally well, and it is seldom that one hears the English tongue spoken so perfectly as when Señor Edwards uses it.

In addressing the welcoming group he said that perhaps an American could speak more frankly to Americans than could a European, for surely no one could even imagine South America having any selfish interest in placing the excellencies of the League before the people of the United States. He then dwelt for some time on the fact that one of the chief objections to the League which he had heard in America was an utter illusion, namely, that it meant a super-state. No sign of it in these three years of the League's existence had appeared. No one in the League ever gave it a thought. The League acts only upon request, and there had been no instance yet where the League has taken a step to interfere in politics or with relations of neighboring states. There were, on the other hand, many instances in which the League had settled great questions upon request of the nations. These requests would come oftener and oftener, and that would become the great function of the League. Another thing that should be said was that the humanitarian work of the League was one of its most outstanding functions. It has also brought together all the experts of the world on every social and humanitarian question and amassed a lot of most valuable knowledge. Then, too, in judging the value of the League, one should recall all the things that could not have been done had the League not been in existence. For instance, Austria could not have been helped in the way it has been without the League. It would have been impossible to have raised a cent for Austria unless the reforms had been carried out which the League undertook to superintend and direct. Any group of nations acting in Austria would have been under suspicion, but all acting together none can be suspected. The World Court is another instance of what the League could do. It did in three years what the unorganized nations have been trying to do for half a century.

But it was the League as an experiment in co-operation that President Edwards stressed most. It was inviting the nations of the world to test a new method and as they tried this new method more and more it would become a habit. I would like to quote the passage in which Señor Edwards emphasized this point, calling especial attention to the words where he summed up the real work of the League: "We are trying to educate the world to the idea of co-operation." The passage is as follows:

"There is no lack of burning political questions—in fact, we all know that Europe is at this moment tortured by innumerable problems—yet the League of Nations has not attempted, and does not attempt, to interfere with them unless it is asked to do so. Well, some people may say that this is a sign of weakness or impotence. I believe that is a very superficial way of looking at it, because really what happens is that all those who belong to the League have the consciousness of the necessity of preserving this newly created instrument for the work of international co-operation, which is its prime and essential object. The League cannot run the risk of blunting this kind instrument which it cost so much sacrifice to create, and, as I think I have said already, the League is more a state of mind than an organized body. Until the principles for which the League stands are instilled into the minds of the people of the whole world, it must be content with promoting international co-operation following the lines of least resistance. We are trying to educate the world to the idea of co-operation; we are giving the world an opportunity to try, to test his new method, this new system, in all the questions of international interest, and in this work of preparation, which at the bottom is a great revolution, a conception of international intercourse. As you all know, we hope that all the nations of the world will by and by come and participate, when they become convinced, as we are certain will be the case before very long, that no surprises, no unexpected and overwhelming engagements will all of a sudden be sprung upon them, but that only specific commitments arrived at of their own free will can be the outcome of their decision to join."

The luncheon given by the Clergy Club of New York to Dr. Fosdick was at the Hotel Astor and was a spontaneous tribute to Dr. Fosdick for the remarkable help he has rendered to the world, especially to the youth of the world, by his writings and his preaching. His little books on "Meaning of Prayer," "Meaning of Service," and "Meaning of Faith" have been read by hundreds of thousands of people. At the various student conventions he has been listened to by many large assemblies. He combines as few men the evangelical fervor of the gospel with liberal interpretation of the doctrines. He has been a constructive thinker as well as a brilliant teacher of the gospel. The only time when any note of iconoclasm has crept into his preaching has been when certain groups within the Church have tried to hold up as fundamental doctrines those which are not fundamentals. Thus in the matter of the Virgin Birth, Dr. Fosdick was never interested in denying it; but when a certain group within the Church said the Virgin Birth was the fundamental doctrine of Christianity Dr. Fosdick objected and said it was narrowing the faith and insisted that the doctrine of the Incarnation was the fundamental doctrine of the faith.

The luncheon, however, was given as a testimonial to the great work Dr. Fosdick has done for the Church and not to endorse any particular doctrinal position. There were two hundred present, representing all denominations. Dr. Milo Gates presided and the speakers were Dr. Henry Sloane Coffin, Dr. Cornelius Woelfkin and Dr. Robert Rogers. They all bore eloquent testimony to the fine work he was doing for the Kingdom of God. Dr. Coffin called him the real conservative. "Dr. Fosdick," he said, "is an outstanding conservative. He conserves to the Church many thinking men and women who would otherwise be lost to it. He conserves the central doctrines of the faith by interpreting them in forms which appeal convincingly to the mind of to-day. He conserves the Church as an institution, building it up and rendering it far more powerful in our city and land."

THE WEEKLY SERMON

The Lantern Bearers

By Rev. Raymond C. Knox

Chaplain of Columbia University

[Following is the baccalaureate sermon preached at Columbia University, June 3, 1923.—THE EDITORS.]

"Wherefore I put thee in remembrance that thou stir into flame the gift of God which is within thee . . . for God hath not given us the spirit of fear, but of power, of love, and of a sound mind."—2 Tim. 1:6, 7.

IN Stevenson's charming essay, "The Lantern Bearers," he describes a boyhood game in which he later saw a significant and stimulating parable. The game consisted in carrying beneath one's coat a bull's-eye lantern. To be the possessor of a lamp was the acme of happiness. It gave one the sense of having within him a secret power, of being entrusted with no ordinary treasure which he was carefully to guard. With his lantern securely fastened beneath his jacket he would set forth on a strange mission to meet his comrades, all similarly equipped, in the hull of a deserted boat, or to gather with them on the lea of a wind-swept dune, there to plot more stirring adventures. The ownership of a light was the bond of fraternity. It united one to his companions as by a sacred cause. "Have you got your lantern?" was the anxious query upon meeting. And when there came a gratified, "Yes," the coats were unbuttoned and the glory of the lights revealed.

From this play of his youth Stevenson derived his life-philosophy: that within every man there is some gift, some talent, which though not always externally visible, is yet the inner light by which he lives, the joy of his being, the strongest motive of his behavior. It sends him forth to seek a career, it joins him in fellowship with those who share a like endowment; and when in the company of the comrades of light, the gift is disclosed and there is mutual recognition.

As we gather in this chapel to mark the day of your graduation, we think of you, each one, as the possessor of a unique gift. By its light you have been led to seek an education, to come to this university by varied paths that its flame might here be trimmed and brightened, and with your comrades you are setting forth upon a career of high adventure.

We trace back that gift to the "Father of Lights," the Author and Giver of every good and perfect gift, and to whom every one is accountable for the use he makes of his stewardship. In its nature and character the gift which is yours is like that of the early followers of Christ. As exhibited in them it fired their hearts with a fresh courage; it filled them with a new spirit of service and brotherhood, it illuminated their intelligence. "Wherefore, I put thee in remembrance that thou stir into flame the gift which is within thee; for God hath not given us the spirit of fear, but of power, of love, and a sound mind."

Not of fear but of power! As we look out on the world in which you are now to have your part how evident it is that men are handicapped and suffering because of fear. Most conspicuously we see the prevalence of fear in the attitude of nations toward one another. In some instances it seems to be the controlling motive of national policy, and to a more or less degree it enters into the acts and plans of every country. It is fear that is responsible for the enormous armaments—that distressing spectacle of peoples still bleeding and exhausted from a terrible war, requiring all their resources and strength for recovery and peace, yet taking upon themselves the crushing burden of our modern, costly, destructive weapons, to be ready if need be for another conflict. The remedy is not for us who are more securely situated to censure and condemn those less fortunate than ourselves—that is only an aggravation. But it is for us to join with them in the common task of removing fear.

We see the corroding action of fear upon the minds of men wherever there is cynicism. It is the cynicism of fear that discourages effort by calling it useless. It chills the nobler aspirations of men by impugning their motives and by magnifying their follies. The cynic may try to conceal his timidity beneath the cloak of fairer phrases, but at heart he is craven. Whoever sneers, fears. He lacks the courage and skill to lead men to achievement, he can only follow in the rear and blame them. He "faints when hard service is to be done, and shrinks at every blow."

No less is fear the foe that every man must overcome in his own heart. Whoever fails to bear witness to the truth, whoever keeps silent in the presence of wrong, whoever yields his principles of honor under the pressure of circumstances, whoever stands faltering and faithless before some lofty enterprise, is the slave of fear. And it is this same weakness which holds a man back from the full exercise of whatever capacity God has given him and from his utmost accomplishment. In that matchless parable of the talents there is a striking comment made of the man who put to no service the sum entrusted to him. When called upon to render an account, this was his answer: "I was afraid, so I hid thy talent in the earth."

Over against this blighting fear in all its manifestations we look to you. We look to you because we believe that within you is the gift not of fear but of power. However, stubborn may be the physical obstacles that stand in the way of ideal aims, you know that "no man ever fails till he fails inside." Like the Roman commander who was cut off in a wilderness and outnumbered by the enemy, you will "take counsel of your own valor." In contrast to the prophets of pessimism who despair of men and predict only disaster, you are to have that finer insight like

"One who never turned his back but marched breast forward,
Never doubted clouds would break,
Never dreamed, though right were worsted, wrong would triumph,
Held we fall to rise, are baffled to fight better,
Sleep to wake."

This gift of power is in the last analysis and in the true meaning of the word of the essence of faith. Faith is never opposed to knowledge and enquiry. Its opposite is fear. Shakespeare understood it when he declared, "Our doubts are traitors and make us lose the good we oft might win by fearing to attempt." Doubt raises spectre which it cannot quell; while faith, clear-eyed and ever-seeking, "greet the unseen with a cheer." Lasting valor is always the fruit of the life of the spirit and "to conquer fear is the soul's triumph."

The book of Ecclesiastes is given a place in the Bible because it illustrates the emptiness and the weakness of a life without purpose and without faith. In depicting the lives of those so limited the author says of them, "they shall be afraid of that which is high."

Assuredly, you have here learned to lay firm hold of the might of the spirit shall not be afraid of that which is high!

But the gift which is yours is not only power; it is also love, a virtue which elsewhere in the New Testament is sometimes called charity and in places good-will.

The virtue of love, or charity, or good-will—it's the thing that is important, not the name—was esteemed by Christ the supreme necessity because it is the bond by which men are united in fellowship. In the affairs of men it is literally true that this is the force which makes the world go round. Wherever it is not, man lives as Cain, his hand raised against his brother and the devil take the foremost as well as the hindmost.

A Church may have the most appealing ceremonies, its teachings be founded upon the traditions of the past and acceptable as well to the critical intelligence of the present. But if the Church is not a constant source for the increase of charity, it becomes as sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal.

Charity, or love, holds the key to the solution of our social problems. For if the minds of men are beclouded by prejudice, by passion, or ill-will, they shall never be able to understand one another, and no system, however theoretically perfect, can be made to work.

Again, how imperative is the necessity that you stir into flame the gift within you. Wherever darkness now overshadows the world, of discouragement, of disorder or of violence, the fundamental cause is our lack of the spirit of co-operation and charity. What bloodshed, bitterness and threats might there not have been avoided if only the nations which but recently fought shoulder to shoulder in a common cause had been able to strive together with equal vigor for the cause of peace! Who can estimate what even yet may be achieved if we can increase among men the stock of charity and then give it expression in some wise plan that will include in its scope all nations of the earth!

Your task is therefore clear: you are to contribute your gift. If the supply of good-will is to be augmented and made adequate, it can come, and come only, from lives that are dominated by it. It is out of the heart of man whence rancor and strifes and wars arise, and it is out of man's heart whence also proceed generosity and sympathy, friendliness and peace. You are to help men, and help them by example, not to pull apart but to pull together. You will find ready place for the display of this spirit, in your business or profession, in your community, and in your larger influence upon city and State. As you exercise your gift it may pass as an emotion, but as a motive it will grow stronger and abide.

Then, this gift which you have received has as its crowning glory a sound mind. Upon the use you make of your mind all else depends. Without intelligence, rigorously trained, even your virtues will amount to little; power may be misapplied, courage and faith degenerate into obstinacy and superstition, love becomes a soft and cooing sentimentality.

When Christ was asked as to the great commandment He quoted a passage from the Old Testament: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength." But to it He added a requirement peculiarly and characteristically His own, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy mind." To love God with all your mind means to use it. For no other purpose was it given you. It means so to discipline and develop it that it may become a fit instrument to seek the truth that sets men free. It demands that you are so to consecrate your gift that you dare affirm as did Christ Himself, "To this end was I born and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness to the truth."

When evil and error often deceive because they cleverly lip the phrases and ape the actions of liberty, of progress, and of peace, how inestimable is the service of Him who can strip off the mask and expose the sham.

When religion is by some to-day so misconstrued that in its name they would prohibit scientific discovery by law, and brand as heresy the thorough, accurate study of the Bible itself, how urgent it is that you show to men the true import of the wonders of God's creation, and the light He hath still to break forth from His Word!

But the greatest service you can render by the use of your mind is in creative thinking, that is, as you perceive yourself and can proclaim to others those majestic conceptions of life and its meaning by which all mankind is lifted up to higher levels. "Nothing on earth," says Victor Hugo, "is so powerful as an idea whose hour is come."

Standing on the threshold of a new age, amid the wreck and confusion left by a world-wide catastrophe, with the crude materials of civilization ready to be rebuilt into an enduring edifice, to you it is given to keep yourself "on the line of discovery," to be so responsive to the guiding spirit of God, that you envisage that truth whose hour is come and thus be able to lead men forward into the ampler inheritance which He hath prepared for those who seek Him!

Students of Columbia, members of the graduating classes: In the months and the years which now have their close you have become increasingly aware of the gift committed to you. We have seen the light proceeding from it steadily grow. We believe that here it has been touched with fire from on high, that "in light you have seen light." In the use of your gift may you never fail! For it is the thing for which all the world's a seeking. It is needed to overcome men's weaknesses and fears. It is needed to draw men together in a new spirit of co-operation and brotherhood. It is needed to guide them into the way of truth and to inspire them with an unfading vision.

"Wherefore I put thee in remembrance, that thou stir into flame the gift which is within thee; for God hath not given us the spirit of fear, but of power, of love, and of a sound mind!"

The Conflict Between Evolution and Christianity

By William Jennings Bryan

[The following is Mr. Bryan's evolution speech at the Presbyterian General Assembly at Indianapolis, as given out to the press, with one or two corrections. Mr. Bryan was speaking in behalf of his resolution to forbid the funds of the Presbyterian Church to go to the support of any institution that "teaches or permits to be taught as a proven fact, either Darwinism or any other evolutionary hypothesis that links man in blood relationship with any other form of life." The Assembly, by a vote of two to one, adopted a very different resolution, directing synods and presbyteries to withhold their official approval from institutions where any teaching is given "which seeks to establish a materialistic evolutionary philosophy of life or which disregards or attempts to discredit the Christian faith." Although he was defeated in the General Assembly, Mr. Bryan is meeting with considerable success in his campaign to suppress the teaching of evolution. Although it seems unbelievable, nevertheless it is a fact that the Legislature of Florida has already adopted his idea. Other States are seriously flirting with it. However mistaken, to our minds, Mr. Bryan may be in the means by which he would accomplish his ends, he nevertheless has also something noble in mind—to conserve the Christian conviction of our young people. Although we earnestly disagree with Mr. Bryan's position, for the reasons suggested we consider it well worth while to print his address.]

MR. MODERATOR AND FELLOW COMMISSIONERS:

I appreciate the courtesy of the Committee on Education in asking time for the consideration of this resolution and the courtesy of the Assembly in granting it. I beg to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That no part of the Educational Fund of the Presbyterian Church of the United States of America shall be paid to any school, college, university or theological seminary that teaches, or permits to be taught, as a proven fact either Darwinism or any other evolutionary hypothesis that links man in blood relationship with any other form of life."

I recognize that many regard the introduction of this resolution as a disturber of harmony. I regret to be subjected to such a charge, but I am not the first against whom such an accusation has been brought. In the seventeenth and eighteenth verses of the eighteenth chapter of First Kings I read:

"And it came to pass, when Ahab saw Elijah, that Ahab said unto him, Art thou he that troubleth Israel? And he answered, I have not troubled Israel, but thou, and thy father's house, in that ye have forsaken the commandments of the Lord, and thou hast followed Baalim."

I answer the charge with the words above quoted. We who favor this resolution are not the troublers of Israel. We stand upon the time honored doctrines of the Church. We plead as our defense the Apostles' Creed, which has been the basis of orthodox Christianity for fifteen hundred years: We believe in God, the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth. We believe in Jesus Christ, His holy Son, our Lord. We believe that Christ was conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary and crucified, dead and buried; that He descended into hades. We believe that He rose from the dead, ascended into heaven and sitteth on the right hand of God, the Father Almighty, from whence He shall come to judge the quick and the dead. We believe in the Holy Ghost, the holy Catholic Church, the communion of saints, the forgiveness of sins, the resurrection of the body and life everlasting.

Those who reject any part of the Church's creed are the aggressors. We are the defenders of the faith. Those who dissent from these time-honored principles should be willing to take upon themselves the responsibility for disturbance of harmony in the Church. Those who believe in orthodox Christianity cannot be asked to surrender without a struggle merely because a struggle may cause discord.

Where do the evolutionists find authority for the suppression of issues? Certainly not from Christ's teachings. Did He not drive the money changers from the temple because they made His house a den of thieves? Should He have whispered to them, expressing the hope that they would find it convenient to remove from the building? Have we not a right to protest against those who would convert the Church from a religious organization into a society for the advancement of science, or turn the Church over to a scientific Soviet government with authority conferred upon the scientists to do the thinking for the Church upon religious matters?

Was it not Christ who advised that one should cut off his right arm and pluck out his right eye rather than that the whole body should be lost? Are the evolutionists more important to the Church than the right eye or the right hand is to the body?

Did not Christ resist the very temptation to which the Church is now subjected? When the rich young man came to him, asking for the privilege of being a follower, did Christ make any concession in order to secure his support? Not by a hair's breadth. He demanded the first place in the young man's heart and he went away sorrowing because he had great possessions.

Now they tell us that we cannot get the college boys unless we eliminate from the Bible many of its vital truths. We must discard Moses because he connects man with the throne of God instead of the jungle. We must then reject the miracles because they are inconsistent with evolution. Then we must reject the virgin birth of Christ because it is a miracle. And then we must reject Christ's bodily resurrection because it, too, is a miracle. This is the process through which evolution is leading a great many students and even some ministers. We have preachers in Presbyterian pulpits who do not believe in the virgin birth of Christ, who assume to accept or reject miracles according to their own judgment and who deny that Christ rose from the dead. If evolution can have this disastrous effect upon the ministers of the gospel, who have taken upon themselves the vows of the Church, what effect must it have upon the young students who are asked to believe that evolution is a proven fact? I believe that we can win more students to a full-statured Christ than to a Christ reduced to the stature of man.

Our first objection to evolution is that it is only an hypothesis, as unsupported in nature as it is antagonistic to the Bible. Many people who call themselves evolutionists do not know what it means. Some speak of evolution as if it were like the development of the automobile or the telephone. Others speak of it as if it were like the growth of a plant from a seed or a chicken from an egg. Neither of these is evolution. The evolutionary hypothesis links all life together and assumes that every plant and animal came up by a slow and gradual change from one of a few invisible germs of life, and came by the action of resident forces working within. While they have not been able to prove that a single species in the more than a million estimated have come from any other species, they ask students to believe that all of the species have developed one from another. It is not a fact. No intelligent scientist contends that it is a fact. Only those who are reckless of their reputations and who rely upon what they think others believe instead of upon anything they themselves know will contend that evolution is anything more than an hypothesis, which means a guess. If these evolutionists were candid with the students less harm would be done, but they only say a part of what they believe.

If man is kin to any one of the lower forms of life, he is kin to all. Have you considered how much the human family is enlarged by the evolutionary hypothesis? If these evolutionists teach our boys that they are kin to such noble animals as the lion, the horse and the elephant, why do they not tell them that by the same logic they are also kin to the hyena, the jackal and the skunk? If they tell them that they are kin to the tarpon, the speckled trout and the sportive bass, why do they not inform them that by the same logic they are also kin to the slippery eel, the octopus and the devil fish?

If they tell our girls that they are cousins to the mocking bird, the nightingale and the meadow lark, why do they not go further and explain that by the same hypothesis they are kin to the bat, the crow and the buzzard? If they are kin to the butterfly, the humming bird and the honey bee, they are also kin to the horse leech, the housefly and the bedbug. If our children believe what the evolutionists say their days will be so filled with family reunions that they will have no time left for the worship of God or the service of man.

It does not lead all astray, but a large proportion. Darwin's hypothesis led Darwin himself away from the Christian faith. In youth he believed in the Bible. In his old age, in a letter published in his "Life and Letters," he said that he believed that there never had been any revelations. That disposed of the Bible as the Word of God and of Christ as the Son of God.

Darwin began life believing in a first great cause. He began by believing in heaven, and in this same letter said that each one must decide the future life for himself on conflicting, vague probabilities. If Darwin's hypothesis would lead Darwin away from belief in God after he wrote "The Origin of Species," as he says it did, what must be its effect upon the minds of immature youth who are told by a trusted instructor that it is true?

Professor Leuba, a teacher in psychology at Bryn Mawr College, Pennsylvania, has published a book on "Belief in God and Immortality." In this book he says that the belief in God and immortality is dying out among the educated, and so proves it. He wrote to the scientists whose names he found in a book containing fifty-five hundred of them—he said it contained the names of all of any prominence. On their answers, he declared that less than one-half of them believed in a personal God or a personal immortality. Then he wrote to the students of nine representative colleges and universities, and from the answers declared that fifteen per cent. of the freshmen had discarded Christianity, thirty per cent. of the juniors and forty to forty-five per cent. of the boys who graduated. This change from belief to unbelief he credited to the influence of the cultured under whose instruction the students passed. Is it possible that any Christian can be indifferent to these figures? Leuba's estimates are confirmed by reports of parents whose children have lost their faith in colleges.

We do not ask that the teaching of evolution as an hypothesis be barred, but merely the teaching of it as a proven fact. Christianity is not afraid of the truth. No truth can disturb Christianity, because all truth is of God, whether it is found in the Book of Books or in the book of nature.

Christianity is not afraid of science, because science is classified knowledge and knowledge is power. But Christianity has a right to protect against guesses being substituted for the Word of God to the destruction of the student's faith. Give science a fact and science can render invaluable service to mankind. It has rendered such service when dealing with electricity, with steam, with falling water and with diseases. Let us encourage investigation in every direction and stand ready to accept truth whenever found and from whomsoever it may come, but accepting guesses is another thing, especially when these guesses undermine the Christian faith.

This issue must be met by the Church. Why should it wait until those outside of the Church have led the way?

The State of Florida has already adopted a resolution identical in wording to the one proposed and has applied it to all teachers in schools paid by taxation. The State of Oklahoma has acted along similar lines. The Legislature of Texas has passed a similar measure through the lower house by a vote of two to one. The subject is before the legislatures of other States. Why should the Church be backward in protecting the Bible in church schools? A few days ago the Southern Baptist Church, in session at Kansas City, adopted a policy identical with the one proposed in this resolution. Shall the Presbyterian Church wait until it is compelled by the action of other churches to come to the support of the Bible and to the defense of the children of the Church?

My friends, I do not ask you to give any weight to my opinion, but you cannot ignore the facts upon which my opinion is formed. I can appreciate the timidity of those who do not want this issue to be raised, but it is already raised. I am simply presenting it to you as it is being presented to the people of the United States. I am simply drawing a line upon which you are at liberty to take position on either side.

Prescott tells us that when the great Pizarro was confronted by mutiny on his ship he called his sailors before him and stated the situation. He recounted the dangers through which they had passed and the perils that confronted them, and then he drew a line upon the stand. He asked those who were willing to share the risks with him to step up to the line. That is my business to-day. I draw a line for the protection of the students in Christian colleges from the teaching, as a proven fact, of either Darwinism or any other evolutionary hypothesis that links man in blood relationship to any other form of life. There is the line, fellow citizens. "Choose ye this day whom ye will serve."

The Soldiers' Way to Peace

By William T. Ellis

War Correspondent

AMERICA helped win one war for the avowed purpose of establishing permanent world peace.

Nevertheless, there is still serious fighting going on, especially in those parts of Europe and Asia which the victorious Allies treated as spoils of war; and Lloyd George has publicly predicted another great war in the near future.

Heart-sick and humanity-loving Americans are crying aloud, from platform, press and wayside poster, "No More War!"

But they will not halt war by any of the methods yet proposed.

If America is kept from entering another war it will be largely through the determination of the veterans of the World War. The real soldiers know what war means; and they hate it with a perfect hatred impossible to any theorist.

As one who shared the war experiences of the American army in France, and who worked on six national battle fronts, and saw possibly a wider area of the war's sphere and consequences than any other American, I may claim to know a little about the subject. Perhaps I reflect, be it ever so inadequately, the mind of the veterans of the American Expeditionary Force when I indicate some things reasonably sure to ensue in this country should there be prospect of another war.

There will be conscription of labor and of capital as well as of fighting men. Slackers, munitioners and profiteers will be eliminated, so far as is humanly possible. Fortunes and luxury will not be the lot of the cowards while their betters go off to die. There is a grim purpose in the returned soldiers' hearts upon this subject.

A law will undoubtedly be drafted making proved profiteering a capital offense, ranking with treason. Widespread regret exists among civilians as well as soldiers that none of the profiteers were shot or hanged for their crimes against the people during the war.

Propaganda and censorship will not be permitted to attain their former proportions. In the light of our present knowledge of the universal dissemination of deliberate falsehoods before and during America's entrance into the war, the soldiers, and most other informed persons, have assumed a "Show me!" attitude. The World War caused a heavy mortality of gullibility. Other nations are already finding that all Americans now hail in spirit from Missouri. There will be an amazing amount of free speech ere war is ever again declared by this country.

Politicians, who with the men behind international trade and finance, are the real war-makers, will have to get a new vote of confidence from the public before they can precipitate another conflict. And that vote of confidence the people are far from ready to give to-day. Instead, the veterans, who have come to see the direct connection between political machines and bad big business, seem inclined to throw on the junk-heap the professional officeholders, and to send a new type of man to represent them in the making and execution of the nation's laws.

In print and in political circles it is rather the vogue to deride the war ideals and aims of America, to which her allies once solemnly and officially subscribed. European statesmen openly flout them.

Not so our soldiers. They risked their all and went into the miry, fiery pit of hell in order to maintain a set of beautiful ideals called the American war aims. These standards lifted the army to new heights of human vision and knightliness. Manhood never before reached so lofty a level.

And still the soldiers think these slogans that bore them into battle were true. They fought for freedom, for national independence, for all peoples, for world-wide democracy, for the breaking of autocracy's power everywhere, for the enthronement of justice and the rights of man over the whole earth, and for the end of war.

They continue to believe that these principles are right, and the only sure basis of a continuing peace. It has been disillusioning to watch the world's big politicians repudiate all their sacred pledges to attain these objectives; but, with characteristic American common sense, soldiers perceive that the failure has been a failure of international statesmanship, and not a failure of the war aims.

A call to another war would find the American veterans distrustful of much in which they had confidence five years ago, but unshaken in their belief that righteousness and goodwill are the only way to peace. They are as loyal as ever to America—more so, in truth—but they have a new discrimition. Their illusions about war are gone. Many of them have come to share the sentiments of Kipling's grim epitaph, written after he had lost his own son:

"If any question why we died,
Tell them, Because our fathers lied."

In his extraordinary address, "Courage," at St. Andrews's University, Barrie more deftly touched the same note: "I want you to take up this position: that youth have too long left exclusively in our hands the decisions in national matters that are more vital to them than to us. Things about the next war, for instance, and why the last one ever had a beginning. . . . For fifty years or so we heeded not the rumblings of the distant drum—I do not mean by lack of military preparation—and when war did come we told youth, who had to get us out of it, tall tales of what it really is and of the clover beds to which it leads. We were not meaning to deceive; most of us were as honorable and as ignorant as the youth themselves; but that does not acquit us of failings such as stupidity and jealousy, the two black spots in human nature."

Youth, especially in the persons of the veterans who, having really known war, utterly hate it, will be the ones to make really effective the slogan, "No More War." Peace, like war, is an effect, rather than a cause; and many of our returned soldiers, along with countless others, have quietly been looking into and talking over the causes of things. That is my surest ground of hope that there will never again be another world war.

The Persians

By Edwin M. Dodd, D.D.

[Dr. Dodd is in charge of the medical department of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions.]

WHAT more interesting sight to watch or more absorbing theme for speculation than the emerging of a nation. We have seen China emerging, and have been watching the process with the keenest interest. The smaller Asiatic countries are having a hard time coming to the surface, and they need all the interest and encouragement that can be brought to bear. Very few people are speculating on the possibilities of Persia's being among those to emerge in this post-war world. Very few realize that there is anything there worth while. To be sure, it would be an enthusiast indeed who could paint a glowing picture of an already transformed or rapidly transforming Persia. Many people would say that Persia scarcely moves, and that the difference between the country in 1922 and in 1914 is negligible, except for the areas of war and famine and devastation. This is an incomplete view. Many of us who have been living and working in Persia believe that we see the beginnings of Persia's emergence. I believe that there are enough signs of change and awakening—straws only though they may be—to say that these years mark a definite turning point for Persia. The quest is, whither will she turn?

The background always helps the perspective. What sort of people are the Persians? What have been the recent conditions and forces in play which have retarded progress? What changes in conditions have taken place more recently to favor progress? What are the signs of emerging?

I can see some of our good Persian friends perhaps taking exception to any brief generalizations which would attempt to characterize Persia and the Persians, just as we Americans react and bristle to foreign descriptions of America and the Americans. But the characterization is from a friend; and the picture is no more drab than the Persians themselves customarily paint. To begin at the bottom of the appraisal and work up, I would say that the most discouraged remark I have ever heard about the Persians was from a wealthy Persian land-owner of Urumia, who said, "Persia is dead and there is no one to bury her." One runs across a good deal of this feeling of discouragement, even amounting to despair, about their own country among Persians themselves. They realize that it has been a backward, down-at-heels, dispirited country. There is none of the buoyant confidence and high expectation that one finds so refreshing and stimulating on coming home to America. There is very little of the will to die for a cause or a principle. The mass of the people are inert and very ignorant. What intellectual and political activity there is has generally been confined to very limited portions of the population, except as others are pressed into the game as pawns. I remember standing by a shop in Tabriz one day when some political gossip was passing about. One shopkeeper laughed derisively, and holding up a piece of bread in his hand, called to his neighbor, "What do I care about anjuman or manjuman [a political party term]. This is my anjuman." A year ago last fall during the sessions of our annual missions meeting in Tabriz a coup d'état revolutionized the city provincial and government. In the morning we awoke to the sound of desultory firing, but found our neighborhood undisturbed. We went on with our sessions and by the middle of the forenoon we were informed that we were under a new government, the so-called democratic leader, a certain Sheikh, having been killed in the melee and an outside clan leader, in behalf of the Teheran monarchist government, having taken over the reins of office. The city in general shifted step without a stumble; and the mob which had been subservient to the Sheikh shouted for the new ruler and execrated the old. Business went on as usual.

The Persians, however, have more potentialities than is indicated by their present negative and retarded stage of development. They are keen business men. To be sure, deception and trickery are all too common in business dealings. Honesty as the best policy is not very generally recognized and practised. But there is business enterprise and sharp wittedness. If you ever tried to keep up with your bakkal (small storekeeper) as he mentally figured out the total price of numerous small purchases, you would respect the mental nimbleness that is evidenced. I heard an Englishman, who is a member of a long established commercial family in Tabriz, and whose business acquaintance with the Persians is almost unrivaled, make the offhand remark, "Why the Persians are the best accountants in the world."

Let me say here that, curiously enough, though not giving honesty any uniform or large share in their dealings, they have developed a high sense of respect for the truthfulness and integrity of Americans, who to them are represented chiefly and most intimately by the American missionaries, and typified officially to the more informed by Mr. Morgan Shuster. During the periods of anarchy in border conditions of Western Persia during the war, when every form of wealth and credit was tottering, it was the American Relief and mission drafts which were sought by high and low, Moslem, Christian and Jew, the conquerer and the vanquished, as the safest form of finance. They believe the word of an American missionary, generally speaking, as they believe almost no one else's word. Whatever else they say about us, or however else they may feel toward us, they believe in our truthfulness and honesty. This sort of recognition and appreciativeness is significant in any people. It opens up possibilities, however seemingly remote.

Hospitality and a kindly disposition toward strangers in general is to our mind a rather outstanding trait in Persians. They seem to preserve the Oriental idea of hospitality toward a guest. And as one travels through the country, except as he may strike some uncommonly isolated or fanatical section, he is more impressed by the friendliness and approachableness of the people than the reverse.

The Persians have in general been far more tolerant of the Christian and alien races than the Turk has been. Except for the atrocities of the extreme war condition in one comparatively circumscribed area of Northwest Persia, the lot of Christians in the country has generally been comfortable and safe.

I do not think it would be stretching it to make this term "hospitable" include a certain rather characteristic intellectual hospitality to new ideas. Your Persian is not a cast-iron mental product. He is malleable and elastic. If the Turk is the German of the Near East, and the Arab the Anglo-Saxon of the Near East, then the Persian is the Latin of the Near East. Through all the centuries Persia has been the hotbed of modern heterodoxy. Sect after sect has sprung up, flourished and gone out or continued, as the case may be. One whole quarter of our city of Tabriz is peopled by the little-understood All-Allahees, who are said to be theologically somewhere between Christianity and Islam. Bahaism has had its day. And Bahaism is still making its inroads into the ranks of the "faithful" in many regions. Omar Khayyam in more ways than one typifies the speculative, philosophical and dialectic, as well as the beauty-loving, fanciful and futile phases of Persian thought. The Persians are impressionable. They readily take over the impress of a strong neighbor or propagandist or conqueror. Atheism from Russia or elsewhere would probably gain considerable ground in the larger cities if anything like the pre-war or early war Russian occupation and domination were again to prevail. But this hospitality to new ideas has its very encouraging side. It explains why the Persians come in such numbers to our American schools, and it explains the attitude of the more enlightened of the younger generation. If the tendency can be guided aright, it can lead to great advance. By and large, then, we have not a strong, virile, dominant race, but a hospitable, approachable and impressionable race. Wise firm leadership is one of the crying needs of the country.

What are the recent forces in play and the conditions prevailing which have held Persia submerged? Without going into the great underlying cause of Islam with its stultifying effects let us mention two outstanding forces of comparatively recent years. First, foreign pressure or domination, and secondly, the war itself. By this latter is meant the whole maelstrom of invasion, occupation, racial and religious hatreds, fighting, economic distress, famine, pestilence and all the long-range reactions from these conditions spreading throughout the less directly affected parts of the country. As most people know Persia was for several years before the war a bone of contention between Russia and England. Russia with her age-long struggle toward a free sea, and England with her Achilles' heel of India found themselves at cross purposes in this area which lies between Russia and the Persian Gulf and is bordered by Afghanistan and India. The gathering tension resulted in the English and Russian agreement in 1907, by which Persia was divided over her own head by these two foreign powers into "spheres of influence." In the case of Russia this influence included considerable armed occupation in the northwest of Persia and certain concessions. Russian influence even before the war was so strong in our northwest province of Azerbaijan that Russians were able to hang in Tabriz certain prominent mullahs (Moslem priests), and others who were accused of intrigue against Russia. This was, of course, bitterly resented by the Persians; but they were helpless. The pre-war situation of Persia was therefore that of being more or less shackled. Russian and British influence dominated the country. The evanescent attempt of the Persians to establish a republican form of government failed and the idealists and progressives among them lost heart and hope. One must admit that the Russian occupation had certain definite advantages for Persia. It gave security and stability, built many good roads, opened up considerable business, and in general left the stamp of some semi-western civilization. But it was not freedom or self-determination for the Persians.

When the war broke out northwest Persia suffered terribly, and the rest of the country reacted in sympathy, though most of it was not subject to the physical damages of Azerbaijan. The contending armies of Russia, Turkey and England crossed and recrossed, advanced and retreated, occupied and evacuated and re-occupied, maneuvered and fought, built barracks and roads and bridges, commandeered property, and generally carried on as though they were moving in unclaimed territory instead of in a supposedly sovereign state—until Persia was prostrate both in spirit and in power. As a result of the war certain rich areas, partly as a direct result of the marching and fighting armies, partly as the indirect result of war conditions, were depopulated or devastated. Hundreds of villages disappeared. The population of some fertile areas shrank to a fraction of their former sizes and prosperity. Trade, which depended so largely on Russia, was almost at a standstill. The rug business was dead. The collapse of the Russian ruble and Russian investments spelled ruin for hundreds of thrifty and successful business people. The net result of the war, therefore, was terribly damaging to the directly affected parts of Persia and a general retardation for the rest.

The aftermath of the war with its first soaring hopes for the small nations and its exaggerated expectations centers on President Wilson, and then its sag and disillusionment and cynicism has been almost if not quite as retarding and depressing as the war itself. The people who looked for a new day lost heart and hope. At this low-ebb juncture there came the pressure and temptation of Bolshevism from the North, not so much the appeal of any social program, communistic or socialistic or what not—an impossible anomaly in a Moslem state—but the appeal of lawlessness and greed and malice. To most people in our part of Persia who favored it, Bolshevism meant that the poor would seize what belonged to the rich, and everybody was free to grab what he could. There went with this, however, among a larger portion of the population, a dread of Bolshevism. Still there was a certain trend toward anarchy. This crisis, happily enough, passed, or seems to have passed with last winter. And the present plight of Russia is certainly not an encouragement to “go thou and do likewise,” to the curiously pragmatic Oriental, who generalizes and argues often more from the obvious and external and material than we do. Just as German and Turkish stock dropped in Persia because Germany failed, so Bolshevik stock dropped because Russia failed. It has been some months now since the Persians at Teheran definitely rejected Bolshevik control. It is encouraging to see that this form of temptation and pressure has been resisted.

Let me lay alongside of this a second encouraging reaction. The Anglo-Persian Treaty, signed by the Prime Minister in 1919, was exceedingly unpopular among the Persians. They felt that it gave England altogether undue power in Persia. How often have I heard them say, “this would make us another Egypt.” As a matter of fact this treaty was never ratified by the Persian Parliament, and was never put into force. In this case, though the fortunes of Persia were at low ebb, she had backbone enough to resist the foreign pressure, and work toward something like self-respect and self-control, even though it was a case of blind groping. Even the British military occupation of Persia, which took place during the latter part of the war, withdrew last spring.

This brings us then to the changes that favor the country's emerging. First, Persia is left to herself more freely than at any time in two decades, if not in a century. Foreign domination is gone. Foreign political pressure is less powerful. Foreign intrigue is probably not very significant or potent, though underground propaganda or pan-Islamism or Bolshevism is hard to gauge with any assurance. As far as external evidence is concerned, Persia is unusually free in this year of 1922 to work out her own salvation. Second, the trough of the post-war wave has been passed. We believe that the zero hour is over. Conditions from now on ought gradually to tend to improvement and stabilization. The threat of anarchy from the North seems to be much less than a year or two years ago. The chance of general security are better than they were. The extremely radical ideas which were a reaction after the war are probably not as popular as they seemed to be at one time. Third, trade is beginning to reach out from Persia into Persia. Communications through the Caucasus, which are a vital outlet for the northwest part of the country, are gradually opening up. At least one large American corporation is projecting considerable miscellaneous business for Persia this coming summer. The recently announced arrangement between the British Government and the Standard Oil Company presumably presages large development of Persia's natural resources, particularly oil and minerals. With this will come advance in agriculture and industries in general. The important rug business can be expected to revive. If the Urumia and Salmas regions of Persia are rehabilitated with foreign money as is now intimated, it will mean that one particularly fertile and promising part of Persia will regain its prosperity. The lawless tribes of Kurds on the border will have to subside.

What are the early signs of emerging?

First, Persia has shown signs of asserting herself, as evidenced by the rejection of the Anglo-Persia Treaty, the rejection of Russian domination, and the calling of the Persian Parliament, which was convened by the Shah on June 1 last after several years of inactivity.

Second, Persia is recognizing her need of leadership and guidance and is appealing to us Americans for help. It is gratifying to realize that American missions and the American good name have maintained their integrity through the stormy and complicated war period. By and large, in spite of temporary fluctuations and local loss of prestige, the American influence for good has persisted.

The work of our American missions has never been more encouraging. The work in such places as Meshed, Teheran and Tabriz, to mention only three, is going forward more encouragingly than ever before, with people coming to our schools, and inquirers' groups coming to our services in a way that is challenging and hopeful. Politically, the people realize that they must have an older brother. I have the best of official sanction in saying that the Persian Government is now applying for American advisers, particularly in such fields as finance and surveys for the national resources. The example set by Mr. Morgan Shuster as Treasurer-General of Persia, has never been forgotten. It is encouraging and challenging that Persia is thus turning to us for help.

It is too early to say that there is anything like a general interest in or swing toward Christianity; but it can be safely said that in certain large centers where we have missionary work there is a growing trend—relatively not larger than the proverbial mustard seed, to be sure, but also potentially as significant—beyond what we have ever seen before. The hospitality of Persians to new truths may conceivably blossom out at any time in an unexpected attitude toward Christianity. Character is what Persia needs above all else. Just so far as they recognize and seek character in our American schools, our American hospitals and our American business, just to that extent is the outlook encouraging for them.

I realize that in saying all this there may be people who will take exception to much of what I have said—people who will feel that Persia is still stagnant and that the signs of encouragement are almost nil. We missionaries, however, cannot altogether feel so hopeless or despairing, no matter how slow the progress is. We are dealing with a country long asleep, enervated, suppressed and discouraged. We believe we see enough signs of slow awakening, of increasing self-respect and true ambition to feel that there is perceptible an upward slant in the necessarily dusty and stony roads ahead of us.

"We Have Put Our Souls into the Blouses"

By William Willard Howard

TWO Russian gentlewomen, employed in making hand-embroidered Russian Princess Blouses in the relief industry put into operation by Anne Louise Howard on the borders of Bolshevik Russia, were complimented on the beauty of their work. One said:

"We have put our souls into the blouses."

This is literally so true of all the work that it well may be taken as a moral example for the rest of the world to follow. At least one group of workers among all the careless, indifferent, slipshod, clock-watching, time-killing, war-demoralized workers of Europe and America show eagerness to do honest work, an anxiety to please buyers of their products, and a conscientious attention to detail approached only by the vanished standards of the past. It may be that in preserving these Russian exiles as a nucleus of a newer and better Russia when the eczema of Bolshevism shall have run its course we shall have preserved also a nucleus of honest, conscientious work upon which a chastened and repentant world may build anew a better civilization for us all.

No one who sees one of the beautiful Russian Princess Blouses can doubt for an instant that the heart and soul of a gentlewoman have gone into both design and needlework. One remarkable thing about the blouses is that there is not one blouse that is not beautiful. A purchaser can pick at random a box from a pile of blouses and be certain to find a garment into which a gentlewoman had put days and nights of painstaking, unremitting effort. There is not one poor blouse in the lot.

I took three dozen of these blouses at random from three different grades, loaded them into my motor car and drove with them to the suburban home of a man who is known personally and by name from Vanceboro to San Diego and from Seattle to Savannah. I spread out the blouses in the living room of the big house, the walls of which were upholstered with what looked like acres of books. The lady of the house, whose father was a distinguished college president and philanthropist, looked at the blouses in perplexity.

"How can I ever make a selection?" she said. "They are all beautiful. If you had brought only three or four a selection would be less difficult. As it is I should like to have them all."

This attitude toward the blouses was almost literally duplicated by a lady from Washington, who called at my office by appointment on her way to Europe.

"What shall I do?" she said. "I cannot take these eighteen blouses with me to Europe. If you had shown to me only two or three I could have chosen one. Well, I must have these three, anyway. I will get some more for Christmas presents on my return from Europe next October."

A contributor in Baltimore has written: "Please do not trouble to answer this letter, but some time tell us through

THE CHRISTIAN WORK of the success of your work. Do the returns justify your labor and expense?"

In THE CHRISTIAN WORK of last week was an article entitled "Reprieve," in which I announced that the life of Vera Thenukhin had been saved through the generosity of a subscriber in Philadelphia, who had contributed a sum of money for the specific purpose of giving to that young woman light employment for a year. That article answers the Baltimore contributor's question. The saving of Vera Trenukhin's life is a return in itself alone that has justified all my labor and expense. If I can save one woman's life—if I can put shoes and stockings on the bare and bleeding feet of little children—I shall count all my labor and expense as nothing.

This question of returns and labor and expense has plagued the souls and paralyzed the wills of many men and women who have sought to help suffering humanity. Thousands of unfortunates have suffered and died because of the blighting, withering influence of this question of returns and expense.

In my experience of the devastating effects of this question I have noticed that in mixed committees of various sorts the men most affected by it are ministers of the gospel, and that the men least affected are hard-headed business men. I have known committees to give up the work of relieving suffering and saving human life simply because it cost more than the ministers among the members thought that it should cost.

I do not count human life in terms of dollars and cents. I believe that if suffering exists it should be relieved first and the cost discussed afterward—if at all. I have found that most men of affairs hold the same view. As a rule, business men look upon these things from a business angle.

I own and operate ships. If in the course of the operation of those ships I can invest one dollar and get back one dollar and ten cents I am justified in making the investment. It is good business. If a retail grocer makes ten per cent. profit on his year's turnover he should be satisfied. He has a good business.

I believe that if a work of mercy is to be done it should be done regardless of cost. What sort of human remnant would the world think me if I saw a woman drowning and refused to plunge in to her rescue because I would ruin a fifty-dollar suit of clothes doing it?

When serving on relief committees ministers whom I have known have been altogether too timid about money. They seemed to have a fear of it—a fear that the business men did not share. The average business man is satisfied if his gift is administered in a business-like way. He does not care anything about reports of work and itemized statements of expenditures. Such things do not mean anything to him, anyway, because he does not have any means of checking up or verifying the accounts.

As for the particular relief work now under consideration, the Baltimore contributor's question may be answered easily: The returns do justify the labor and expense. Even before I left the border of Bolshevik Russia on my journey homeward Anne Louise Howard and I had been repaid in gentlewomen's gratitude for all our work and use of private funds; since my return home the response to my appeals to readers of THE CHRISTIAN WORK has been so prompt and so generous that I am led to believe that we are at the beginning of a highly useful and extensive work of relief. Just how extensive that work will be will depend on the additional support that it receives from lovers of humanity in the United States. For encouragement and support in the expansion of this work I can look only to gentlefolk in my own country. Neither in Great Britain nor in Europe can I look for help.

To readers of these lines who sympathize with the Russian gentlefolk and desire to have a part in the work of relief I will give only one definite assurance—I will administer your gifts with the same business methods that I use in the operation of my ships. I cannot work miracles; but that much I can promise. At present the overhead charges are negligible. Anne Louise Howard gives her services free and pays her own expenses. I have paid the import duty on the blouses and the cost of printing and mailing the booklet. The few thousand dollars of my private funds with which I was able to put the needlework industry into operation will remain in the working fund, to be used over and over again.

But that does not make more than a beginning. The plight of the Russian gentlefolk is so tragic, the suffering and distress so acute, that there is need of a working fund many times larger. I am forwarding money to Anne Louise Howard each week, but it is not nearly enough to give employment to the throngs of gentlewomen who beg for a share in the work. More is needed. If you who read this feel that the children of the exiled nobility and intelligentsia of monarchist Russia are as well worth saving as the children of Bolshevik Russia, who have been fed at a cost to America of scores of millions of dollars, I invite your help in the work that already is in practical operation. Contributions, in any amount, may be sent to the Russian Refugee Fund, care THE CHRISTIAN WORK, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

The Present Crisis: A Response to the Declaration of the Federal Council

By Rev. Alfred E. Garvie, D.D.

AS one who not only two years ago visited the United States, preaching, lecturing and giving addresses in the interests of Anglo-American friendship, but since his return has used every opportunity in Great Britain to promote that object, I venture to offer some response to the declaration of the Federal Council regarding America's International Obligation in the Present Crisis. All who are concerned about a Christian solution of the present problems must welcome that declaration heartily and express warm appreciation of its spirit and purpose. I fully recognize how difficult, well-nigh impossible, it is for the American Government to give adequate financial assistance, so long as some of the nations of Europe, and notably France and Belgium, are resorting to violence instead of negotiations for the settlement of international difficulties, and are squandering resources needed for national economic recovery on armaments. I fully recognize that the questions of debts, reparations and armaments cannot be separated, and that any conference in which the United States shared must be free to discuss these and all other relevant questions. I believe that the people of this country, and even the government, would be ready to welcome such a conference without any restrictions of its functions.

As the division in the last debate on the Ruhr question showed, had not the party whips been put on, the majority of the House of Commons would be prepared to approve and support a much more courageous and energetic policy on the part of the Government in opposition to this adventure. Not because the policy of France is inflicting serious injury on British trade and preventing the much-needed economic recovery alone, but still more because the moral sense of the nation condemns as unrighteous as well as unwise this resort to "methods of barbarism," even if the sole purpose be collection of reparations, and not annexation. I much regret that I have so far had no indication that the Protestant churches of France and Belgium have uttered any protest against the disastrous course being followed by their politicians. The churches of Great Britain are practically solid in their condemnation. It does seem entirely unreasonable that France should claim to do as she pleases in the interpretation and application of a treaty of peace, to make which even possible America and Great Britain contributed so much in life and treasure. This stumbling block must be removed before there can be any renewal of friendly co-operation in the interests of peace between the nations of Europe. It is much to be desired that the conscience of America, as expressed through the churches, should support the moral protest of the best elements in this country against this outrage of what is virtually a renewal of war against a disarmed foe. I must confess that it has grieved me that THE CHRISTIAN WORK has not more vigorously opposed this policy. America may be assured that, with negligible exceptions, the public opinion and popular sentiment of this people, and not the testimony of the churches only, is against any policy of violence which may provoke war, and for any measures of conciliation which may establish enduring peace.

It may be that the state of American politics forbids any advocacy of America's entry into the League of Nations, and that the calling of such a conference is the only policy now practicable. But those who in Great Britain not only welcomed the first suggestion of such an organization which came from America, but even advocated it when the idea was still treated with suspicion, and have since given all the support they could to the League of Nations Union in promoting interest in the League of Nations, must greatly regret that this declaration ignores the fact that an organization exists and is functioning effectively, so far as the policy of the great powers of Europe will allow, to which all such questions could be referred, if only America would come in. Occasional conferences cannot effect what a permanent organization would. I am sure that America would carry such weight in the counsels of the League, and could so influence the action of those nations whose indifference or hostility has hampered its operations, that, much as the League despite all obstacles has accomplished, it would be enabled to realize the ideals of men like General Smuts or Lord Robert Cecil. May I very earnestly ask the Christian men and women not to abandon this advocacy of the League of Nations, into which I was assured during my visit America would yet be brought?

On the Near Eastern question one cannot write without a deep sense of humiliation, and a keen pang of anguish even. My political interests and activities began in the well-known campaign of Mr. Gladstone in 1881 against the Bulgarian atrocities. In the early days of my ministry I went about lecturing on the Armenian atrocities, with the exposure of which the name of Mr. W. T. Stead is associated. The subordination to financial interests of human obligations in more recent policy is one that must fill with shame all who believe that human worth and material wealth are simply incomparable, and that where the first makes a demand, the second deserves no consideration. May I say with all respect that America's aloofness is one of the causes of the present situation? America must do more than make protests or offer financial assistance; the Turk understands and seems to understand force only. The use of force would not be necessary if the Turk were made to understand that America would be prepared to use all the resources she could command to put an end once for all to this recurrent tragedy of the massacre of Christians in the East.

In the condition of this country at the present moment, with the losses it has suffered, the burdens it is bearing, the miseries it is enduring, the awful memories from which many hearts have not made escape, no one would dare to suggest that this country can go to war with Turkey again, if she has to go alone. We have a right to expect more than advice and money from America in dealing with this harrowing situation. I write this with reluctance and regret as one who in advocating Anglo-American friendship has to meet the taunt that this is the extent of responsibility alone which America will assume.

I had staying with me in November for a week Dr. Otto Baumgarten, of Kiel, and next week I hope to entertain Dr. Deissmann; thus the bonds of co-operation in learning and scholarship are being reknit. From what I hear from Germany, it is in this class—professors and students—that the greatest hardships are felt. The valuable contribution to knowledge and thought made by Germany before the war can again be hoped for if there is some recovery of more normal economic conditions in Germany. Will the churches of America make such a recovery of Germany an object of their efforts? Hate has wrought enough ill; let love do her healing work.

As a result of Dr. Jowett's appeal the World Alliance has been reconstituted and will now be directly representative of the Christian churches. Its voice will carry more authority and its influence will be more fully felt in the churches of this country. It is doing all that it can to create public opinion and popular sentiment here in favor of friendship among the nations. For this end it is working in close association with the League of Nations Union. Pressure is being constantly brought to bear on the Government for a more active policy of appeasement than that hitherto pursued. Communications are being constantly maintained with the committees in other countries of Europe to urge all the Christian churches to make their utmost endeavor to bring about an international situation which will at last assure peace, and with it security, prosperity and progress for this much afflicted continent. The churches of America can rely on the churches of this country for hearty co-operation in every effort to bring "peace on earth among men of good-will."

The General Synod of the Reformed Church in the United States

By Professor George W. Richards, D.D., LL.D.

THE twenty-first triennial sessions of the General Synod were held in Hickory, North Carolina, May 23-30. It was the first time the Synod, since its organization in 1863, met south of Maryland. It was most appropriate, however, that this meeting should be held in North Carolina, where there is a loyal group of Reformed people, about ten thousand strong, whose history dates back to 1710, and most of whose forebears came from Pennsylvania, especially during the decade of 1745 to 1755. At Newton, North Carolina, about ten miles from Hickory, Catawba College is located, seventy-three years old and under the supervision of Potomac Synod and North Carolina Classis. The delegates, ministers and elders, not far from four hundred in number, will always remember the bountiful hospitality of the citizens of Hickory and adjoining towns, members of different denominations giving royal entertainment to their guests. The much vaunted "Sunny South," however, was prevented from displaying her splendor by a thick curtain of cloud which covered the blue the greater part of the Synod's sessions.

The opening sermon was preached by the retiring president, Dr. George W. Richards (Matt. 9:37-38) on the theme, "The Training of Christian Leadership"—a note that was sounded frequently in the addresses and in the action of the Synod. The Rev. J. C. Leonard, D.D., of Lexington, North Carolina, was chosen president on the second ballot, six men, one of them a layman, having been put in nomination. The delegates represented English, German and Hungarian classes. The English have a large majority. Most of the German congregations now have both German and English services. During the last triennium two Hungarian classes were added to the Church, making three in all, with fifty-two congregations, about thirty thousand adherents and forty ministers. Provision has been made for the instruction of Hungarian youth in the colleges and seminaries of the Church. No serious issues arose to call forth an expression of the various theological tendencies represented by the delegates; yet one is safe in speaking of three types which cannot be sharply separated—the ultra-conservatives, the moderate conservatives and the liberal conservatives. It needed only a slight provocation to stir up controversy; the occasion fortunately did not arise for the manifestation of latent differences. The nearest approach to such an occasion was the overture of one of the classes for a book besides the regular standard of the Church, the Heidelberg Catechism, for the instruction of the youth. After a somewhat heated discussion the request was not granted.

One of the foremost questions before the Synod was the request of the boards of the Church—Home Missions, Foreign Missions and Ministerial Relief—for an annual budget of $1,000,000. After a wholesome discussion by the pastors that amount was sent to the classes for apportionment upon the congregations on the basis of "ability and willingness." This was one of the advanced steps in the direction of larger benevolent contributions taken during the last twenty years. For while the Reformed Church compared with other churches in this respect was somewhat backward, in the last two decades, from 1902 to 1922, it has increased its benevolent contributions by 496 per cent. For the first time, also, it has appropriated $5,000 annually for the American Bible Society and $4,000 annually for the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ.

Pursuant to a two-thirds vote of the fifty-nine classes, a Board of Education was established. It is composed of fifteen members and was instructed to organize and to work out a mode of operation, with due consideration of the needs of the congregation, the school and the community, on the one hand, and of the academy, the college and the theological seminary, on the other. By no means one of the least of its functions is to take active measures for the recruiting of the ministry. For it seems far easier to procure millions of money than scores of men and women for distinctively religious work.

The Committee on a New Liturgy, after six years of painstaking labor, submitted its report with forms for the regular Sunday services and special services of various kinds, containing in all thirty sections. The work is based largely on the Order of Worship and the Directory of Worship, both of which have been in use for more than forty years. The earlier books were the ripe fruit of a thirty years' liturgical controversy, in which Dr. John W. Nevin and Philip Schaff took an active part. The controversy belonged to an earlier generation. The new committee was composed of men representing the three theological schools and the different parties and sections in the Church. The new liturgy was submitted with the unanimous approval of the committee, which meant practically that, with minor revisions, it would be accepted by the Synod. It will now be submitted for tentative use to the congregations and subject to revision at the next meeting of the Synod three years hence. Whether or not it will be submitted finally to the classes to be made an ordinance of the Church by a two-thirds vote remains to be seen. It is at least debatable whether or not any liturgy should be made a constitutional ordinance. The attitude of the Reformed Church at present on worship is to allow freedom for both the free and the liturgical service and to conduct all service with dignity and reverence, with spirituality and spontaneity.

Another new feature submitted to the Synod was the report of the Social Service Commission, which was constituted under the supervision of the Board of Home Missions three years ago. The commission defines its objectives under three heads:

1. To make clear to the constituencies of the Reformed Church and the communities served by the same the social implications of the Gospel and to promote the application of its teachings to the organization of human society, in conformity with the Social Creed adopted by the General Synod of 1917 and the instructions of the General Synod of 1920 authorizing the creation of the commission.

2. To assist local churches in such practical aspects of community service as will express Christianity in relation to the needs and aims of community life, and enable them to render an adequate Christian ministrations.

3. To make the Reformed Church a constructive force in the national life, in co-operation with approved national agencies and movements for religious and social welfare.

For the accomplishment of these ends unusual progress was made in so brief a time. The work was done through the organization and co-operation of synodical and classical committees, addresses at the annual meetings of our judicatories, sermons in the churches, articles in the church papers, especially the Social Service edition of last summer, comments in the "Heidelberg Teacher," tracts, books, summer schools and conferences. The keynote of this movement has been the Christianizing of society through the conversion of the individual.

A deliverance was also submitted by the commission in answer to a request of the Synod three years ago on the problem of recreation. Space permits us to quote only two of the recommendations on this matter:

1. Churches seeking to utilize the religious value of play and to discharge their local responsibilities in this matter should co-operate with those community agencies that already exist rather than attempt to set up rival agencies; provided, however, that the community agencies are carrying on their work in the interest of the people and not for commercial gain, and are adequately meeting the needs of the community or are capable of doing so.

2. Where no recreational agencies exist the churches should lead the way—co-operatively where possible, and if need be, they should set up programs, putting them upon as broad community bases as the conditions may permit.

It remains to be said that the Reformed Church is providing for a memorial church at Chateau Thierry in France. The building is in process of erection and will be dedicated in the autumn. The funds for payment are in the hands of the National Service Commission. Of special significance also is the erection of a Reformed Church building in Philadelphia, Fifteenth and Race streets, in memory of Dr. Philip Schaff, at a cost of over a million dollars, one of the most imposing church buildings in that city. The work will be completed during the current year.

Prodigal Daughters*

By Joseph Hocking

SYNOPSIS

Colonel Lester Trelawney arrives home in England after six years of military service in India and Mesopotamia to find his two daughters sadly beset by the flood of new morals, and ethics and dress of the "younger generation." Eleanor, he soon discovers, is associating with young women of strange tendencies. Peggy has been "keeping company" with a young man of doubtful character. Both have been coming home at all hours of the night. The Colonel insists upon their recognition of his authority. They refuse. He is called away for a few days, but is recalled by a message saying that both girls have left home. He meets Peggy's lover and forces from him the addresses of both girls. The Colonel and Mrs. Trelawney visit them. Peggy has just been married to Barnes. Eleanor has secured a position in London where her employer forces his evil attentions upon her. She is rescued from a bad situation by her old friend Rod Ravenscroft, who begs her, in vain, to return to her home.

PEGGY'S ROMANCE FADES.

"SOMETHING will have to be done," said Jim Barnes, who had been standing for a long time, sullen and silent, looking into vacancy.

Peg did not reply.

"Have you nothing to say? Why, we're right up against it. We've got to do something. We owe three weeks' rent and this pile of bills. I can see nothing for it but a moon-light flitting."

"What do you mean by that?"

"Clearing out. We have no money, and you won't do anything."

"What can I do?" and the girl's tones were sullen and defiant.

"Do," he said with an oath. "You could do a lot. But you'll do nothing. You're willing to sponge upon me for everything."

"Sponge upon you! Be careful what you say, Jim."

"Why should I be careful?" he asked. "Besides, it's true."

"You didn't talk like that when I lived at home," she protested. "You told me you were earning good money, and that it would be the joy of your life to buy things for me, and now—" She shrugged her shoulders.

Barnes laughed brutally. "Yes, and a nice fool I made of myself," he said. "Instead of marrying a girl with money, as I thought, she hasn't got a sou."

"I had nearly thirty pounds, and I gave you every penny of it."

"Thirty pounds! What's that?" sneered Barnes. "It all went in a week or two. Oh, you throw up that to me, do you?—your dirty thirty pounds. You paid me thirty pounds to take you, did you? And a nice bargain I made of it."

Peg did not reply.

"You were glad enough to get me," Peggy said.

"Was I?" sneered Barnes. "It was you who did all the courting, dear. I had no need to do any."

"Oh, you mean, contemptible outsider," gasped the girl in her rage.

"Look here, none of that!" said Barnes, taking a savage stride towards her. "I'm not going to stand any of your cheek. Mean, contemptible outsider, am I? Well, go and live with your mean, contemptible insiders!"

Peggy stood before him defiant, her eyes flashing. "Don't think you can frighten me," she cried. "You are a mean, contemptible outsider, or you wouldn't speak like that."

Barnes caught her roughly by the arm. "Say that again," he said, "and I'll blacken your eye," and he lifted his hand as if to strike her.

All the fighting spirit in the girl was aroused, and she felt contaminated by his touch. Pride of race, and all the influences of her early associations surged within her. She felt degraded by passing through such scenes, for this was only a repetition of others of a similar nature. But she was not afraid. Something, she knew not what, caused her to defy him, and challenge him to do his worst.

"Strike me!" she cried, her voice quivering. "Strike me! It's the kind of thing a creature like you would do. But remember, I'll tell my brother John, and I'll tell my father, too."

"Bah, you daren't! Your brother John!!" and Barnes laughed uneasily. "He's afraid to come near me. He remembers the licking I gave him at the Cosmopolitan Hotel months ago."

"Yes, I heard about that!" answered the girl. "Why, he thrashed you within an inch of your life. Jenkins told me so himself."

"Jenkins did, did he? I'll pay him out for that."

"Now then, strike me," and the girl looked fearlessly and defiantly into his face.

Barnes dropped her arm and walked away muttering.

Things had come to a crisis. The room in which they now lived was not the place to which Barnes had first brought her. That was comparatively comfortable, but it cost more than they could afford to pay, and after much heart-searching on Peggy's part she had consented to come to their present abode. It was a miserable, squalid place, and the surroundings were anything but savory. Still Peggy had consented. Barnes had told her that it need only be for a little time, as he expected a raise in his wages shortly, and when that time came they would be able to return to more comfortable surroundings. But the raise of wages did not come, and even this shabby little room was more than they could pay for.

Peggy, like many other girls of her class, was utterly unfit to be a wife. She was young and inexperienced, and had always refused to learn housekeeping. In addition, although her father was not a wealthy man, the family had always been able to live in comfort. She had but little knowledge of the value of money, and did not realize how quickly what seemed to her a large amount could melt away. Moreover, having been brought up as she had, she had at first protested against going to cheap restaurants and cheap places of amusement and for a time Barnes had yielded to her. But little by little facts stared her in the face.

For the first two months after their marriage Barnes still appeared to her a gay Lothario. She was still under the spell of his handsome presence and high-flown talk; but in time she became disillusioned. She saw the kind of man to whom she had linked her life, realized how utterly different he was from those of her own class. She could not help seeing that he was a common, vulgar braggart. They had scarcely a taste in common, and to all intents and purposes they spoke a different language.

But she would not admit this even to herself. By nature she was self-willed and obstinate, and she would not confess that she had made a mistake in marrying. With a kind of doggedness, therefore, which sometimes almost amounted to heroism, she tried to shut her eyes to his real nature and to be a good wife to him.

In this, however, she was only partially successful. As the glamor of her marriage passed, and the ugly specters of poverty and brutalism appeared, she grew hard and sullen. In fact, she was fast awakening to the grim reality of the life she had chosen.

Shortly after the visit which her father and mother paid her she received a letter from the latter telling her that if ever she was in trouble she must let her know. She also stated that while her father still kept his doors open to her, they would forever remain closed to Barnes. This man he would neither admit to his house, nor recognize in any way. Her mother had also asked her if she might come to see her.

The letter was, possibly, not wisely written. Certain it is that Peggy, angered by the insult which she considered had been offered to her husband, had written defiantly to her mother, declaring that she needed neither the help nor the recognition of anyone at Hampstead, and would not have it if it were offered to her. She also stated that, by her husband's wish, seeing her father's house was closed to him, their house was closed to them, and to John—especially to John.

Barnes had been very angry when she had told him what she had done. Even yet that gentleman had hopes of a recognition taking place, and he thought Peggy had made it impossible by what he called "her — silly pride."

But now things had come to a crisis. Barnes had received no raise in salary, and debts stared them in the face. With the romance of marriage entirely gone, the shabby sordidness of their surroundings hardened Peggy. A month before this Barnes had suggested that they should go and live with his people at Camden Town, and she had refused, and as week after week he still harped upon this string, she, while her defense became weaker and weaker, loathed the idea more and more.

"We must do something," grumbled Barnes at length, after striding around the room.

"There's one thing you can do."

"What?" he asked.

"You can do with a little less whisky. Only two days ago I asked you for a new pair of gloves and you told me you couldn't afford it. But you're able to pay sixteen shillings for a bottle of whisky."

"Look here," cried Barnes, "I'm not going to do without a drop of whisky for you or anyone. Besides, a man must offer a friend a drink if he comes to see him. And I tell you this—"

He stopped suddenly as if a new thought had struck him, and after a few seconds' silence he went on in more conciliatory tones. "Look here, Peg, old girl," he said, "we are in a bad way. You must forgive me if I spoke to you a bit hasty just now; but I've my pride the same as you have. Of course, things haven't turned out as we expected. I tell you straight, I did hope your father would have been reasonable; I didn't think he'd carry things to such a length as he has, and I thought after he'd got used to the idea he'd have—caved in. But he hasn't. Now I'm as proud as Lucifer in some things, but it's no use being silly."

"You told me you were going to have a raise of salary," snapped Peggy.

"I thought I was, but business is bad, and I'll tell you straight—I dare not ask for more money. The gov-ner gave me a hint only to-day that he might soon ask me to get another place, and if he did I don't know where I could get one. Jobs ain't going begging now like they were. See?"

"You mean that you might be out of work?" asked Peggy.

"That's what I do mean, old girl, and then we should be in the soup—head over ears in the soup. I'm sorry, Peg, really downright sorry."

The girl looked with abject misery towards the fire-place.

PEGGY'S BETRAYAL.

O H, the horror, the degradation of it! For some time she did not know what she was doing, or where she was going. She only knew that she was adrift in London, that she, the daughter of General Trelawney, was alone and unprotected in the London streets, a castaway.

What could she do? Where could she go? A sense of utter desolation and misery possessed her, and she was ashamed beyond words. At that moment she scarcely cared what happened to her. She was not yet nineteen years of age, and what had the future for her?

Up to now she had, in spite of everything, refused to be anything but loyal to Barnes. She had excused his words of cruelty. She had fought against the loathing which sometimes filled her when she realized that she was wedded to him for life. In her way, and in spite of all her faults, she had tried to think kindly of him, and to be loving to him. For his sake she had refused to share Eleanor's offered hospitality. Ay, and more than that, for his sake she had refused to go to her own home. For his sake, too, she had borne with his sister's sneers and jibes and his mother's constant insults. And now it had come to this.

What could she do?

Again the question haunted her. She remembered what Barnes had said only two nights before when she had suggested spending the afternoon with her sister. "You can throw yourself in the river," he had snarled. "I don't care what you do."

Well, why not? Life had nothing to offer her.

She would not go to Eleanor and tell her what had taken place. She simply could not. She could see the look that would come into her sister's eyes, the bitter smile that would curl on her lips.

For a long time she walked, unheeding whither she went. Then presently she realized that she had passed from the streets and had entered an open space. The wind had risen and dark clouds were being swept across the sky. Above her head she saw patches of blue and here and there a star shining.

Why, this was Hampstead Heath! She was near home; not more than five minutes' walk from her father's house. Almost instinctively she thought of the morning when her father and mother had come to her, and she remembered the former's words: "Good-morning, my dear; you'll remember that your father's and mother's house is always open to you."

She had felt at the time that his unconscious emphasis on the last word was an insult to the man to whom she had sworn to be loyal, but now it came to her like healing balm. They still loved her. In spite of everything she was her Dad's little Peggy still.

Great sobs rose to her throat, sobs which almost choked her.

"What shall I do? What shall I do?" she wailed. "Oh, God, help me! Oh, if they only would, if they only would! But I dare not! I'm ashamed!"

Her old home seemed like heaven to her now, and the restrictions which at one time seemed so irksome were something to rejoice in. Oh, to have a home, and tenderness, and love! To be with her own people! To breathe the atmosphere of affection and refinement! Oh, God help her.—if she only could!

What would John say? What would Trev's fiancée say? Did her father really mean it when he told her she might come home? He was a proud man and would shudder at anything like disgrace coming to his name; and she had disgraced it by becoming the wife of such a creature as Barnes. And yet—

Then there came to her memory, like some long-forgotten dream, the words she had read in childhood, and forgotten in her girlhood. A saying from the most beautiful story ever told. "I will arise and go to my father and I will say unto him, Father, I have sinned. . . ."

But could she? All the time she had been walking, walking, she knew not whither. Then suddenly she saw a light. Yes, it was home! That was her father's house! That was a light coming from one of the windows.

She crept wearily along no longer. Her feet seemed to be winged, and she rushed pantingly to the door of her old home.

She knocked timidly, like one afraid. Then as there was no answer, more loudly.

She heard footsteps in the hall, firm, decided footsteps, and the door opened.

"Yes, what is it?"

It was her father's voice.

"It's me, Dad. . . . Peggy. . . . Will you let me come in?"

"Peggy?"

"Yes, Dad I've—I've come home. I have no home but this. Will you have me?"

In a second the general understood. He required no mental process to comprehend everything. His heart leapt to the truth.

"My little Peggy!" he cried. "Come in, my darling! Come in! you must be cold. Come in! There, let me see your face. Kiss your old dad, my little girl! I am glad you have come!"

He drew her to the warm, well-lighted room as he spoke, and held her close to his heart, while the girl sobbed convulsively.

"I didn't know—I was—so near! Then I saw the light!

I—I didn't know what I was doing! But—but I couldn't help it! I have come home, Dad!—I'm so miserable and—ashamed!"

Her words came incoherently between great heart-breaking sobs. She scarcely knew what she was saying, but the long pent-up feelings which had been buried in her heart for months were trying to find expression.

Meanwhile her father held her to his heart. His brain even yet had failed to grasp the situation, but his love made him understand everything.

"There, there, Peggy, it's all right! It's your old home, my dear! No matter what's happened. Everything is right," and his voice was hoarse because his heart was a wild tumult.

"I'm—I'm so ashamed," stammered Peggy, "but—but I couldn't help coming. Something drew me here in spite of myself. When I found out what I was—what it all meant, I think I went mad. I didn't know where I was going. I thought I would go to the river and throw myself into the water. . . . There seemed nothing else for me. Then I saw I was on the heath, and—and I didn't know where I was going, although I kept on walking. Then I saw the light. . . . Will—will you have me, Dad? I know I've been a bad girl, but I couldn't help coming home; something made me."

"Have you! Of course I'll have you! There, my darling, don't fear anything, your old dad is here; he will keep you safe. There, sit before the fire and let me pull off your wet cold boots; then I'll go to your mother and tell her you have come home."

He drew her to an armchair as he spoke, and took off her hat and jacket.

"Are you better now, my little Peg?" he went on, scarcely realizing what he was saying or doing. "You're cold and hungry, aren't you? There, there now, don't cry. It's all right. I'll go and fetch Mother."

"No, no! not yet!" sobbed the girl.

"What shall I do for you then? I'm so glad to see you, Peg. Is there anything you want? I'll get Mother here in a minute. She'll know better than I what to do."

"No, no! not yet," persisted Peggy. "Please, Dad," she sobbed, "let me sit on your knee like I used to. I haven't sat on your knee—since—before the war, and—and . . ."

"Yes, my darling," said the General, whose eyes were brimming with tears, "that's it! There now, sit on my knee and put your arms round my neck, as you used to years ago, and tell me everything."

She laid her head on his shoulder like a tired, broken-hearted child and then she sobbed out her story. . . . Such a pitiful story! So common, yet so tragic. She told it between heart-broken sobs and exclamations of shame and sorrow.

"And is that all?" asked the General at length.

"That's all, except that I want to be with you, and—and I want—oh, I want Mother!"

"Of course you do! It's all right. Your old Dad is gladder than words can tell to have you back. Yes, I understand what you feel. It's all a miserable business;—but never mind, you have come home now. There, there, kiss me again, my dear."

"But—but do you really forgive me? Do you really mean to say that you'll have me here, just as if I hadn't been so wicked? For, oh, I have been so miserable!—so ashamed!—and—and I do want to be good, and I do want Mother."

"Of course you do!" The General half laughed and half sobbed out the words. "Don't be afraid, Peggy, we'll make everything right. The old miserable past is over, and in some way we'll begin anew. There, there, I'll go and fetch Mother."

He rushed away as he spoke, while the child looked around the room she had known all her life. There were the old books, the old pictures, the old furniture. Everything she saw seemed to bid her welcome, everything seemed to tell her of an undying love. This was home—the home which in her madness, and in her wickedness, she had left, but which was now the haven of refuge for which she so longed.

International Sunday-School Lesson

Mary, The Mother of Jesus

July 1, 1923

LUKE 2:41-52.

"Blessed art thou among women."—Luke 1:42.

SERMON limits preclude going into the historic reasons for Mary's adoration. One might tell of the great church councils and controversies of the fourth and fifth centuries—how the idea of Mary's right to receive homage became associated with a belief in Christ's divinity, as if the mother of one who was divine must have a larger share of divinity than any other mother of men; which idea, growing and becoming exaggerated, led to enthroning her above all humanity. One might relate how men linked Christ's divinity to that of His mother, and when that of the mother was attacked fought wordy battles in its defense, as if its overthrow must somehow imperil our reverence for the Christ.

One might review the host of legends and myths that gathered themselves from all the imaginations of the remotest past, and clustered about the name of one who was so highly favored among women. It might be shown how easy it was for heathen minds, accustomed to worship their goddesses, to transfer their affectionate reverence to the mother of their new-found Lord, carrying their former paganism into their new Christianity, just as men to-day carry much of old prejudices and idolatries of wealth and fashion into their Christianity.

It is natural that there should rise this veneration for Mary. Let us note some of its effects on men's lives. Those effects were in part harmful and degrading, but also (let us be fair in this matter) in part purifying and elevating. On the one hand, her worship tended to diminish the adoration of Christ by centering the more affectionate thoughts of believers upon His mother rather than on Himself. There is a Romish picture described by Robertson in which Christ is represented as a wrathful judge about to destroy the earth which is being saved by the piteous intercession of Mary. The picture is an extreme instance of how much more tender was the feeling toward Mary than toward Christ. I am, however, aware that the Catholic theologians declare the worship paid to her, however strong, is inferior to that paid to Christ—the one being but an extreme form of the reverence for sainthood, and the other the sacrificial worship of divinity. But it is only too apparent in practice (however the theologians may distinguish between hyperdulia and latria, the two forms of worship), that in the minds of ignorant worshipers there is very little distinction between the reverence they pay to Mary and that which they pay to God, except, perhaps, that the feeling for the Virgin is the more tender. Thus the direct worship of Mary on the part of the ignorant may be substituted for the worship of God in Christ; while the intervention of the Virgin as intercessor between the believers and the Son of God, which is the faith even of the learned Catholic, may prevent free personal access to God. To remove men by so much the more from their Father in heaven, when they already feel too far away from Him—that were a tragic result of such Mariolatry!

On the other hand, by constantly associating Mary's motherhood with Christ's incarnation we must admit that this worship has tended to ennoble motherhood in men's minds, thus hastening the evolution of the ideal human mother, of which Henry Drummond so eloquently wrote. It has helped to make the office of mother, which was so lightly esteemed in pagan civilization, more sacred among us. Just as childhood and infancy wear a new halo of glory from Christ's nativity, so motherhood won its aureole in part by Mary's maternity.

It also elevates womanhood as well as motherhood by presenting so high an ideal as that of Mary. "Like God, like worshiper," the old proverb reversed, has application here in the effect of the purity, the gentleness, the humility of the Madonna on the hearts of her adorers. I have no doubt that many a rude man in the long centuries of the Church has been softened by the contemplation of her gentleness, and myriad Catholic maidens throughout the ages have grown into sweeter, purer women under the influence of their Holy Mother.

This veneration of the Virgin has also exalted woman's position in the world by exalting the diviner qualities which she may have in common with Mary. It has increased men's respect for woman, enhanced their tenderness and chivalry towards her, as was so well instanced by the attitude of the knights of the Middle Ages, who wore on their crests some token of devotion to Our Lady.

And now in our day, however exaggerated or false the adoration of the woman; Mary of Nazareth, may be, the womanly qualities she represents are as worthy of our admiration as of old; for are they not the very Christian qualities which are so endearing in the spirit of Jesus? The words with which Goethe concludes his masterpiece are permanent and true:

"The Woman soul leadeth us, upward and on!"

Seekers after God, men must find something human and tender in God or they will adore a human being like Mary. God must be humanly lovable and loving, or human hearts cannot really love Him in return. Fellow Christians, while we exalt Christ's divinity, let us never forget, as did the churchmen of the fourth and fifth centuries, the sympathy and nearness to us of the man Jesus. He is our Saviour, not only because He is so divine, but just as truly because He is so human.

One more, let no prejudice excited by the falsity of Catholic worship prevent the outflung admiration of our hearts for this beautiful soul. In all the history of women there has been none more humble and reverent, more gentle and sweet, more pure and modest, more self-controlled—in short, more womanly in the beauty and strength of that word, than Mary of Nazareth. She who throughout her life, as Luke said of her, kept all these things concerning Christ's childhood, pondering them in her heart, had a strength of beautiful reticence and quiet self-restraint, rare and lovable. She that nursed at her breast and that guided with mother hands the childish steps of the world's future Saviour ought not to be forgotten by that world. Jesus was tempted in all points like as we are, even as a boy. Is there ever a time that temptation presses harder than in boyhood, and do you doubt that God used the mother's heart and the mother's thoughtfulness to train and lead out into manhood the heart and mind of the boy Jesus? Christ, I repeat, was as truly a man as He was God, and what human being ever reached his full humanity without a mother's influence?

Gentle, loving mother, searching for her boy lest he be lost from the caravan that came back from the Jerusalem festival! Sweet, retiring woman, that sunk her life out of sight, making no display of the fact that she was the mother of the people's prophet, as many a mother might have done! Tender, silent mother, bravest and loyalest, unashamed and unafraid when others forsook Him, standing there at the foot of the cross of thy crucified Son (His blood over thee, his eyes upon thee, with a son's tenderness as He gives thee to the beloved disciple's care)—by the love of that Son's gaze, by the mourning of thy mother-heart, what before was our honor for a beautiful soul is touched now with our sorrow, and crowned now with our love.

Foreign Correspondence

Letter from France: The Congress for Social Christianity in Strassburg, Alsace

IN 1887 a group of men of heart and faith, pastors and laymen, greatly concerned to see the masses of workmen more and more dominated by economic materialism and restricted to the interests of their class, founded at Nîmes, the old Gallo-Roman city of Augustus and Antoninus, the "Association Protestante pour l'Etude Pratique des Questions Sociales" (1). About the same time the "Revue de Theologie Pratique" (2) saw the light of day and became the organ of the rising movement and shortly took the name of "Revue du Christianisme Social" (3). This new current of ideas and life traveled through the different organizations of French Protestantism: Reformed, Lutheran or Independent, by means of intense propaganda and overcame little by little certain oppositions founded far less on ill-will than on a too evident and too frequent misunderstanding of the two problems of the moment (in particular all the aspirations towards greater social justice in the midst of the laborers' democracy) and also on a conception exclusively individualist and too materialistic super-earthly concerning the interests of Christ. In studying the economic facts in the light of the Gospel and the Gospel by the light of economic facts and in penetrating more and more the social value of the prophetic preaching of justice and of the apostolic idea of solidarity, in orienting oneself more and more in the sense of the co-operation of classes as opposed to their competition which is only the disguised and hardly mitigated form of war, the sixteen congresses of the "Association Protestante" which have been held from 1887 to 1914 (in Paris, Marseilles, Lyons, Nantes, Bordeaux, Geneva or elsewhere), have profoundly modified the state of opinion; and at present there are very few of the young candidates in our theological faculties in Paris, Strasburg or Montpellier, very few of the young members of our Christian Associations or of our Students' Federations who do not claim for themselves with a legitimate pride the title Social Christians. The fact is, that they have understood that Christianity of the future will be socialistic or it will not be. Let us say more exactly that the Christianity of Christ is socialistic in its very essence, and that it is a misfortune almost irreparable for the Church to have understood it so late. God grant that it may not be too late.

At the beginning it was a movement almost exclusively theoretical. It did not delay, nevertheless, in assuming the practical aspect imposed by a situation which did not permit to Social Christians more than to content themselves with an academic study of the works of Bastiat and of Karl Marx or of vibrating to the flaming harangues of Jaurès. It is the time when, toward 1901, those centers of religious, moral and social activity were created, which took the names of "Solidarités" or of "Fraternités" (in Rouen, Roubaix, Lille, Paris, Alais, etc.), and which became for the churches like a missionary advance guard preserving or bringing again contact with masses of workmen who were more and more hostile to a religion which appeared to them as a guardian of privileges, as a gendarme of capital. Without separating and isolating itself from the precedent, this new movement began to display its individuality clearly and asserted itself by founding at Besançon in 1910 a movement called "Action Chrétienne Sociale" (4), which allied itself with a great burst of enthusiasm with the social Christians and the Christian Socialists, who believed that if there is a time for study, there is also a time for action. Consequently, they worked out a program of practical realizations defining the democratic, economic, moral and international standpoint of the new group, which recalls the one recently prepared by our brethren in the United States; and they went to work immediately, for it was then the time to repeat the celebrated phrase, "Action is now in order," the horizon of the nations is becoming dark.

(1) Protestant Association for the Practical Study of Social Questions. (2) Review of Practical Theology. (3) Review of Social Christianity. (4) Social Christian Activity. (5) The proceedings of the Congress of Strasburg are in press and will appear shortly in the form of a volume in octavo of about 200 pages at the price of six francs for subscribers. Address the "Bureaux du Christianisme Social," 2 rue Balay, St-Etienne, Loire, France. (6) Social Service of Faith and Life. (7) Fraternities Movement. (8) French Protestant Federation of Social Christianity. (9) The "Revue du Christianisme Social" (Review of Social Christianity) appears ten times a year in issues in octavo of from 80 to 100 pages. The price for annual subscription is 18 francs in France and 20 francs in foreign countries. Single numbers are sold at 2 to 4 francs, according to importance. Address to the Director of the Review: M. le Pasteur Elie Gounelle, 2 rue Balay, St-Etienne, Loire, France.

A little later, indeed, a frightful tempest swept the planet with the violence of a cyclone. How many hopes perished in the storm! How many projects buried in the bloody mud of the trenches! It seemed that the cause of social Christianity and even of Christianity had experienced, from the fact of war, an irreparable defeat. In reality, it is the contrary which became true in the first hours that followed the Armistice. If something perished in the maelstrom of 1914, it was the purely individualistic and intellectual notion of Christianity. It is a piety which, concerning itself only with the salvation of man in the future world, abandons to the enterprises of selfishness and of violence the sacred field where should be realized the great human brotherhood. On the contrary, that which appears as the great necessity of the moment is a religion which assuredly transforms, regenerates the individual, but also applies to the collectivity, that is to say, to the masses, to classes and races, the renewing and redeeming power which streams from the Gospel of Jesus of Nazareth. If those who believe do not decide to put in the realm of life, in the laws, in the institutions and in the customs the divine ferment of which they are the depositaries, nothing can answer for the future of civilization. Under the empire of the interests in conflict and under the lash of exasperated hatreds, the frightful catastrophe of which we still feel the last convulsions will be renewed indefinitely from quarter of a century to quarter of a century. It will be the destruction of the Church and the end of humanity.

It is in the presence of these dramatic prospectives, under the impression of these solemn thoughts, that the "Association," whose history we have just briefly retraced and showed its physiognomy, was called together last June for its seventeenth Congress. They had the immense pleasure to meet in Strasburg, the noble and grand capital of Alsace, which became French again by the play of that which Gambetta called immanent justice, more than by the force of arms. One could see in the course of our meetings for work, for discussion or for edification that if our joy was great at the sight of the redressing of a wrong which carried in itself since 1871 the germs of a new conflict, there was nothing mean, nothing chauvinistic, nothing imperialistic in the manner in which the national or international problems were set and settled. The presence in Strasburg of foreign delegations coming from Switzerland, England, America, Italy and even from Germany was in itself a guarantee of this fraternal broad-mindedness from which the French social Christians do not intend to depart in the least toward those who have been most blameworthy toward their Fatherland, if at least they decide to confess and to make reparations.

One saw it clearly when, having founded the group of French fraternities, their representatives decided immediately to unite with the international federation of these institutional churches which are one of the best means for the evangelization of the proletariat. And how can one forget the sight afforded by the Congress when in the great meeting at the new temple consecrated to the World Alliance, after having listened to the Ragatzes, the Foerstes, the Dickinsons, the Monods ardently plead the cause of peace between the peoples through the friendship of the churches, the whole immense assembly rose to intone, each one singing in his own particular language, the immortal carol of Luther which remains the symbolic song of the world Reformation: Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott. The spirit of Pentecost is not dead in the Church of Jesus Christ.

It is not possible for us to give to our American readers a detailed account of the meetings of the Strasburg Congress (5). The details would not interest them; they will be especially sensitive to the turn taken by the debates, which took up such fatal subjects as the Christian use of wealth, the pedagogic reform of the social patronat, the political attitude of Social Christians facing the grave problems debated in European parliaments. It goes without saying that the best place was made for Alsace and the Alsations who resumed their places at the common hearth of the French Protestants, and who opened before the Congress the treasure of the social experience accumulated for more than a century in the course of their wide industrial enterprises. We do not forget indeed that it was Alsace that gave to the Reformation the celebrated Bucer, with whom the interest in social questions was so sharply marked. In Alsace there lived from 1740 to 1826 this precursor of Social Christianity, who was the celebrated Pastor Oberlin, reformer of that wild canton of the Vosges, called the "Ban de la Roche." It is from this same "Vallée de la Bruche" that came great chiefs of the Alsatian industry, the Legrands, the Dieterlins, the Steinheils, who were filled with the spirit of social Christianity. It is to Mulhaus that we owe the Dolfuses, the Engels, the Gouths, the Siegfrieds. There were from Alsace-Lorraine, Louis Gouth and Tommy Fallot, the founders of our old "Association Protestante pour l'Etude des Questions Sociales," which was united at the Congress of Strasburg to the "Action Chrétienne Sociale" and to two or three other similar groups, such as the "Service Social de Foi et Vie" (6) and the "Mouvement des Fraternités" (7), to form the "Fédération Protestante Française du Christianisme Social" (8). It was at the "Ban de la Roche," in a pious pilgrimage which assembled the members of the Congress before the tomb and in the Church of Oberlin, that the last measures destined to assure the future progress of the young federation were concluded.

Our readers will learn with joy that its president remains the eminent economist, Charles Gide, the apostle of co-operation, and the "Revue du Christianisme Social" (9) so brilliantly directed by the valiant Elie Gounelle, will be more and more the organ charged with multiplying the rays of life and with increasing its influence, whether in France or beyond its borders. For it is certainly as an apostolate, as a mission that the after-war Social Christians understand their task. Their only ambition is to bring the message of the Gospel into the tram of history, to place at the heart of the human being this irresistible leaven which is the living and vivifying Spirit of the Messiah. They believe in Christ, Saviour of the whole man and of all men. They believe in humanity; they believe in the Kingdom of God.

ONE BOOK A WEEK

Under this caption, each week, we shall direct attention to some striking book, such as no Minister or those interested in religious thought and action can afford to remain unacquainted with

Four Collaborated Books on Religious Foundations

IN the history of religious thought no books have made more stir than those which have occasionally appeared where several authors have collaborated, writing on different aspects of the faith in the same volume. One has only to recall Essays and Reviews of sixty years ago or Lux Mundi of forty years ago, and in more recent times Foundations published by a group of Oxford scholars under the direction of Canon Streeter.

The fashion seems to be returning, and four books have just come to our desk in which eight or ten writers have dwelt upon the different aspects of the Christian faith and yet through all of it they hold a certain unity of thought. For instance, from the Stoneman Press, Columbus, Ohio, there comes The Faith of a Modern Christian, which consists of a series of papers by The Theological Seventeen. The Theological Seventeen are a group of pastors of different denominations bound together into a fellowship. At their meetings, papers on theological subjects have been read and freely discussed. It occurred to them that a valuable contribution might be made to theological thought if each one of the members was asked to prepare a paper on the general subject of "The Faith of a Modern Christian," and this book is the result. The chapters deal with such subjects as "An Outline Statement of the Faith for To-day," "Modern Science and Christian Faith," "The Christian Idea of God," "The New Testament," "The Old Testament," "The Christian Idea of Christ," "The Christian Idea of Man," "The Christian Idea of Salvation," "The Christian Idea of Prayer," "The Christian Idea of the Church" and "Internationalism."

The authors are pastors in various communions and they have produced a very stimulating and suggestive book. We imagine that whoever reads this book will be somewhat surprised at the rather radical positions that are taken, and if the book is an index of the progress of modern thought in the average American city, there is not much hope for the fundamentalists winning their case. It should be said that although the papers are theologically pretty radical, a very beautiful religious spirit runs through them all.

At the same time there comes to us from the press of the Macmillan Company, New York, Religious Foundations, a series of papers by various authors, most of whom are well known to the churches. These authors have been in the habit of meeting at a religious summer school at Haverford College, and as the school could not be convened last year, those who have generally taken part in it, have been asked to contribute one article on this general theme, and they have been bound together in this extremely suggestive book. The book has a very unusual quality, as its editor, Professor Rufus M. Jones says. It is written in the sincerest manner, every man honestly stating his thought regardless of where the conclusions lead, but the interesting thing is that the conclusions of almost all of these men lead to the same thing—that liberal thought eventuates in the strong faith in the eternal verities by which men can interpret the universe satisfactorily to themselves and lead triumphant lives. The ten topics are dealt with by such men as Professor Jones, Dr. Sperry, Seebohm Rowntree, Clutton-Brock, Elihu Grant, Professor Jacks, Professor Lyman and Professor Peabody. They are as follows: "How Shall We Think of God?" "How Shall We Think of Christ?" "How Shall We Think of Man?" "What Shall We Think of Nature?" "How Shall We Think of Society and Human Relationships?" "How Shall We Think of the Kingdom of God?" "What Shall We Think of the Bible?" "How Shall We Think of Evil?" "How Shall We Think of Progress?" "How Shall We Think of Life After Death?"

Another volume which has just come to us from London, and which has been published in this country by E. P. Dutton and Company from the house of John Murray, London, is called The Christian Faith and is a series of essays written at the instance of the British Christian Evidence Society, edited by Dr. C. F. Nolloth, of Oriel College, Oxford. These eleven chapters written by such men as Professor Webb of Oxford, Dr. Stanton, the Rev. W. M. Bell, Dr. Kennett of Queen's College, Cambridge, the Rev. R. Webb-Odell, Professor Peake, Dr. Nolloth, Dr. Gardner of Oxford, Dean Rashdall of Carlisle, Canon Barnes of Westminster, and Professor Watson, deal with the following topics: "Religion and Philosophy," "The Comparative Study of Religions," "The Bible and Science," "The Religious Value of the Old Testament," "The Evidences of Christianity," "The New Testament Record," "Jesus Christ," "The Ethics of Christ," "Christianity and Social Problems," "Modern Psychology: Its Bearing on Religious Teaching," and "Christianity and History."

This volume is a little different from the others, inasmuch as each writer wrote without any previous conference with either the editor or the other writers and the subjects treated are thus regarded from quite different points of view. Yet the consistency of the book, as a whole, does not suffer. Another interesting thing about these essays is that they are written with parents in view, realizing that there is a need of soundness in religious education which has been intensified by the last eight or ten years of stress through which the world has passed.

So that the chapters not only tell of the great fundamental problems of the faith, but also give instructions for the best way of imparting instructions on these problems to insure reception by the pupil. All of this gives a certain directness to the writing which will appeal to the average reader.

The Return of Christendom is written by a group of leading thinkers in the Anglican Church, and has an introduction by Bishop Gore and an epilogue by G. K. Chesterton. The Macmillan Company, who have published the book in America, have also added an introduction by Bishop Brent. These chapters, as is stated in the prefatory note, have been in every case the subject of careful consultation between the writers concerned, and so are in every sense the fruit of their collaboration. The authors of these chapters are not so well known in America as some of the writers in some of the other collaborated books, but are all men who hold leading places in the Anglican communion, and these chapters are not confined purely to the theological aspects of the faith, but deal with the application of Christianity through all the problems of our time. Indeed, this is the note that is emphasized in the book. The very first paper is on the "Idea of Christendom in Relation to Modern Society," and the other chapters take up this same thought only along more detailed lines. They carry it out into industry, into property and into socialism, so that the fundamental note of the book is really the return of the Kingdom of God. Yet there are interesting papers on the return of Dogma, and what form it shall take. The last chapter by Father Bull is on "The Kingdom of God and the Church To-day," and is provocative of much thought. The book as a whole is devoted to what Bishop Brent feels is one of the growing needs of the times to a searching study of the present condition of industry and a plea for humanization, moralization and Christianization of property and the whole of the social order.

All of the books we have mentioned on this page are worthy of very careful reading and study.

EPISCOPALIANS AND THE CONFERENCE ON FAITH AND ORDER

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN WORK:

I venture to suggest that the editorial in the issue of April 14, "Episcopalians and Unity," is a little bit behind the times. I guess whoever wrote it forgot the apology the General Convention of the Episcopal Church made in October, 1910, when it started the movement. I enclose a copy of our first pamphlet containing the Report and Apology which was accepted by the Convention. Episcopalians, however, among their other faults, remain human, and while they sometimes reach a high plane, once in a while the atmosphere is too rarified for them and they descend, but for twelve and a half years the Commission on the World Conference of the Episcopal Church has been advertising that apology and doing its utmost to secure the cordial co-operation of the other churches. The Continuation Committee has striven since its appointment to make it clear that it represents the seventy-eight churches which sent delegates to the meeting at Geneva in August, 1920, and it has consistently urged each and everyone of these commissions to recognize that its share in the enterprise is exactly the same as that of the Episcopal Church. I shall be very grateful if you can stress this point now. We are very anxious that the other churches shall take an active part in the leadership, especially in the group conferences which we are trying to get formed and which it seems to us will be absolutely essential if any proper preparation is to be made for the World Conference itself. We think we need the active interest and co-operation not only of every church, but of the rank and file of each church. Unity will never be reached by the action of a few leaders, no matter how learned and saintly they may be. I do not think that the action of the Ecumenical Councils or any other action of Christians has ever become efficient until it was adopted and supported by the great body of the Church. Moreover, we have advertised from the beginning that we recognize that special treasures have been entrusted to the stewardship of particular churches, and our hope is that through the World Conference these may be available for all Christians in a common storehouse. Personally I have never been able to make up my mind finally on the question of the exchange of pulpits. I voted enthusiastically in the General Convention at Richmond, which I think was sixteen years ago, in favor of a canon which made possible such exchanges, although there was a restriction in it which I would have preferred to see omitted. I think from some points of view such an exchange would be most desirable, but on the other hand I think it would tend to conceal the fact that differences still exist, and I do not believe that our differences will ever be removed until we face them fairly and fearlessly.

ROBERT H. GARDINER,

Secretary of the World Conference on Faith and Order.

[The apology to which Mr. Gardiner refers runs as follows: "We would place ourselves by the side of our fellow-Christians, looking not only on our own things, but also on the things of others, convinced that our one hope of mutual understanding is in taking personal counsel together in the spirit of love and forbearance. It is our conviction that such a Conference for the purpose of study and discussion, without power to legislate or to adopt resolutions, is the next step toward unity. With grief for our aloofness in the past, and for other faults of pride and self-sufficiency, which make for schism; with loyalty to the truth as we see it, and with respect for the convictions of those who differ from us; holding the belief that the beginnings of unity are to be found in the clear statement and full consideration of those things in which we differ, as well as of those things in which we are at one, we respectfully submit the following resolution."]

TITHING LITERATURE FOR CHILDREN FREE

Until September 1, 1923, we hereby offer a pamphlet containing "A Mother's Story of Her Two Boys" and "When Jim Mercer Signed Up" to pastors, Sunday school superintendents and teachers in such quantities as they can wisely use, free, postage paid.

Please mention THE CHRISTIAN WORK; also give your denomination.

The Layman Company, 35 North Dearborn Street, Chicago.

The American Child Health Association, believing that health is a matter of sound education, and that no greater creed can be spread through the world than the gospel of good health, has instituted a unique series of health scholarships, to be awarded to teachers in service who have been especially successful in teaching health. The $10,000 allotted to these scholarships will be distributed as follows:

Five $1,000 scholarships and fellowships to college graduates now in service as principals, or elementary school supervisors.

Five $500 scholarships to normal school graduates or college graduates now engaged in classroom teaching.

Fifteen $200 scholarships to holders of teachers' certificates, now engaged in classroom teaching.

The committee announces that these sums are not fixed ones, but approximate, depending upon circumstances, and that although the conditions require the teacher to be in service at present, an exception to this rule may be made in favor of any teacher who has already done exceptional work in health education.

Further details concerning these scholarships may be had by writing to the association at 370 Seventh Avenue, New York City.

LOOKING 'EM OVER AT THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

[The "General Assembly Daily News" published the following verses on May 22. The hero of the third stanza is John Willis Baer; of the fifth stanza, Dr. Reid, of Oakland, California:]

"My friend," said Elder Juggins, "my anxiety is this,

To teach you to identify the men of prominence.

That weary man you see up there a-pounding with his gavel

Is the honored Moderator who's job is to unravel

The parliamentary tangles and make the business travel.

"The gentleman behind him, who's now rising to his feet

Is the Clerk of the Assembly—he will now say, 'I repeat,'

He writes down all the minutes with his dollar fountain-pen,
And steers the soaring orators back to the earth again,
When they seem about to rise beyond the range of human ken.

"And now, pray look most carefully, for, walking up the aisle

A former Moderator comes, a-smiling of his smile

He knows the whole Apostles' Creed—which no one can confute

And he is the glass of fashion all the way from hat to boot.

As he walks up to his section in his summer ice-cream suit.

"Those three sad-looking gentlemen consoling of each other

A-falling on each other's necks and saying, 'Courage, Brother.'

Are true-blue Presbyterians in every respect;

They never are unorthodox; nor do they genuflect;

But sad to say, they are to-day, among the non-elect."

"But Elder Juggins, tell me quick, who is this frequent sage,

Who rises to each question, and rushes to the stage,

Who to the welfare of the church shows such complete devotion,

That he must give his eloquence to each and every motion—

Who may he be?" Said Juggins, "I have not the faintest notion."

A GOLDEN JUBILEE IN THE MINISTRY

The Rev. Dr. Henry Mottet, rector of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the Holy Communion, Twentieth Street and Sixth Avenue, is celebrating the golden jubilee of his ministry, the whole of it in the same pulpit, by raising one-quarter of a million dollars to erect a six-story community house for this downtown district of New York City, now destitute of all other Protestant Church influence.

The Church of the Holy Communion is an old landmark of "little old New York," for it was built seventy-seven years ago on its present site, which was then over a mile north of the city limits. It was founded as a free church—the first church of its kind in New York City and one of the very first in the United States. It welcomed the poor as well as the rich, the colored as well as the white, to worship together in one common fellowship. No pews were sold, as was the custom in other churches, and the offerings were voluntary, members of the congregation giving according to their means. The church was founded with the mission not to save people from hell, but help them make this world heaven.

During his fifty years as minister of this historic church Dr. Mottet has had three big tasks to perform. His first task was to assure forever the permanency of the church on this section of Manhattan, so that these people might not be without a place to worship. This he did by establishing an endowment fund. The first $100,000 toward this fund was begun with twelve one dollar gold pieces placed in a little silk bag on the altar by twelve working girls of the community. Since then the endowment fund has increased to over $600,000.

His next great task was to modernize the church building. The entire sanctuary was reconstructed, beautiful fifteenth century art windows replaced the old ones, and the finest organ of its size was installed.

Dr. Mottet's third big task is still unfinished—the building of a great community house for this downtown district. "For years," says Dr. Mottet, "I have studied and planned for the creation of a community house which shall meet the needs of the thousands of men, women and young people, who are my constant neighbors and devoted friends working and living in this part of Manhattan. To celebrate my fiftieth anniversary as minister of the Church of the Holy Communion I am raising $250,000 to make possible this community house, which will be the only community house in this part of the city where there is practically no place for young people to meet for social mingling, few wholesome amusements, and no noon hour or after work recreation center."

REV. WALTER SPENCE ON EVOLUTION AND CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN WORK:

The writer is utterly amazed and righteously indignant that any minister of the Gospel, assuming the name of "a Christian," should be permitted the use of the columns of THE CHRISTIAN WORK to broadcast his rationalistic caricature of every historical and doctrinal statement of God's Word as to the origin of man, the origin and nature of sin, and the mission and work of Jesus Christ in the redemption of sinful and sinning humanity. We refuse to become a party to any further dissemination of his blatant infidelity by quoting or discussing any portion of an article that is the ranklest exposé of the fact that "evolution" is the arch-enemy of Christian faith and character and of the Christian church that has ever been discussed by a professedly "Christian minister," and appeared in and been promulgated by a religious paper within the writer's knowledge. It is, however, a case wherein "the wrath of man is made to praise God" and bless humanity in disclosing the atheistic infidelity and apostasy of this type of so-called "Christian evolution," and in defiantly challenging the Christian church to a "dual to the death" in defense of the Bible as the Word of God and of its own existence, mission and redemptive character.

Suffice it to say that, if the Rev. Walter Spence is correct in his "evolutionary hypotheses," the Bible is the basest fraud that has ever been imposed upon the human race, and Christianity the most heartless, cruel and deceptive of all similarly false and "pagan" religions, and the preachers of it are the worse foes and deceivers of their fellow-men the world has ever known.

We submit this article as the evidence of this fact, and challenge the author's right to the name of "Christian" in any evangelical, rational or Biblical sense. Ingersoll and Darwin were as "orthodox" in their onslaughts against the Word of God and Christianity in their day as is this article on "Christian evolution" by a "Congregational pastor" of our own.

I have been a reader of THE CHRISTIAN WORK and its predecessors all the forty-four years of my ministry and greatly appreciate it, but an article as "rank" as the above almost drives me to "giving it up" forever. I certainly could not commend it as a family paper, or to anyone but a discriminating reader who does his own thinking. That article will do more to undermine the faith of men in the Word of God, Christianity and the ministry than anything THE CHRISTIAN WORK has ever contained, and I regret it.

J. A. LIVINGSTON SMITH.

"WHOM GOD HATH NOT JOINED"

Under this title Rev. Joseph Fort Newton discusses divorce in the "Atlantic Monthly" for June. He believes that in a completely Christian social order there would be no divorce problem, for the Christian spirit would forgive everything. The Church should recognize that comparatively few marriages are truly Christian, and either make a distinction between Christian and "common" marriage, or else perform religious ceremonies only for those who profess Christian principles, and then recognize no divorce. There are many marriages, he asserts, which should not have taken place, and in some of these the marriage relation is more immoral than divorce. "The sanctity of marriage lies in a sacred union of hearts," and where there is no longer love the true marriage has ceased. The law should not go into detail, but should provide special courts with both men and women judges where such questions can be dealt with properly. "The real remedy lies in making marriage a nobler and finer thing than it is. . . . Until we have learned to live with ourselves and keep the peace, we may not hope to live with another without friction."

TOWARD CHURCH UNION

The Cleveland Congregational Union and the Presbytery of Cleveland on May 7, in joint session, adopted resolutions calling for organic union of the two communions. They also voted: "That all matters pertaining to the local missionary enterprises within the territory common to the Presbytery and Congregational Union shall hereafter be considered in joint sessions of the executive boards now conducting the church work. At their joint sessions all plans for the support of churches, establishing new ones, or readjustments of existing churches, shall be passed upon and determined, provided that no existing contracts be violated."

THE MONDAY CLUB SERMONS

give to the Sunday-school teacher inspiring and practical insight into the essential spiritual messages of the International Uniform Lessons. The book consists of a series of short expository sermons on the lessons by such leading American preachers as Francis E. Clark, W. E. Barton, Charles Reynolds Brown, William Elliot Griffis, Cornelius H. Patton, John E. Tuttle, and others.

Dr. Frederick Lynch, editor of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, says in a recent letter:

"The other day The Monday Club Sermons for 1923 happened to come to my hand, and I was very much impressed both by the list of contributors, and by the unusually fine standard of the execution."

Dr. Lynch has arranged with us to run The Monday Club Sermons serially in THE CHRISTIAN WORK, beginning with the January 27th issue. But many Sunday-school teachers, pastors and superintendents will wish to own the whole series, so as to have it at all times conveniently at hand. #### THE REPARATIONS TANGLE

The amended German reparations note communicated on June 7 is the most business-like document that has yet come from the German Foreign Office. The note re-emphasizes Germany's willingness to accept the decision of an impartial commission of inquiry as to the amount and method of German reparation payments, and offers to supply all available information necessary to form a reliable judgment on her capacity to pay. It proposes a total of 1,200,000,000 gold marks per annum as "part of a definite reparations settlement": (a) 500,000,000 to be realized from the annual bond interest on a 10,000,000,000-mark capitalization of the federal railways; (b) 500,000,000 guaranteed by first mortgage bonds to be levied on the entire business, industry, banking, trade, traffic and agriculture of the country; (c) customs receipts on all imports other than necessities—excise on tobacco, beer, wine and sugar, and on receipts of the spirits monopoly. (It is remarked that the pre-war receipts reached about 800,000,000 gold marks annually, which have now fallen to about one-quarter, but would be automatically increase with Germany's economic recovery.) In conclusion the note emphasizes that in a matter so vast and complicated progress can be achieved only around a conference table, and repeats the request that such a conference be summoned to decide how Germany may best discharge her liability for reparations which she formally acknowledges. No reference is made in the note to France's demand that passive resistance in the Ruhr be stopped at once. Because of this the French press indicates a summary rejection of the offer without examination of its various provisions. There are many signs, however, that the French will not have things quite so much their own way as with the German proposals of last month. The British are ready to concede that the note presents a possible basis for negotiations, even though the annual cash offer may be inadequate. They have previously indicated their readiness for a four-year moratorium, as well as a small stabilization loan. The Belgian disposition toward a less rigid policy in the Ruhr was indicated by the text of her proposals which were allowed to leak out recently. Moreover, the German request for an international commission of inquiry is in line with the general proposal of Secretary Hughes last December, rejected by the French; and "official Washington" is reported to be in further accord with the final paragraph of the German note, in that it believes that no substantial progress can be made except through "oral negotiations." France has been five months in the Ruhr, and the Paris press, which claims that France is on the point of success, is particularly bitter against the more moderate British viewpoint which shows a willingness to negotiate at this point of the proceedings. France is isolating herself more and more from her allies, while Great Britain, Belgium and Italy show signs of finding common ground.

of reconciliation and reconstruction are those dedicated efforts which are made in the spirit of Christ.

THE FRIENDS IN ENGLAND SAY, "REVISE THE TREATY"

The following appeal "To Peoples and Rulers," issued by the Yearly Meeting of the Society of Friends (Quakers) in Great Britain, at their 255th annual meeting held at Devonshire House, Bishopsgate, London, is being distributed widely throughout the world. In England it is being sent to members of the House of Commons and the House of Lords, to public men, to teachers, trade unions, the clergy of all denominations, and so on. Friends overseas will undertake its distribution in the Dominions and through the Friends' Council for International Service, who have already prepared French and German translations, it will be circulated throughout Europe and other parts of the world:

The Society of Friends, brought into close human relations with the suffering people in our own and other countries, during and since the war, both victors and vanquished, feels impelled, as a religious community, to speak out upon the present deplorable state of Europe. The world still gropes for the way of peace. The Treaty of Versailles has failed to bring either peace or security to France and the world. Its enforcement is riveting militarism more firmly upon Europe, destroying the will to peace and intensifying the spirit of revenge. All the conferences held under this influence have likewise failed.

On financial, economic and political grounds the Treaty of Versailles has been arraigned. We, however, are burdened chiefly with its fundamental immorality. The first consideration for the framers should have been to relieve the common suffering of the peoples rather than to increase the power of victor states. It was wrong to exclude the conquered from the Peace Conference, wrong to impute sole guilt and to extort an admission of that guilt by the weapon of starvation, and it was wrong to ignore the promise of better terms to a democratic Germany. The treaty is morally invalid because many of its provisions, unjust to themselves, are a breach of the terms on which the Central Powers laid down their arms.

We admit that our own country has made claims and secured advantages in violation of the terms of surrender, and we recognize that our call for revision necessarily implies a readiness to forego gains where justice demands renunciation. We believe that, as the facts are recognized, men of honor will feel bound to make a fresh effort for the redemption of Europe.

In order to achieve this end we call for a new type of conference to revise the treaty. Representing the common needs of common men rather than the political aims of statesmen, and fired with the desire to work loyally for the common good, its members must co-operate as equals, unfettered by the provisions of the treaty, and free from the temper of domination.

In face of the tragedy of ever-deepening despair we are convinced of the need of an urgent endeavor to bring such a conference into being without delay. This will demand the co-operation of wide circles of earnest souls with fixed determination to relax no effort until such a spirit of goodwill is spread abroad as shall make it possible to leave behind the strife and bitterness of the present, and to bring about an agreement broadly based on justice and truth.

The years of war and its aftermath have convinced us more clearly than ever that amidst the most difficult circumstances the forces potent to lift human society into the place

THE BRITISH LABOR PARTY'S REPORTS ON THE RUHR

A delegation from the British Labor Party recently visited Cologne, Dusseldorf, Essen and Bochum to study conditions in the Ruhr. Their conclusions and recommendations are published in the press reports of the International Federation of Trade Unions. Their findings, briefly stated, are: Serious as conditions already are, they will become much worse if the French army attempts more drastic measures, such as taking over the railroads or interfering with the liberties of the workingmen. In that case there will be either famine or widespread disorder, with a desperate struggle between French soldiers and German civilians. The Versailles Treaty does not provide any adequate method of settlement, and a new international instrument should be created with German representatives assisting in its formation. In the meantime the British government should ask both the French and German governments to submit their proposals to an international tribunal. The British Labor Party also makes the following suggestions for the solution of the Ruhr problem: 1. A settlement cannot be reached by attempting to dismember Germany or to keep her permanently "in a state of economic vassalage." 2. The total amount of reparations should be fixed at once and international loans secured on German resources floated so that France and Belgium could be paid at once. 3. A special meeting of the League of Nations should be called to admit Germany as a member and to settle questions of national security, debts and indemnities. The British government should be ready to be generous in regard to debts, mandates and forfeited property, both on moral grounds and because present conditions ruin trade, are likely to cause war and endanger civil liberty and reform. 4. German proposals offer a basis for negotiation. 5. Troops should be removed from the occupied territory, and, if this is not agreed to, British troops should be withdrawn independently and at once.

THE CHURCHES ON THE NEAR EAST

In a letter presented to President Harding at the executive offices last week a representative group of religious leaders have expressed the views of fifteen great denominations and philanthropic organizations on conditions in the Near East, the Armenian refugees and the situation in Greece. The delegation told the President that there is a large and increasing number of citizens who feel that the Government should give to the Greeks the moral support which would come to them with the resumption of diplomatic relations. They explained that this group believes the Government should take a more definite stand in securing justice in behalf of the oppressed people of the Near East. They said: "We represent those who look with grave apprehension on the apparent acquiescence by the Allied Powers in the abandonment of the Armenians to their fate without any just reparations for the wrongs that have been done them." They declared that when the United States demanded, because of its part in the common victory, certain rights, interests and equities, it also assumed responsibilities which cannot be evaded. In their oral presentation of the case the delegation made three points:

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

1. The importance of giving Greece the encouragement that would come from a prompt resumption of diplomatic relations.

2. The importance of establishing an international commission as suggested by Secretary Hughes on March 30 to take care of the refugee situation in the Near East. They pointed out that the refugee situation is part of the wreckage of the war and that the United States shares with the rest of the world responsibility for cleaning it up.

3. That the United States should refuse to ratify the new treaty with Turkey until that country has returned to the present Armenian Republic the territory which has been taken from her since the war, the territory to be used for the establishment of Armenian refugees from Asia Minor.

THE EIGHT-HOUR DAY "WORKS" IN COLORADO

With the statement that the American Iron and Steel Institute's committee in its recent unfavorable report on the abolition of the twelve-hour day had failed to give the public the other side of the question, the research department of the Federal Council of Churches last week continued the fight against the long work day. The department made public a letter from J. F. Welborn, president of the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company of Denver, in which John D. Rockefeller, Jr., has an interest. In it Mr. Welborn tells how his company during the last five years has demonstrated that the abolition of the twelve-hour day is entirely practicable. The letter was addressed to Raymond B. Fosdick, of New York, a director of the company, and was transmitted to Rev. F. Ernest Johnson, director of the Federal Council's research department, in answer to a request for information concerning the company's experience. The letter of Mr. Welborn to Mr. Fosdick includes the following statements:

"The change was made November 1, 1918, the hourly, tonnage and piece rates being increased ten per cent. when the working shift was reduced from twelve to eight hours. Our rates, prior to November 1, 1918, had always been on the same basis as the steel industry generally paid in the East. The immediate results from the standpoint of production per man hour and of labor cost per unit of output were satisfactory, and where conditions have been comparable it has been evident that we have lost nothing either in producing cost or output by reason of the change. At blast furnaces the labor cost per ton immediately following the introduction of the eight-hour day with the increase of ten per cent. in wage rates increased slightly over one per cent. above former costs. At open hearth furnaces it increased one and a half per cent., while at our rolling mills there was a substantial reduction in the labor cost per ton. Recent careful analyses of operating results between various twelve and eight-hour work periods have been made and show these results to be even more satisfactory than we had realized before. The trend of production per man hour, with unimportant exceptions, has been upward since the adoption of the eight-hour day; and in every department of our steel manufacturing operations, from blast furnace to the wire mill, our production per man hour is now greater than it was when all of these activities were operating on the twelve-hour shift. Comparing these results of the last few months with periods of similar production when basic rates were ten per cent. lower than current rates and the working time twelve hours per day, we find that almost without exception our labor cost per ton is lower than in the earlier periods. Furthermore, whenever the question of change made in the length of the working day has come up for discussion between officials and employees' representatives, satisfaction with the change has been expressed by the employees. It is obvious, therefore, that our change from a twelve to an eight-hour day was practical and has been successful. A factor of added interest is the fact that with almost capacity operations at our steel plant during the last few months and employing over six thousand men, we have experienced no shortage of labor. Our operating officials have frequently expressed the belief that this condition is due, in large part at least, to adoption of the eight-hour shift."

The research department of the Federal Council has for some months been compiling facts concerning the twelve-hour day and the practicability of its abolition as reported by various investigators. It will issue a research bulletin on the subject within a few days.

SOME PERTINENT "ARMY FACTS"

On an inside cover page of the program of the first annual horse show of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps at Michigan Agricultural College there appears the following interesting statement: "This first annual R. O. T. C. horse show gives a very clear idea of our present military policy. You will see in the ring entries from each of the three component parts of the Army of the United States—the Regular Army (the permanent establishment), the National Guard (the citizen soldiery), and the Organized Reserves (in service in time of war only). This is the first time in the history of this country that there has ever been a policy of this type. It is economical, it is efficient and it is not Prussian or militaristic or 'kaiseristic' in the least. All three component branches are working together very smoothly. The Army is fighting desperately to keep this policy in spite of the highly organized pacifist lobby in Washington, which is spending money right and left to disarm our country in order that the forces of bolshevism and radicalism may assume control. Incidentally it was found recently by the U. S. Secret Service that the greatest part of the money for this insidious movement comes from Moscow and is being spent in sending pacifist orators broadcast over the country. Do not think that the Army is crying for war. That is not it at all. All the Army wants is a uniform policy of reasonable and economical preparedness pursued in time of peace, so that when war does come that it will not be necessary to sacrifice thousands of lives and billions of dollars on the altar of unpreparedness as was the case in the World War." This is typical of orthodox army logic. It would be interesting to know more about that pacifist lobby which is spending money right and left in order that the forces of bolshevism may assume control; also, which organizations have received the greater part of that money from Moscow.

THE SOUTHERN CHURCHES ON RACE RELATIONS

Strong statements adopted last month by the Southern Baptist Convention and the Southern Methodist Board of Missions are pointed out by the Commission on Interracial Co-operation as further indication of the growing determination of the South to eradicate lynching and mob violence. These bodies represent the two greatest denominations in the South, with an aggregate membership of about six millions. The Baptists in annual convention in Kansas City adopted the following:

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

"This Convention has repeatedly gone on record as unalterably opposed to all sorts of mob violence and mob rule. Perhaps the most vicious and the most dangerous form of lawlessness in our present day is found in the activity and violence of mobs. Mob violence defies all law, despises every principle and function of government, and tramples into the dust every human right. Mob violence in the South, in its beginning, most often occurred against individuals of the Negro race for attacks upon the sanctity of womanhood. Like all cancerous evils, it has spread. It is now practised for other offenses, against the white race as well as the Negro race. But if the evil had remained or should be confined to the realm in which it began it is not to be tolerated by Christians or by other intelligent patriotic citizens."

The resolution of the Methodist Mission Board came up in connection with a recent lynching and was as follows:

"Resolved, That a message of commendation and approval be sent Circuit Judge Walker for his fearless and righteous exposition of the law in his charge to the Grand Jury at Fayette, Missouri, at the time of investigation of a recent act of mob violence committed at Columbia, Missouri; and that we hereby register our sorrow over the crime of brutal murder by mobs so frequently occurring throughout our beloved land, not only because of the unrighteousness of such deeds and the defiance of the law, but also because of the reflection upon our Christianity in the eyes of pagan people."

A SAMPLE OF SERMONIZING

A few weeks ago a prominent minister in a Western city dealt with the preachers and scientists and infidels who "deny the Word." He paid his respects to Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick. He thundered: "There is no difference between Fosdick and Foster. Of the two I prefer Foster. Foster believes in the overthrow of government and openly says so. Fosdick denies the virgin birth and then subtly lies about it." His text was from Daniel and he "proved conclusively" from it that the Turks, Reds and all Bolsheviks, Fosdick and the Egyptian philosophers are all in the same line of degeneration. He said the Greece and Turkey peace settlement is a temporary calm only; that Turkey must return to the Holy Land for a time as conqueror, but will eventually be destroyed utterly—this in order to fulfil a verse in Daniel. His large church was full. He spoke into radio. Multiplied thousands heard his message. Scores of young people left his church after the sermon saying, "He's right," "That's true," "Isn't he wonderful?"

WHO CARES FOR TRAVELERS?

A striking instance of solicitude for the religious welfare of travelers is shown by the decision of one of the largest hotel managers in the country to establish in three big hotels in New York City under his managers, chapels for the use of the patrons of the hotels. These chapels will be open at all hours for meditation and prayer and on proper occasions for worship. What can the church do for travelers? There are many hotels in which clerks know absolutely nothing of the churches in the city or near the hotel. Churches might make it a point to send some visitor to the hotels occasionally and talk with these versatile men of affairs who welcome strangers as they register their names and have these friendly men acquainted with the churches near their very doors. Something can be done by the way of friendliness toward hotel clerks. There are instances of committees of the Y. M. C. A. which see to it that every Sunday morning a personally addressed invitation to the churches of the city is placed in the box of every guest of the hotel who remained over Sunday. There is a great host of people who are away from home over Sunday and they are people with religious convictions and with religious needs and open to neighborly approach of a reasonable kind. There are doubtless ways in which some of the strong business men of the churches could call in hotels and without being obnoxious in tactless ways make known to strangers the proximity of a church and their neighborly thought for folks away from home. Whatever means may be suggested for the contact with sojourners and travelers, we may be sure that unless their presence in a community is realized by the church, the church will be losing out of its prayer and out of its solicitude a large number of people who, because of absence from home and possibly loneliness, are especially open either to the influences of grace or to the influences of evil.

SIMKOVITCH'S "TOWARD THE UNDERSTANDING OF JESUS"

It will be good news to many of our readers that Professor Vladimar Simkovitch's essay, "Toward the Understanding of Jesus," has been published in a paper edition. It may be secured from Mr. Kirby Page, 311 Division Avenue, Hasbrouck Heights, New Jersey, at 25 cents per copy, plus postage. We should add that Mr. Page is willing to handle the distribution of this pamphlet at this time because he is convinced of its great value and desires that it have a very wide reading. The cost of the essay in book form was $1.75. In this work Professor Simkovitch, of the economics department at Columbia, gives a comprehensive review of Jewish history before and during the life of Jesus. By an objective analysis of the social and political events and issues he shows the reasons for many of the remarks, teachings and actions of Jesus. In every way his study may be said to lead toward the understanding of the Nazarene.

A STRIKE IN CO-OPERATIVE FACTORIES

The "New Statesman" (London- for April 28 announces a strike of workers at two of the factories controlled by the Co-operative Wholesale Society. The Society, it appears, reduced wages without consulting the unions concerned, although they had promised that this would not be done. Their explanation is that the new rates correspond with changes by the Trade Board, which governed the wages of most of the workers and that, therefore, no notice was necessary. The unions claim that many of the workers are not under the Trade Board, and that conference should have been held in any case. The joint committee of trade unionists and co-operators was established to settle such disputes without strikes, but the matter has not been referred to them, although the unions are willing that it should be. There could scarcely be a better illustration of the fact that consumers' co-operation may leave unsettled some of the most fundamental problems in industrial relations.

Mr. Bryan Pays His Compliments to Governor Smith

THE "New York Times" sent five questions to Mr. Bryan immediately after Governor Smith signed the bill repealing the Mullan-Gage Act for the enforcement of prohibition in New York State, and Mr. Bryan's answers appear in the issue of June 10. The questions were as follows:

1. Will prohibition be a leading issue at the next Democratic convention?
2. What strength will the wets and dries be able to command?
3. Do you believe prohibition will continue to be an issue in national politics?
4. What effect has Governor Smith's action on the Cuvillier bill had on the national situation?
5. What of his assertion of State rights in connection with his action?

It goes without saying that Mr. Bryan's answers will be read by hundreds of thousands of people, and that they express the feeling of the nation at large. Governor Smith replied to Mr. Bryan in "The Times" of June 11, but apart from pointing out some historical errors Mr. Bryan had made in his article, and apart from declaring himself against Mr. Bryan's intimations that personal desires and ambitions lay behind his act, Governor Smith's reply does not seriously modify Mr. Bryan's main contention, that prohibition is the expressed will of the great Christian majority of the nation and any modification of it for light wines and beer means such a blow at it that it will practically nullify it and make it of no effect. Light wines and beer mean strong gins and whiskies.

To the first question as to whether prohibition will be a leading feature in the next Democratic convention or not, Mr. Bryan answers without any hesitation that there is no probability it will. He feels there is even no possibility of it. The Eighteenth Amendment is the result of fifty years' activity at the polls. The final victory was the result of ratification by forty-six States of the Union—an overwhelming majority. Every vote in Congress, since the amendment was ratified, to weaken it in any way has been defeated by an overwhelming majority. In all this movement the Democratic party has had as honorable a record as the Republican. It is not likely that this constant majority in the Democratic party is going to permit the party to be the champion of the liquor traffic. Governor Smith has heard only from the bar-room crowd of the big cities, not from the women whose husbands wasted their money at the saloon. "A poll recently made by a New York paper," says Mr. Bryan, "showed a large majority of the Democratic National committeemen and the Democratic State chairmen in favor of the enforcement of prohibition."

On the second question as to the relative strength of the wets and dries in the nation, Mr. Bryan feels one cannot speak with accuracy. Everything points to the preponderance of dry sentiment. Prohibition was secured by the vote of the men: the Democratic party was made dry by the men's vote. But now the women can vote. The wives, daughters and sisters of the nation will surely add their strength to the dry sides of both parties. It is impossible to think that the women will undo the dry vote of the men. (Of course, Mr. Bryan will be accused by the wets of ignoring one main factor here, namely, the change of sentiment on the part of the men. The wets tell us that thousands who voted for prohibition are against it now and that many Congressmen who thought they were reflecting the real constituency of their people have discovered their mistake and would vote otherwise now. No such change of sentiment is apparent.)

As to question three, as to whether prohibition will continue to be an issue in national politics or not, Mr. Bryan makes the only reply there is to make, namely, that it will continue to be an issue as long as there is any organized opposition to its enforcement. "Lawlessness of individuals, without concerted action, does not make an issue; but lawlessness sponsored by officials and backed by wealth and organization cannot be ignored by either party." This is what we have now. The wets are not so foolish as to try to repeal the Eighteenth Amendment. They do not even expect to repeal the Volstead Act. They are endeavoring to reach that strength where they can defeat appropriations for enforcement of the law and tie the hands of the State enforcement, as Governor Smith has done. "The real issue now is law versus lawlessness, an issue never before the American people until now." Prohibition won by the largest majority any issue has had, and for the first time in our history we have an impudent minority attacking it and demanding its nullification and even endeavoring to impose their will upon the great majority, which strikes at the heart of republican institutions.

The fourth question asks what effect Governor Smith's signing the Cuvillier bill will have on the national situation. What "The Times" has in mind is, we suppose, to what extent will Governor Smith's action encourage the wets in other parts of the country and lead other States to take similar action. Mr. Bryan thinks that the effect will be to put the dries on their guard, rather than to encourage the wets. The people of the United States are not going to let the liquor interests control the nation again. Perhaps Mr. Bryan is a little too confident. Some States where the wets are many do seem to have taken courage and are preparing to follow New York. In Wisconsin the wets at once resumed the attempt to take the State enforcement law off the books. Other States are beginning to talk about States rights more than they have. There is no doubt that the wets have taken new courage throughout the country. There is no doubt that it is going to be very difficult to enforce prohibition in New York.

EDITORIAL

The last question concerns itself with State rights. Here Mr. Bryan is perfectly right in his contention that no State has any rights when those rights jeopardize the welfare of the whole nation. Unfortunately he made one or two slips in facts here which Governor Smith pounced upon with vengeance, but his main point is impregnable, that when it comes to an article of the Constitution put there by concurrent action of all the States it is poor business for one State to talk of repudiating it. Of course, Governor Smith replies that he is not repudiating the Constitution and by his signing the repeal of the Mullan-Gage law he is not attacking the Constitution or playing false to it in any way. The Mullan-Gage Act was simply a statute passed committing the State of New York to enforce an article of the Federal Constitution. It is the nation's business to enforce the Constitution, Governor Smith contends, and consequently he signs the repeal. Technically he is right. It is doubtful if it was the part of wisdom to have passed the Mullan-Gage law in the beginning. It was born out of the enthusiasm of those who had worked for prohibition for years and who wanted to offer the assistance of the State to the nation to do what it was already pledged to do, for every State is pledged to uphold the Constitution. It was a work of supererogation born out of a noble impulse. Suspicion of the wisdom of the course soon began to make itself felt as ardor cooled down. In the first place, it took hundreds of policemen away from tasks where they were needed. In the second place, it took hundreds of thousands of dollars from State funds to do what the nation should be doing and for which the Federal Government should be paying. In the third place, it made a double trial and double penalty for each act, since a man broke the Federal and State laws at one and the same time. It was these things that led to the movement to repeal the law, along with a certain irritation caused by the constant presence of the local police in all restaurants and hotels. Governor Smith makes this all plain in his memoranda accompanying his signature.

Unfortunately, the repeal of such a bill, once passed, regardless of its superfluous character, gives the impression that a concerted attack is being made upon the law it was framed to support. At least, it gives the impression that its framers are bent on making the enforcement of the law impossible. This is about what it has done, and about all it has done. The Federal Government has largely entrusted the enforcement of the law to the local police and now they are suddenly withdrawn. What that means, say, in the great city of New York alone can be seen. All the Federal officers put together, to say nothing of those available, cannot watch a city of five million people. It is not at all to be wondered at that Mr. Bryan considers Governor Smith's act as a covert attack upon the Constitution. There are also certain passages in Governor Smith's accompanying memoranda that are very irritating and give the impression that he will not greatly care if the present law is not strictly enforced. He speaks of those who take the Eighteenth Amendment as strictly forbidding wines and beer of low alcoholic content as fanatics, and would declare a definition of intoxicating beverages that would permit light wines and beer. On the other hand, Mr. Bryan knows that once wines and beer are permitted everything else comes back with it. Mr. Bryan is right. Light wines and beer mean gins and whiskies. It is either strict prohibition or freedom to buy and sell all drinks, unless the nation wants to adopt some such program of regulation as that used in Sweden, where one can purchase lighter drinks freely, but where strong drinks are sold only by the government under strict regulations.

Loneliness

A GOOD many people are lonely through defects of character which they ought to remedy. They are always afraid to confide anything in others in case they may be betrayed; they may have naturally a reserved temperament and do nothing to overcome it; the result is that they do give out the material for the weaving of a close and intimate friendship. In these matters we do very largely make our own world. A proud spirit is not friendship-making; to be too self-conscious is to be unable to give oneself with freedom, and the result is that others do not give themselves to us. Some may have an inner life which would not bear revealing; they may be worrying and grieving over things which, if they spoke of them, would not get them the sympathy of others. A good deal of worry and grief is due to some form of selfishness, some pride of spirit, some haughtiness of temper, some hugging of an idiosyncrasy, and these are always social isolators.

There are other kinds of loneliness. There is the loneliness of greatness, the experience of a small minority whose voice is heard in every age. The prophets have always been lonely men, the explorer must learn to live with very little or no society. This kind of loneliness has its compensations, though it is often very hard to bear. The explorer has the sense of adventure, the prophet the consciousness of a mission.

Apart from greatness, there is a great deal of loneliness if you are just a little ahead of the ordinary ideas and opinions of your circle. Bishop Colenzo became lonely when he ventured to criticize the Pentateuch. That would not make any man lonely now, but it did then. There are many discomforts attending upon the service of any truth a little beyond that ordinarily held. The late Dr. Whiten, of New York, once told me that his wife said to him: "James, no reformer should be a married man." Anyone who wants to go ahead with things, to lead to any new position, must have a capacity for solitude. It is not enjoyable, and one's soul often cries out for the human touch, the human fellowship, but it has to be endured in the interests of truth. And you may always take this comfort, that if you endure it, and are faithful to your truth, in time others will come to share it with you, and then you will get a fellowship the sweetness of which is immeasurably better than the miscellaneous fellowship you get in the holding of opinions which, though traditional, are not very vital. There is no friendship so valuable and so soul-supporting as the fellowship of one who has shared your convictions, who really sees the truth with you and feels it. Many men after lonely years have been able to work themselves into that sort of fellowship, and it is ample compensation for any hardship there was on the way to it.

Again, there is a loneliness in going ahead, even if it does not provoke any hostility, and when no ostracism is intended. It springs simply out of the fact that a man is ahead of his company. Jesus knew these two kinds of loneliness. He knew the loneliness that was created by the positive hostility of the religious authorities of His time. That did not trouble Him half as much as the loneliness which arose from the fact that His own disciples were so slow in grasping His point of view. He often marveled at their want of understanding, and their lack of vision. This was all the more painful because He was eager to communicate. He came into the world to communicate truth and to give life. All failure was loneliness. The old prophet's words, "I have trodden the winepress alone, and of the people there was none with me," must have often been the experience of Jesus. What enabled Him to bear it was the closeness of communion with His Father and His great love for men which made Him patient with them. He knew the need of patience. Did He not describe the gradualness of the growth of the Kingdom when He compared it with a seed falling into the earth and coming up through various stages to full maturity? Did He not speak from actual experience when He described the Sower going forth to sow, and finding so much of His work bearing no fruit? The double secret of the power to bear this kind of loneliness is close communion with God and a great love for humanity. Any of us to-day who are committed to high ideals need these two things.

The other kind of loneliness we want to mention is that made by great suffering. Of course, there is an inevitable loneliness in every deep experience. However much others may share it, it is peculiarly your own. The burden you are carrying is very much like the burden that other people are carrying, but the fact that they are doing so does not make yours any lighter or any less your own. Even sympathy does not alter this fact. Sympathy is a great help, we cry out for it, and it is a comfort to remember that even Jesus did; He felt the need of companions in his anguish. But when your friends have done the very best for you, when you have had all the sympathy that it is possible to get, your sorrow has to be borne by yourself. It is a great thing to have a friend, or a few friends, who are ready to watch with us in the direful hour, but even then the soul must bear its own burden. Do we know anything else? Well, if we bore our agony before God, and to God, in any such way as Jesus did, we know that help came. Luke tells us that when Jesus was intensely lonely an angel from heaven came to help Him. Mystic help does come, whichever way we name it. Where should we have been but for that? We are thankful for human friends who draw near us at such times, even though they cannot remove the loneliness or carry away the grief, and even though they may not understand its full nature and extent. But we are thankful most of all for that help which comes through no human medium, call it "anger," if you will; it is at any rate super-human, coming from a source above us, and lifting us in our sorrow, and through it, to some divine strength of life. Gethsemane would be fatal to men but for this. What a glorious sufferer Jesus was! Sometimes we are told that we present Jesus as a sufferer too much, and that we ought to speak more of His youthfulness and adventurous living, and so present an attractive Christ, especially to young people. Well, the character of Jesus was many-sided, and all sides should certainly be presented. We should always deplore any attempt to cultivate a morbid sentimentality about the sufferings of Jesus. Any attempt to tell the story, or portray it in pictures, with the idea of exciting the emotion of pity or sorrow for the individual Jesus is the wrong thing to do. Fortunately, it is not successful; so far as it has any success it is morbid. Jesus would be the last to countenance it. To the daughters of Jerusalem who were weeping about Him He said, "Weep not for Me, but for yourselves and your children." He did not wish them to pity Him in His personal suffering, but to concentrate their minds on what was happening in the moral and spiritual sphere, and to weep over a nation neglecting its spiritual privileges. Any attempt of the Church to concentrate the minds of the people on the sufferings of the personal Jesus and to make them sorry for Him is bound to miscarry. You cannot stir a genuine emotion for something that happened two thousand years ago; it is difficult enough to stir it for a present-day event if it should be thousands of miles away. This is not because people are hard; it is a difficulty of imagination.

But though morbid sentiment about the suffering of Jesus from the personal point of view is unhealthy, this does not mean that we are to substitute for the suffering Christ the merely joyful Christ, the adventurous young man. On the whole, this is a shallow plea. Life is not all joy and adventure, even to the young; they have their troubles and their sadness and very often their tragedies. And there is an inevitable Cross in life; one might say that life, from the day of the awakening of the moral nature, is life on a cross. The individual will and the social will will form a cross to which we must adjust life; when we have harmonized these two we have turned the cross into a throne. Certain instincts and desires come up against the sense of right and duty, and they form a cross. This is not confined to the middle-aged people; it is indeed most acute in youth. The young are stirred by idealism at the very time when the world is bidding for compromises. Very particularly is the life of the young on a cross. Speaking generally, people are up against the most crucial problems of their existence before they reach the age of twenty-five. And the cross has meaning all the way through. The sufferings of Jesus have immense significance, not as mere sufferings, but as revelations of some of the greatest and deepest things in life. This is probably why, at bottom, Passion music still holds people as it does. There do come to most people some experiences which to them are Gethsemane and Calvary over again. And so long as human experience passes through these valleys of deep shadow, so long as crucifixion is such a general fact in life, the so-called attractive Christ, who is only young and adventurous, would prove to be less attractive than the Christ who prayed in Gethsemane and suffered on the Cross. There is so much suffering in the world that only a suffering Saviour can meet its needs. If we do not learn what to make of suffering, we shall fail in life. The suffering Christ reveals the suffering God, and we cannot in the end be helped by a God who does not in some way share our sorrows and bear our griefs. By all means let us have the Christ of adventure, if we understand the nature of the adventure. He staked everything on spiritual values. If we follow in that adventure we shall not escape suffering, nor fail to come to our Gethsemane.

Besides, there are many other sorrows not following upon the adoption of spiritual principles, but arising from circumstances over which we have no control. They are often hard places to go through, fires that scorch, and rivers that threaten to overflow us. The value of the suffering Christ is in the assurance that He revealed a God who is with us in all our experiences, and does not forsake us when we are most alone. There will be a cross in the heart of God as long as there is a sin or a sorrow in the life of man. This is the truth that shines from the Cross of Jesus; this is the Gospel of the Cross. The merely joyful Jesus will not suffice; He would fail in the crises of our life. Let the King of earth His "cross ascend."

A Great British Citizen

AMERICA is just welcoming on a visit one of the most useful and interesting personalities which the land of bonny Doon has produced since the days of Carlyle and Stevenson. Professor Patrick Geddes, known as botanist, biologist, antiquarian, geographer and city planner, is primarily a great citizen devoted to beauty and to public service.

I recall one day many years ago sailing down the Firth from Glasgow with our delegates to a world peace conference and finding myself beside this little man with the soft, eager voice who opened my mind to the significance of geography, a wonderful study of which he seemed a born interpreter. He discussed the different effects sea life and mountain life had produced upon the different races and showed the relation of geological deposits to man's development. It was all a revelation of the science which correlates the sciences and centers them around the genus homo.

We learned later, on the professor's visit to Boston, of his experiments in social science, or rather in simple, human companionship. Up the dark, steep stairs of one of the tall tenements of High Street, Edinburgh, he and his family took up their abode and began quietly to transform a hideous slum, full of intricate wynds and closes and peopled by gin-drinking and discouraged folk. Clad in work clothes, he and his neighbors whitewashed the blackened walls and little by little the region changed physically and morally.

To-day, at the head of High Street, opposite Professor Geddes, new home on the edge of the Castle grounds, with its majestic stronghold, stands the Outlook Tower, a product of Professor Geddes' ingenuity and industry. Here his study of geography and of humanity and art has found unique expression. The lower floor is devoted to the world with the continents painted on the floor. Above is the map of Europe in the next story. Higher still, the map of Great Britain. The topmost floor is devoted to Edinburgh, with the map on the floor and the colored views of Edinburgh painted as a frieze and all correctly orientated to the points of the compass. The rooms are filled with material and wall paintings that aid the citizen to think of himself as related to his city and to the successively larger areas to which as a citizen of the world he is vitally related. An adaptation of this tower suited to various localities might well serve to emphasize and clarify a glorious lesson in patriotism and in internationalism, though probably no city in the world could supply such a picturesque and historic setting as castle-crowned Edinburgh under Arthur's Seat.

One afternoon in Nuremberg, as we were studying on our knees the quaint figures on St. Sebald's Shrine, whom should we encounter but our professor doing the same thing and like us bound for thousand-year-old Rothenburg, all of whose red-tiled, gabled houses within the city walls dated back 250 years. What great luck, to visit with such a great master the most medieval city except Carcassonne in Europe. We joined forces and that night under a glorious full moon we stood beneath the lofty tower of the Rathhaus, whence the next day we heard the trumpeters' sound forth a German chorale at midday, as is their periodic wont. This event was remembered later back in Boston and stimulated the rendering of "America" and Christmas carols from the steeple of the Park Street Church to delighted listening thousands on Boston Common. We explored the mysterious streets of Rothenburg, catching frequently strains of choral music and violin cadenzas from the many music-loving homes as we surreptitiously mounted the city walls and viewed the multitude of towers and spires silhouetted in the light of the harvest moon. As we stumbled over the wooden flooring our Scotchman lighted matches to guide our path which fortunately no guardian of the peace perceived or he might have ended his antiquarian researches in the lockup. What a memory to treasure—that pilgrimage next day under the rapid, running comment of the interpreter to whom every stone and bit of woodcarving revealed the life of the days of Tilly and of Luther!

Of late years Professor Geddes has devoted himself to the study of that most neglected and most needed art—the art of city planning. Probably no nation since the days of the cathedral builders has done more original and beautiful work in architecture than America has of late. Recent American architects are gradually displacing the hybrid commonplaces of the 70's and 80's. From the Lincoln Memorial and the great railroad stations in New York, Washington and Richmond to the cosy artistic bungalows shown in "Country Life" one finds a gratifying new appreciation of fitness, harmony and unity. But, alas, the art that should go with them—the art of city planning—and make them effective by supplying sunshine, civic spaciousness and proportion is far to seek.

Aristotle, the first to give the basic principles of city planning, took, as he called it, a "synoptic" view. He saw the city as a whole. We provide and embellish a few costly, showy spots dedicated to beauty and near the homes of the privileged few. But the beauty of jewels and upholstery appeals most to the average mind; miles of dreary conglom-erations of mud-colored, mansard-roofed wooden buildings, with mixtures of red brick, yellow brick, brown stone, gray stone, varying from two to twelve stories in height, does not offend the mind accustomed to our city streets and our fixed idea that each man must be allowed to do exactly as his whim dictates. Professor Geddes sees the frightful cost and waste and unhealthful conditions which reckless lack of planning perpetuates. A bad poem need not be read. A bad picture may be taken from the wall, but a city laid out regardless of future growth and human needs inflicts weariness, heavy taxes and discomfort on millions in the years of its existence. Wherefore let us welcome as a benefactor a man who can help us save the future from the folly of to-day.

Our rampant individualism permits, not only ugly skylines, but the outrageous invasion of neighbors' rights. Streets are congested, sunshine cut off neighbors' property, values lowered and uncertainty created for prospective builders, because we ignore city planning. We are unwilling to make regulations to subordinate private to public good. It is to a land that is very Philistinish so far as civic regulations are concerned to which Professor Geddes comes with a headful of practical suggestions and a wealth of experience, not only in Scotland, but in many other lands, most recently in India, where he has been doing wonderful work.

He has surveyed and reported on some fifty different cities, including Bombay and Calcutta, Amritsar and Madura. His report to the Dunbar in two volumes is a wonderfully comprehensive study of civics and industry and social life. It shows how every detail in the city's life may be improved from the disposal of sewage to the regulation of traffic. Professor Geddes has of late been preparing plans for a Zoo in Lucknow, for Tagore's Schools in Bengal and for Osmania University in Hyderabad. Among Professor Geddes' voluminous writings are: "The Evolution of Sex," "Ideas of War," "Cyprus and Some of Its Possibilities," "Making of the Future," "John Ruskin, Economist," "Education for Economics and Citizenship," "Cities in Evolution" and "City Development." Says the author: "A new social science is forming, a new social art developing, and what press and parliaments are beginning to see to-day even the most backward of town councils will be sharply awakened to to-morrow. This civic self is still inarticulate, the materials towards this nascent science are not merely being collected by librarians; they are germinating in our minds as we walk the streets. Rich and poor alike have to be upset in most of what they have been all their lives accustomed to hear of poverty and misery and degradation of the towns of the middle ages." Professor Geddes shows ample evidence of the gardens and spacious squares and the outdoor life of the people, the women working in open sculleries, etc. He maintains that the present evils found in these towns date from the industrial era. He shows how many people first realize the beauty of scenes when they see them reproduced in a picture. "A few well-chosen picture postcards will produce more effect upon most minds than does the actual vision of their monumental beauty. For the beauty of such streets we have become half-blind. The true town plan is the outcome and the bower of civilization of a community and of an age. In civic science the task of each acquires a directness of responsibility exceeding that of politics with a significance and a value which monetary economics missed."

My first acquaintance with Professor Geddes was when he gave a course of lectures in Boston arranged by the Twentieth Century Club. It was a delight then to welcome him as a guest and to have hours of inspiring conversation. My last touch with him was before the war in his own home, perched loftily at the top of Edinburgh beside the castle grounds and commanding a magnificent view on all four sides. I noted the pipe organ, the friezes painted by his Scotch artist friends and all the many evidences of a family life rich in thought and beauty and culture. Those were days when no nightmare of war threatened and national and international problems did not absorb one morning, noon and night. Will such days come again? Please God, they will, and some day may the efforts of our Scotch host be realized and his dreams of rational life and civic beauty become true.

Easter in Palestine

WE have just finished a series of meetings in Egypt and Palestine. On the last visit to Egypt two theaters and a neighboring church were filled three hours in succession each night. They decided this year to have an intensive campaign concentrating upon a picked body of men. Tickets were issued to the leading students, business and professional men of the city. The auditorium of the newly opened Y. M. C. A. building was filled each afternoon at five o'clock with seven hundred students and again at 7.15 with an equal number of Egyptian graduates and gentlemen. Owing to the size of the hall several hundred men were turned away.

The audiences were composed chiefly of Copts, Moslems and Protestant Egyptians. The remainder were Jews, Catholics, Greek Orthodox and Europeans. On the second night they began to send in their written questions. The men took the keenest interest in the after meetings for questions. On the last day, with the exception of two short breaks of an hour, the meetings lasted from three o'clock in the afternoon until ten at night. When we called for inquirers to daily study the Bible and to join classes several hundred Copts, Moslems and Protestant young men signed cards of application.

In Assiut, in upper Egypt, the ancient Coptic church opened its doors for daily meetings. This ancient church had its bishops and deacons here before any of the gospels were written. It produced Origen, Athanasius and many of the early church fathers when Alexandria was the leading city of the world. It has survived three centuries of Roman and more than twelve centuries of Moslem persecution. On our last visit to Assiut three thousand every morning and six thousand every evening were attending the meetings in the great tent here. This time we conducted an intensive campaign, filling first the Coptic and then the Protestant church each night, while meetings were held during the day for college students and women. The new Egypt is seething with the demand for independence, and the need of the hour is for a great moral leadership for the nation. It is this crisis in every country visited since the war that gives significance to such evangelistic meetings. Never was the world so desperately in need of moral leadership. Never was the full message of Christ so obviously the one and only spiritual remedy for the need of each nation, race and class.

Crossing by rail from Cairo to Jerusalem, we held a series of meetings attended by Moslems, Jews and Christians, the representatives of the three great monotheistic religions which are gathered here. The meetings in Jerusalem were conditioned by the political situation here. If we may sum it up in a few words, it seems to be as follows: After the capture of Jerusalem in 1917 by General Allenby came the Balfour declaration stating that "His Majesty's government views with favor the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people and will use their best endeavors to facilitate the achievement of that object." Following this came the mandate and the constitution based upon it, giving the Jews preferential treatment and endeavoring to create this national home for the Jews by all economic, social and political means. But this preferential treatment has alarmed and embittered the indigenous majority of the population of Palestine, which, according to the recent census, is seventy-nine per cent. Arab, eleven per cent. Jewish and nine per cent. Christian. Even this underestimates the non-Jewish population which comprises nine-tenths of the people.

A non-co-operation movement for self-determination has been started that bids fair to parallel that in India. The recent elections were boycotted by the majority, who did not care to participate in electing ten members to represent the Gentile nine-tenths of the population, while the Jewish tenth would have fifteen members appointed or elected to represent it. A great mistake has been made here in sustaining by Jewish finance and British force of arms an alien minority of Jewish special privilege in the face of the inherent world-wide demand for indigenous self-determination and the essential rights of people to manage their own affairs.

There are two classes of Jews in Palestine to-day: the Orthodox minority, legalistic and pietistic; and the Nationalist majority, political, worldly-wise and often materialistic, atheistic or sometimes Bolshevistic. The Orthodox Jews were defeated in the recent election even in Orthodox Jerusalem. The Nationalists are the abler and more powerful, and Zionism has become primarily a political movement.

All who recognize our spiritual debt to Judaism would eagerly welcome a religious and spiritual home for the Jews in Palestine. But when that home is conceived as an ambitious and exclusive Jewish political state of special privilege for the Jews over the Christian and Mohammedan majority it is quite another matter. Spiritual Israel may become politically the crafty, over-reaching Jacob. If this policy is persisted in it will react upon and defeat the political aspirations of the Jews in Palestine, make more unpopular the Jews throughout the world and further embarrass the British government.

One of two things will probably force Great Britain to revise the mandate and constitution for Palestine in line with Article 22 of the League of Nations Covenant and the British White Paper on Palestine which promises equal justice to all elements of the population. One may be the financial burden which the British and Palestine taxpayers will not be willing to carry indefinitely. The other may be an Arab uprising in Palestine and Mesopotamia, in both of which an alien minority or artificial foreign rule is maintained by force against the consent of the indigenous democratic majority of the people. The only question is, Will the revision come before or after bloodshed? Britain now faces a serious situation in India, Egypt, Palestine and Mesopotamia. In each a serious political blunder has already been made and each can only be settled when it is settled aright—in accordance not with imperialistic aims, but with indigenous, native interests.

Between meetings we have spent this glorious Easter week in the sunshine of Jerusalem and Galilee. Each day we sat in the temple area under an old olive tree just beside the site of the Beautiful Gate, or on the Mount of Olives overlooking Jerusalem. From the highest spot on Olivet we can see in one vast panorama one of the grandest views in all the world. On the east lie the Jordan, the Dead Sea, the Wilderness of Temptation and beyond the Mountains of Moab, whence Joshua led the tribes in Judea. On the west are the mountains round about Jerusalem and almost the whole of Judea. Just there, five miles to the south, is the little town of Bethlehem. On the north are the scenes of the lives of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, of Samuel, Saul and David.

But grandest of all, just before us, glorious in the April sunshine, rises Jerusalem, "the city of the Great King." Its magnificent walls stretch for half a mile on either side, rising some forty feet in height, with a hundred feet buried here in the dust and debris of the forty sieges and thirty-two captures of a city that is "built upon its heaps." Round them crusaders and Saracens fought for centuries. "Compact together" its square stone houses rise, dome on dome, up to the summit of Mount Zion. It is one of the most picturesque and, in historical associations, the most significant city in the world.

Just opposite is the Temple Area, where since the siege of Titus in 70 A.D., there has been left literally not "one stone upon another." Let us stand here upon the bare rocky summit of Mount Moriah, upon the mount where Abraham is said to have worshiped the one true God in a world of polytheism and idolatry. Here upon this rock about 1000 B.C. David offered sacrifice after he had captured this stronghold of the Jebusites and made Jerusalem his capital for all Israel. Here Solomon in all his glory built his temple, and here to this "house of prayer for all nations" which had been made a den of thieves and robbers, came our Lord to His Father's house. There on the left in Solomon's Porch, where He taught, where the Apostles preached, and where the early Church was gathered. On the right stood Herod's castle, Pilate's palace and the barracks of the soldiers, on the steps of which Paul stood to speak when he was dragged from the fury of the mob below.

In sunny Galilee we stood in a carpenter shop in the beautiful village of Nazareth, beside Mary's fountain, and in the little synagogue. We passed through a wealth of the flowers of the field over the hills of Galilee down to the blue lake. We sailed across to Capernaum and stood one morning in its ruined synagogue. There by the lake Andrew and Peter, James and John were called to follow Him, and Matthew sat at customs. We returned past the Samaritan Mount Gerizim for Easter morning in Jerusalem. Out from the dark graves and tombs and grottoes, from the ceremonial and legal bondage of men and their stifling "holy places," we came this mighty Easter morning into the light of the eternal and glorious Gospel, with its message, "He is not here. He is risen." "Neither in this mountain nor yet in Jerusalem"—but everywhere, in all nations, unto the uttermost parts of the earth, they that worship Him may worship in spirit and in truth in the abounding life of the living Christ through the Spirit of a permanent Pentecost.

Mr. Egan Talks About Books

[This page is devoted to a weekly letter recording the significant events and movements of the day from the Christian point of view.]

I REMEMBER hardly anything of my boyhood experiences with more satisfaction than the reading of a little book containing about a dozen papers by eminent men on "Books That Have Helped Me." I cannot recall all the authors, but among them were Edward Everett Hale, Charles W. Eliot, William T. Harris and Julia Ward Howe. They are gossipy, fascinating papers, and I read them so often that I almost knew them by heart. I also discovered a large number of books that have since been cherished companions. When I heard that Mr. Egan had written the story of the books that had helped him I awaited his book with great eagerness, expecting that the joy of my boyhood experience would be repeated. It is always so interesting to learn what has been the chief formative influence in the lives of eminent men.

And now I have just finished, but only for the first time, "Confessions of a Book-Lover," by Maurice Francis Egan. (Doubleday, Page and Company.) It is a delightful as well as an illuminating book. Mr. Egan has been a book-lover since childhood. Through the long period of diplomatic service in Europe he kept up his literary activities, reading many books and writing some as well. His "Everybody's St. Francis" is one of the most popular of biographies, and his "Preludes" and "Studies in Literature" are known to all lovers of books. Since his return from Denmark he has been reviewing outstanding new books for the "New York Times Literary Supplement" each week, and someone recently said that his reviews were often more interesting than the books he reviewed. There is doubtless some truth in the remark, for Mr. Egan is brimming over with ideas and the book he is reading often stimulates this flow so that there is as much of Egan in the review as there is of the author, all of which makes the review intensely interesting.

Mr. Egan began reading at a very early age. There were no children's books about, for which he is devoutly thankful. He read what he could lay his hands upon and his mother used to read aloud to him whatever she happened to be reading. "I am happy to say she never read children's books," he says. "Nothing was ever adapted to my youthful misunderstanding. She read aloud what she liked to read, and she never considered whether I liked it or not. . . . In this way I became acquainted with 'The Virginians,' then running in 'Harper's Magazine,' with 'Adam Bede' and 'As You Like It' and 'Richard III' and 'Oliver Twist' and 'Nicholas Nickleby' and 'Valentine Fox' and other volumes when I should have been listening to 'Alice in Wonderland.' But when I came, in time, to 'Alice in Wonderland' I found Alice's adventures rather dull in comparison with those of the Warrington brothers, and Thackeray's picture of Gumbo carrying in the soup tureen. To have listened to Rebecca's description of the fight in 'Ivanhoe,' to have lived through the tournament of Ashby de la Zouche, was a poor preparation for the vagaries of the queer creatures that surrounded the inimitable Alice."

Mr. Egan admits that this kind of reading implies leisure and the absence of distraction, and he feels that, unhappily, the modern child has very little leisure left to him. "As to distractions, the modern child is surrounded by them; and it appears to be one of the main intentions of the present system of instruction not to leave a child any moment of leisure for the indulgence of the imagination. But I am not offering the example of my childhood for imitation by the modern parents." Nevertheless, modern parents might well think over Mr. Egan's questionings. Are the moving pictures and the flood of books and stories with no literary value and the cheap comic supplements and the juvenile magazines going to produce the type of manhood the great classics produced? When I remember the books Dr. Hale, Mrs. Howe and Dr. Eliot and Mr. Egan read, somehow I expect the kind of man they turned out to be. I cannot say that I very confidently look for this type of manhood from children brought up on movies and comic supplements and cheap juveniles. Mr. Egan read many books during his happy childhood in Philadelphia and his impressions of them are very interesting. "The Scottish Chiefs," "Gulliver's Travels," "The Last Days of Pompeii," "Tales of Alhambra." ("What nice little story books," exclaims Mr. Egan, after mentioning this book, "could awaken such visions of the past, such splendid arabesques and trailing clouds of glory as this book! Read at the right time, it makes the pomegranate and the glittering crescents live forever, and creates a love for Spain and a romance of old Spain which can never die.") The boy discovered the poetry of Tom Moore and reveled in it. "Lalla Rookh" especially delighted him. He read the "complete works of Miss Milford" and was transported to the country she made so vivid. Scott and Dickens he devoured, and Scott especially transfigured all life for him. I imagine Mr. Egan would feel that Scott was the most essential part of a boy's education, an idea I would almost share with him. During one Christmas week he was lost to the world, having buried himself in a volume of Froissart. Then came the discovery of Shakespeare and a new world swam into his ken, and so on and on the story goes, and one cannot help continually asking how much all this reading of the great books contributed to Mr. Egan's character and success—and often they are one and the same thing.

The boyhood reading forms only a third of this most interesting volume. There are chapters on the poets—especially Dante, the essayists, the novelists that have been read and the analysis of their genius and character is very illuminating. Especially interesting is the chapter in which the Victorian and the modern poetry is compared. Mr. Egan admits that there is a place for vers libre—Walt Whitman, whom he often used to meet on the streets, by the way, and Amy Lowell have used it with great effect. But I should gather that in general Mr. Egan has a good deal of contempt for it and looks upon it as a refuge for laziness and for those who have no sense of music and no skill for beauty. But it is the chapters on the boyhood reading that I am interested in at this moment, and especially am I interested in what he says of the remarkable influence the thorough reading of the Bible, as a child, had upon him. Here he says just what Ruskin and many other great men and authors have said, and, with them, he cannot pay enough tribute to the book.

He began in very early years to read the Biblical stories. The Acts of the Apostles thrilled him. He soon came to "the conclusion that nobody could tell a short story as well as our Lord himself." He thought he got much more out of the New Testament by reading it consecutively, as story, as literature, than his companions did from studying International Sunday-school lessons. "For me, reading as I did, the whole of the New Testament was radiant with interest, a frankly human interest." "Whatever may be the opinion of other people," Mr. Egan says, "mine is that the reading of the New Testament in the simplicity of childhood, with the flower of intuition not yet blighted, is one of the most beautiful of mental experiences." Through several pages Mr. Egan dwells upon the inestimable worth that this thorough knowledge of the Bible acquired in childhood has been to him. It was not only the joy and delight that came through story, thrilling history, glowing pictures and poems; not only the standards of manhood that he got thus early; not only the beautiful sense of the surrounding love of God and our Lord; but that it has been a great liberating, enlarging influence through all his thought and his expression of it. In the first place, it has unlocked all other literature to him. No one can understand the great literatures of my land and America who is not steeped in the Bible, for they are built up on it, their springs are in it, their pages are covered with its words. To quote Mr. Egan: "I soon discovered that it was impossible to understand the allusions in English literature without a knowledge of the Bible. What would Ruth among the alien corn mean to a reader who had never known the beauty of the story of Ruth?" Again, he who does not make himself familiar with Biblical ideas and phraseology finds himself in after life with an incomplete medium of expression, Mr. Egan rightly says. He bemoans the impoverishment of language that exists among the younger people of to-day who seem to look upon this book of noblest English as well as of divinest genius with scorn. Wherever a man has been saturated with the Scriptures you find distinction in his style. Let me quote one very interesting passage: "A man who knows the Scriptures is fitted with allusions that clarify and illuminate the ordinary speech. He may not have any technical knowledge, or his technical knowledge may be so great as to debar him from meeting other men in conversation on equal grounds, but his reading of the Bible gives his speech or writing a background, a color, a metaphorical strength which illuminate even the commonplace. Strike the Bible from the sphere of any man's experience and he is in a measure left out of much of that conversation which helps to make life endurable."

Mr. Egan also adds that not only did his thorough reading of the Bible as a boy give him a background against which he could see more clearly the trend of the books he was reading and fathom their deeper meaning, but "it was a moral and ethical safeguard." As a boy he soon discovered that the morality of the Bible was the standard by which not only life, but literature, which is the expression of life, must be judged. He found that practically every piece of literature which stood the test of real greatness owed something to the Bible. He is equally convinced that there is something lacking in the character of the man who knows not the Book of Books.

Spurgeon and His Work

-By the Rt. Hon. David Lloyd George, M.P.

Delivered Before the Pastors' College, London, on May 16

THERE are many here, who, from their knowledge of Spurgeon, from their intimate acquaintance with his works, and from their general training, could give you a much more edifying and instructive address upon that topic. I am simply one of the many millions of his humble admirers in every land throughout the world. I had the privilege of hearing him only three times, and it is one of the regrets that always come to you when you miss for ever great opportunities of making a better acquaintance with great men—it is one of my deepest regrets that, whereas I might have multiplied the three thirtyfold, I left it at that figure. It is one of the signs of advancing years that you are always praising the past and that you are beginning to talk of the great days of your youth. There is something in it indeed.

It is invidious to make comparisons, but I think I would venture to say that Spurgeon was the greatest preacher of his age. It was an age of great preachers, but he was the greatest in a great age. I will give two tests. The impression is more lasting, the impression is a spreading one. The other is, his sermons are translated into every civilized tongue in the world. As the years roll by Spurgeon is still Spurgeon, and more Spurgeon than ever. There is a greater appreciation of the essential bigness of the man, his greatness—what a giant he was!—and that will grow and grow as the years go by. Why was it? He was a great orator. I heard him three times. I never heard anything like it. He had every quality of the orator. I am not going to schedule them. He had great elocution. There is the story of Henry Irving going casually in to hear him, and saying he was one of the finest elocutionists he ever heard. The elocution was perfect. The voice was a marvel. If I had been there from the depths of the East, not knowing one word of the tongue in which he spoke, I should have been thrilled. The voice! I can hear it. I never hear one hymn given out without I hear Spurgeon. It was a haunting voice. He had an immense power of appeal. I never heard a man who, mounting a platform, had as great a power of popular appeal. Spurgeon had all the qualities that make the orator, including simplicity. There are very few people who understand that that is essential to good speaking. Simplicity—that is the gift of making things which he had studied all his life clear to men who had not studied for an hour. Lucidity: one of the mistakes made by superficial people is to think that all waters which are clear must necessarily be shallow, and that all waters that are muddy must necessarily be deep. He was clear, simple, lucid. He had a wonderful sense of style.

I read some of Spurgeon's earlier sermons, and his later sermons. There are great differences—differences in character. The man grew; not merely the mind, but the man. It is a great study in the growth of character. He was more tender, he was gentler, his appeal was more to love than to fear. But he was a stylist at nineteen. What strikes you when you read the earliest sermons is what a wonderful instinct for a perfectly English style he had. Mr. Passmore, his publisher, was kind enough to send me the other day one of Mr. Spurgeon's sermons corrected by himself for the press, and there were many corrections, made in that beautiful handwriting of his, like the man—clear, straight, open—all corrections of style: which shows that he had an instinct for style, he believed in style; and from the point of view of literature, it is great reading, it is good reading, even for the profane. That is why John Bunyan is not a theological book; it is part of the literature of England. Nobody worries whether he is a Calvinist or an Arminian or a Fullerist, or whatever these various categories may be. I do not believe I am a Calvinist; at least, I do not know; those things don't worry you when you read either Bunyan or Spurgeon. The thing that attracts you is his appeal to the imagination.

He was a poet, the greatest poet I think among the preachers. Look at his similes, his metaphors, as well as his descriptions. The way he worked them out—perfect. There is nothing more dangerous than a flight of fancy in either a speech or a sermon, especially if it doesn't come off. There are three things that may happen to it. There is the first. You attempt your flight. If you are a rhetorical pilot you get into your machine. Your intention is all right; you mean to get right up there. But you can't get off the ground. The simile keeps bumping, and the machine ends in a ditch. That is unpleasant. The next type is, you get off the ground, and you get off rather too quickly, and you come down with a crash. That is tragic. There is the third: you get right up. The man who gets right up, with ease, with grace, flies over land and sea, mountain and valley, goes along until time comes for him to deliver his message, then descends with the same ease, with the same grace; not a moment's anxiety for a single passenger—that was Spurgeon. There is a skill, there is a strength which gives you confidence.

Take two sermons, which, if you have not read, I beg you to read them, not as a religious exercise—yet they are that, of course—but as a study in English; nay, not even as a study in English; as a joy, as a delight, as a pleasure which you may have. I believe for a shilling you can get it, but if it is more, you pay ten times as much for trash. Two sermons out of a number: "There Go the Ships," is one; the other, "Supposing Him to be the Gardener." Those two; they are the working out of, I do not know whether you call it a simile or a metaphor or an image, over pages: difficult to do, dangerous. It has come off. You may come down with a bump, you may tire your passengers. You go along; he lifts you up on his great fancy with his strong wings, he carries you through the air, blue, clear, unclouded, above the highest clouds; and when you come down you are not tired, you are throbbing and thrilling with the joy of what you have done. You need not go to Paris, across the sea, with all its dangers: buy a cheap volume of Spurgeon, and you will get such a flight as you will never forget. That is one reason why he is going to be permanent. There is no man in English literature since John Bunyan who could do that, and that is why Bunyan and Spurgeon are going to be part of the literature of our land as long as this tongue is spoken under English skies or in any other land where the same tongue is understood.

But he was not all mind. If he had been he could not have preached those sermons. Literature is not all mind. The best of it is heart. Spurgeon said that a man must have a great heart to be a great soul-winner. That is true, whether it is in religion, or politics, or anything else; and he was that. He had a great mind, and the fact that he had a great heart obscured the fact that he had a great mind. You commonly heard, very often, "Yes, he is a fine preacher, but he has not got the brain of the Rev. Mr. A., he has not got the learning of the Very Rev. Mr. B., and he has not got the intellect of the Right Rev. Mr. C." He was the greatest genius of them all. But that is not what made him great. His sermons throbbed with tenderness, and they throb to-day. He had a great love for his fellow men, and for the Saviour of his fellow men. He had a faith which was indomitable, inexhaustible, pervading.

In addition to that, he had a great sagacity. He had great common sense. He had deep insight into character; and it is worth reading his sermons for the purpose for which some people pretend they read novels: as studies in character. There is no character who is not depicted perfectly, with great humor, with much quaintness, but with great compassion, by Spurgeon. There also he was like John Bunyan.

His lectures to his students were marvels. There spoke the man, and I am delighted that you are going to call this college the Spurgeon College; and I am sure we all feel very grateful to Mr. Hay Walker for his magnificent gift. Spurgeon's heart was in this. It was some of his best work. Some of the best things he ever said were said in connection with this college. Mr. Bradford was good enough to send me over the week-end a book by an old friend of mine who passed away five years after the death of Mr. Spurgeon, Rev. William Williams, of Lambeth. He was an intimate friend of Spurgeon, and he wrote a book of reminiscences; I wish it could be reprinted; it gave me a delightful week-end. The way he addressed the students, the homely way; the shrewdness, the sagacity which he put into it; the knowledge of human nature; the similitudes and the gestures, in order to imprint on the minds of the students something he wanted to get right in.

May I give you a few specimens? He said to them: "Don't preach above your audience. Some preachers do it. The Divine injunction is, 'Feed My lambs,' but you must not put the food out of the reach of the lambs. There are so many preachers who read that text as if it were, 'Feed my giraffes.'" Then he said to them—of course, there was no man freer of cant than Spurgeon, no man more earnest, but no man with less cant in London or out of London; and the one thing he could not stand was what he called the goody-good style. He said: "I heard a preacher say the other day: 'This morning I shall read a chapter in dear Hebrews.'" Another thing he said was: "Avoid the pompous. The other day I heard a man say, 'The son of Amram stood unmoved,' and I said to him, 'Who is the son of Amram?' He said, 'Moses.' 'Then why don't you say so?' "

Then here is another very good phrase, when he tells his students to avoid being too flowery. There is no man who had a greater gift of using poetic language, but it was used with great restraint. He said: "You must not wrap garlands round your swords." It is a great saying. He was down on long prayers. He said: "Fancy a man praying for twenty minutes, and then asking God to forgive his shortcomings!" He also advised them not to preach long sermons. He said: "Some sermons remind me of the sailor who was told to pull a rope on board. He pulled and pulled until he was tired, and then declared that he believed 'the end o' this 'ere rope is cut off.'" Then he said to them: "There are some people who can't stop even when they have really finished, when they have nothing more to say;" and he said it reminded him of the captain who ordered his company to fire a salute, and they answered: "We have no more ammunition, sir." "Then," he said, "cease firing." "That," said Spurgeon, "is my advice to you. Talking on the same subject, he said a boy was asked why the eunuch went away rejoicing.

He said: "It was, sir, because Philip had finished his sermon."

He was a good man. He was a man of genius. He had a great heart. It was a great soul. He was a great man; and my suggestion to every young man, especially, is this—to put Spurgeon on the list of his friends. He can do it through what has been published. Not the nominal friend, not the friend to neglect, not the friend to have his photograph on your mantelpiece and no more, not the friend you drop cards on; but the friend you get really acquainted with, get to know, and, above all, the friend whose counsel you ask at difficult moments. You will get advice from him in those great volumes that will serve your purpose. But, above all, with this proud possession—if you like, of the Baptist denomination—of this great figure in the story of the organization to which you and I belong, this great Englishman, this great prophet of his age, I ask you to see that his name, which will live in literature, shall live in this part of his work, to which he gave much of his heart, much of his labor, which shortened his life—see that something is done which is worthy of the people to whom you and I belong.

A Body for the Ideal

By the Rt. Rev. Charles H. Brent, D.D.

Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Western New York and Chairman of the Continuation Committee of the World Conference on Faith and Order

FROM America have come in recent years ideals of unity both for the churches and for the nations, ideals which have caught the imagination of the world. It is now pretty generally conceded that unity is a necessity and not a luxury. The educational stage is fast approaching the practical stage. In the history of ideals there is a period when they are in the air and when it would be premature to organize them into institutions. As they progress there comes a moment when they must have a body through which to perform their more advanced work. Such a moment has arrived when both for the churches and for the nations definite, even if tentative or experimental, steps must be taken to give concrete form to those hopes and visions which God has committed to us men for embodiment. I am here concerned only with the churches.

I think most of us, at any rate, have reached the comforting conclusions of Bishop Gore, who in his lectures on "Catholicism and Roman Catholicism" says: "I feel bound to acknowledge that all baptized persons are, as individuals, members of the Church Catholic. I cannot see how anyone who accepts the Western doctrine of the validity of all baptisms by whomsoever given can deny this. In some sense, to be really baptized into Christ is to be baptized into the Church inevitably." And again: "While we must be true to our distinctive responsibilities in the place where God has put us, we must, by all means, constantly remember that the divisions within the Church, though they are sadly deep, do not go near the root."

Comforting as this is, the time is past when we can rest satisfied with it. It is quite right to believe that it is the Divine method to accept and use man's imperfect way until the human mind recognizes its imperfection. After that inaction on our part is culpable, and unless we move up into something better we shall lose even the ground we possess. This is pointedly so now. Again to quote Bishop Gore: We must be faithful 'in our struggle to knit together again the sadly divided communions of the one Church of Christ.'

It was a great and sympathetic advance for the Bishops at Lambeth to agree that, in the major non-Episcopal communions, there have been enshrined "rich elements of truth, liberty and life which might otherwise have been obscured or neglected," and that these gifts ought to be placed at the disposal of the whole Christian fellowship. "The vision which rises before us is that of a Church genuinely catholic, loyal to all truth, and gathering into its fellowship all 'who profess and call themselves Christians,' within whose visible unity all the treasures of faith and order, bequeathed as a heritage by the past to the present, shall be possessed in common and made serviceable to the whole body of Christ. Within this unity Christian communions now separated from one another would retain much that has long been distinctive in their methods of worship and service. It is through a rich diversity of life and devotion that the unity of the whole fellowship will be fulfilled."

It is only on the basis of such a pre-supposition that the World Conference on Faith and Order has a locus standi. Our reach is ambitious. It claims for its field of operation the whole of Christendom. The great Catholic communions, East and West, are part of its vision, whether or not it receives official recognition by the Latin communion. Our vision began, and must continue, a whole vision. One of the great thinkers of the Roman Catholic Church writes, ponderously but truly, that "we religious men, especially we Catholic Christians, will indeed never drop the noble truth and ideal of a universal unity of cultus and belief, of a single world-wide Church, but we will conceive this our deathless faith in religious unity as being solely realizable only if we are able and glad to recognize the rudimentary, fragmentary, relative, pedagogic truth and worth in religions other than our own—a worth which, as regards at least Judaism and Hellenism, the Roman Church has never ceased to practice and proclaim." In another place the same writer says: "We religious men again will have to develop, as part of our religion, a sense, not simply of the error and evil, but also of the truth and the good, in any and every man's religion." This also must Protestants learn to do in their consideration of Rome.

Our vision, therefore, is before us clamoring for embodiment. A while ago there were those who would have pleaded for some sort of federative effort as sufficient for the need. Experience is steadily proving beyond any doubt that, though federation is of value, it is of limited value, and can never take the place of organic unity.

The next step in our progress toward unity is prosaic. We must bring our ideal down to earth and give it an incarnation. The goal set is a World Conference on Faith and Unity, if possible in 1925, the sixteenth centenary of Nicea. Such a conference will be impossible without a series of local conferences throughout the Christian Church in America. It should be noted that this method of dealing with great questions is recognized as being the most effective possible in a country of great spaces and great population like our own. The parish is admirably adapted for the promotion of the conference method. The over-production of literature, characteristic of our lavish times, makes our bulletins and other publications only semi-effective without the aid of personal contacts. This is peculiarly true as touching the laity, both men and women. There are few indeed of these who would not exclaim at once that our divisions are preposterous and that unity should be effected. But there are also few who realize that the responsibility for action in the direction of unity rests as much upon them as upon the clergy. Were the clergy alone to reach definite conclusions and arrive at plans for unity, they would be from the outset impeded and perhaps in the end be defeated, were not the laity keeping pace with them. The belief that the clergy are the Church is a vicious heresy, hard to kill. It can be killed only when the laymen take their full share in the thought as well as the activities and worship of the Church.

There are two major questions which occupy the foreground. They are fundamental and cannot be dismissed with a gesture. The first is, What is the Church? When this is answered so as to command a consensus of opinion the rest will be relatively easy. Is it a supernatural (or mystical) body? Is it unique among all organizations both in character and scope? Is there any substitute for the Church? Is it a local grouping or a universal fellowship? Is it spiritual in the sense of dealing only with things invisible, or is its business to flood the visible things with spiritual light and power, covering every department of human affairs—all these and many more queries must get a definite answer.

The second major question is, What place has a creed in the Church of Christ? Again we find ourselves flooded with interrogations preparatory to giving an answer. What is the difference between the Catholic creeds and confessions of faith? Does it block the immediate operation of the Spirit of God to keep inviolable the present form of the Apostles' and Nicene creeds? What is the function of a creed and how does it operate in aiding faith in the living Christ?

After we have cleared the ground for further discussion there arise questions on the sacraments and on holy orders, full of interest and full of importance. But we can hope for but little progress until the two major considerations have been fully and widely dealt with.

In conclusion, let me say that as America initiated these unity movements among both the churches and the nations, it is to America that the churches and the nations look for leadership in the embodiment of the ideal in the actual. Any failure on our part through inertness or cowardice would be the betrayal of a trust. We have set our hand to the plough and may not look back. Most of us do not estimate at its full value the opportunity lying at our very feet. It is up to us to prove that we are loyal to our own dream children. This can be done only by patient and painstaking labor which, without haste and without rest, embodies them in settled purpose and intelligent activity. Though we are concerned in this paper only with the unity of the churches, the world of men is panting with weariness because of the disunity of the nations. It is tolerably clear to all who think that the two unities are bound together so intimately that every step forward by the churches brings world peace nearer. The incentive is great, the cause is worthy, and the call for action is imperative.

Little Known Abyssinia

The Abyssinian is Christian and tolerant to all religious creeds. Little or no effort is made by him for the conversion of the Moslem or Jew. From the end of 1829 missionaries of various denominations have entered Abyssinian territory. The earliest was Samuel Gobat, sent by the Church Missionary Society of England, who was followed in 1834 by two Franciscan monks, sent by the propagandists at Rome. It may be said to the credit of the Abyssinian that his religion has the greatest influence for good. The country dotted with churches, monasteries and convents, the former being for the most part small and unpretentious, usually built in circular form and surmounted by a cross to which ostrich eggs are attached. The influence of the church undoubtedly sways the national policy.—William Thompson in the "Southern Workman."

Plans are being formulated by the National Radio Chamber of Commerce for the establishment of radio extension courses in all the principal universities of the country. Already preparations are being made in England and Germany for broadcasting college courses and pioneers in the field are active in this country. Many colleges and universities are using radio to further their advertising campaigns and to acquaint the public at large with the benefits of a college education. It has been estimated that there are between three and four million radio listeners in the United States, most of whom are of college age. With comparatively little effort complete courses could be broadcasted to this great audience from all the standard colleges and universities in the country. The only expense for the student would be incurred in the purchase of a radio set of sufficient strength to reach his favorite college.

Preparedness—But Which?

By Frederick J. Libby

[Reprinted from "The Locomotive Engineers' Journal" for April, 1923.]

OUR military men are filling the newspapers and periodicals with pleas for preparedness. Are they not justified? War is brewing in Europe. However warm one's sympathies with France or with Germany, even a child would know that the effect of the French seizure of the Ruhr is to sow hatred which, if it matures, will produce war.

The clank of arms in Europe vitally concerns us because the world has become too small for us to stay out of future European wars. We may cry, "Aloof! Aloof!" but the ocean will again be found to unite us with the seat of war, and we shall be thrust into the thick of it just as we were before. So our military men are saying—and will keep on saying until Congress meets that we must prepare adequately for war.

They are too honest to say, after the experience of the past ten years, that the measures they recommend will give us peace. Everybody knows now that preparation for war does not bring peace. What General Maurice of the British army learned, we all have learned, that "if you prepare for war, thoroughly and efficiently, you will get war."

Secretary Weeks, in "The Nation's Business" for January, declared that we must be ready for "a war that would tax us to the utmost in man power and resources." Colonel Roosevelt said in Philadelphia recently, that of course there will be more wars. The slogan that popularized conscription and war loans in the recent conflict, "A war to end war," is now a joke in our military circles. One wonders what slogan will take its place. Probably one is already pigeon-holed with the mobilization plans.

Getting ready for war! It is a discouraging thing to be doing so soon. The workingmen, and still more the wives and children of the workingmen of all the civilized world, groan under the burdens that the last war laid upon them. They who, as President Harding put it, "pay in peace and die in war," want no more new wars. They yearn for peace with justice and security. It is an alluring picture that the Hebrew prophet paints of a time—and we were told it would follow the Armistice of 1918—when the plain men of all the world could "sit every man under his vine and under his fig tree, and none to make them afraid."

Our soldiers promise us nothing like that. They do not lure us with specious and vain hopes. They tell us the truth as they see it. In fifteen or twenty years—perhaps earlier, perhaps later, God knows—we may expect a "war that would tax us to the utmost in man power and resources."

We know what being "taxed in resources" means as we did not ten years ago. We know, too, what being "taxed in man power" means. It means white crosses in interminable rows.

But you will say, "I thought we were prepared now. We have a good navy." At least, it is an expensive one. We have just appropriated half as much again for the upkeep of the army and navy as all the rest of the government costs put together. Five hundred and fifty millions, twenty per cent of our 1924 budget, will go for the army and navy. Eighty-six per cent. of the same budget goes to pay for past wars and for this next one. Only fourteen cents of our hard-earned dollars paid to the Federal Government will go for the "constructive purposes of peace." What more do they want?

Innocent reader, do you honestly imagine that we can prepare for the unknown terrors of the next cataclysm "adequately" on $550,000,000 a year? Read what Will Irwin has to say in his little book, "The Next War." Poison gas and airplanes offer possibilities of destructiveness beyond the power of human imagination to conceive.

Edison says that London can be wiped out in three hours and that there is no way of preventing it. Bywater says that the French have now enough airplanes to lay waste half the cities of southern England, including London. The next war will be the twilight of the white civilization. The jackals and the coyotes will be barking amid the ruins of the great cities of the earth when its clouds lift for God to look down. Do you think we should skimp in our preparations? Remember again! We are not preparing in the hope of averting war by that means nor of remaining outside. Face the facts like a man! We are asked to prepare adequately so that more of our children may pull through than can survive in the rest of the civilized world—in Europe, for example. Anybody can see what Europe will be when that war stops. Airplanes, poison gas and hate in a crowded area like little Europe! God have mercy on the children! But He won't—because we have no mercy.

We must get ready adequately for war and no more fooling. "Why should we go unprepared as we are at present?" cried Admiral Sims at Peoria on George Washington's birthday—George Washington, who said, "My first wish is to see this plague of mankind—war—banished from the earth." Read what General Pershing said in a recent "Saturday Evening Post," enlarging on the same theme. Read the little extract from the "preparedness" program that you can find in to-morrow morning's paper. Read the story the next morning "popularizing" the navy or the National Guard. Visit the "movies" and watch for the "popularizing" picture in the "News Weekly." Look for it also in the illustrated pages of the daily and Sunday press. Question your boy when he is home from college, or your child after school, to see whether they are being educated for peace or for war. It will be a big war and we must not only get ready, we must be gotten ready.

What is the program? It has all been proclaimed from the housetops. You will read it ad nauseam till Congress meets. Our military men fear the next Congress and so the campaign for greatly increased military appropriations has already been launched. The following are the chief features:

I. Remodel the battleships at a cost of $90,000,000. (It is now announced that the first year's work on this feature has been delayed, but not abandoned.)

2. Build sixteen 10,000-ton scout cruisers. Cost, $168,000,000.

3. Build six big submarines as types for future development. Cost, $24,000,000.

4. Build six gunboats. Cost, $8,000,000.

5. Build another airplane carrier. Cost, $22,000,000.

6. Develop an air force of 40,000 men and 2,000 officers with 2,000 planes "on the coasts and at strategic points in the interior." Cost of maintenance (conservative estimate), $120,000,000.

7. Scrap the Mare Island naval base (cost $40,000,000) and build one on the Alameda mud flats to cost $150,000,000.

8. Build adequate naval bases on Oahu, T. H.; on Puget Sound; develop the New York-Narragansett Bay base; the Chesapeake Bay base; an advance base in the Canal Zone.

9. Develop six secondary bases.

10. Develop "completely" six airplane stations. The cost of these eighteen naval bases and airplane stations has not been published. A billion dollars will not cover it adequately.

11. Expand the National Guard, as provided under the National Defense Act, from the present force of 160,000 to 424,000, if the States permit. Maine and Wisconsin refuse to expand further.

12. Increase the Civilian Military Training Camps from 22,000 to 100,000, as endorsed by President Harding.

13. Extend the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, senior and junior divisions, from the present size of about 100,000 to a possible 884,000 in the 670 colleges and universities and the "1,200 secondary institutions where junior units might be maintained." If appropriations remain inadequate, extend military training under Section 55-c of the National Defense Act ("first military policy America ever had") from the sixty-two schools now receiving aid from this section to the 1,200 eligible.

14. Increase the Regular Army from 125,000 men and 12,000 officers to an immediate minimum of 150,000 men and 13,000 officers (see General Pershing's article in the "Saturday Evening Post" of March 10 for light on this and other points above) and gradually raise the figure to the "necessary" 285,000 men and 18,000 officers provided for in the National Defense Act.

Some readers of this formidable program will say to themselves, "Surely this is an exaggeration." Unfortunately for us, it is not! Clip for yourself the items as they appear. Begin with General Pershing's article already referred to. Add to it from the daily press as the propaganda goes through the cycle and then repeats. You will very quickly realize that America is being asked to prepare adequately for "a war that would tax us to the utmost in man power and resources," and that it cannot be done on any $550,000,000 a year. Twice that will be required "if we are not to be caught napping again," as you will be told.

Perhaps you wonder how the recruits are to be found for these vast forces when it is hard now to keep the various branches of the army and navy up to authorized strength. General Lassiter reports that "the units now being definitely established will provide a force of about 3,000,000 men." It cannot be done without militarizing the thinking of the youth. Since women are the natural enemies of war, they too must be "started right." All this has been adequately planned.

A conference on the Training of Our Youth for Citizenship and National Defense was held in Washington in November, under the auspices of the War Department. On December 8 the Secretary of War submitted to the President a report which can be obtained from the War Department. Here is how the hundreds of thousands of annual recruits are to be obtained: Give "the young men and women of the country" a "complete and proper conception of their . . . duties as citizens, together with proper preparation of each and every one to render some useful service in the organized defense of the nation in any emergency."

The plan is to "get them young." Instruction in junior units is to "be so organized and administered that it will stimulate interest in military work."

The main reliance for recruiting officers is declared to be "suitable training prior to reaching the period of admission to the Reserve Officers' Training Corps." It is mercilessly thorough!

One more indication of the seriousness of the preparations: The entire industrial and economic resources of the nation are being tabulated and pigeon-holed under the direction of the Assistant Secretary of War. Even the contracts under which work is to be done have been agreed upon between the Secretary of War and the potential contractors. (See "The Nation's Business" for January, article by Secretary Weeks, "Organizing Business for War.")

We may thus sum up our preparations for war: Since no effective measures to assure peace have been taken, whether by labor or the churches or the farmers or the women or the governments—certainly not ours—in four years of opportunity, and since, on the contrary, seeds of hate, and therefore of war, are being sown to be reaped by and by. Our military men are simply doing their duty and calling upon us to make the sacrifices necessary if we are to pull through the war better than the more congested nations of Europe possibly can. They frankly say that we shall suffer to the utmost in man power and resources. There is no doubt that Europe will be practically exterminated. Our preparation will cost us roughly a billion a year. Then will come the war!

I have said that one reason for the justice of the plea of our military men is the fact that we are making no effective efforts to achieve peace. Sentiment is not going to end war. Nor are we going to drift into permanent peace. Men drift down, not up. We are drifting into war. If the time ever comes when we are sufficiently aroused as a nation to want peace we shall, of course, go to work and get it. British labor has averted two wars in three years as far as Great Britain was concerned, but world leadership has now passed to America. It is the United States that will have to take certain necessary steps if world warfare is to be stopped and if a new era of peace and justice is to dawn. What is the way to peace?

As would be expected, it is the opposite of the way to war. In place of aloofness—now found impossible in this diminishing world—progressive world organization by the old reliable step-by-step method; in place of increasing armaments, world-wide reduction of armaments to police status; in place of militarization of the thinking of our youth of both sexes—to be duplicated, if we start it, in every land—world-wide education for peace. This program, substantially that of every thinker from William Penn down, is rational and practical. It offers us the only hope we have in the darkness of our times.

There must be progressive world organization. What do we mean? The League of Nations? An Association of Nations—a kind of league without "teeth"? A World Court to Outlaw War as advocated by Senator Borah? The Permanent Court of International Justice at The Hague, endorsed both by the Democrats and by President Harding? We mean the progressive substitution of law for war as a method of settling international disputes by steps as rapid as public opinion is from time to time ready to take.

As a first step, the recognition of an existing world court is more in accord with common sense than trying to start a new one against the opposition of fifty nations. But Senator Borah says this court has too narrow jurisdiction to assure the settlement of all disputes. The next step is, then, to extend its jurisdiction. Eighteen nations have given it compulsory jurisdiction.

Conferences have proved their worth when labor unions and organized employers differ radically. Conferences will be found valuable when nations differ. An economic conference on the rehabilitation of Europe must come as soon as France will agree to discuss fundamentals and as soon as America is ready to reduce the inter-allied debts to practicable figures in return for the sacrifices that European nations will have to make—such as reduction of armaments, balancing of budgets and stabilization of currencies. The world must get down to bedrock and begin to build.

But some man will say, "This will not stop wars. You have got to change the economic system." Personally, I do not believe that we have got to change the economic system in order to abolish the organized murder system of settling the disputes that may arise under it. If organized labor knew, for example, that a war was starting over oil, would it support that war?

With the spread of knowledge it is going to be increasingly difficult to arouse patriotic fervor over economic aggression backed by armies and navies. Once the machinery is set up for the orderly settlement of international quarrels, the man on the street is going to point his icter to the properly constituted tribunal and go peacefully about his business. But the machinery must exist and it must command confidence. We must keep going along this road until we reach effectiveness. We must be willing to tinker with the machinery until it works.

Disarmament must be world-wide. The world is too small for any nation to disarm alone. But as long as France, for example, has an army of 700,000 men and Russia an army as large or larger, no world organization would have stability. Europe would continue to be an armed camp.

Police status is the goal most men contemplate for the reduction of armies. "Minimum police forces" is the goal set by the Fidac organization of former soldiers, of which the American Legion is a member. The important thing from the standpoint of necessary economy and world security is that armies and navies be all reduced together, and that as fast as the progressive growth of machinery for the orderly settlement of disputes permits, all armies and navies become mere police forces. We need our billion a year for something else.

David F. Houston, recent Secretary of the Treasury, reckoned that our government has cost, since the beginning, sixty-seven billion dollars. Of this fifty-two billions have gone for war or because of war, and we have lived on the other fifteen. What a country this would be with the fifty-two! Without indulging in vain regrets, the world can start whenever it is ready to save the next fifty-two.

We have in our office copies of a French primer, printed since the war. It was obtained from the publisher in Paris. On the cover one reads that it is the eighth edition, 381st to 410th thousand. Presumably 380,000 copies are in use among the children of France of the age of six or seven.

In this primer we find a picture of German soldiers shooting down a French boy whose hands are raised in a dramatic gesture that no child could forget. There is a picture of the burning of the roof of Rheims Cathedral. There is this conversation:

"My child, you will not forget all these crimes?"

"I promise, mother."

These are sentences for the child to fill in: "The Germans have killed _____. The Germans have destroyed _____. The Germans have burnt _____."

Hatred will thus be drilled into the soul of the little pupil that he will not outgrow this side of the presence of God. This is education for war.

We wish that no other nation were doing this detestable thing. The fact is, and we all know it, we all are doing it, though perhaps less crudely than the French Nationalists. Who of our generation in America was not taught a prejudice against Great Britain when we studied the history of the Revolutionary War? At our most impressionable age we were taught that "America licked 'em and could lick 'em again," or words to that effect. The textbooks were designed to convey that impression.

So with the war of 1812. General Pershing says that "the only creditable thing in the whole war was Jackson's victory at New Orleans, fought after the treaty of peace had been signed."

"Our troops," he says, "were untrained and everywhere badly handled, and, of course, fled before the enemy from nearly every field. Even the capitol was left defenseless, only to be captured and burned by a handful of British. The conduct of the forces can be recorded only with humiliation."—"Saturday Evening Post," March 10.

Was this the impression that you and I were given?

A Mexican textbook is said to describe Pershing's expedition into Mexico as a "bandit's raid" that was finally repulsed by the bravery of the Mexican forces.

All nations in their schools are sedulously cultivating a "superiority complex" by misrepresenting facts in the interest of a wrong type of patriotism. "Deutschland ueber alles" is adapted to every country. "America over all," "England over all," "France over all!" It is the background sought by all imperialisms.

On June 28 a conference of the educators of fifty nations is to gather in San Francisco, California, under the auspices of the National Education Association, to discuss what steps can be taken jointly to disarm the textbooks of the world, just as Japan has recently been doing, substituting those that teach broad international understanding for those that foster narrow nationalism. It is a conference as momentous in its possibilities as any that ever convened.

We who have lived through a war and who know what war is may hammer out a world organization in the next ten years that will work fairly well in the prevention of war. We must elect to office men who will try, men of vision, men of wisdom, men who without being rash, are not afraid to take risks in the interest of humanity. We may hammer down the armaments of the world to police forces, being aided powerfully by the intolerable taxation in every land. But if our work is to have permanence we must see to it that our schools are not undoing all we achieve by teaching nationalistic prejudices and hatreds. They must educate for peace. They must teach the truth. They must teach the truth about other nations as well as our own. They must teach the truth about war. In one generation the schools can change the thinking of the world.

We have discussed adequate preparation for war. We have discussed adequate preparation for peace. None of us believe in "unpreparedness." We must choose between two adequate programs. America leads and will lead for the next fateful ten years. Which way shall we lead—resolutely, wisely? Shall it be toward peace or toward the wreck of our civilization?

No Respecter of Titles

By William Willard Howard

IT should not be necessary to discuss this matter at all. It really is a thing that should carry its own answer, but as some of the contributors to the Russian Refugee Fund seem to be mildly curious concerning the attitude of the Russian ladies of title in the relief work that Anne Louise Howard has put into operation on the borders of Bolshevik Russia, I may as well dispose of the question now as at any time later.

The feature of the relief work on which light is wanted is this: Do the Russian ladies of title receive special consideration and preferential treatment because of their titles, or do they stand on the same footing with writers, artists, musicians, teachers, officers' widows and other members of the intelligentsia?

The answer is: Anne Louise Howard is no respecter of titles.

To this thoroughgoing American lady a title of nobility is regarded as a sort of social curiosity. If she were to show any preference in her relief work I should expect her to show it toward some half-starved teacher, writer, artist or musician—at any rate, some helpless, friendless creature without claim to social distinction.

As a matter of fact, the only preferential treatment shown in this work is given, by common consent, to those destitute and starving gentlewomen who are most in need. In giving out employment the rule is, "The neediest ones first."

The Russian ladies of title have not made any claim for consideration because of their titles. On the contrary, some have concealed the fact that they have titles. I think that many titled persons among the refugees are living under assumed names as a measure of safety. During the revolution in Russia a title was a certain target for a revolutionist's rifle. The refugees feel that their peril is not yet over. They live in terror lest they be gathered up and dumped back upon the soil of Bolshevik Russia.

Another question has been asked, How much do the Russian gentlewomen earn in this relief work?

It may astonish the contributor who asked the question when I answer, I do not know. It is the literal truth: I do not know. Anne Louise Howard does not know.

I know, of course, the exact cost of batiste, voile, French crépon, Panama cloth, embroidery colors, sewing thread, elastic tape and buttons. I know, also, the total amount that we pay for labor on a hundred blouses; but I do not know how much each individual worker receives for her work.

The work is done through two committees of refugees which were formed for the special purpose of dealing with individual workers. The committees divide the work according to the temperament and aptitude of the workers. Payment is made on a sliding scale regulated by the design of the embroidery and the amount of detail in the finished work. In some instances the cutting is done by one person, the work of embroidery by another, and the sewing and finishing by a third. As many as four individuals sometimes work on one blouse, although the rule is for one person to make an entire blouse.

It will be seen, therefore, that it would be difficult for me to know, with any degree of accuracy, what the workers earn. The intention of the committees, however, is that the earnings of the workers shall not be less than the earnings of the native women who work at dressmaking and kindred employments.

The rates of pay are fixed by the refugees themselves, acting through their committees. That the rates are satisfactory, as compared with the earnings of native women, is shown by the efforts of native women to obtain a share in the employment. In one instance a Hebrew woman was so anxious to get the work that she tried to obtain cloth and embroidery materials by main strength. Women of German origin have asked repeatedly for a chance to do the work.

It is natural that gentlewomen in the United States who have seen better days should sympathize most keenly with the plight of the Russian gentlewomen. A lady in Baltimore has sent a dollar bill with this message: "For the gentlewomen of Russia from a Southern gentlewoman whose loss in the past limits her contribution."

With a keen sympathy for the destitute Russian refugees a gentlewoman in Wilkesburg, Pennsylvania, has sent to me this letter: "After reading your articles in THE CHRISTIAN WORK which so vividly describe these fine women and your wonderful work I want to tell you that one of the poor women of America, who, like those over there, have seen better days, has read and appreciates perhaps more what you are doing than those readers who have known no tragedy or sacrifice as I have known. Although I am personally poor, I have some friends to whom I want to show the photographs of the blouses. It may be that I can help sell some, and in that way help these deserving people.

"I would ask no better in life than to be placed in such a position as the lady who helps you over there. I will appreciate the circular regarding the blouses and can assure you of one order—maybe more."

The writer of the foregoing letter thinks that she is poor. In reality, she is rich—abundantly rich in those priceless qualities of human sympathy and helpfulness which lift the individual out of the rut of self-interest and selfishness and make possible the spiritual progress of the world.

Most of you who read these lines can help the Russian gentlewomen in the same way that this gentlewoman in Wilkesburg intends to help—if you will. It is a matter only of human sympathy and a willingness to help. Those among you who do not want a blouse probably have among your friends at least one gentlewoman who is able to buy a blouse and who would be glad to help in that way, if the plight of the Russian gentlewomen were brought to her attention. If you can help to sell a blouse the financial result is as good as though you bought one.

In bringing the destitute and suffering condition of the Russian gentlewomen to the attention of your friends the fact should be borne in mind that the withdrawal of American relief workers from Bolshevik Russia has no bearing whatsoever on the plight of the refugees. No matter how abundant the harvest in Bolshevik Russia may or may not be, not one grain of wheat or of rye of that harvest will benefit the refugees. It should be remembered that the refugees are not now in Bolshevik Russia, but are this side of the border in eastern Europe.

The refugees can neither go back to their old homes to share in the harvest, nor yet find employment in the alien lands in which they have sought safety. The only course open to them is to remain where they are until a change in political conditions permits them to return home. So they wait—and starve. You may save a life, if you will, in one of three ways. You may buy a blouse, you may help to sell a blouse, or you may send in a contribution, in any amount, to increase the present working fund. Remittance for blouse or contributions to the fund may be sent to the Russian Refugee Fund, care THE CHRISTIAN WORK, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

A forty-page illustrated booklet giving photo-engravings of twenty-five representative blouses will be sent to any address or to any of your friends for the asking.

Evolution and Immortality

By Rev. Walter Spence

Pastor of the Congregational Church, Peru, Illinois

“IF a man die shall he live again?” asked the Patriarch of Uz. We are still asking that age-old question. And with persistent purpose we still seek for new and better reasons for this hope of immortality. The doctrine of evolution has answered many questions, and has thrown new light upon many old problems. Does it shed any light upon the riddle of existence? Does it help us to answer this question of Job? Does it deny the immortality of man, as some of its adversaries assume? Or is it a dumb oracle with no word either for or against this hope? Or does it furnish new grounds for this unquenchable faith?

The evolutionist, least of all men, should deny the possibility of survival after death. That in man should be evolved the power of survival is not more incredible than other accepted conclusions of evolution. When we consider the amazing results of the evolutionary processes nothing seems impossible. If from the simple form of the amoeba has been developed the highly organized human sensorium; if from the nerve center of the ascidian has been developed the human brain with its power of thought and its sense of freedom; if from mere sensation has been developed consciousness, and from animal consciousness human self-consciousness, we should not think it incredible that the animating principle in the highest form of life should develop the power of perpetual survival. As Dr. T. T. Munger wrote, “The space between an ascidian and a thinking brain is as wide as that between temporary existence and unlimited existence. If an ascidian can evolve mind, the briefer life of an ascidian may evolve endless life.”

The belief, then, that man has developed the power of survival is entirely consistent with the known results of evolution. We find an analogy, or rather a parallel, to this in the life of a plant. The plant has the power of self-perpetuation. When and whence comes this power? It is not an original power—it is not possessed by the tiny shoot when first it is born from the earth. Cut it down in mid-life and it dies to live no more. The self-perpetuating power is acquired at a certain stage of its growth by development within the plant itself. And then it bears a seed in which it hides its life. And though the old plant body die, it survives in the seed to build for itself another body by and by. Thus it is conceivable that nature has developed in man a survival power that enable him to bridge the gulf of death and live forever. As John Fiske has said, “There is no insuperable difficulty in the notion that in some period in the evolution of humanity this divine spark may have acquired sufficient concentration and steadiness to survive the wreck of material forms and endure forever.” Evolution is the miracle worker of the ages. It changed a shapeless nebula of fire-mist into a cosmos. It changed a sphere of molten minerals into an habitable world. It changed the fins of fish into the wings of birds. It transformed mollusks into mammals and beasts into men. Is it any greater miracle to endow man with the power of an endless life?

Not only does the doctrine of evolution admit of the possibility of survival, but it furnishes some grounds for this belief. It gives scientific form and force to one of the most familiar arguments. The philosopher has argued from the universal hope of immortality. Among all races there is this belief in a future life that shall never end. The American Indian believed in “a happy hunting ground” in some mystic land of the spirit world; the Scandinavian in green paradise amid the eternal wastes; the Greek in the Elysian Plains, where the shadowy images of the dead moved in a world of shadows; the Egyptian embalmed the bodies of his dead and hid them in mausoleums because he believed in a resurrection day; the Jew believed that when “the dust returns to the earth as it was, the spirit returns to God who gave it,” and the Christian believes that “There is no death; what seems so is transition;

This life of mortal breath
Is but a suburb of the life elysian
Whose portal we call death.”

Viewed from the standpoint of evolution, there is a profound significance in this universal belief—this instinct of immortality. Nature has her prophecies, and we know that her prophecies are fulfilled. The development of lungs in the unborn animal is a prophecy of breathing. The development of wings on the unhatched birdling is a prophecy of flight. The development of vocal cords “in the songless egg” is a prophecy of song. The development of the eyes of the embryo is a prophecy of sight. So the development of this hope in human consciousness is a prophecy of its fulfillment. It is inconceivable that Nature would have evolved this instinct in the consciousness of the race if there can be no fulfillment of the hope.

Or to look at this instinct from another angle, does Nature evolve desires which cannot be gratified? We have not found her so inconsistent. Every natural desire finds its means of gratification. For hunger there is food; for thirst there is water; for esthetic desire there are things of beauty; for acquisitiveness there is untold treasure; for passion there is the differentiation of sex. Then may we not safely conclude that for this great desire also Nature has provided a means for its satisfaction. "Nature makes no half-hinges," said Joseph Cook. "God does not create a desire to mock it. Our constitutional instincts raise no false expectations. Conscience tells no Munchausen tales. The structure of the human constitution is not an organized lie." The Christian evolutionist believes that this universal hope of humanity is the voice of Nature and the voice of God speaking through intuition to the human heart, whispering of immortality, prophesying a deathless life beyond the tomb.

The doctrine of immortality, and that alone, gives a raison d'être for the whole process of evolution. Man is the ultimate goal of evolution. He is not only the latest and highest result, but the goal toward which, throughout the ages, Nature has been striving. Every successive stage in the development was a step toward man. When Nature evolved the lowest form of vegetable life upon the wild wastes, that was the first great step. When the first animal began its semi-conscious existence in the primeval waters, that was another step toward man. When the mollusk was succeeded by the fish, and the fish by the reptile, and the reptile by the mammal, life was steadily climbing toward man. And when at last, after countless ages, man arrived upon the stage of the world's history, the goal of Nature's development was reached, evolution's one great purpose was fulfilled. "On earth there will never be a higher creature than man," said John Fiske. "It is a daring prophecy," commented Henry Drummond, "but every probability of science attests the likelihood of its fulfillment. The goal looked forward to from the beginning of time has been attained. Nature has succeeded in making a man. She can go no further; organic evolution has done its work." If man does not survive physical death, what has Nature accomplished? "The mountain labored and brought forth a mouse." When one believes that "the whole creation is focussed on man, that throughout all the ages Nature has been evolving humanity, it is impossible to believe that the end of all this is, at the best, only three-score years and ten of life and then annihilation. "It is inconceivable," to quote from Lyman Abbott, "that God should have spent all the ages in making a Gladstone, a Lincoln, a Jefferson, a Shakespeare, only that He might make a body with which to fill a grave." Without the immortality of man this long evolution seems without a purpose, this beautiful cosmos without a meaning, as Macbeth said, "an idiot tale signifying nothing." He who believes that behind all the forces of Nature is a Supreme Being, an Infinite Intelligence, and an Infinite Love that never acts without a purpose and always does what is right and good, can never accept such a conclusion. "I believe in the immortality of the soul," said John Fiske, "as a supreme act of faith in the reasonableness of God's work. . . . The more thoroughly we comprehend that process of evolution by which things have come to be what they are, the more likely are we to feel that to deny the everlasting persistence of the spiritual element in man is to rob the whole process of its meaning."

From the viewpoint of evolution, the physical life is but one stage in the development of the soul. Though physical evolution reached its goal in the animal man, psychical evolution must carry forward his mental and spiritual nature to higher degrees of excellence. The event of death merely transfers the soul from one stage of development to another. The biological history of a man shows several distinct stages, each of which has a function to perform in his development. At first he exists in germ, in a spherule of protoplasm. He soon outgrows this, breaks the fetters, develops a higher form. In the body of his mother he grows into the embryo. By and by he undergoes a crisis, he is born into the world of air and sunshine. With new environments and new conditions of life he continues his evolution. Through the sensorium he acquires knowledge, and the body becomes the instrument of many activities. By means of the body the soul is moulded and developed. The years pass, and there comes a day when the body is no longer needful. It has performed its function—it has helped forward the soul as far as Nature intended. Henceforth it would be no longer a help, but an incubus. If the soul would still grow, it must lay aside the body. Then the body is dropped, and the soul, the man himself, is born into a higher realm to continue his evolution under conditions of which we cannot conceive. It is the metamorphosis of life.

Nature furnishes many analogies of such metamorphosis. The most familiar and most beautiful is that of the caterpillar, "Nature's gospel of the resurrection." In one stage of its existence it is a mere worm, creeping upon the earth, stupid and unattractive. Then comes a short period of dormancy. It seems to be dead. Then one day the chrysalis is broken open, and from the dead body of the worm rises a winged creature of wondrous beauty, floating upon the air, feeding upon the flowers, bathing its glorious wings in the sunlight, moving with the rapidity of thought, as free as the zephyrs in which it sports. The worm-body is a necessary stage in the evolution of the butterfly. But when this is no longer needed the worm-body is thrown aside, and the butterfly with a new body rises into a higher life and attains its perfect form. The metamorphosis of the butterfly is a beautiful illustration of the metamorphosis of a human soul. When the physical body has performed its function in the evolution of the soul, it dies, it is left behind, and the immortal spirit mounts up into the higher and freer life of the spirit world.

The Protestant Episcopal Church has always been a compact body. The term "church" indicates a common consciousness coming down from the far centuries past. Separate congregations are never called "churches." They are parishes and part of the one Church. In the administration of missionary and benevolent enterprises the Episcopalians have one society known as the Domestic and Foreign Mission Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America, which has been in existence since 1821. Within recent years this Society has been more perfectly compacted under the administration of a bishop, and a new title has been given it, that of "the Presiding Bishop and Council." This new organization correlates in a way the dioceses of the Church as well as the missionary activities of the Church. The Council is organized in the following departments: Missions and Church Extension. Christian Social Service, Publicity, Finance, and the Nation-wide Campaign. Rt. Rev. Thomas F. Gailor, former Bishop of Tennessee, has been the president of the Council and was re-elected at the recent National Council of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Portland, Oregon. This gives a continuity of administration through a second term of office.

Prodigal Daughters*

By Joseph Hocking

INSTALLMENT XV.

She heard murmuring voices and hasty footsteps, and then she knew she was in her mother's arms. She heard her mother's voice, felt the warm kisses on her cheek. She wanted to explain, wanted to—she knew not what.

"Oh, Mother, he's left me, and—and it's wrong, I know—but I'm glad he has! I could not go to him again even if he wanted me. It's all been so awful, so horrible!"

"Of course it has," cried Mrs. Trelawney.

She seemed to know what to do better than her husband. There was that touch of intimacy, knowledge and innate wisdom which helps to make the crooked places straight and the rough places plain.

"Of course you mustn't cry; what is there to cry about? You have come home, my darling. And, Lester, can't you see that the poor child is tired and faint? The servants have gone to bed, but that doesn't matter. Oh, yes, it's no use telling me, Peggy, I know you're hungry. I'll go and get something for you."

There was healing in every word, in every tone, in every movement. The child's bitter, wounded, bleeding heart felt it, and understood. There were no reproachful questions, no upbraidings, no saying, "I told you so." The time for these things might come later, but now it was heartfelt gladness, a welcome home which her poor little soul longed for.

"No, no, I'm not going to let you talk to me about all those miserable things!" cried the mother, as Peggy again tried to return to her sordid tale of the past few months. "There's no need for that now, and you must not trouble a bit about the future. We shall be able to talk about that some other time. All that matters now is that you are here, my darling."

"I was afraid that—you would be away," sobbed Peggy. "It seemed strange that you should be up so late."

"I could not go to bed," said the General. "I don't know why, but I felt as though I must sit up."

The door opened again, and John entered.

"Hello, Peg, old girl!" said the boy rather awkwardly. "Good business! I thought I heard your voice, so I put on these clothes over my pajamas and came down."

"Yes, Peg's come home," cried the General. "Come to stay. Isn't it splendid?"

"He left me this," said Peggy piteously, handing John the letter which Barnes had written. "I've been staying with his mother, and—and, Jack, don't look like that!" For John had read the letter by this time, and knew the whole truth as if by intuition.

"The mean, dirty swine! But it's all right, Peg, he'll never trouble you any more," said the boy, speaking awkwardly, but with a look shining from his eyes which made Peggy understand in spite of everything.

"Of course, it's going to be all right," said Mrs. Trelawney. "Are you quite warm now, darling? Will you have something more to eat?"

"No, no, Mother. Don't mind my crying, but it's all so beautiful—I never knew before how beautiful it was. Dad, you're sure it's you, aren't you? You're sure I'm home, really? Will you let me get on your knee again? And, Dad, you're sure you forgive me, aren't you? I have been wicked, but—but I do want to be a good girl!"

The General took her on his knee again. "There, there, my little Peggy, snuggle up close to me just as you did in the old days when I used to tell you stories before I put you to bed. Is that all right?"

"It's just beautiful, Dad," she sobbed, "just beautiful!"

Unmindful of the time, they sat together, talking. Little by little Peggy became calmer, and in spite of their protests she insisted on telling her story again; such a mean, miserable story! She seemed to want to unburden her heart, to throw from her life the experiences of the last few months. It might be as though she were a little child again, a little kiddie who had been naughty and now entered the happiness which comes through forgiveness.

But it was more than that, and although they said nothing of it, each knew it. Especially did the General feel that, although his little Peggy had come home, contrite and repentant, that he, with all his love, could never wipe out the past. He saw by her shudders and by her expression of loathing when Barnes' name was mentioned, the misery and the truth. He could not undo the fact that in many senses his child's life was ruined, and that in the days to come she would feel the pollution of her association with the man with whom she had been madly infatuated.

But he would not upbraid her. He would try, as far as in him lay, to destroy the effect of those miserable months. He knew she had destroyed much of her girlhood. She had made her future black with a kind of shame which she could not express, and she would be forever haunted by the thought that her life had been contaminated with evil. She had come back, but it could never be as though she had never gone away. There were still the months which the locusts had eaten.

But he kept all that from Peggy. In spite of everything his heart went out to her with a great overwhelming love, and the thought of her contrition and her penitence went far to atone for the pain she had caused him.

"We must get Trev home!" he cried. "I'm sure it can be managed—and we must get Mary Penryn up here, too. You'll like her, Peg."

"Yes, she's a ripping girl," was John's emphasis. "You must get her up here to-morrow, Dad. I'll bring her up to lunch if you like. I'll run down with the car for her to-morrow morning."

"And now we won't talk any longer," said Mrs. Trelawney. "I can see you're tired."

"I feel as though I shall never be tired again," sobbed Peggy

"Ah, but you are. I insist on you going to bed now."

A few minutes later Peggy was in her own bedroom, the bedroom she had known from childhood. Oh, how beautiful, how restful everything was! She recognized every article in the room. Nothing seemed to have been changed since she left it. It had been furnished according to her own desires and tastes. The colorings were perfect, everything accorded with everything else, and it was all so sweet and restful. An air of refinement prevailed, too. Everything was so different from the vulgar squalor of Primrose Terrace.

"Is everything all right, Peggy?" asked her mother.

"Kneel with me as I say my prayers," she sobbed. "Just as you used to do in the old days, Mother. I've been a wicked girl, but I will be good. Oh, I will be good!"

Side by side they knelt, while the mother, scarcely less moved than her child, put her arm round her. "Please, God, forgive me, and help me to be a good girl."

It was the old prayer of her childhood which came back to her, and for the moment she felt like a child again. And, after all, she was but little more. But her childhood had gone, and she knew it, and although she could not put it into words, she felt the tragedy of it.

"There, now, go to sleep," said her mother, as Peggy nestled among the clean white sheets. "We shall be here in the morning."

"May I come in, Peggy?"

"Yes, Dad; please come."

The General knelt beside the bed and kissed her. "God bless you, my little girl," he said, and his voice broke. "Good-night, we'll meet in the morning."

"MISS STATHAM."

LEANOR saw at a glance that Miss Statham's rooms had an appearance of comfort, almost amounting to luxury. The house, which was large and handsome, overlooked Regent's Park, and was pleasantly situated. Years before the whole row in which the house was placed had been occupied by people of position and affluence. As the years went by, however, and the craze for flats had grown, this, with other dwellings of a similar nature, had been turned into self-contained suites and let much to the proprietor's profit.

"Yes, the position is very pleasant," assented Miss Statham when Eleanor expressed delight at what she saw. "It's very convenient, too. One is in easy access to everything from here, and yet away from the noise and crowds. But come, take off your things and sit by the fire. We are nearing the end of March, but the weather is bitterly cold."

She led the way into her bedroom as she spoke, and Eleanor saw taste and comfort everywhere.

"I am glad you like my rooms," said Miss Statham as she noted Eleanor's look of approbation. "You see, I have a bathroom adjoining and also another bedroom in case I want to entertain a friend. From my point of view, I do not suppose I could get anything better. I can be in the office in twenty minutes and the people here are very good to me. They have a very good cook and the service is, on the whole, excellent. Sometimes, of course, I dine at a restaurant for a change, but generally I have my dinner served here alone. I see you are looking at my books," she went on, as they entered the front room again. "Yes, I read a good deal. I am not often in the humor for going out, and I'm afraid I am very extravagant in books. Of course, the libraries do one pretty well, but I buy a good many all the same. Somehow I can never enjoy a borrowed book like I can one of my own."

A little later they sat down to dinner, which was deftly served by a quick-footed, silent servant. Everything was cooked to perfection and showed that Miss Statham could command all that money could give her. It was evident, too, that she was a woman of taste. Every piece of furniture was a work of art. Indeed, every article in the room suggested a person of culture and affluence.

"And now," said Miss Statham, when they had finished dinner, "draw up your chair to the fire and let us talk. Will you forgive my saying so? I took a liking to you the first time we met, and I have for a long time wanted to ask you to come here, but I kept putting it off. As I get older I am afraid to act on impulse. I want to think out everything again and again before acting."

"I expect that is because of the responsible position you hold in the firm," replied Eleanor.

"Perhaps so, but I'm inclined to think I am getting crusty. Do you know how old I am?"

"A little over thirty, I should say."

"I am nearly thirty-seven," and there was a touch of bitterness in her voice. "Miss Trelawney, I want to tell you that you are winning golden opinions from both Mr. Spurling and Mr. King. I am saying this to spite myself, for I honestly believe I am a little bit jealous of you."

Eleanor laughed incredulously.

"It's true," replied Miss Statham. "Women are like that, at least women under certain conditions are, and they get jealous in spite of themselves. Do you mind my speaking freely to you?"

"I shall be delighted if you will."

"Well, I think old maids are nearly all in a state of arrested development. If a woman does not marry by the time she's thirty-five her nature, instead of mellowing, kind of shrivels up. That's why old maids are sour and vinegary. Would you mind telling me what are your hopes and prospects?"

"That's rather a difficult question. My prospects?—you know them better than I. If I please my employers, and business continues good, perhaps I may advance a little more in their confidence; but my hopes?—the hopes of a girl are oftentimes very silly, aren't they?"

"Are they? I'm not sure. I don't want to depress you, Miss Trelawney, but you asked me the other day whether I was ill. No, I am not . . . but . . . I think I am rather miserable."

"I am sorry," replied Eleanor politely.

"Some people have a genius for friendship," went on Miss Statham. "I have not. I had years ago, I think, but that part of my nature has become atrophied. But I have taken a liking to you. I feel that I can speak to you; perhaps there's something akin in our natures. I want to speak confidentially to you about myself. It's an awful confession to make, isn't it? but I do. Is it because I'm getting old, or is it a woman's whim? I am thirty-seven and you are just over twenty, I suppose?"

"Nearly twenty-two," replied Eleanor.

"Then there are fifteen years between us. Do you ever expect to get married?"

"No," replied Eleanor.

"But you will; at least, I hope you will."

"Why should I?"

Miss Statham was silent for a few seconds. "Miss Tre-lawney," she said at length, "I suppose I am what you might call a well educated woman. My father was a barrister and sufficiently successful to be able to send me to a good school—St. Andrew's, in fact. When I finished there I went on to Girton and was supposed to distinguish myself. You have some idea of what Girton is, and how a number of girls will talk when they get together. I got mixed up with what was called the advanced set and we discussed in our own way what a woman's life ought to be. We greatly believed in woman's rights and we scorned the idea that a woman should in any way live a life inferior to that of a man. Of course, we were angry that we could not take our degrees in the same way men could, however much we might be superior to them in intelligence and attainments.

"We claimed that no position should be open to a man which was not also open to a woman. In the abstract, I suppose, we were right. Anyhow, my mind was filled with all that sort of thoughts.

COUNTRY CHURCH DEPARTMENT

What a Country Minister Should Know

By Anton T. Boisen

IT was once my privilege to be present at the examination of a candidate for ordination at a meeting of a Congregational Association. The candidate in question was a country minister—a simple, earnest, sweet-spirited young man who had been doing a fine bit of service in a neglected field. As a country minister myself, I was much interested in the questions which they asked him and the character of the examination which they conducted. After the reading of his personal statement, a brief but sincere and pointed summary of his faith, they put him over the coals. One good brother wanted a clearer statement of his idea of the inspiration of the Bible. Another wanted to know what he thought of the miracles. Another asked whether he believed in the virgin birth. Still another severe-looking gentleman in spectacles was much concerned about his familiarity with Congregational polity. There were other questions of the same character. Then it was discovered that the candidate, while he had had six years in college and seminary, had yet no degree from the seminary. This discovery aroused considerable discussion. Some were afraid it might lower the standard of the Congregational ministry to admit a man who had no seminary degree. Altogether, the examination was a fairly typical one. At least I have heard similar examinations before other bodies and not so very long ago I submitted to one myself.

As a visitor at this Association I did not feel called upon to say anything, but I analyzed the questions asked and discovered that all of them had to do with just three things:

1. The things which a man must believe or say that he believes.
2. His knowledge of and familiarity with the organization.
3. The academic insignia which he wore.

Now I am not one of those who fail to recognize the importance of a man's beliefs or the need of loyalty to the organization to which he belongs or the necessity of thorough training and preparation. I merely want to call attention to certain omissions.

In the first place, there were no questions asked about the candidate's purpose. I will venture the assertion that of all the questions which may be asked of a young minister there is none more significant. It was my task for some two and a half years to study the religious conditions in certain sections of the country. In the course of this study I asked this question many times and I found the answers most illuminating. Nearly all of them were of one type: "My task is to save souls," "My task is to win men for Christ." These were the common answers. With them I have no particular fault to find. When, however, I tried to get the meaning of these phrases in terms of character and social life I met with poor success. The failure on the part of this Association to ask any questions bearing on this matter seems to me, therefore, a serious omission. Such questions seem for more important than the questions concerning the personal beliefs to which most of the attention was given. Surely, if you know what a man is trying to do you can be fairly certain of the essential elements of his faith.

In the second place, although this man was a country minister, there was no consideration given to his familiarity or lack of familiarity with the problems of country life. It is, of course, not necessary for a minister to be either a "born" farmer or a scientific farmer. One of the most successful country ministers I know usually prefaces his delightful talks on the country church with the statement: "I was born in the city and raised in the city and I have always preached in the country." Instead of being necessary to know all about farming, it is often well to avoid carefully the appearance of assuming to know very much about farming, or about anything else, for that matter. Of course, it may be seriously embarrassing if you cannot milk a cow or hitch up a horse or tell potatoes from rag-weeds, but even that may be less of a handicap than the suspicion of superior knowledge. Frequently the best way to get things done is to stand in the background and help someone else to do them. For this reason it is of great importance for the country minister to be thoroughly acquainted with the great agencies which are working today for better farming, better business methods among farmers, and a better social life in farming communities. It should be part of the minister's task to bring his people into touch with these agencies, for, I take it, God may work through them as well as through church or pulpit. For the same reason he must understand the social and economic forces peculiar to the country community in order that he may recognize and deal intelligently with them. The supremacy of Mrs. Grundy, the jealousy of leadership, the sacredness of tradition, the dangers of isolation, the strength which comes from the first-hand struggle with nature, the peculiarities of the labor problem, the importance of good roads, the ins and outs of tenancy, the menace of the tough gang and the healing power of wholesome amusement, and the magic of co-operation—all these influence for weal or for woe the lives of his people and with them and through them he must work as he seeks to make his community part of his Master's Kingdom.

In the third place, no questions were asked which would test the candidate's knowledge of the human personality with which it was his task to work. What would we think of a physician who knew all about herbs and medicines and yet knew nothing about human anatomy and physiology and hygiene? And yet isn't it true of many of our ministers, that while we have studied the principles of the Christian faith, and have traced the origin and development of that faith as revealed in the Bible and its subsequent development in the historic work of the Church, we have made little attempt to study the human personality either in health or in sickness or the interplay of forces in human society. We make little conscious or systematic attempt to diagnose cases or to recognize the social factors which are involved in order that we may be able to bring to bear, according to the needs of the particular case, the forces of healing and of power which lie in the Christian religion. Insofar as this is true we can make no claim to be wise physicians. We are either quack doctors dealing with a universal specific, or else we are harmless but impractical "idealists."

The older message in its cruder forms approached perilously near the patent nostrum. You can hear it even to-day in some revival meetings. There is a place called heaven and a place called hell. You are going to die some day, and if you want to go to heaven you must take the proper medicine. You need "the wonder-working power of the blood of the Lamb." But even at its crudest this old message represented a real attempt to bring hope and salvation to the soul that was sick, and where its premises were accepted that old message has been a gospel of life-giving power to many a needy soul.

But that old message is passing now. Ministers and people are alike becoming emancipated from the old beliefs which gave it power. But the new message which has followed the old has lost its ring, authority and assurance. It has become an idealistic philosophy which puts God so high that it leaves Him no real influence in human affairs, and it devotes itself to social reform and religious education. But for the soul that is sick the new message has no gospel of hope or salvation. It turns such cases over to the doctors and to our rapidly growing hospitals for the insane.

It may be suggested that the seminary training upon which this Association was inclined to insist would have made good these omissions. My observation is, however, that even to-day a man can pass through almost any of our theological schools and get his degree without ever having seriously studied the human personality either in health or in sickness or the social and economic forces which affect it.

ONE BOOK A WEEK

Under this caption, each week, we shall direct attention to some striking book, such as no Minister or those interested in religious thought and action can afford to remain unacquainted with

A Great Autobiography*

AN autobiography to justify its publication should fulfil at least one of two essentials. It should be either the record of a great or unique life, or it should be told with such insight, ability and charm as to make it a work of art.

"The Days of a Man" measures up to both standards. Dr. Jordan has fought the good fight and kept the faith. His story is as inspiring and human a document as has been printed in years.

Starting with what is sometimes supposed to be the handicap of poverty, but in reality, with the greatest of all blessings—ancestors made up "of common men, farmers, teachers, preachers, lawyers and their women folk—all of the old Puritan stock," Dr. Jordan by hard work, sobriety and ability rose to become one of the great souls of his day, measured by any standard.

As a scientist he has achieved an international reputation for his work on fishes. As an educator he is usually reckoned as one of the less than half dozen really great college presidents. As a "minor prophet of democracy" (which he modestly calls himself), he has played a major rôle in American life that few of his contemporaries can hope to emulate.

If Huxley was right when he said that the truly educated man is he who knows something about everything and everything about something then Dr. Jordan is educated. He has never ceased from boyhood to old age to widen his knowledge of fishes. In his researches throughout America, Europe, Asia and Australia he has discovered twenty-five hundred new species of fishes of the twelve thousand known to science, while of the seven thousand genera, actual or nominal named since scientific nomenclature began in 1758, he has to his credit 1,085. He has not only nobly served science in this, his chosen field, but the Government has recognized his abilities by appointing him on various commissions, the most important being the Joint Fish Commission of Canada and the United States and the Joint Commission composed of England, Japan, Russia and the United States for the preservation of the fur seals in the Behring Sea.

In addition to his services in the realm of research Dr. Jordan has built up Leland Stanford, Jr., University from nothing into one of the great educational institutions in the world. And all the while he found time to take an active part in the burning issues of the day. By pen and voice he has never flagged in championing worthy causes even when those were unpopular and his espousal was sure to be misunderstood. Yet despite this intensely active life he found time to travel all over the world, to dip into philosophy and religion and not infrequently to drop into poetry.

It is impossible in the space at my command to enumerate the interesting places this wandering Ulysses has visited, the interesting people he has met, and the honors that have come to him. His autobiography would have been worth while if it had been little more than a catalog of his successes. But it is much more than that. The personality of the scientist, the patriot and the truth-seeker suffuses the whole chronicle, all so simply, so entertainingly and often so eloquently told, that there is not an uninteresting page in the whole 1,662 pages of the two volumes. Moreover, there is many a gleam of humor sprinkled over the text, though Dr. Jordan declares he takes his fun internally. In short, the book is human from beginning to end and in that respect, as in not a few others, can be compared with Franklin's autobiography.

Dr. Jordan's place in American science and education is secure. How he will rank as a "minor prophet" remains to be seen. In that category his efforts for peace were his greatest endeavor. The public got the impression that he was the peace-at-any-price variety of pacifist, in those turbulently intolerant days just preceding our entrance into the war. This popular view was perhaps not unnatural for Dr. Jordan was probably the most conspicuous advocate of "keeping us out of the war" in the land. Even after Wilson had appeared before Congress to ask for a declaration of war, Dr. Jordan kept up the peace fight, feeling that until Congress gave its consent the country was not officially committed to war and there was still hope to avert America's participation. But those who charged Dr. Jordan with what evils may lurk in ultra-pacifism little understood the man. Dr. Jordan came into the peace movement through the door of biology. His "The Blood of the Nation" and "The Human Harvest" broke entirely new ground. These books demonstrated that war is the survival of the unfit in the sense that the best youth are killed in war and therefore leave the second best to be the fathers of the next generation—a procedure which reverses the usual processes of evolution. It was not as the sentimental pacifist that he deplored war, but as the scientist and democrat. War was worse than immoral. It was inefficient. It was stupid.

It was these convictions that caused Dr. Jordan to stand almost alone when he called for calmness and reason in these last few weeks before our entrance into the war. After war was declared, he loyally supported the Government by word and deed. "Our country is now at war," he telegraphed the San Francisco 'Bulletin,' "and the only way out is forward."

I have never read an autobiography where the names of so many friends and acquaintances are mentioned. I wish space permitted extensive quotations from his sympathetic and apt characterizations. Suffice it to mention three.

Of Agassiz, his beloved teacher he wrote: "Essentially an idealist he regarded all his own investigations, not as studies of animals and plants as such, but as glimpses into the divine plans of which their structures are the expression. . . . To his mind, also, divine ideas were especially embodied in animal life; the species being the "thought unit." The marvel of structural affinity and plan in creatures of widely diverse habits, and outward appearance, he took to be simply a result of association of ideas in the divine mind."

With Roosevelt there was much intimacy in the earlier days. But latterly when Roosevelt began to brandish the "big stick" and put those who differed with him in the Ananias Club, Dr. Jordan's admiration cooled off a little. "When I recall Roosevelt's later days, there rise to my mind the last words of Steerforth in 'David Copperfield,' 'Think of me at my best, Davey.' With the rest of his countrymen I shall always think of him at his best. Best and worst—that which his friends most praised and his critics most decried—were strikingly mixed. In my judgment strength and weakness sprang from the same root, for he thought with his heart rather than his head. Though particularly fitted by nature and training to form opinions, these were always subordinated to feelings. Where emotion came contrary to reason, so much the worse for reason. But when as in most cases reason and emotion went hand in hand, he was an immense force for good."

Of Woodrow Wilson he wrote: "There have been many analyses—friendly and otherwise—of his character and purposes. These I shall not discuss, further than to affirm my belief that his lofty expressions of American idealism will give him ultimately a higher place than his admirers now claim for him."

Dr. Jordan warns the reader that he will not indulge in personal criticisms—an excellent resolution for those who record themselves permanently in book form. And yet in speaking of Senator Lodge he gets around his rule rather adroitly by dismissing him in the following sentence, which is about the best example of that rhetorical device known as "the emphasis of understatement" I happen to remember. "As the best thing I can say of the senior Senator of Massachusetts is nothing, I refrain from further comment."

Dr. Jordan's philosophy can be perhaps best summed up in his own words. "Wisdom is knowing what to do next, virtue doing it, religion our conception why the right action is better than wrong and prayer the core of our endeavor."

Life to Dr. Jordan is not as the cynical Lord Balfour said, "a disreputable episode in one of the minor planets," but a man's job, hard, incessant and if well done, ennobling. Following facts and the ideals these facts suggest is the greatest quest in life. "The only final test of a supposed fact is found in our ability to prove it by entrusting our lives to it or to the method by which it is gained. Simply to prove that a proposition will "work" that is muddled along after a fashion, is not enough; in all its parts it must stand a supreme test, that of "livableness."

I cannot do better than end this brief review with a quotation from a letter sent Dr. Jordan by his friends in the office of the San Francisco "Call" on his seventieth birthday. "Learned scholar, understanding teacher, brave idealist, you were one of the small and suffering band of men who labored to keep humanity a little above the level of the beast, while all your fellows sank deeper and deeper into madness.

"You might have struck your banners with apparent honor; you choose to fight onward to apparent defeat. It is part of your strength that on this day, when you spare the allotted three-score years and ten, you are more deserving than ever of the love and reverence of your friends, who in their own selfishness wish for you many more years of life."

Simon Peter

JOHN 1:35-42

"Lord, thou knowest all things; thou knowest that I love thee."—(John 21:17.)

1. Supreme insight and hospitality for the character of Jesus.

ON the score of greatness there should be written in favor of Simon Peter.

Peter apprehended much more swiftly than any other of the early disciples, and was responsive to, the character of the greatest personality the world had seen. It was not posthumous praise; it was present appreciation, welcome and worship of that unique Messiah. His instincts, choices and affections melted into the heart of the Son of man and the tides of heaven swept back far up stream into the soul of the fisherman of Galilee. "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God," was the ready response to his Master's inquiry of the apostolic group, as to their opinion of him. Others, and Peter himself, had previously called Jesus the Son of God, but it had not become a deep, permanent conviction in their minds hitherto, such as was brought out in these teaching interrogatories of their Master after two years of intercourse and discussion in these hostile challenges from without. We start, therefore, with a mind whose windows were all open to gleams from the Light of the World. This was the key to the transformation of a rough, volatile sailor into a stabilized disciple and eloquent advocate of Jesus Christ.

We need not blink at Peter's failure and fall in denying his Master. It has been open to the world for twenty centuries, but while regrettable, it does not stand in the eyes of men as Judas' betrayal did. There was no deliberation about it and the eyes of his Master brought tears and genuine, swift recovery. On the very threshold of their ministry, this apostle and his mate were marked by the Sanhedrin for boldness and they "perceived that they were unlearned and ignorant men, . . . and took knowledge of them, that they had been with Jesus."

There must have been greatness in a character which could possess so many infirmities and yet cast them off and attain so praiseworthy and exalted a position after middle life.

Jesus had trusted Peter; he knew how the years of contact, fellowship, teaching and discipline would secure the victory over all the weaknesses of his affectionate disciple. Peter is an illustration of one who absorbs from a great Master his major qualities of character. He had no side lines. An old Kentucky breeder of race horses had a colt which he never allowed to sleep with other animals. The owner occupied the next stall. No wonder the annals of the turf show a marvelous record for even a horse that never associated with other creature than a great master.

2. As the personal structural engineer of the Church of Christ.

A study of the chapters of the first half of the book of Acts reveals the large part of Peter was to have in unfolding the principles of the early church. After the first assemblies, when the disciples had all things in common, and almost immediately, Peter is found entering with John into the temple. He tells the expectant beggar, "Silver and gold have I none; but what I have, that give I thee." Phalansteries might be perilous elements in the new order. There is a higher benevolence and ministry of fellow disciples to each other and together to the world. Speaking of ecclesiastical propaganda as against that which is evangelical and spiritual, said one concerning the mission fields with which he was familiar: "The churchy group gained their entire congregation by doles and poverty purchase." The Pilgrims at Plymouth in their day were delivered under wise leadership from the danger which threatened the early church through socialistic features.

Peter also stood for the purifying of possessions among the early converts and supporters of the Church. It was he who called Ananias and Sapphira to account for their falsehoods and whose sentence was swiftly confirmed by the higher court of heaven. No principles of accommodation were allowed by this leader to impair the foundation or super-structure of the Church of his Master. Romans who falsely claimed this disciple as their first bishop have no sanction for their subsequent principle and practise of compounding felonies from the conduct of this servant of Christ.

3. He stood the tests of a great character in crises and emergencies.

Peter's warm and enthusiastic temperament helped as well as hindered his rise to prominence. His memorable failure and the denial of Jesus at the time of his trial were followed by swift sorrow. He did not even run away, or hide himself, nor did he seek sympathy from those hostile to his Master. He remained near and ready to repent. Nor did Peter allow himself to be separated from his fellow disciples as the shadows deepened on Calvary. He remained with the rest of the little band and was early with John at the sepulcher on the resurrection morning. Certainly he did not forfeit the confidence of the other apostles by his fall, nor that of Jesus who sent him a special message by Mary Magdalene as he rose: "Go, tell my disciples and Peter." The gulf closed quickly and did not remain open for the germs of prejudice. The wound was aseptic, deep and bloody as it was.

Here we may leave him, still the servant of the beloved Church, as he passes from the record and from our sight, learning that patience which his epistle enjoins and which is a mark of greatness. We part from him undergoing cheerfully that experience which the Master foretold for his impetuous follower. "When thou shalt be old, thou shalt stretch forth thy hands, and another shall gird thee, and carry thee whither thou wouldst not" (John 21:18).

HAS THE CHURCH A MINISTRY TO THE JEWS?

Some Notes of a Conference in Princeton

The Jewish question is now up for open discussion in America. Publicists and thinkers have been giving consideration to many aspects of the perplexing problem. A stream of books, pamphlets and magazine articles have been issuing from the press calculated to develop attitudes either favorable or unfavorable to the Jews. For the most part the discussion has been left to those who have little or no interest in the Church or the missionary enterprise. And yet the Jewish question, though having many angles, is essentially a religious question, and no real solution can be found until it is approached frankly and intelligently from this point of view.

Unfortunately the Church is not yet awake to its responsibility to the four millions of the race of Jesus now living in the United States. Some Christians hold that as the Jews have a religion of their own, we are entitled to leave them to that; as if the absence of Christ from a religion were of little consequence. Others say the Jews have had their day, and now the Church can conscientiously pass them by. Others again declare you can never convert a Jew, though the history of the Christian centuries refutes the assertion and demonstrates that work for the Jews is proportionately more fruitful than that for any other non-Christian people. Still others, recognizing the peculiar difficulties in the way of Jewish evangelization, maintain that it is the duty of the Church to turn aside from the Jews to more fruitful fields. But the majority of Christians are simply indifferent. They are uninformed as to the Jewish situation in America and the responsibility of the Christian Church for their spiritual welfare.

The one significant fact, however, that furnishes encouragement to those who are concerned for the Jews is the awakening interest among Christians in all parts of the country in the development of a worthwhile ministry in their behalf. The Conference in Princeton, called by the Department of Jewish Evangelization of the Board of Home Missions of the Presbyterian Church, was marked by an intensity of interest and a breadth of view which indicate that a new policy and a new program of approach to the Jews have been initiated. Among the speakers were Professor Charles R. Erdman, of Princeton; Drs. John A. Marquis and John McDowell, of the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions; Dr. Max I. Reich, president of the Hebrew Christian Alliance; Dr. H. H. McQuilkin, of Orange; and a number of men engaged in work for the Jews.

Among the facts brought out in the Conference concerning the Jewish situation in America were these:

The United States, with about four millions of Jews, is now the largest Jewry in the world. New York with its 1,750,000

Jews is the most extraordinary Jewish community the world has ever known. The Jews are scattered over every State and territory of the Union, not only in large cities, but in towns and villages. There are 75,000 Jews engaged in agriculture in the open country.

The presence of so many Jews in America, their eagerness to avail themselves of opportunities denied to them in Europe, their progress in industry, commerce, finance, politics and the leading professions was dwelt upon and the importance of enlisting this alert and masterful people under the Christian standard was emphasized. This obligation becomes the more urgent as perhaps as many as eighty per cent. of the people have abandoned the ancient faith and are religiously adrift. Many are seeking satisfaction in socialism, Christian Science and other modern cults.

The most disturbing fact in the Jewish situation is the rise of anti-Semitism. Not only is there widespread racial prejudice, but the Jew has been singled out for special attack. While Jews guilty of misconduct or crime occupy an indefensible position, the Conference called attention to the tendency to blame the whole Jewish race for the sins of the few. Indeed the Jew throughout the ages has been made the scape-goat for all untoward conditions in the lands of their dispersion. Here in America Christians must oppose all propaganda calculated to develop suspicion and hatred of the Jew as alien to the Christian spirit and American ideals. Such a spirit moreover raises an almost impenetrable veil between the Jew and Christ.

Particularly suggestive were the addresses and discussions dealing with the attitude of the Christian Church to the Jews.

The conviction was repeatedly expressed that the Christian Church has not only a ministry to the Jews, but is challenged by the great commission of Christ and every Christian motive to include them specially in its missionary program. The situation here in America in particular lays a burden of responsibility upon all Christians to interpret the spirit of Christ to this people, so long the victims of injustice and ill-will in lands nominally Christian in Eastern Europe.

Experience has demonstrated the value of a community approach to Jews living in Jewish neighborhoods. The varied ministries carried on by such enterprises furnish opportunities for those contacts calculated to remove prejudice and open a way for the Gospel. As the majority of Jews in this country, however, do not live in ghettos, but in the neighborhood of Christian churches, it was generally recognized that the work of Jewish evangelization could not be adequately overtaken until every church having Jews in its community was enlisted in a ministry to its Jewish neighbors. This, it was recognized, involved a program of education for the Church itself, and the employment in many cases of workers specially trained in methods of intelligent approach to the Jews. Emphasis was also laid upon the importance of highly

Christianity and Progress

By HARRY EMERSON FOSDICK, D.D.

Professor of Practical Theology, Union Theological Seminary

Dr. Fosdick is probably the most popular writer of religious books in the country to-day. Over a half million copies of his books in the Every Day Life Series have been distributed. This latest work consists of the 1922 Cole Lectures at Vanderbilt University.

specialized literature to carry a special appeal to the Jewish mind.

The prevailing note in the Princeton Conference was one of hope. The presence of a considerable number of Jewish Christians who are engaged in work for their own people was in itself a source of encouragement. The number of Jews who have already become followers of Christ in this country meets conclusively the idea that prevails in some quarters that Christian work in their behalf is unfruitful. What was even more remarkable was the testimonies as to the movements within Judaism itself indicating a changed attitude to Jesus, and the acceptance by many Jews, still within their own fold, of Jesus as the Messiah. Undoubtedly these are days of crisis for our Jewish people, but they are even more manifestly days of responsibility for the Christians. If the Church will but utilize her resource of prayer, money and service a work may be done here in America that will remove the reproach of the Christian centuries and bring the Jews into fellowship and loyal allegiance to their own Messiah.

DR. FOSDICK ON UNITARIANS

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN WORK:

Not in any spirit of controversy, but simply to promote better understanding, I should like the privilege of correcting an obvious misunderstanding of prevailing Unitarian thought expressed in Dr. Fosdick's admirable sermon printed in your issue of April 7. He seems to imply that Unitarians preach a sort of atheistic humanism, which counsels men to be good without any divine source of goodness. He says that to offer Jesus as the ideal for men to imitate, without seeing God in Him, is like asking a sick man to imitate an athlete. He seems to accuse Unitarians of such folly. He would score a point if they did indeed seek to explain Jesus and life without God. But as they do not, the criticism is scarcely fair. There is nothing in his sermon that they are likely to take exception to except his reference to their teaching.

When we think that Jesus was no isolated phenomenon we do not think of God as away up in heaven all the time, but of the immanent Deity who is seeking to incarnate His love and life more perfectly in human forms. In the words of Dr. W. C. Gannett, "We believe in God, the Light, the Life, the Love in all things immanent; in Incarnation as the indwelling God unfolding and manifesting Himself in all men." We say with Martineau, "The universe gives us the scale of God and Christ His spirit." We sing with Hosmer—

"Thought answereth alone to thought
And soul with soul hath kin,
The outward God he findeth not
Who finds not God within."

We agree with Emerson—

"So near is grandeur to our dust
So near is God to man
When Duty whispers, Lo thou must,
The youth replies, I can."

Unitarians are accustomed to criticism and do not mind it, but it surely does gall them a little to be charged with the folly of telling men to be good without having faith that God is revealed by His spiritual grace in the love of Jesus and in all who like him seek to do the will of God. The very essence of their teaching is that the Divine Life is seeking to incarnate its eternal beauty in men, and of this Jesus is the pre-eminent example.

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN WORK:

Your editorial on "The Church and Divorce" is of interest as are all your editorials, especially those on human and personal questions. I would greatly like to read what you might have to say on this question approached from another angle. I have made somewhat of a study of those persons whom I have married and supplemented it by a study of some couples whom I have known closely where marriage was not a success. The conclusions I have reached are several, but they all lead to this one, namely, that marriages are made in haste and ignorance, and that prevention and education is the only cure. It seems to me that the modern picture show, the modern novel, the whole modern attitude toward courtship is cheap and often positively degrading. Is not the Church's chief duty in the matter to break her conspiracy of silence. We never tell our young life that in the years of middle adolescence that a holy instinct awakes, that out of it issues interest in the other sex, that homes are founded thereon, but that any partnership but a partnership of mind and spirit fails whether it ends in the divorce court or not. I do not think that the treatment of the subject in "The Glass of Fashion" is overdrawn. "Incompatibility" in this age of "nerves" is very often only temper and irritability. Many there are who cannot get along together and cannot endure separation.

A PAYING INVESTMENT

A veteran Chinese Christian who lived near a river extremely difficult to cross sold his small tract of land in order to build a bridge for Christians to cross to attend Sunday and mid-week services. After his death a county official heard of the charitable deed and went out to investigate the bridge. He found it was a well-constructed bridge and that it was of great benefit to the community. He immediately inquired if any members of the family remained. Upon his inquiry he found there was a small boy of sixteen. He requested the sponsor to come to his office with him. After consultation the boy was promised an annual income from the money the father had expended on the bridge to pay for the boy's food, clothing and tuition while in our mission school. Besides the official promised him five American acres of land for the boy's later use.

WHAT WOULD YOU REPLY?

On one of a missionary's country trips an influential village elder who had studied both the Old and New Testament, "The Evidences of Christianity" and other religious books asked the following questions: Is the Garden of Eden story a parable? Did it take place in heaven or on earth? Where does the devil come from? Why did God create a devil? How do you account for demon possession? Why did God have man break the covenant? With such questions as these one is continually confronted. It means the Chinese are beginning to think and investigating the truth of Christianity. We are to give a reason for the faith that is in us.

THE TREATMENT OF CRIME

A liberal view of this subject is presented by Charles L. Chute, general secretary of the National Probation Association, in the "American Review of Reviews" for May. He says very little has been done in the way of scientific treatment of crime problems. Severe penalties have never been a deterrent. The recent increase in spectacular crime is due to after-effects of the war, the automobile's increase as a means of escape, publicity given through motion pictures and the newspapers, and especially the inadequacy of the old system of treatment under present conditions. A thorough overhauling of the entire system of law, courts and prisons is necessary, so that it will be possible to learn the causes of crime in each individual case and establish a system that will remove or correct these causes. The chief agencies now being used are probation, court clinics, juvenile courts, with special detention homes and domestic relations courts. In place of the modern prison we should have: 1. A well-supervised probation system. 2. Special hospitals for feeble-minded, insane, epileptic or physically sick offenders. 3. Reformatories for confirmed criminals, where they should be taught trades and made to live as nearly normal lives as possible; after their release they should be put on strict parole.
